COMMENTARY

UPON

THE FIFTH BOOK OF MOSES,

CALLED

DEUTERONOMY

CHAP. XXVIII.

Ver. 1. AND it shall come to pass.] In this chapter he repeats, with many enlargements, the reward and penalties which he had promised and threatened in the book of Leviticus, unto the observance or breach of the covenant they had made with God: and here in this verse he promises in general the blessings which are more particularly enumerated in the following verses.

If thou wilt hearken diligently unto the voice of the Lord thy God, to observe and do all his commandments, &c.] See vii. 12. where the same thing is said; only here he adds the word diligently, to make them attend with the greater seriousness to what he delivered. (See chap. xi. 13. 22.)

That the Lord thy God will set thee on high above all nations of the earth.] By bestowing on them the following blessings. (See vii. 14.) They were already endued with singular privileges above other nations, (Exod. xix. 5, 6.) which by their obedience would be confirmed, continued, and augmented, in greater plenty of all things.

Ver. 2. And all these blessings shall come upon thee, and overtake thee.] Blessings that come unexpectedly, and when we are not in pursuit of them, are most welcome, and highly delight us. And such God here promises to bestow on them by his gracious providence, without their laborious and anxious seeking after them. By which very thing he set them above all nations: for what they followed after eagerly, and many times in vain, he undertakes should come to them and prevent their desires.

If thou shalt hearken unto the voice of the Lord thy God.] So as to observe and do all his commandments; as it is explained in the foregoing verse.

Ver. 3. Blessed shalt thou be in the city, and blessed shalt thou be in the field.] That is, in all their affairs, within doors or without. Or whether they lived by employments in the city, or by husbandry in tilling the ground. It is not a natural interpretation of these words, which one of the Hebrew doctors gives of them in Bava Metzia, where he expounds, blessed shalt thou be in the city, Thy house shall be so nigh unto the synagogue, that thou needest not be troubled by going a long way to it; and blessed in the field, Thy ground shall lie so near to the city, that thou mayest quickly bring the fruit it produces to be sold in the market. But if he could have gone on in this manner, it had been something tolerable; but he expounds what follows in a most indecent manner. (See Wagenseil upon the Gemara of Sota, cap. 3. sect. 9. annot. 5.)

Ver. 4. Blessed shall be the fruit of thy body.] This seems to be a promise of preventing miscarriages, when they were with child: for a numerous progeny is promised afterward, (ver. 11.)

And the fruit of thy ground.] This signifies they should have seasonable harvest and vintages. For fruit of the ground comprehends not only all sorts of corn, but grapes, figs, pomegranates, and such-like fruits which grow on trees.

And the fruit of thy cattle.] By the word behema is sometimes meant all sorts of brute creatures, in opposition to men; sometimes tame creatures, in opposition to wild beasts: but here all sorts of domestic creatures (except kine, sheep, and goats), viz. asses and camels. Which Jacob brought with him, as well as oxen and sheep, when he came from Laban into Canaan. (Gen. xxxii. 5. 7.)

And the increase of thy kine.] The breed of these was very profitable, being a considerable part of the riches not only of that, but of other countries; as appears by what Pausanias saith of them. (See Bochartus, par. i. Hierozoicon, lib. ii. cap. 40. in the beginning.)

And the flocks of thy sheep.] Under the name of sheep, in the Hebrew, are comprehended goats also. All which God promises to increase, that is, to make them very wealthy. And here it may be observed, that the Israelites were generally husbandmen or shepherds, and did not commonly follow any other trades: and therefore no mention is made of them here, unless it be in ver. 6. where he seems to speak of all sorts of business.

Ver. 5. Blessed shall be thy basket.] The Jerusalem Targum refers to the basket wherein they carried up their first-fruits, (xxvi. 2.) But the Vulgar Latin translates it thy barns: and so do the LXX. αἱ ἀποθῆκαί σου, the place where they laid up their corn and other fruits of the earth. Which God promises both to fill, and to preserve from the fire, or thieves, or other disasters.

And thy store.] The LXX. and the Vulgar translate it, all that was remaining; of which they had not present use, but kept till they had occasion for it. So it is a promise that they should never want; but still have something lying by them in store (as we translate it) above what they needed.

Ver. 6. Blessed shalt thou be when thou comest in, and blessed shalt thou be when thou goest out.] This the Jerusalem Targum interprets, of their entering into their schools, and going home again. But it rather signifies, they should have good journeys when they had occasion to travel, and find all safe when they returned home: or be prosperous both in time of peace and in time of war; when they are said, in the Hebrew phrase, to go out against their enemies. Or it may signify, in general, good success in all their affairs; which is expressed by the phrase of coming in and going out, (xxxi. 2. 2 Sam. iii. 25.) But I see no ground to think that it relates to traffic or manufactures: for they were of little use among a people, whose plain way of living made few things necessary, but what every man could make himself. And therefore we find by Ezekiel, who describes (chap. xxvii.) the great variety of merchandise which was brought to the mart of Tyre, that the Israelites carried nothing thither but wheat, and honey, and oil, and balm, (ver. 17.) which are the commodities the earth itself produceth.

Ver. 7. The Lord shall cause thine enemies that rise up against thee to be smitten before thy face.] God had promised before, that, when they went up to serve him at their solemn festivals, their enemies should not so much as desire their land, (Exod. xxxiv. 24.) and now he assures them, that, when they did invade their country, they should not prevail, but be overthrown by them.

They shall come out against thee one way, and flee before thee seven ways.] He not only promises them victory, but a complete victory. For fleeing seven ways (i. e. many ways), imports a total overthrow; which made every man shift for himself, as soldiers do when they are entirely routed.

Ver. 8. And the Lord shall command the blessing upon thee.] Protect them in their enjoyments by his sovereign power and providence; when otherwise they would have been in danger.

In thy storehouses.] The LXX. translate it ταμεῖα, and the Vulgar cellaria; which signify places wherein other goods were laid up within doors, as corn was in barns without, (ver. 5.)

And in all that thou settest thine hand unto.] In all manner of undertakings and employments.

And he shall bless thee in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee.] Make them live long therein.

Ver. 9. The Lord thy God shall establish thee a holy people unto himself.] Confirm them in that noble relation wherein they stood to him. (See vii. 6. xiv. 2.)

As he hath sworn unto thee.] See vii. 12.

If thou wilt keep the commandments of the Lord thy God.] He had separated them from all people, by peculiar laws and privileges: for this purpose, that they should be governed by him, and be obedient to him.

And walk in his ways.] Nobody can see any reason to make this a special precept (as the Jews do), that we should walk in the ways of the Lord. Which contains all the duty owing to him: whether by his ways we understand those Divine qualities, of mercy, holiness, goodness, and truth, whereby we approach to him; or (as the word ways is commonly used in Scripture) his Divine precepts, whereby he comes (as it were) unto us, and declares his mind and will towards us, by conformity to which we become like him in those Divine qualities: for that is the entire meaning of walking in his ways; ordering all our actions according to the direction of his holy will, whereby we resemble him.

Ver. 10. And all the people of the earth.] Who were round about them, or should have any knowledge of them.

Shall see that thou art called by the name of the Lord.] Be convinced that you are, after a peculiar manner, the Lord's people, (xiv. 1. xxvi. 18.) For wheresoever we read that a person or thing hath the name of God called upon it, or is called by his name, the meaning is, that it is his. As the city called by God's name, Jer. xxv. 29. is the city of God, where he dwelt, viz. Jerusalem. And thus the ark is said to have the name of God called on it, 1 Chron. xii. 6. i. e. was the Lord's ark, or the ark of the covenant. And as here the children of Israel are said to be the people called by his name, so it is said of the Christian church, Acts xv. 17. For the very same phrase (as Mr. Mede observes) is used of the like relation that men have unto that which is theirs. Thus Jacob saith, Gen. xlviii. 16. that his name should be called on the two sons of Joseph, that is, they should be his, as Reuben and Simeon were: which shews these are words of adoption. (See Disc. i. p. 7.)

And shall be afraid of thee.] Not dare to do thee any hurt, or fear to have thee their enemy.

Ver. 11. The Lord thy God shall make thee plenteous in goods.] Bestow on them abundance of all good things, that their hearts could desire.

In the fruit of thy body.] By giving them a numerous and healthy issue; whereby they should be multiplied like the stars of heaven, or the sand on the sea-shore; according to the promise made to Abraham, Gen. xv. 5. xxii. 17.

And in the fruit of thy cattle.] Which he promised likewise to increase exceedingly.

And in the fruit of thy ground.] Which should afford large crops of corn, and great store of all other fruits every year.

In the land which the Lord sware unto thy fathers to give thee.] So that they should not need to send unto other countries to procure food (as they did in the days of their father Jacob), but have enough in their own land to support them all, though never so numerous.

Ver. 12. The Lord shall open his good treasure unto thee, the heaven to give thee rain unto thy land.] The heaven, or the air, is called the good treasure of God, because there he gathers together great heaps of clouds, from whence he enriches the earth with fattening showers of rain: which when he withholds, he is said to shut up this treasure, (xi. 17.) and when he bestows it, to open it; that his people might be sensible of their dependance upon his bounty for that blessing, as well as others, which he dispenses as he pleaseth.

In its season.] The former and the latter rain, as the Scripture calls it. The former fell in autumn, after the seed was sown, to make it take root and spring up; the latter fell in the spring-time, to bring the seed which was come up to maturity. (See xi. 14.) See the learned Dr. Prideaux, upon Maimonides's treatise De Donis Pauperum, cap. 1. not. 25.

And to bless all the work of thine hand.] By these seasonable showers he blessed their ploughing and sowing, and produced a plentiful harvest: which seems to be meant here by the work of their hand; viz. their husbandry; which included all sorts of plantations, as well as tillage, (Gen. ix. 20.)

And thou shalt lend unto many nations, and thou shalt not borrow.] A token of great riches, (see xv. 6.) which all nations looked upon as a blessing: as indeed they are with piety. And therefore Callimachus, in his hymn to Jove, prays him to bestow both virtue and riches upon them, (ver. 97.)

—— Δίδου δ' ἀρετήν τε καὶ ὄλβον.

Which puts me in mind of a pertinent observation of Maimonides, in his preface to Pereck Chelek, in which he treats of the foundations of the Jewish religion. "This is the meaning (saith he) of the promises and threatenings of the law, that, if they were obedient to his precepts, he would furnish them with all good things that should further them therein, and remove from them all that hinder them: for no man can serve God as he ought when he is sick, or oppressed with famine, or vexed with wars; therefore God promises to remove all these things, and to give them health and tranquillity, that they might perfect their obedience, and be worthy of the life of the world to come. 'For this is not the end of the law, to make the earth bring forth plentifully, and to prolong men's life upon the earth, and give them healthful bodies; but that by all those things they may be helped and encouraged to perform obedience to it,'" &c.

Ver. 13. And the Lord shall make thee the head, and not the tail.] This is a proverbial speech, which is explained in the words following: And thou shalt be above only, and thou shalt not be beneath. For the head being the first and chief part of all animals, and the tail the last and lowest, those persons are said to be the head who command over others, and those the tail who are subject. And therefore this is a promise that they should rule over other nations, as their lords (as they did in the days of David and Solomon); but other nations should not lord it over them.

If that thou hearken unto the commandments of the Lord thy God, which I command thee this day, to observe and to do them.] This was the condition upon which all their happiness depended; as he had told them in the beginning of this discourse, ver. 1.

Ver. 14. And thou shalt not go astray from any of the words which I command thee this day, to the right hand or to the left.] See chap. v. 32.

To go after other gods to serve them.] This was the principal commandment of the law, to serve no other gods but the Lord alone. Which, while they observed, he was pleased to bless them, and to bear with many other sins which they committed. Upon which account, this commandment is so often repeated, as we find it, in this very book, vi. 14. vii. 4. 16. viii. 19. ix. 16. 28. xi. 3, 4. 30, &c.

Ver. 15. But it shall come to pass, if thou wilt not hearken unto the voice of the Lord thy God, to observe to do all his commandments and statutes, which I command thee this day.] Especially that great commandment, Not to go after other gods to serve them.

That all these curses shall come upon thee, and overtake thee.] Pursue them so, that they should not possibly escape them. The same phrase is used of the blessings, ver. 2.

Ver. 16. Cursed shalt thou be in the city, and cursed shalt thou be in the field.] As miserable, that is, every where, as he intended to have made them happy, (ver. 3.)

Ver. 17. Cursed shall be thy basket and thy store.] The blessing of the barn was to have it full, (ver. 5.) and therefore the curse upon it was to make it empty.

Ver. 18. Cursed shall be the fruit of thy body, and the fruit of thy land, &c.] He threatens to consume their children, their corn, and other fruits, with their herds and flocks.

Ver. 19. Cursed shalt thou be when thou comest in, and cursed shalt thou be when thou goest out.] Have no comfort in any undertaking, either at home or abroad, in peace or in war.

Ver. 20. The Lord shall send upon thee cursing, vexation, and rebuke.] It is very hard to know what these three words particularly import; the two first of them being very variously translated. The first of them, meera, seems to signify, in general, that God would blast them in all they designed and went about; for although the LXX. and Vulgar here render it famine and want, yet elsewhere the LXX. render it as we do, Κατάρα, cursing: and the next word, mehuma, they translate hunger; but in other places the LXX. render it by six or seven words, which import the same with our English vexation, viz. Ταραχὴν, trouble or disturbance; Θόρυβον, tumult; Σύγχυσιν, confusion; Ἔκστασιν, horror or affrightment, &c. which relate to great disorder, disquiet, and perplexity in their mind. And the last word, mighereth, the Vulgar translates as we do, rebuke; but the LXX. Ἀνάλωσιν, consumption; which are the same in effect. For when God rebukes a man for his iniquity, he makes his beauty to consume away like a moth, (Psal. xxxix. 11.) For God's rebukes consist not in words, but in sore afflictions, (2 Kings xix. 3. Psal. xviii. 15, &c.) particularly in disappointments and ill success in their undertakings, and continual fear of worse for the future.

In all that thou settest thine hand unto for to do.] In all their affairs (ver. 8.) they should meet with trouble, perplexity, and defeats.

Until that thou be destroyed.] He threatens that this curse, trouble, and rebuke from God should pursue them, till they had completed their ruin.

And until thou perish quickly.] When God began to punish them, after long patience with them, he was quick in his executions, and many times brought upon them sudden destruction. So he threatens in Zephaniah i. 18. that he would make a speedy riddance of all that dwell in the land. And though the whole nation was not rooted out speedily, but by degrees, yet they enjoyed it but a short time, in comparison of what God designed, if they had been obedient; in that time, they were seldom without some trouble or other, till they were expelled out of their country.

Because of the wickedness of thy doings, whereby thou hast forsaken me.] And followed after other gods, which was the great crime that brought them to desolation.

Ver. 21. The Lord shall make the pestilence cleave unto thee.] The pestilence is threatened in Lev. xxvi. 25. where he saith he will send it among them, and here adds, that it shall cleave unto them, that is, be incurable. And so the author of Schebet Judah confesses, that, after they had been wasted and broken in pieces by wars, they that fled into Spain, in the time of Alphonsus, were swept away in great numbers by a plague; and introduces one applying these very words, as a propheey of it: which I thought fit to note, though this part of the propheey doth not belong to what hath befallen them since the last destruction of Jerusalem (as I shall shew hereafter), but to the times before the first destruction; when he often sent a pestilence to destroy them, (2 Sam. xxiv. 15. Jer. xiv. 12. xxi. 6, 7. 9. and many other places of that book, Ezek. v. 12. vi. 11, 12. Amos iv. 10.) But it must be acknowledged, also, that the Greeks call such unseasonable weather as destroys the fruits of the earth, by the name of Λοιμὸς, pestilence. So Plato, lib. x. de Legibus, saith, that which is called Νόσημα, a disease in bodies, Ἐν δ' ὥραις ἐτῶν καὶ ἐνιαυτῶν λοιμὸν, &c. is called pestilence in the seasons of the year. The murrain also in cattle is called by the same name; which even the pagans thought was sent by the anger of their gods, for the sins of men; as we learn from Callimachus, in his hymn to Diana, where he saith, (ver. 125.) that when she was angry, pestilence ate up their cattle, and hail destroyed the fruits of the earth.

Κτήνεά φιν λοιμὸς μεταβρώσκεται, ἔργα δὲ πάχνη.

As, on the contrary, when she was well-pleased, she sent fruitful seasons, and all manner of happiness, as it follows in that hymn.

Until he have consumed thee from off the land, whither thou goest to possess it.] Made a great destruction, by sweeping away many people; the rest being reserved for other judgments, which follow in the next words.

Ver. 22. And the Lord shall smite thee with a consumption, and with a fever, and with an inflammation.] These three words signify sore diseases in men's bodies: the two first of which, sachepheth and kaddachath, we translate in Lev. xxvi. 16. as we do here; only the second of them we render the burning ague, which here we translate fever. Unto which is here added dalleketh, which signifies such an inflammation as is accompanied with itching (according to the LXX. who translate it Ἐρεθισμὸν), which is extremely grievous, because the scratching of it increases the inflammation.

And with an extreme burning, and with the sword.] These two seem to relate unto the indisposition of the air, by extreme heat and drought; as we translate the word chereb in the margin of our Bibles; for it signifies both the sword and dryness; as the first word charchur signifies scorching heat, which frequently causes diseases: for it being the doubling of the word charar, it denotes the extremity or highest degree of it, as all such words do; of which Bochartus hath given many examples in his Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. i. cap. 19.

And with blasting and with mildew.] These two relate to the destruction of their corn, and the fruits of the earth, which follows upon the corruption of the air, as famine follows upon the corruption of the fruits of the earth. The first word schiddaphon, the LXX. and the other Greek interpreters translate Ἀνεμοφθορίαν, blasting by biting winds; though elsewhere the LXX. translate it by Ἐμπυρισμὸν and Πύρωσιν, which signify such blighting as comes by heat. And the second word jerakon (which comes from jerek, herb or grass, or any green thing) seems properly to be expressed by the LXX. who translate it Ὤχραν; for corn, and grass, and herbs, turn pale and wan for want of moisture.

And they shall pursue thee until thou perish.] These plagues upon their bodies, and upon the air, and the corn, and herbs, he threatens shall come upon them one year after another, till they were consumed.

Ver. 23. And thy heaven that is over thy head shall be brass.] That is, as brass, having no more moisture in it than brass hath. It is remarkable, that he doth not say the heaven, that is, the air or clouds, but thy heaven, that is, the clouds which hung over their country should be dry, though they dropped upon other lands. (See Jer. xiv.)

And the earth that is under thee shall be iron.] Hard as iron, for want of rain to soften it. (See Lev. xxvi. 19.) The observation of Maimonides is worth noting upon this part of the law: "That the Zabii, an ancient sort of idolaters in the eastern countries, thought the fruitfulness of the earth depended upon the worship of the planets, and the rest of the heavenly bodies: and therefore their wise men and their prophets (as he saith he found in their books, particularly in one concerning the husbandry of the Egyptians) taught the people to keep festivals in their honour, because the fruitfulness of the earth, by which men subsist, depends upon their will and pleasure. In opposition to which God ordered Moses to tell the Israelites in his name, that if they worshipped the stars they should have no rain; the earth should be barren, the trees yield no fruit; the season prove unhealthful, and their lives be shortened. On the contrary, if they worshipped him, the Lord of heaven and earth, and him alone, they should have showers from above; the earth should bring forth abundantly, and they should be blessed with healthful seasons, sound bodies, and long life. For it is the very foundation of the law (as his phrase is), to root the forenamed false opinion out of men's minds." (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 30.)

Ver. 24. And the Lord shall make the rain of thy land powder and dust.] That is, there shall be such a long drought, that, instead of rain, showers of dust, blown up into the air by the wind, shall fall down from heaven upon them.

From heaven shall it come down upon thee, till thou be destroyed.] This seems to denote something more than the falling of clouds of dust, wherewith the air was filled by high winds; viz. showers of ashes, which have sometimes fallen in great quantities, as good historians testify. Nothing is more known than the vast clouds of ashes which Mount Ætna hath often vomited, whereby all the country thereabout hath been laid desolate. And the like hath been thrown out by Mount Vesuvius, which hath reached as far as Rome and Constantinople. (See Bonfrerius.) But if there was any such thing in Judea, it must be a miraculous judgment, there being no such mountains in those parts of the world to make such evomitions.

Ver. 25. And the Lord shall cause thee to be smitten before thine enemies.] He saith the same in effect, Lev. xxvi. 17. For to smite in Scripture (as I have before observed) signifies to slay or kill.

Thou shalt go out one way against them, and flee seven ways before them.] Though they marched out in a great body against their enemies, he threatens that they should soon be dispersed; the hand of the Lord, as well as of their enemies, being against them. For that expression is remarkable, the Lord shall cause thee to be smitten, (see ver. 7.)

And shalt be removed into all the kingdoms of the earth.] This is something more than is threatened, Lev. xxvi. 33. signifying, not only their dispersion into the remotest parts of the world, but their being tossed up and down like vagabonds, from one country to another, without any certain settlement; which hath been notoriously verified since their last dispersion by the Romans, of which they themselves have given us large accounts in several books, viz. Juchasin, Schalscheleth Hakkabala, Schebet Judah, and Zemuch David, wherein they have abundantly confirmed what Tertullian saith of them in his time, " Dispersi, palabundi, et cœli, et soli sui extorres vagantur per orbem;" That being scattered, straggling up and down uncertainly, banished from their own country, they wander about the world, without any king, &c. But this belongs to the time of the first captivity, when Nehemiah (chap. i. 8.) confesses these words were fulfilled. (See Jerem. ix. 16. Ezek. vi. 8. xii. 14, 15.)

Ver. 26. And thy carcass shall be meat unto all the fowls of the air, and unto the beasts of the earth.] Nothing was accounted a greater calamity among the Jews, than to have their dead bodies lie exposed, to be buried only in the bowels of birds and beasts; and therefore Jeremiah threatens this as the utmost punishment of the king of Judah, xxii. 19. xxxvi. 30. and the Psalmist bewails it as one of the sorest judgments that was befallen them, Psal. lxxix. 2, 3.

And no man shall fray them away.] That is, no man took so much compassion upon them as to chase them away, and to inter the remainders, which the birds and beasts had not devoured.

Ver. 27. And the Lord shall smite thee.] Why the Jerusalem Targum should here, in a particular manner, say, the Word of the Lord shall smite thee, I cannot imagine; unless it was to suggest, that he, being their conductor out of Egypt, was the person more especially concerned to punish them for their shameful ingratitude to their Deliverer. (See ver. 68.)

With the botch of Egypt.] Some take this to signify the leprosy, unto which they in that country were subject. Others, that bile breaking out with blains, wherewith God smote the Egyptians, (Exod. ix. 9, &c.) For that is called schechin, as this is.

And with the emerods.] The Hebrew word apholim, is no where to be met with but here and 1 Sam. v. 6. 9. 11. and in the rest of that history; which most interpreters (and not without reason) think signifies those painful tumours in the fundament, which sometimes turn into ulcers. (See Bochartus in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 36.)

And with the scab.] The LXX. here translate the Hebrew garab, (as they do also Lev. xxi. 20.) ψώρα ἀγρία, a fierce or malignant scab. And the Vulgar adds the word jugis, to signify that this was no small punishment.

And the itch.] The Hebrew word cheres signifies, as is generally thought, a dry itch; which is the most troublesome of all other.

Whereof thou canst not be healed.] This may refer both to the scab and to the itch beforementioned; which proceeded from such a corruption of the blood, that they were as incurable as the leprosy.

Ver. 28. And the Lord shall smite thee with madness, and blindness, and astonishment of heart.] All these three relate to the mind: the first of them importing such a distraction in their thoughts, that they should not know what course to take, when they consulted for their safety: the second, such a stupidity, that they should not discern the true way, but always take the wrong: the third, that amazement and horror which followed thereupon, when they saw themselves ruined by their own foolish counsels and mad contrivances. A famous instance of which was in the time of Trajan, when they committed such outrageous massacres, both upon the Greeks and Romans (as Dion, a very sober author, relates), in Cyrene and Cyprus (where great numbers of Jews dwelt, after they were driven out of their own country), that the Lord, no doubt, (to use the word of Dr. Jackson on the Creed, book i. chap. 27.) had smote them with the madness and blindness of heart here threatened, that they might hereby provoke that puissant emperor's indignation, which otherwise would have slept, but now pursued them throughout his dominions, not only as enemies, or rebels, but as noxious creatures to human society, with a revenge suitable to their former outrages. And, indeed, this prediction was verified in their blind credulity, which made them follow every one that pretended to be their Messiah; which always brought great calamities upon them, as R. Gedaliah himself confesses in Schalscheleth Hakkabala; where he mentions no small number of these deceivers, and shews how many Jews perished who followed them. Yet they are but a few, in comparison of a long catalogue, that might be made of those pretended Messiahs. (See the learned Wagenseil's confutation of R. Lipman's Carmen Memoriale, p. 233, &c.) Unto which I shall add only one observation more out of Solomon ben Virgæ, who saith, in some places of Germany, they were possessed with such a rabies, that they cut one another's throats, to avoid the oppression of their enemies; and burnt themselves and their neighbours in their houses, setting whole cities on fire, and perishing in the flames. Such was their extreme rage and furious revenge, and those Christians who pressed them to change their religion. Many stories of the like nature that author tells in his book entitled Schebet Judah; where he hath sixty-four relations of the calamities which befel them in that and in other countries. But these words, I doubt not, were fulfilled before in the first desolation of Jerusalem, to which they belong. For though we have not such particular relations as those now mentioned to illustrate them, yet the prophets speak of their being mad, by drinking of the cup of the Lord's fury, (Jer. xxv. 16. 18.) and blind, (Zephan. i. 17. Lament. iv. 14.) and astonished, (Jer. iv. 9. Ezek. iv. 17.)

Ver. 29. And thou shalt grope at noon-day, as the blind gropeth in darkness.] This shews the blindness spoken of in the foregoing verse relates to their mind; which was so darkened, that in the plainest and clearest things they mistook the way and means of their preservation, (Zephan. i. 17.)

And thou shalt not prosper in thy ways.] But, quite contrary, whatsoever course they took, it turned to their undoing.

And thou shalt be only oppressed and spoiled evermore.] One oppression followed upon another (as the same Dr. Jackson observes), and such rapines were committed in several places upon them as only made way for new ones, even when the supreme powers endeavoured to hinder them.

And no man shall save thee.] This was so remarkably fulfilled in these parts of the world, that the magistrates, who had a mind in many places to preserve them from such outrages, as none but Jews can justify, durst not venture to appear for their rescue. And those that did take them into their protection, were the instruments of their further wrongs, by grievous exactions for the maintenance of the war undertaken in their defence. So strangely (as that excellent person forenamed speaks, cap. 29.) did the wisdom of God bring that to pass, which his servant Moses had foretold in this verse, no man shall save thee: for even succour itself turned into their sorrow; and it is hard to say, whether men's purposes for their good, or for their evil, brought greater plagues upon them. Thus it was before their first captivity; Pharaoh king of Egypt came to help them, but was not able, (Jer. xxxvii. 7. xlvi. 17.)

Ver. 30. Thou shalt betroth a wife, and another man shall lie with her.] Take her away from thee before thou canst consummate the marriage. This was a sore affliction, for all nations accounted it a singular blessing to complete a marriage; and, on the contrary, a curse to be defeated of such delightful hopes. Whence Callimachus, in his hymn to Apollo, promising many blessings to the youths who sung and danced before his altar, mentions this in the first place, (ver. 14.)

that he would be with them, and prosper them, if they were to be married.

Thou shalt build a house, and thou shalt not dwell therein.] But another take possession of it, (Zephan. i. 13.)

Thou shalt plant a vineyard, and shall not gather the grapes thereof.] So we rightly translate the Hebrew word, which (as the margin notes) is, thou shalt not profane or make common the grapes thereof; which was not to be done till the fifth year after the plantation. Before which time God threatens another should enter into it, and enjoy the fruits thereof.

Ver. 31. Thine ox shall be slain before thine eyes, and thou shalt not eat thereof: thine ass shall be violently taken away from before thy face, and shall not be restored to thee, &c.] All these are but particular instances of their grievous oppressions in all countries, where their goods have been confiscated, the bills of debts owing to them all cancelled. Of which the same pious and learned person, Dr. Jackson, gives several instances in the forenamed chapter.

Ver. 32. Thy sons and thy daughters shall be given unto another people.] This was literally fulfilled when the Jews were banished out of Portugal, in the time of king Emanuel; who ordered their children under nineteen years of age to be taken from them, and brought up in the Christian religion. When infants also were torn from their mothers' breasts, with far more grief and sorrow than they had at their coming out of their womb: and many hundred years before that, when the Goths were lords of Spain, and suffered no parents to have any commerce with their children after the seventh year of their age, but by public decree they were committed to Christians to be educated by them, who married them to their own sons and daughters. (See the same Dr. Jackson, chap. 28. parag. 1, 2.)

And thine eyes shall look, and fail with longing for them all the day long.] Their women filling the heavens with more hideous shrieks than the Egyptians did, when all their first-born were slain in the night. For these were bereft at once of all their dear children in the open sun, in vain begging to have them restored to them. And to increase their calamity, (as that excellent person observes, chap. 29. parag. 15.) many Moors professing Mahometism were transported out of Portugal at the same time, without such violence offered to them. What was the reason? (saith he) God would have a manifest distinction made between the Jews and other people, that this prophecy might be fulfilled.

And there shall be no might in thy hand.] Either to protect or to rescue them from violence. Where I cannot but take notice, with the same doctor, that the Moors then had some power in their hand, which moved the Portugals, perhaps, to abstain from such usage of them, lest the report of it coming to the African Mahometans, they might attempt to avenge their wrongs. But these wretched Jews had no power any where, none to avenge their injuries, which God had ordained they should suffer at all times, and in all places wheresoever they came, without redress.

Ver. 33. The fruit of thy land, and all thy labours, shall a nation which thou knowest not eat up.] This was remarkably fulfilled, when Salmaneser came and dispossessed the ten tribes; and when Nebuchadnezzar carried the other two tribes away, and placed other people in their room.

There were many strange people also among the Romans, who devoured their labours, before their last destruction by Titus. And ever since they have been subject to depredations of various sorts; having scraped up riches, with great care, which have often fallen into the hands of strangers. Particularly in the time of the famous crusadoes, when divers nations marched in great numbers to recover the holy land from infidels, their business was in their way to rob and spoil the Jews, and to make great slaughter of them, as both Jewish and Christian writers witness; particularly the author of Schalscheleth Hakkabala, and our Matthew Paris.

And thou shalt be only oppressed and crushed alway.] That they should not only sometimes, or in some ages, or in some one or few kingdoms, but always, in every kingdom whither they removed, (as he speaks, ver. 25.) suffer such violence and wrong, as no other people hath done, must needs be thought to proceed rather from Divine justice than men's inclination to injustice. Which could not but have varied with the diversity of times and places, and the several dispositions of parties, among whom they have been dispersed. And yet the brief enumeration of their particular spoils and hard usage, which Dr. Jackson makes in the forenamed chapter (whose words these are, in the beginning of it), throughout the most civil and best governed states of Europe, will abundantly confirm the truth of Moses's words in this place, Thou shalt never but suffer wrong and violence alway, as our old translation hath it. The same is lately observed by an eminently learned person (J. Wagenseil), in his confutation of R. Lipman's Carm. Memoriale, p. 241. where he takes notice, that the Jews no sooner have grown rich, and by degrees become considerable in any country, but some great calamity hath befallen them. This the attentive consideration of their history will justify, particularly as he observes in France, Spain, and England; God not suffering them to be quite destroyed, like the Amalekites, Jebusites, and Philistines, of whom no footsteps remain, but be scattered and tossed about through all Christian countries (for a testimony to the truth of our religion), and there only oppressed, crushed, and squeezed, as Moses here foretold. One instance of which sore oppression I cannot forbear to add out of Schebet Judah, where R. Solomon Virgæ confesses what great miseries they have been exposed unto, by persons pretending to be their Messiah, who have drawn the hatred of all nations upon them; particularly in Persia, he saith, they were most lamentably handled upon this score, being not only stripped of all, but forced to go about like dogs, with a great clog of wood bound to their necks, which exposed them to the scorn and laughter of all men: for while some threw it behind their backs, others would come and throw it down before their feet; some dragging them backwards, and others cruelly beating them with it. This one told him who saw it.

Ver. 34. So that thou shalt be mad, for the sight of thine eyes which thou shalt see.] So they were, (as the forenamed doctor observes, chap. 29. par. 6. 15.) when their children were taken from them in Portugal. For some, being not able to rescue or dispatch them, killed themselves; others, who had better opportunity, drowned their children in wells or ditches. And here in England, one of their learned rabbins persuaded four hundred of his company, besieged with him in a strong tower by the furious multitude, to cut their own throats, rather than fall into their enemies' hands; himself confirming his doctrine, by cutting his wife's throat first, then his children's, and lastly killing himself. And thus, in the time of the forementioned crusadoes, the soldiers made such dreadful havoc of the Jews as they went along to the holy land, that many of them made themselves away out of despair; as their own authors, R. Gedaliah and David Ganz, tell us, ad an. 1096.

Ver. 35. And the Lord shall smite thee in the knees, and in the legs, with a sore botch that cannot be healed, &c.] This is the same word in the Hebrew [schechin] which is used ver. 27. called the botch of Egypt, and here an evil botch, that is, a very grievous breaking out; which began in those lower parts, and so spread (being incurable, and by no means to be stopped) from the sole of the feet, unto the crown of the head.

Ver. 36. And the Lord shall bring thee, and the king which thou shalt set over thee, unto a nation which neither thou nor thy fathers have known.] This may seem to have been fulfilled literally, only when Jehoiachim was carried away captive to Babylon, (2 Kings xxiv. 15.) and afterward Zedekiah, (xxv. 7. Jer. xxxix. 7. lii. 11.) For when they returned, they had no more any kings. But the latter part of these words [a nation which neither thou nor thy fathers have known] may incline us to extend this threatening as far as to their last dispersion by the Romans. Since which they have been driven into several countries, far less known to them than Babylon was, (with which they had correspondence before their captivity thither, 2 Kings xx. 12, &c.) and though they have had no king, yet they have set over themselves rulers and governors, who may be comprehended under that name.

And there thou shalt serve other gods, wood and stone.] Either sottishly following the example of the country to which they were carried, (Jer. xliv. 17, 18.) or being compelled thereunto by their cruel tyranny, (Dan. iii. 6.) The author of Schebet Judah observes, that this was the just punishment of their folly in running after idols, that they were sent into other countries to worship those gods which they were so fond of in their own. And he refers it particularly to the time of the captivity of Babylon; in which they continued seventy years, according to the number of years wherein those planets, whom they had worshipped, finished their course: for Saturn, as he computes, finishes his in one-and-twenty, Jupiter in as many; and so he proceeds with the rest, which make up that number. But this is too curious an observation, and the Jews have little skill in astronomy; therefore I pass it by, and only observe, that Manasseh ben Israel also understands this of the Babylonian captivity; for all the punishments mentioned from ver. 15. to ver. 49. were fulfilled under the first temple, and after the ruin of it, till the building of the second; which, though it be not exactly true (some of these predictions having been more completely fulfilled, as I have shewn, in aftertimes), yet is it reasonable to think, that this threatening particularly belongs to what they suffered in Babylon; the very same calamity being again threatened in the sixty-fourth verse, where I shall shew it belongs to their present condition.

Ver. 37. And thou shalt become an astonishment.] Their neighbours, he means, who saw or heard of the greatness and strangeness of their various plagues, should be dismayed at the sight, or report of them; wondering that a people, who had been so flourishing, should be made so exceeding desolate. (See 1 Kings ix. 8. Jer. xviii. 16. xix. 8.)

A proverb, and a by-word, among all nations whither the Lord shall lead thee.] So that when men would express one extremely vile, they should say he was a Jew. The same is threatened by God when he appeared to Solomon, 1 Kings ix. 7. and by Jeremiah, xxiv. 9. which, it is likely, was fulfilled at their first captivity into Babylon; (see Lament. ii. 15, 16.) but hath been notoriously fulfilled in their last captivity (as they call it), since the destruction of Jerusalem and their temple by the Romans: for here in England (from whence they have been banished above three hundred years) their name serves as a perfect measure (to use the words of Dr. Jackson, book i. on the Creed, chap. 30.) to express the height of impiety in any agent, or the depth of an abject, worthless, forlorn condition in any patient. Better we cannot express the most cut-throat dealing than thus, You use me like a Jew; or, none but a Jew would have done this. And when in common speech we exaggerate wrongs done to the most odious or despised people among us, we say, I would not have done so to a Jew.

Ver. 38. Thou shalt carry much seed out into the field, and shalt gather but little in.] This was fulfilled before they were carried captive to Babylon, when God frequently sent sore famine upon them, as we read in the prophet Isaiah, lii. 19. and Jeremiah, xiv. 1—3, &c. and is often threatened by Ezekiel among other terrible judgments, and by Jeremiah himself, xxix. 17, 18.

For the locust shall consume it.] They were a great plague in those countries, falling sometimes in such vast numbers (from whence they had the name of arbe), that they covered the whole face of the earth, and devoured every green thing: for so another of their names imports, which is chasil, coming from chasal, which signifies to consume and eat up; which they did so entirely, that they were looked upon by all people as a plague sent by God, and are therefore called by Joel his army, ii. 25. So not only the Hebrews, but the Arabians esteemed them; who say, that some of them on a time fell before their prophet, as he sat at meat, with this inscription on their backs; "I am God, and there is none other besides me, the Lord of locusts, who nourish them; and when I please, send them forth, that they may be food for the people; and, when I please, that they may be their plague, by eating up their food." (See Bochartus, in his Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. iv. cap. 6.)

Ver. 39. Thou shalt plant vineyards, and dress them.] Take a great deal of care and pains about them, after they are planted, to make them fruitful.

But shalt neither drink of the wine, nor eat the grapes.] Not enjoy the least benefit by their cost and labour.

For worms shall eat them.] The Hebrew word tholaath is a general name for all worms whatsoever: but there is a peculiar sort that infest vines, which the Greeks call ἴπες and ἴκες, as Bochartus observes, in his Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. iv. cap. 27. where he takes notice that the Latins call this worm volvox, and convolvulus; because it wraps and rolls itself up in the buds, and eats the grapes up when they grow towards ripeness, as the Roman authors explain it.

Ver. 40. Thou shalt have olive-trees throughout all thy coasts, but thou shalt not anoint thyself with the oil.] Though the country abounded with these trees in all parts of it, they produced nothing but leaves, and a show of fruit, which came to no perfection.

For thy olive shall cast her fruit.] Being blasted, as the Jerusalem Targum explains it, in the very blossom; or the buds dropping off for want of rain; or the fruit being eaten with worms. Maimonides observes, that the idolaters in those countries pretended, by certain magical arts, to preserve all manner of fruit, so that the worms should not gnaw the vines, nor either buds or fruit fall from the trees (as he reports their words out of one of their own books, which he names); therefore, to deter the Israelites from all idolatrous practices, Moses here pronounces, that they should draw upon themselves those very punishments which they studied by such means to avoid, (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 37.)

Ver. 41. Thou shalt beget sons and daughters, but thou shalt not enjoy them; for they shall go into captivity.] Which is threatened in many places of the prophets, and fulfilled in several invasions of their neighbours; for the Syrians, no doubt, carried captive more than one little maid, who waited on Naaman's wife, (2 Kings v. 2.) And in other inroads upon them, till the captivity of the whole land. This we may be confident was a frequent calamity, (2 Kings xiv. 26. xv. 37, &c.) But it was never more remarkably fulfilled, than since they crucified our Saviour; their children having been taken from them, (as I have observed before, ver. 32. 34.) and transported sometimes into other places. And who knows whether many of their stock, detained by king Emanuel of Portugal, beforementioned, have not been transported into America? and whether many of the Spanish colonies have not a mixture of the Jewish progeny in them? as Dr. Jackson observes. Manasseh ben Israel, I am sure, endeavours to prove (in his book called Spes Israelis), that some of the ten tribes are in America; though how they came there, he can give no account.

Ver. 42. All the trees, and the fruit of thy land, shall the locust consume.] So Onkelos and the Hebrew writers generally translate the word tzelatzal; which signifies a peculiar sort of locusts which falls upon trees, as others upon the fields. And it seems to have this name, because these locusts come in such thick clouds, that they darken the sun; the Hebrew word tzalal signifying to overshadow. The Jerusalem Targum translates it, all your trees, and the fruits of your land, shall spoilers possess.

I suppose these several judgments fell in the order wherein they are here mentioned in ver. 38—42. there being first a great dearth, of which we read 2 Kings viii. 1, &c. and Joel i. 10—12, &c. then many invasions of their country, wherein several were carried captive by the bands of Moab upon the Israelites, (2 Kings xiii. 20.) and of the Chaldeans, Syrians, and Ammonites, who came upon Judah, (xxiv. 2.) And we read expressly, that before this, in the days of Ahaz, a great multitude were carried captive by the Syrians, (2 Chron. xxviii. 5.) After which more spoilers came upon them in the days of Jeremiah, xii. 12. and a new famine, xiv. 1, &c. in which this forty-first verse may be thought to be fulfilled.

Ver. 43. The stranger that is within thee shall get up above thee very high, and thou shalt come down very low.] There is no sorer punishment to a proud people, than to see those who are not only their inferiors, but much beholden to them (as all strangers were to the Jews, among whom they lived merely by permission), get up above them, and become their superiors. But so it was, that the Jews, by their foolish endeavours to advance themselves, raised a mere stranger to the highest dignity, who humbled them into the lowest condition. For this (as that excellent person I have often mentioned observes) may be applied to Vespasian, who was appointed to command in the wars against the Jews, and, being a person of mean birth and obscure family, had no thoughts of aspiring to the imperial seat; but by the unseasonable desire of the Jews to exalt themselves above all nations, they hoisted him up to the most sublime pitch of greatness, who was ordained by God to pluck them down from their seat, and bring them beneath all people. (See Dr. Jackson, book i. on the Creed, chap. 23. par. 3, 4, &c.) For he quite extinguished their glory, which was their temple at Jerusalem; and likewise shut up and profaned the temple which the Egyptian Jews had built in the country of Heliopolis, after it had stood above three hundred years: but if any one think good thus to apply the words of this verse unto Vespasian, they must not take this for the literal meaning of them; because it is evident, that by the stranger is to be understood those of other nations who lived among them; particularly, those gentiles who were brought into the country by the Assyrians, instead of the ten tribes, as some of the best of the Jewish writers expound it. What the doctor also saith, concerning their advancing Vespasian to the imperial dignity, cannot be maintained.

Ver. 44. He shall lend to thee, and thou shalt not lend to him; he shall be the head, and thou shalt be the tail.] Thus the covenant of God, to exalt this people and humble their foes, was quite inverted, as he also observes, (see ver. 12, 13.) all the plagues threatened to those who bare ill-will to Sion, lighting on them and their friends; and all the blessings promised to such as prayed for her peace, being heaped on those that wrought her ruin.

Ver. 45. Moreover, all these curses shall come upon thee, and shall pursue thee, and overtake thee, till thou be destroyed.] These punishments, he means, should not cease, but follow one upon another till they had brought them to utter ruin. Which is so evidently fulfilled, that, would but the atheists consider it, and lay it to heart, it would wring from them a confession of the truth of what these Divine oracles have uttered, that this was a people who had been appointed to destruction. For, though there be a great many of them remaining, in several parts of the world, yet they have never been suffered to grow into a nation, but in that sense are utterly destroyed, as Moses here prophesied.

Because thou hearkenedst not unto the voice of the Lord thy God, to keep his commandments and his statutes which I commanded thee this day.] It hath manifestly appeared the hand of God is very heavy upon them for their disobedience to him, there being no other reason why they, who were once so favoured by him, should be so long as they have been more miserable than any other people.

Ver. 46. And they shall be upon thee.] That is, the curses beforementioned should remain fixed upon them, and continue unremoved from age to age.

For a sign, and for a wonder.] That all men may take notice of them, and look upon them as extraordinary tokens of God's high displeasure, and take warning thereby to beware of their infidelity and disobedience: for, as that great man often saith, No sign can be given equivalent to the desolation of the Jewish nation, and their continuing still banished from their own land, and miserably treated in all other countries.

And upon thy seed for ever.] All the world may clearly see (to use his words again) that the God of their fathers hath cast them off, they having no signs or badges of his ancient wonted favours, whilst innumerable marks and scars of his fearful indignation against their fathers remain unhealed in their children, after more generations than their ancestors had of prosperity in the promised land.

Ver. 47. Because thou servedst not the Lord thy God with joyfulness, and gladness of heart, for the abundance of all things.] Or, in the abundance of all things; for this is opposed to the hunger and thirst in which (he saith in the next verse) they should serve their enemies, as a punishment for their wanton abuse of God's mercies. Which being so exceeding great, justly required not only their obedience, but cheerfulness and delight therein.

Ver. 48. Therefore shalt thou serve thine enemies, which he shall send against thee.] He doth not call the Lord their God, as he did before, now they were abandoned by him for their sins.

In hunger, and thirst, and nakedness, and in want of all things.] This shews what he meant before by abundance of all things, plentiful provision of food and raiment, and all other things belonging to the comfort of life.

And he shall put a yoke of iron upon thy neck.] The loss of liberty was as great a misery as any other, which ended also in hard servitude. And it was but just that they should be slaves in the land of their enemies to cruel masters, who would not, in their own country, serve so gracious and loving a father as the Lord their God.

A yoke of iron] Signifies an unsupportable yoke, which could not be broken. (See Jer. xxviii. 13, 14.)

Ver. 49. And the Lord shall bring a nation against thee from far.] This evidently belongs to the Romans, as Manasseh ben Israel acknowledges; who thinks, that at this verse begins his prophecy of their calamities under the second temple, as in the foregoing he describes their calamities under the first. And in this, I think, he saith right, that there is scarce any thing mentioned in the following part of this chapter, but what relates to what they suffered under the second temple (as he speaks) and since its destruction; though I cannot say, as he doth, of the foregoing part of it, that it was fulfilled in the calamities which befel them under the first temple; for many things were never so completely fulfilled, as since they crucified our Saviour.

From the end of the earth.] This shews he speaks of the Romans, rather than of the Chaldeans, who did not come from far, much less from the end of the earth; but out of the north country, which was not very far distant from Judea: whereas the Romans, by whom they were last destroyed, came literally from far, and from the end of the earth; particularly Julius Severus was called by the emperor Adrian to their destruction out of this island of Britain; wherein Vespasian also had given great proof of his conduct. And Adrian himself, and Trajan, by whom they were still more crushed, after Vespasian had destroyed their city and temple, were both Spaniards by birth. And, therefore, Manasseh ben Israel says peremptorily, in his book, de Termino Vitæ, (lib. iii. sect. 3.) this is to be understood of the soldiers in Vespasian's army, which he brought out of England, France, and Spain, and other remote parts of the world.

As swift as the eagles.] Which every one knows the Romans carried in their ensigns. And these birds are observed to fly upon their prey with great force and violence; to whom, therefore, fierce soldiers (such as the Romans were) are compared, when they set upon their enemies. So Homer describes Achilles falling upon the Trojans,

Αἰετοῦ οἵμαϑ' ἔχων———

In Iliad Φ, where οἵματα signifies ὁρμήματα, furious assaults, as the scholiast interprets it. And so he speaks concerning Hector, Iliad X. As David also speaks of Saul and Jonathan, 2 Sam. i. 23. and the Chaldeans are so described, coming against Jerusalem, Jer. iv. 13. xlviii. 40. xlix. 22. Lament. i. 19. Ezek. xvii. 3. and see Dan. vii. 4. and Bochartus, in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 9. par. ii. lib. ii. cap. 2.

A nation whose tongue thou shalt not understand.] The Roman tongue was more strange to them than the Chaldean, especially the language of many nations, of which the Roman army was composed; and being a people whom their ancestors, perhaps, never heard of. Dr. Jackson justly looks upon the destruction and general desolation of their country, made by the Romans and their tributaries in these western parts of the world, as an everlasting monument of the truth of Moses's prophecy, in this and in the following verses.

Ver. 50. A nation.] This word nation being used thrice in this and the foregoing verse, Manasseh ben Israel (in the place forenamed) is so critical, as to observe, that this repetition shews Jerusalem was to suffer thrice by the Roman power: first, in the time of Pompey; and, secondly, when Sosius came to the assistance of Herod against Antigonus; and, thirdly, when it was besieged and overturned by Vespasian and his son Titus.

Of a fierce countenance.] So we translate this phrase, Dan. viii. 23. which, in the Hebrew, is a strong or hard face. Accordingly we translate it impudent (or, in our language, brazen-faced), Prov. vii. 13. and hard, Prov. xxi. 29. and bold of face, Eccles. viii. 1. All which set forth a people stern, fierce, undaunted, cruel, and hard-hearted; that had neither mercy nor modesty, but inflexibly pursued their designs; which is the true character of the old Romans.

Which shall not regard the person of the old, nor shew favour to the young.] These are wont to be pitied, being unable to hurt others; but in their wars with the Jews, the Romans spared nobody, their rage and fury extinguishing all reverence to grey hairs, and all tenderness to young babes.

Ver. 51. And he shall eat the fruit of thy cattle, and the fruit of thy land, until thou be destroyed.] For they brought such vast armies, as devoured all the provisions in the country.

Which also shall not leave thee corn, wine, or oil, or the increase of thy kine, or flocks of thy sheep, until he have destroyed thee.] He repeats it again, in more particular words, to set forth the desolation to be so great, that nothing should remain for their support.

Ver. 52. And he shall besiege thee in all thy gates.] The country being wasted, the Jews fled into their fenced cities, where they had laid up some provisions, to enable them to hold out a siege.

Until thy high and fenced walls come down, wherein thou trustest, throughout thy land.] This was literally fulfilled by the Romans, to whom the best fortified places were forced to yield, as may be seen in Josephus's History of the Jewish War, which is the best commentary on this part of the prophecy. The walls of Jerusalem particularly were razed by Pompey; and Sosius took it again by force in the time of Augustus. But Tacitus tells, that the Jews took such advantage of the covetousness of Claudius, that they purchased of him the liberty to fortify their city again; which they did so well, that they trusted, as Moses here speaks, to its strength; which was so great, that Titus could not take it but by a long siege, which concluded in its utter ruin.

He shall besiege thee in all thy gates, throughout all the land which the Lord thy God hath given thee.] He repeats it again, that they might not think to find security in any place whatsoever, though never so strongly fortified, and well provided with all things necessary for its defence.

Ver. 53. And thou shalt eat the fruit of thine own body, the flesh of thy sons and of thy daughters, which the Lord thy God hath given thee, in the siege, and in the straitness, wherewith thine enemies shall distress thee.] This was fulfilled to a tittle by Vespasian and his son Titus; who, after they had vanquished them in the field, begirt them so close in Jerusalem, that they could not stir out, and rather than surrender, perished by a lamentable famine. For there were vast multitudes of people shut up in the city, which run thither from all parts for safety; who brought the famine sooner upon them, and made it more severe when it came. If we may believe R. David Ganz, it was furthered also by a fire, which the seditious people kindled, whereby fourteen hundred magazines were consumed, stored with provisions to serve two hundred thousand people for twenty years. For this he quotes Josephus; though no such thing is to be found in him.

Ver. 54. So that the man that is tender and very delicate among you.] The two Hebrew words for tender and delicate signify a man that had lived in pleasure, and fared daintily, like the rich man in the gospel.

His eye shall be evil towards his brother, and towards the wife of his bosom, &c.] Grudge every bit which he sees his nearest relations eat, being ready to snatch it out of the mouth of his dear consort and children, and put it into his own: for this is the effect of a ravenous hunger.

And towards the remnant of his children which he shall have.] This imports that they should see many of them die in the siege: for famine forced them to feed on bad food, and that bred pestilential diseases, which swept away many; and increased still more by the carcasses of those that were famished. If any credit may be given to one of their own authors (David Ganz), there were above a hundred and sixteen thousand dead bodies of the rich and honourable men of Jerusalem carried out at one gate of the city, which was that of the Brook Kidron, besides those which were carried out at other gates, and thrown over the walls: and this he pretends to have out of Minchas, the son of Seruk, who was a faithful register in that city. Josephus mentions almost the same number, lib. vii. de Bello Judaico, cap. ult.

Ver. 55. So that he shall not give to any of them of the flesh of his children whom he shall eat.] This is a description of the sorest famine, which forced them, after they had eaten up their horses, dogs, cats, and such-like creatures, and their very belts and shoes, to eat even their own children; which fathers, who used to live deliciously, Moses prophesies, should eat up themselves privately, and let none share with them.

Because he hath nothing left in the siege, and in the straitness, wherewith thine enemies shall distress thee in all thy gates.] They were so sorely pinched with famine in a long siege, that they had nothing else remaining but their own offspring, and one another, wherewith to satisfy their hunger. Josephus observes, (lib. vii. de Bello Judaico, cap. 18.) that Jerusalem had been taken five times before this; but never suffered so dreadfully as by Titus; whom the Talmudists therefore call by the name of impious: which epithet belonged rather to themselves, who having, with wicked hands (as St. Peter speaks), crucified and slain their Redeemer, were, by the just judgment of God upon them for their infidelity, hardened in an obstinate belief and expectation of a deliverer from the Romans, till they were reduced to those extremities.

Ver. 56. The tender and delicate woman among you, that would not adventure to set the sole of her foot upon the ground for delicateness and tenderness.] A description of the greatest softness and delicacy; which both the Chaldees express by a word that signifies the nicest motion, and going so slow a pace, as if they were loath to touch the ground. (See Bochartus, in his Phaleg. lib. iv. cap. 19.)

Her eye shall be evil towards the husband of her bosom, and towards her son, and towards her daughter.] This is only a higher instance of the cruel effects of their distress by famine: for women, especially of the better sort, are naturally more tender and pitiful than men, and have the most passionate love to their children; which Moses here prophesies should be quite extinguished by hunger. And it was literally fulfilled, both in the siege of Samaria, wherein a woman boiled her son, (2 Kings v. 28, 29.) as a man did in the first siege of Jerusalem by the Babylonians, (Baruch ii. 3. and see Lament. ii. 20. iv. 10.) But never so exactly fulfilled as in the last siege by the Romans, when a noble woman (which fully answers to this prophecy, such persons being very delicate) did the very same, as Josephus relates in his book of the Jewish Wars, lib. vii. cap. 8. A most unnatural fact, as he observes, which was never committed, either by Greek or barbarian; and which he would not have related, because it might seem incredible, if there had not been many witnesses of it besides himself.

Ver. 57. And towards her young one that cometh out from between her feet.] Towards her new-born babe, which is wont to be welcomed into the world with great joy; but in this siege dispatched out of it, to assuage the rage of their hunger. In the Hebrew (as we take notice in the margin) the word we translate young one, properly signifies the after-birth: and so the LXX. translate it, τὸ χορίον. Which makes this passage most plain; that their hunger should make them so unnatural, as, first, to eat the afterbirth which came from them, and then the child which was wrapped in it.

And towards her children which she shall bear.] The rest of their children, whose cries for food they had no way to stop, but by killing them, and making them their own food. So it follows in the next words.

For she shall eat them for want of all things.] Having nothing else left to eat: for they had devoured, not only the leather of their girdles, and their shoes, and which covered their shields, but the very stale dung of oxen, and such things as the most sordid of all living creatures would not eat. (See Josephus, lib. iii. ἁλώσεως, cap. 16. lib. vii. cap. 7.)

Secretly.] It was not done secretly for any other reason, but lest any body should have a share with them, and so make their hunger return the sooner: and yet it was a hard matter to conceal what they had done of this kind; for the seditious people presently smelling there had been something boiled, got into the house, when she had eaten one half of her child, and found the other half, which she had left till another time; of which she invited them to eat.

In the siege and straitness.] These two words, which are used here, and ver. 53. and 55. may both relate to the grievous miseries they should endure, when they were besieged, (ver. 52.) and may be translated, in the pressure and straits wherewith thine enemies, &c.

Wherewith thine enemies shall distress thee in thy gates.] We have not such an account of their distress in other cities, as we have of what they suffered in Jerusalem; where ἄπειρον πλῆθος, an innumerable multitude perished by famine, (as Josephus tells us, lib. vii. ἁλώσεως, cap. 7.) and ineffable calamities thereupon happened: for in every house, where the least shadow of food appeared, a war immediately began; and the dearest relations fell to blows, snatching away from each other the miserable supports of life. Nor would they let those that were dying expire quietly, not believing what they affirmed, when they told them they had no food in their houses; but the cut-throats came and searched their very bosoms, as they lay drawing their last breath, whether they had not there hid some food.

Ver. 58. If thou wilt not observe to do all the words of this law, which are written in this book.] Among which those words are most remarkable, (xviii. 15. 18, 19.) "A Prophet shall the Lord thy God raise up unto thee, like unto me; unto him shall ye hearken, &c. Whosoever will not hearken unto the words which he shall speak in my name, I will require it of him."

That thou mayest fear this glorious and fearful name, THE LORD THY GOD.] That is, fear the great Lord of heaven and earth, and their special benefactor, who is most glorious in himself, and to be most humbly reverenced by us: for the name of God is God himself; from whence it is that he is sometimes called Haschem, the Name, Lev. xxiv. 11. This shews the reason why Moses repeats this name the Lord thy God so often as he doth in the preface to this book, chap. vi.—ix. &c. In some of which there is scarce a verse wherein we do not meet with these words, and it is sometimes repeated no less than three times in one and the same verse, (xii. 18. xvi. 15.) that God might be in all their thoughts, and the fear of him might possess their hearts.

Ver. 59. Then the Lord.] If they still persisted in their infidelity and disobedience, after Jerusalem and the temple were destroyed, and such unheard-of calamities as they had suffered during the siege of that place, he threatens to bring upon them more astonishing judgments.

Will make thy plagues wonderful, and the plagues of thy seed, even great plagues, and of long continuance.] Though their great plagues, under Vespasian, by famine, sword, and pestilence, had lessened their numbers exceedingly, yet, by the time of Trajan and Adrian, they had, like traitors taken for awhile from the rack (to use Dr. Jackson's words), recovered strength enough to be put to greater torture; for then they were made a spectacle to the world of the Divine vengeance again, which they brought upon themselves by their rebellion; and shewed therein their natural strength, by their grievous lingering pains in dying: for not only in Mesopotamia, and in Cyprus, but especially in Cyrene, and throughout all Egypt, they broke out into such outrages, ὥσπερ ὑπὸ πνεύματος δεινοῦ τινος καὶ στασιώδους, as if they had been possessed with some fierce and seditious spirit; (as Eusebius speaks, lib. iv. Eccles. Hist. cap. 2.) whereupon Marcius Turbo was sent against them, and setting upon them, both by sea and land, with horse and foot, made a vast destruction of them. See Dion, lib. lxviii. and Xiphilinus, who describe their slaughter to have been so great, that now was fulfilled (as the forenamed Dr. Jackson thinks) what Moses foretold in this place, The Lord will make thy plagues wonderful, great plagues, and of long continuance. And, indeed, Eusebius saith in the forenamed place, that Turbo destroyed many thousands of them, πολλαῖς μάχαις ἐν οὐ ὀλίγῳ τε χρόνῳ, &c. in many battles, and in no small time, the war being protracted a great while to complete their destruction. And the application of this prophecy to this time may be confirmed by a strange relation which we meet withal in their own books: for in the Jerusalem Talmud, one of their doctors tells us, that, when Trajan came upon them with his army, they were reading these very words of the law, (ver. 49.) "The Lord shall bring a nation against thee from far, from the end of the earth," &c. which he understanding (having asked them what they were doing), he cried out, Here is the man (pointing to himself), who am come five days sooner than I intended. And immediately compassing them about with his legions, slew them all. Then he went to their wives, and offered them mercy if they would submit themselves: but they replied, What thou hast done to the ground, do to the stubble: so he dispatched them also, and shed so much blood, that it ran into the sea as far as Cyprus. At this time (so he concludes his story) the horn of Israel was cut off from Israel, never to be restored into its place, till the Son of David come. This passage I find alleged by Joh. Benedictus Carpzovius, out of Massec. Sanhedr. in explication of another matter in Schickard's Mischpat Hammelech, cap. 3. Theor. 10. p. 199.

And sore sicknesses, and of long continuance.] Such as gonorrhœas, leprosies, and burning fevers, as the author of the old Nitzacon, set forth by J. Wagenseil, explains it, p. 131.

Ver. 60. Moreover, he shall bring upon thee all the diseases of Egypt, which thou wast afraid of; and they shall cleave unto thee.] The same diseases he foretells should infest them in, and after, their destruction by the Romans, which had done formerly under the Chaldeans, and other oppressors, (ver. 27.) What these diseases were, Pet. Cunæus, lib. ii. de Republ. Jud. cap. ult. hath expressed in these words, "Vitiligines, psorasque et tetra ulcera," &c. Leprosies, itches, botches, and foul stinking ulcers, the greatest physicians have anciently ascribed to the Egyptians and Syrians, as plagues proper to those nations; unto which diseases, he observes, the Jews were strangely obnoxious.

Ver. 61. Also every sickness, and every plague, which is not written in the book of this law, them will the Lord bring upon thee, until thou be destroyed.] It had been too long to have set down all the diseases and calamities that mankind are subject to: but he tells them, they should not escape any one of them, though very numerous, and be afflicted with them till their destruction was completed. For they were of such long continuance, as was said before, and pursued them so closely whithersoever they went, that they are no longer a nation, but a scattered, forlorn people, abandoned and forsaken by Him that formerly protected them. Of this they themselves are so sensible, that they have confessed the truth of this part of the prophecy in these later ages: for Solomon ben Virgæ having related (in the fiftieth section of his book, called Schebet Judah) how they were transported out of Palestine into Spain, and so miserably handled, that not one of a thousand remained; and then how they were destroyed in Germany and France, where, of innumerable multitudes (equal to the number which came out of Egypt), scarce five thousand survived that calamity; and what he himself saw in Castile and Portugal (where they suffered such things as cannot be expressed, nor conceived, by famine, by depredations, by transportations, and by being sold for slaves, or drowned in the sea), he thus at last concludes his sad story, that they who fled to avoid that dreadful tempest in Castile found the truth of this oracle, Every sickness and plague, which is not written in the book of this law, shall the Lord bring upon thee, till thou be destroyed.

Ver. 62. And ye shall be left few in number, whereas ye were as the stars of heaven for multitude.] The multitude of the Jews killed in the wars, was equal to the number of living men in Israel in the time of king David: for Josephus saith, that in the siege of Jerusalem there were destroyed, by pestilence, famine, and other ways, eleven hundred thousand, besides above ninety thousand carried captive. For they being come from all countries to keep the Passover, the whole nation (as his words are, lib. vii. Ἁλώσεως, cap. 17.) were shut up here by a fate, ὥσπερ εἰς εἱρκτὴν, as in a close prison, or rather driven thither (as Dr. Jackson speaks) into a slaughter-house, after they had been foiled by the Romans in the field. And yet after this they recovered strength (as I observed before), merely to be more tormented, and miserably destroyed: for in the reign of Adrian (who succeeded the emperor Trajan) they shook the Roman empire by their rebellious commotions, as Dion, who lived not long after, relates in his History, lib. lxix. which moved Adrian to exercise the greater severity upon them in their punishment, there being slain of them in battles and skirmishes five hundred and eighty thousand, besides a vast number consumed by famine, and sicknesses, and fire, during the time of this lingering war; which Julius Severus, a famous commander, sent for on purpose out of Britain, designedly protracted to a great length, not being willing to try it out in the field in one battle with a desperate multitude. And now, as Moses foretold, they were left few in number: for Dion, as if he had intended to expound these words, saith, that Severus so beset and attacked them separately, in several parties, that very few of them escaped; fifty of their strongest fortresses being utterly razed, and nine hundred and eighty and five of their most noble and populous towns sacked and consumed by fire, with the slaughter of the forementioned number; insomuch, that, as his words are, all Judea was in a manner laid waste, and left as a desert. This we may truly call the last conflict of this nation with death and destruction in their own land; out of which they were now almost totally expelled.

Because thou wouldest not obey the voice of the Lord thy God.] Who had spoken to them by that great Prophet, his eternal Word, promised in the eighteenth chapter of this book, ver. 15, &c. but they would not hearken to him: for which cause he gave them up to listen unto false Christs, whom they followed to their destruction; particularly Barchocheba, who, in the time of Adrian, took upon him the title of their king, and set up his throne at Bitter, in the tribe of Benjamin, which the Jews had made their chief seat, after the destruction of Jerusalem; and had in it, as they pretend, four hundred synagogues. Here the Romans made such a slaughter of them, when they took it, that the Jews themselves cannot find expressions tragical enough to represent it. Twice as many, they tell us, perished now as came out of Egypt; great rivers ran with the blood of the slain, which (say some of them) carried great rocks along with it in the stream. With these, and many other such-like hyperbolical speeches, they themselves exaggerate their calamities, as many have observed out of Juchasin and Gittin, particularly Const. L'Empereur, in his annotations on Jacchiades, (Dan. xi. 34.)

But though now they were left few in number in Judea, yet, in other countries where they were dispersed, they multiplied again, that God's plagues might continue to be multiplied upon them, and this prophecy more perfectly fulfilled: for some ages after this, (anno 1009.) they had so incensed Christian people against them, by bringing the Persians upon them, who destroyed the churches dedicated to our Saviour at Jerusalem, that it was resolved, by the common consent of all Christians, that no Jew should live in their territories, but be driven out of them throughout all the world. By which means the greatest part of them died of several kinds of death, or made away themselves, so that "vix pauci residui fierent in orbe Romano," there remained but a very few of them in the Roman world. They are the words of Glauber, who relates this, lib. iii. cap. 7.

Ver. 63. And it shall come to pass, as the Lord rejoiced over you to do you good, and to multiply you; so the Lord will rejoice over you to destroy you, and to bring you to nought.] The state of the Jews, from the time of Adrian till the expiration of the Roman empire, cannot be gathered from the Roman writers; but the fathers of the church often mention their miseries. And so do their own authors; particularly the author of Schebet Judah, who saith, "It is not in the power of man to tell all the kingdoms and cities where they were scattered; in which they suffered things so horrid, that it is fitter to pass them over in silence, than to relate them: but therein was verified the Divine prediction, Lev. xxvi. 38. Ye shall perish among the heathen, and the land of your enemies shall eat you up," (sect. 49.) And Dr. Jackson, to explain this, hath more particularly observed, that as God raised up Cyrus in testimony of his rejoicing to do them good, who released them from their captivity in Babylon; so, to give the world a proof of his rejoicing to destroy them, and bring them to nought, he advanced Philip Augustus to the crown of France, (about anno 1179.) to defeat all the hopes which some kindness shewn unto them had put into their hearts: for he spoiled their synagogues of all their donatives and ornaments, confiscated all their lands and immoveable goods, and granted a release of all debts due unto them from Christians. (See book i. upon the Creed, chap. 28. parag. 13.)

And ye shall be plucked from off the land whither thou goest to possess it.] This was wonderfully fulfilled by Adrian; who, after a strange desolation, beforementioned, prohibited, by a public decree ratified with the senate's consent, any Jew to come within sight of Judea. This he did out of a politic respect, lest the sight of their native soil might inspire them with some fresh desperate resolutions to endeavour their settlement there again; but herein he was unwittingly the angel of God (as the same excellent person speaks), to keep this wicked race out of that paradise, the good land, out of which he had driven them.

Ver. 64. And the Lord shall scatter thee among all people.] That was the effect of Adrian's severe decree, of not coming within view of their own country, which made them disperse all the world over, where they could find any admittance.

From the one end of the earth even unto the other.] Such as were carried captive in Adrian's war were transported by his order into Spain, his own native country, which was then accounted the end of the world westward. And many of them, it is evident by their own books, fled to Babylon, and the countries thereabout, which was as far as they knew eastward. In Spain they continued many years in great abundance, as it were, expecting a wind for their passage to some place more distant from their ancient seat. And who knows whether many of them have not, since the discovery of America, been transported thither, as I before observed? Certain it is, that the Jews themselves are sensible this prophecy was not fulfilled, till this their last dispersion, after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans: for thus R. Isaac, who had occasion to mention these words, (in his Munimen Fidei, lately brought to light by Wagenseil, Perek. vi.) glosses upon them: "In the Roman captivity, the Jews were dispersed and dissipated through all the regions of the east, and of the west: for every nation of which the Roman army consisted, when they returned to their own countries, carried some of them along with them, into Greece, Germany, Italy, Spain, France, and all other countries, which either Christians or Mahometans now possess."

And there thou shalt serve other gods, which neither thou nor thy fathers have known, even wood and stone.] Here that excellent person I have so often mentioned (Dr. Jackson) commends it to the reader's consideration, whether this part of Moses's prophecy may not be understood of the convert Jews throughout the pope's dominions, who are often urged to commit idolatry with stocks and stones, upon more tyrannical terms (if they gainsay) than their forefathers were, either by the Assyrians, Chaldeans, Egyptians, Romans, or any whatsoever, that led them captive out of their land.

If it be said, there is a great difference between the heathen idolatry, and the present image-worship in the Roman church, it is granted the idolatry is of a diverse kind; and so it seems Moses meant, when he threatens the Jews, after their final transportation into these western countries, should serve such gods as their fathers had not known: for their forefathers, before Moses's time and after, had known the heathen gods too well; but were perfect strangers to this image-worship now in use. And to strengthen this interpretation, it ought to be observed, that these words [which neither thou nor thy fathers have known] are omitted in the thirty-sixth verse of this chapter; where he speaks of their serving of other gods of wood and stone, as he doth here. But that part of the prophecy belongs to what they did in the first captivity into Babylon, as Manasseh ben Israel observes, who understands these words to be a prophecy of what they have suffered in this last dispersion: for, reciting these words (lib. iii. de Termino Vitæ, sect. 3. p. 131.) as containing the greatest calamity that hath befallen them, he saith, "This we see fulfilled, after a singular manner, in this present captivity; because of all those evils wherewith the Hebrews have been afflicted in France, and England, and Spain:" for they had been often pressed, either to renounce their religion, or to be undone; and many times chose rather to comply with the idolatrous worship in the Roman church, than to be banished, and have their goods confiscated.

Ver. 65. And among these nations shalt thou find no rest.] This was wonderfully fulfilled in the ages which followed that in which Adrian lived; when they both disturbed others, and could find no rest themselves: for in the third century, they raised sedition in the reign of Severus, by whom they suffered very much about the year 202. after our Saviour's birth: and in the next century we are informed by St. Chrysostom, in his second oration against the Jews, (tom. vi. edit. Savil. p. 333.) "That they rebelled again in the time of Constantine; who, causing their ears to be cropped off, dispersed them, καθάπερ τινὰς δραπέτας καὶ μαστιγίας, as vile fugitives and vagabonds, into various countries, where they carried this mark of infamy along with them, that all might be instructed to make no more such attempts." But in the fifth century they made new commotions, and were driven out of Alexandria for their seditious practices, where they had been settled ever since the time of Alexander the Great, and dispersed into several countries, as Socrates observes in his Ecclesiastical History, lib. vii. cap. 16. And in the next chapter relates how miserably they were deluded in Crete, by one who pretended to be Moses come down from heaven to lead them to their own land through the sea; into which many threw themselves, and perished. That expulsion out of Alexandria is mentioned by David Ganz also, one of their own authors. In the sixth century, as Elmacinus tells us, they again rebelled in Palestine against the Romans, who slew a great number of them. And in the seventh, they were expelled from Antioch by Phocas, and out of Jerusalem by Heraclius, and out of Spain (anno 604.) by Sisebutus, or, as some call him, Sisebodus, king of the Goths; and they flying in great numbers into France, were shortly after put to this hard choice, either to renounce their religion, or lose all they had; which persecution, Dr. Jackson observes, in the book often mentioned, (chap. 28. parag. 1.) is recorded by those who wrote the life of Dagobert, as one of the chief memorables of his reign. What their state was in the next three centuries, he saith, he had observed nothing remarkable: nor can I find any thing notable in the eighth, but the appearance of a false Messiah, by whom they were deluded, and brought into trouble. As for the ninth, there were no learned men among them in that age, nor in the Christian world. And in the tenth they were in the same condition; insomuch, that they were fain to make a weaver the head of one of their universities.

Neither shall the sole of thy foot have rest.] They being not able to obtain a long settlement any where; but were tossed up and down, and forced from one country to another: for so it was, that, in the beginning of the eleventh century, about the year of our Lord one thousand, they were so vexed throughout the most part of Europe, that "quid agerent, aut quo se verterent nesciebant," they knew not what they should do, or which way they should turn themselves, as the forenamed doctor observes, (par. 4.) out of Papirius Massonus, who hath it out of Glauber. To which I will add this testimony out of David Ganz, in his book called Tzemach David, that, in the latter end of this century (anno 1096.) when there was a famous expedition for the recovery of the holy land, the Jews felt it a most calamitous time (as he speaks), being robbed, and pillaged, and killed, by the soldiers as they went along. And, indeed, so much cruelty was exercised upon them, that it moved St. Bernard's compassion, to write to the bishop, clergy, and people of Spire, not to persecute them, much less kill them, or drive them out of their country: "For they are dispersed (saith he) into all lands, that, while they suffer the just punishment of their horrid wickedness, they may be witnesses of our redemption," Epist. 322. And the author of Schebet Judah, mentioning their banishment out of Savoy, Piedmont, Lombardy, Sicily, and other countries, quotes these very words of Moses [among those nations thou shalt find no rest, &c.] as a prophecy of that exile; which was accompanied with many other mischiefs: for, as they fled to other countries, an immense multitude of people fell upon them, and pillaged them of all the gold and silver they were carrying away with them, as he relates there, sect. 11.

And the Lord shall give thee a trembling heart.] They being always in dread of some new misery, their condition still growing more dismal in the twelfth century: for as there is a progress in Moses's prophecy of the increase of their calamities; so it proved in the event, that their sufferings grew greater and greater. They themselves (in Tzemach David, and other books) relate, that, in the year 1142. a hundred and twenty of their congregations were utterly subverted and dispersed. And in the year 1170. they were expelled again out of France, and spoiled of their treasure; which was renewed in the year 1198. How they were used here in England, our own chronicles tell us; and the like ill-usage they met withal in Germany and Spain: so that R. Zacut complains of no less than ten grievous persecutions in this one age, to abolish the name of Jews out of the world. This could not but give them a very trembling heart.

And failing of thine eyes.] Which looked for some relief; instead whereof they were still more hardly used in the thirteenth century, being, in the year 1253. again expelled out of France, whither they had returned; and again in 1295. when they expected some rest, there was a fresh expulsion, mentioned by R. Levi ben Gersom, who saith they were spoiled of all their goods, and sent away only with their clothes upon their backs. Which he affirms with the more confidence, because it was done in his time, when, he saith, there was such a number of them, that they exceeded those that came out of Egypt. So he writes in his exposition of those words, Numb. xxiii. 10. Who can count the dust of Jacob? I will forbear to mention how they were treated here in England (1290.) and in Germany; into which they flying out of France, were most cruelly used.

And sorrow of mind.] Which must needs seize upon them heavily to find their miseries so far from abating, that they still increased in the fourteenth century: when they were banished again out of France, and spoiled of their goods, 1306. and once more 1395. which the Jews call their fourth and last banishment. About the same time they were banished out of Germany, anno 1392. In Castile, indeed, they redeemed their lives with money (which they could not part withal, without much sorrow of mind), but in Catalonia, Arragon, and in other parts of Spain, such a terrible storm fell upon them, that they themselves, in Juchasin, say, there were no less than two hundred thousand turned Christians, with heavy hearts. It would be too tedious to mention all that they suffered in the fifteenth century in Germany, Hungary, Polonia, and in Italy, Spain, and Portugal. I will only observe what befel them in the country last named, in the next century, anno 1506. when all that is said in this verse is fulfilled, by that dreadful massacre which was made of them at Lisbon for three days together; where men were not suffered to die of their deadly wounds, but were dragged by their mangled limbs into the market-place, where the bodies of the living and the slain, with others half alive, half dead, were burnt together in heaps. The spectacle was so horrible, that it quite astonished the rest of this wretched people; two thousand of which perished in this barbarous manner. Parents durst not mourn for their children, nor children sigh for their parents, when they saw them haled to the place of torment; so that their hearts, no doubt, were ready to break with grief and sorrow. In short, "Sic eos metus exanimaverat, ut vivi non multum a mortuorum similitudine distarent:" fear had so dispirited them, that the living in their aspect did not much differ from the dead; which words of Osorius (in his fourth book de Rebus Emanuelis) our Dr. Jackson, who relates this sad story out of him, looks upon as a paraphrase upon these words of Moses (though Osorius did not think of them), I will give thee a trembling heart, and failing of the eyes, and sorrow of mind.

There are those who, by a trembling heart, understand the terrors of an evil conscience: so D. Chytræus, p. 131. And by failing of the eyes may be understood, the constant disappointment of their hopes, wherewith they were sometimes fed by false Messiahs in several ages; which disappointment bred great sorrow of mind, when after earnest expectation of some good, the quite contrary came upon them.

Ver. 66. And thy life shall hang in doubt before thee.] That is, it should be doubtful whether they should live or die the next moment. As it manifestly happened in the forenamed massacre, when they durst not fetch a sigh, and yet could hardly avoid it, at the sight of their parents' or children's tortures, for fear they should suffer the same before the breath was out of their tortured bodies.

And thou shalt fear day and night, and shalt have no assurance of life.] So it was then: none of them knowing who would be next seized, in those three days' butchery. And so it was in some of their banishments, which, they were told, should be the best remedy for the evils impending over them, as the author of Schebet Judah speaks, who tells us, (sect. 23.) that the reason which some princes gave for their expulsion out of their territories was, to prevent their being torn in pieces by the people, who were most furiously set against them.

Ver. 67. And in the morning thou shalt say, Would God it were even!] That they might not see those miserable spectacles, which they hoped would end in the night, when men went to rest.

And at even thou shalt say, Would God it were morning!] Being afraid of unseen dangers, to which the night might give an opportunity; or, that they might not see their way, when they fled by sea and land, from one country to another, as they were forced to do very often: for Abarbinel, in his Commentary upon Isaiah xl. 11. reckons up four universal banishments, out of the countries where they lived. The first out of England; the next out of France; the third out of Asia, Germany, Tuscany, Lombardy, and Savoy; and the last out of Spain; when he himself was one of those who were constrained to leave that country, and knew not whither to go. He hath given us a lively description of that calamity (like to which, he saith, none had ever befallen them, since they were banished their own country) in his preface to his Commentary upon the Book of the Kings, which he wrote the very next year after their expulsion, (1493.) and the author of Schebet Judah hath transcribed in his own words: "A decree was made and proclaimed publicly, that all the Jews should change their religion, or quit the country in three months' time. Abarbinel had then a place in the court, where he petitioned the king, and besought his ministers and counsellors to revoke the edict, and be content with their estates, which they offered to him; but all in vain: for three hundred thousand, old and young, men and women, and he among the rest, went away on foot upon one day, not knowing whither to go. Some went into Portugal, others into Navarre; where they conflicted with many calamities: for some became a prey, or perished by famine and pestilence. And therefore others committed themselves to the sea, hoping to find a quiet seat in some other countries. But on the sea they met with new disasters; for many were sold as slaves when they came on any coast, many were drowned, many burnt in the ships which were set on fire; in short, all suffered the just punishment of God the avenger (as he speaks): for after all this, a plague came and swept away the rest of the miserable wretches, who were hated by all mankind; so that all that vast number perished by one calamity or other, except a very few." He that would see more of the woful miseries of this people, may look into Schebet Judah, sect. 53. where he shews what befel those who went to seek new habitations in the kingdom of Fess, where they lived a long time upon grass, and ate its very roots, and then died, and their bodies lay exposed, none being so charitable as to bury them.

For the fear of thine heart wherewith thou shalt fear, and for the sight of thine eyes which thou shalt see.] The one of these seems to refer to their dreadful apprehensions in the night; and the other to the lamentable spectacles they beheld in the day. And the simple meaning of the former part of the verse may be, that they should be weary of life, having no comfort either day or night.

Ver. 68. And the Lord shall bring thee into Egypt again.] The Jerusalem Targum translates it, The Word of the Lord shall bring thee back again. He, that is, who conducted them out of Egypt in a glorious cloud, would punish them for their foul offences against him, by bringing them again into bondage there. This was first fulfilled after the desolation made by Titus; when there was, as I observed before, (ver. 62.) above ninety thousand carried captive, and many of them transported into Egypt, as Josephus relates, in the conclusion of the sixteenth chapter of the seventh book, concerning the Wars of the Jews. And here Manasseh ben Israel hath a very pertinent observation, that Vespasian transported them into many and various regions: but Egypt is only here named, the more to reproach the Jews: as if he had said, "Ye shall be carried into that land as captives, out of which ye came in a triumphant manner," lib. iii. de Termino Vitæ, sect. 3. which may incline one to think, that he was of the same mind with our Dr. Jackson, who, observing how cruelly they were used here in England, and many other countries, concludes, that this island, and every place of Europe, wherein their condition of life hath been more hard and burdensome than their forefathers' was in Egypt, may be said to be that Egypt, into which God threatens here to bring them in ships.

And, indeed, we do not read of their being carried into Egypt after Vespasian's time; though it is set down here as a punishment to come upon them after a long train of other miseries; and must relate to their rigorous usage, which I have observed in many countries, in several ages, down to these latter times. The Jerusalem Talmud, it must be observed, mentions another bringing into Egypt (literally understood), in the Massechta beforenamed upon ver. 59. where they say, that, as God forbade them three times to return into Egypt (which they there set down), so they were forced thither three times for their transgressions against God; first, in the days of Sennacherib, king of Assyria; (Isa. xxxi. 1. 3.) secondly, in the time of Johanan, the son of Kareah; (Jer. xlii. 16.) and lastly, in the time of the emperor Trajan: but this I look upon as a mistake; for Trajan rather killed all those whom he found there, than carried them thither, as I noted before.

With ships.] Which seems to put them in mind how different their condition was now become, from what it was when they came out of Egypt without any ships; for the sea gave them a passage through it, by being made dry land. Their being carried also thither by ships, made their condition the more deplorable, because there were no means of escaping out of them, as there might have been if they had gone by land.

By the way whereof I spake unto thee.] Or, to the way, (so the particle beth often signifies, Gen. xi. 4. xvi. 22.) that is, to the place, whereof I said, Ye shall see it no more again: for it seems to be a manifest allusion to what we read in the seventeenth chapter of this book, ver. 16.

And there ye shall be sold unto your enemies for bond-men and bond-women.] Exposed to sale like beasts in the open market; and that at so vile a price, that thirty of them (as both profane and ecclesiastical historians relate) were sold for one small piece of money. Josephus, giving a particular account how the captives were disposed of by Titus, saith, that the most goodly young men he reserved to attend his triumph; of the rest, he ordered those above seventeen years old to be sent bound into Egypt, to labour in the works there; many he distributed in the provinces to perish in the theatre by the sword and wild beasts: and all under seventeen years old he commanded to be sold. But while they were making this distribution, twelve thousand of them died of famine; partly by the hatred of their guards, who gave them no food; and partly by the weakness of others, whose stomachs could not receive it, (lib. vii. cap. 16.) By which a judgment may be made how little worth these vile wretches were, as it here follows. In aftertimes, I have observed, in the course of this Commentary, how they were sold for slaves in some places, and in all used as no better. Benjamin Tudelensis, who went a pilgrimage to visit his countrymen, represents their condition as most miserable throughout the eastern empire. And particularly complains of their hard usage among the Greeks at Constantinople: within the walls of which city they were not suffered to live, nor to come thither, but on occasion of traffic and business; and that only by boat (for they had their habitation in a kind of an island), not a man being permitted on horseback, except only one, Solyman, the emperor's physician. Whose advancement was their sole comfort in that miserable servitude, under which the rest groaned, without any difference of good or bad (as he acknowledges), who were daily beaten and abused in the open streets. Thus he confesses, though his principal design was to set forth the power they retained in the world. (Itinerarium, p. 27, 28. edit. L'Empereur.)

And no man shall buy you.] Though some, as I said before, were sold at a very vile rate, next to nothing; yet others hung upon the seller's hands (as we speak), the market being either so overstocked with their numbers, that none would cheapen the greatest part of them, or they were so contemptible that nobody would give what was asked for such useless slaves: for, as no money could purchase their peace and security from calamities, so neither could the calamities, though continually most grievous (they are the words of Dr. Jackson), redeem their estimation in the world; nor all the blood of their slain (though their massacres were numberless) extinguish that hateful and loathsome conceit which most men had entertained of them. For in the fifteenth century they were become so abominable, that several doctors began to hold it unlawful for Christians to let them live among them. Particularly the famous Thomas Terrecremata, inquisitor-general, forbade all men to have any dealings with them, or to afford them meat or drink, or any thing else. Whence proceed the direful proscriptions which we read of in that age, whereby they were forced out of Spain, Poland, Hungary, and divers other countries; where they were not suffered to live, though with a note and character upon them to distinguish them from all other men.

I conclude my observations on this chapter, with the remark which the same great man (Dr. Jackson) makes, chap. 22. paragr. 6. That the extraordinary blessings and plagues which were to overtake this people, being here set down by Moses; although their blessings might have been more and more admirable than the curses that have befallen them, yet he, either foreseeing or fearing what would be, rather than hoping the best that might be, is almost four times as long in enumerating their plagues as he is in their blessings. And so have the miseries of the latter Jews been four times as long, as the prosperity of their worthy ancestors. And since our Saviour's death, all the plagues, which were in part fulfilled before, have been more than seven times multiplied upon them. For in their former overthrows or captivities, though they suffered the violence of war, yet, after that storm was past, so they did but submit to their conquerors, they lived well enough, nay, usually found more than ordinary favour at their hands; but since our Saviour's death, they have through all ages been more and more miserable; "the memory of the foregoing plagues having been but an invitation to the like, or worse; and their continual bad usage prescribing the lawfulness of their abuse."

CHAP. XXIX.

Ver. 1. THESE are the words of the covenant.] The Talmudists in the Gemara of Sota, cap. 7. sect. 24. refer these words to the benedictions and cursings mentioned in the foregoing chapter; which plainly belong to what God delivered unto Moses in Mount Sinai at the first; which he had now repeated in this book, with the addition of several blessings and curses, to make what he said the more effectual.

Which the Lord commanded Moses to make.] That is, to renew. For which end Moses repeated the principal laws of God, and explained them in this book; which is from thence called Deuteronomy: being a compendium of the Pentateuch, a breviary of the covenant, composed for the familiar and daily use of the children of Israel.

With the children of Israel in the land of Moab.] Where he declared to them the law which he had formerly delivered to their fathers, (Deut. i. 5.)

Beside the covenant which he made with them in Horeb.] This doth not signify that he made a covenant with them, different from the former made at Horeb, (Exod. xxiv.) but only now renewed the same covenant, after they had shamefully violated it more than once. Which was the more necessary, because they were ready to enter into the land of Canaan, and he was just upon his departure from them into another world; and therefore did all he could to engage them in a more firm obedience to God. And for that end, both more fully explained several laws, and added others, and at large laid before them the happiness or the misery that would ensue upon their fidelity or falseness in this covenant.

Ver. 2. And Moses called unto all Israel.] This seems to import a new summons which he sent out to them, to attend him, now he was about to conclude what he had to say to them, before he left them. Which he did not, as I have often observed, (see ver. 1.) all at once, in one continued speech, but at several times; and now was about to wind up all in this and in the next chapter.

And said unto them.] He argued with them from the knowledge and experience which they had of the power of God in his wonderful works, particularly three, which were very memorable. Those in Egypt, which he mentions here in the two next verses; and those in the wilderness, ver. 5, 6. and lately in the great victory he had given them over two potent kings, ver. 7, 8.

Ye have seen all that the Lord did before your eyes in the land of Egypt, unto Pharaoh, and unto all his servants, and unto all his land.] Some of them had seen (when they were young), and others had understood from them (which is here called seeing), all the plagues which God brought upon Pharaoh, and upon his court, and upon his whole country. This he had often called to their mind, in his preface to the repetitions of his laws, (vi. 12. vii. 18, 19. xi. 3, 4.) and makes it a great aggravation of their guilt, if they should forsake Him, who had done such wonderful things for them, (xiii. 5. 10.) And now he concludes with the same argument, as most powerful to move them, if they had any sense of their obligations to the greatest Benefactor.

Ver. 3. The great temptations which thine eyes have seen, the signs, and those great miracles.] Of these he had put them in mind before. (See iv. 34. vii. 19.)

Ver. 4. Yet the Lord hath not given you a heart to perceive, and eyes to see, and ears to hear, unto this day.] They had not so considered and laid to heart God's wonderful works, as to have a lasting sense of them bestowed upon them by God. He gives us an understanding heart, but we must first consider what he hath done for us, as the apostle instructs us, 2 Tim. ii. 7. And he gives us what we do not receive; and so in effect it is not given. Thus he saith himself, that he purged Israel, but they would not be purged, (Ezek. xxiv. 13.)

What the difference is between a heart to perceive, and eyes to see, and ears to hear, need not be curiously inquired. They are, perhaps, but three various expressions of their gross stupidity, or three degrees of it, which was so great, that they had no continued sense of the wonderful works God hath done for them; nor did so much as regard and observe them; no, nor hearken to those who put them in mind of them; which must not be imputed to any want of power in these things to move them, much less of the Divine grace to work upon their hearts by them, but was wholly to be ascribed to their own negligence and perverseness; of which God here complains, and with which he severely upbraids them, that he had not given them this grace: which is a clear demonstration the fault was in themselves. And therefore Maimonides rightly and judiciously explains these words, when he saith, the meaning is, They had not disposed themselves to receive this grace from God.

Ver. 5. And I have led you forty years in the wilderness.] By a glorious cloud, which both conducted and protected them, (viii. 2. xi. 5.) Concerning these forty years, see chap. ii. 7.

Your clothes are not waxen old upon you, and thy shoe is not waxen old upon thy foot.] See viii. 4. The Jews used no shoes in Egypt, as Bochartus probably conjectures; but being to take a long journey, through a rough way in the wilderness, he commanded them to eat the passover with shoes on their feet, (Exod. xii. 11.) And these very shoes which they put on at that festival, when they were ready to march, God suffered not to decay in all their travels for forty years following. (See Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 50.)

Ver. 6. Ye have not eaten bread, neither have ye drunk wine or strong drink.] Not commonly; though, when they passed by some neighbouring country, they might possibly sometimes purchase both bread and wine, or strong liquors: but their ordinary food was the heavenly manna, and their drink was the water that followed them out of the rock. So that the meaning is, they were constantly supported by a miraculous supply from God; who took care of them, and thereby laid a greater obligation upon them to serve him, who graciously fed them without any labour of their own. For they neither ploughed, nor sowed, nor reaped, nor took any other pains for this provision; as they must have done for bread and wine, or other liquors pressed out of dates or figs, &c.

That ye may know that I am the Lord your God.] This he did for them, that he might breed and maintain them in a sense of his omnipotent power, and of his all-sufficient goodness and faithfulness to his promises; which he intended to demonstrate at his first giving of manna to them, (Exod. xvi. 12.)

Ver. 7. And when ye came into this place.] For they were now in a part of the country which they conquered, (iv. 45, 46, &c.)

Sihon king of Heshbon, and Og king of Bashan, came out against us to battle, and we smote them.] See Numb. xxi. 24. 34, 35. Deut. ii. 30, &c. iii. 2, 3, &c.

Ver. 8. And we took their land from them, and gave it for an inheritance unto the Reubenites, &c.] See Numb. xxxii. 33. and Deut. iv. 12, &c.

Ver. 9. Keep therefore the words of this covenant, and do them.] Preserve them in memory, so as to make good your engagements which you passed to God in Horeb; which Moses was now about to renew, and lay a fresh obligation on them. For most of them being a new generation, and now going to enter upon the possession of the land of promise, it was necessary to make them sensible of the condition of their tenure, by engaging them in a solemn covenant to observe the laws of God faithfully; which was but a renewal of what was made before at Horeb.

That ye may prosper in all that you do.] See iv. 6. The Hebrew word, which we translate prosper, the LXX. translate act prudently; for they translate it Ἵνα συνῆτε. And the Vulgar, to the same purpose, ut intelligatis, that ye may understand to manage yourselves wisely in all your concerns, by observing the rules God hath given you; which was the way to prosper.

Ver. 10. Ye stand this day all of you before the Lord your God.] The summons which he sent out, (ver. 2.) it seems by this, was to appear at the tabernacle, where they now stood; and from whence he delivered these words to them, by the priests and Levites, (xxvii. 9. 14.)

Your captains of your tribes.] In the Hebrew, your heads of your tribes, who were the greatest persons in the nation, called sometimes princes.

Your elders.] These were not only the seventy elders, mentioned Numb. xi. 16. but all the other judges in their several courts, who are often called by the name of elders in this book, particularly xix. 12. 18. xxi. 2. 4. 6. xxv. 8.

And the officers.] Who attended upon the judge, to execute their sentence. (See xvi. 18.)

With all the men of Israel.] All the men of their several tribes.

Ver. 11. Your little ones, your wives.] Who were all now present, or else were represented by the men of Israel.

And thy stranger that is in thy camp.] Whether Egyptians, that followed them when they came out of Egypt, (Exod. xii. 38.) or other people who embraced their religion, so far, at least, to renounce all idolatry.

From the hewer of thy wood unto the drawer of thy water.] The meanest servant, whom they had bought, perhaps, with their money, either in Egypt, or since they came from thence.

Ver. 12. That thou shouldest enter into covenant with the Lord thy God.] In the Hebrew the words are, pass into covenant. For so covenants were anciently made in the eastern countries, by dividing the sacrifice, and passing between the parts of it; as appears from the manner of God's making a covenant with Abraham in Gen. xv. 10. 17. whence some derive the Hebrew word berith (which signifies a covenant) from bara, which signifies cutting off; because something was always sacrificed at the making covenants, and anciently cut in pieces. For the same reason the Romans called a covenant fœdus, which they derive à feriendo, from striking, that is, killing some beast (particularly a swine), which was done with many ceremonies.

And into his oath.] The Hebrew word which we translate oath, rather imports a curse, which was annexed to an oath. And so the LXX. Ἐν ταῖς ἀραῖς; for they entered into this covenant with such imprecations upon themselves, as are mentioned xxvii. 15, 16, &c. wishing, perhaps, that they might be cut to pieces, as the sacrifice was (between whose parts they passed), if they did not faithfully perform their engagement.

Which the Lord thy God maketh with thee this day.] For the covenant was mutual, as appears by the burning lamp, representing the Divine Majesty passing through the pieces of the sacrifice, when God entered into a covenant with Abraham, (Gen. xv. 17.)

Ver. 13. That he may establish thee to-day a people unto himself.] Confirm them in all the privileges which they had often forfeited by breaking his covenant; of being his peculiarly above all people, (Exod. xix. 5. Deut. xix. 2.)

And that he may be unto thee a God, as he hath said unto thee.] Bless them and do them good, as he had solemnly promised.

And sworn unto thy fathers, to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob.] Gen. xii. 2, 3. xvii. 7, 8. xxii. 16, 17. xxvi. 3, 4. xxviii. 13, 14.

Ver. 14. Neither with you only do I make this covenant and this oath.] He means those mentioned ver. 10, 11.

Ver. 15. But with him that standeth here with us this day, before the Lord our God, and also with him that is not here, &c.] I think the particle ki (which begins this verse) should not be translated but; for this is the same with what was said before, not distinct from it; and therefore should be translated thus, As with him that standeth here with us before, that is not here with us this day; i. e. with all that were absent from the present assembly, and with all future posterity, who were as yet unborn. So the Jerusalem Targum understands the latter part of this verse, With all generations which shall be after us, as if they stood here with us to-day; and so Uziclides, as they call him, With all generations to come, unto the end of the world, as if they stood here with us at this present. For perpetual leagues are sometimes made between whole nations; for whom some contract in the name and place of all the rest, and bind not only themselves, but their successors. And thus kings give fiefs to their subjects, upon conditions which their families are bound to perform in after-ages, or else lose the benefit of them.

Ver. 16. For you know how we have dwelt in the land of Egypt.] These words, and those that follow in this and the next verse, come in as an argument to move them to enter into this covenant, and to shew them the necessity of renewing it. For, as God had wonderfully multiplied them in the land of Egypt, so he delivered them from thence no less wonderfully, when they were miserably enslaved; which was such a mercy, as ought never to be forgotten (and therefore frequently mentioned in this book), and laid an obligation upon them to be wholly devoted to him, as his redeemed people, (iv. 20.)

And how we came through the nations whom we passed by.] The Edomites, Midianites, Ammonites, and Moabites, through the skirts of whose countries they passed, and were preserved from receiving any hurt by them.

Ver. 17. And ye have seen their abominations and their idols.] They had opportunity in Egypt of seeing too much of their vile idolatries. And so they had as they passed by the country of Moab and Midian, when some of them were seduced to the worship of Baal-Peor; though, if they had not been blinded by their lust, they could not but have seen how contemptible an idol that was, and have abominated it. All the idols of the heathen are frequently called abominations; and in Lev. xxvi. 30. they are called, as they are here, gillulim, which we translate in the margin dunghill-gods, to express the utmost contempt of them. And some think they are so called, not only in regard of their matter, "sed ob formam scarabæi habitantis in stercore," but for the form of the beetle, which lives in dung; for so Isis, the great goddess of the Egyptians, was represented, as Plutarch tells us, in his book de Iside et Osiride. But whether in such ancient times, as this of Moses, it may be justly doubted.

Wood and stone, silver and gold.] Generally they were made of wood or stone, which sometimes were silvered or gilded over. And if any of them were made of massy silver or gold, yet, being lifeless things, they were no more able to afford them any help, than the dung on the earth. And it was an abominable thing to look upon dead matter as a god, or to think he made his habitation there (which was the opinion of the better sort of heathen), or would be represented by them, they having no likeness at all unto him.

Ver. 18. Lest there should be among you man, or woman, or family, or tribe.] These words are to be connected with ver. 15. as the principal end why he engaged every soul of them to renew their covenant with God, that none of them might revolt from him, to serve any other god. And the order wherein he places these words shews, that idolatry is of a very infectious nature, spreading itself strangely, from single men and women unto families, and at last into whole tribes.

Whose heart turneth away this day from the Lord our God.] Who had a hankering, as we now speak, after other gods; which might afterward break out into idolatry.

To go and serve the gods of these nations.] When the heart, i. e. the mind, will, and affections, are depraved, men easily find occasions to follow, whither they lead them. And by this it appears, that the principal part of the covenant was to keep them close to the worship of one God, and no other; as I have often observed, vi. 4. vii. 2. 25. ix. 1, &c.

Lest there should be among you a root that beareth gall and wormwood.] Many take a root here to signify an evil principle, which the apostle calls an evil heart of unbelief, Heb. iii. 12. But the words going before in this verse, and those that follow in the next, plainly lead us to take it for any person lurking secretly among them (like a root underground), that was tainted with idolatry, who might poison others therewith, and in time bring forth the fruits of their impiety, which he calls gall and wormwood. Where it must be observed, that the Hebrew word rosch, which we translate gall, properly signifies an herb growing among corn, as bitter as gall. Which in Hosea x. 4. we translate hemlock; and commonly in Scripture is joined with wormwood, as it is here, Jer. ix. 15. Lament. iii. 19. Amos vi. 12. Unto which idolatry is compared, because it is most ungrateful and distasteful (if I may so speak) unto God, and produces bitter effects, that is, most grievous punishments, unto men.

Ver. 19. And it come to pass, when he.] The man spoken of before, under the name of a root of bitterness.

Heareth the words of this curse.] Against idolatry, which Moses engaged every one of them to renounce, by making a solemn covenant with God to worship him alone, and dreadful imprecations upon themselves, if they did not make good this covenant, (ver. 12. 14—16. xxvii. 15.)

That he bless himself in his heart.] Secretly fancy none of these curses shall fall upon him, but, quite contrary, promise himself all manner of happiness.

Saying, I shall have peace.] Prosper and be happy.

Though I walk in the imagination of mine heart.] Or, in the stubbornness of mine heart, as it is in the margin; that is, resolve to worship what god I best fancy.

To add drunkenness to thirst.] In the Hebrew the words are (as the margin of our Bibles observes) the drunken to the thirsty; for both words are adjectives, as grammarians speak; and, supposing a substantive to support them, many think none so proper to be understood as the word earth. Which makes this a proverbial speech, To add the wet ground to the dry and thirsty, or rather, the thirsty to the wet. For the particle beth, which in the Hebrew is the note of the accusative case, is put before the word dry, or thirsty; and, therefore, that is the thing which is to be added to the wet or drunken; not the drunken to the dry. And the sense is, draw others into the same wickedness; just as if a drunken man should draw sober persons to play the fool with him, and do as bad as himself; or, after one piece of land is overflowed, the water should be let into that which is dry, and spoil that also. For this seems to be the meaning of the whole verse, If a man shall be so presumptuous, as not only to cry peace to himself, when he runs after his own devices, in serving other gods, but endeavours to draw others into the same wicked practices.

There are a great many other interpretations of these words (seven or eight) given by the Hebrew doctors, besides others in Christian writers; which may be seen in Cocceius in his Ultima Mosis, sect. 134. But this seems to be the most easy, at which the Chaldee aims, and the LXX. if the particle μὴ be omitted, which is not in the Hebrew, nor the Chaldee, nor the Vulgar Latin. And if we take the words as we translate them (only inverting them), add thirst unto drunkenness, the sense is as easy; viz. add more sins to the foregoing, (Isa. xxx. 1.) and to be still inflamed (as the Scripture speaks) with love to more idols, after the service of many of them; "increasing their altars (as Hosea speaks) like heaps in the furrows of the field," (Hos. x. 1. xii. 11.)

Dr. Jackson, in his first book upon the Creed, (chap. 30. parag. 4.) thinks the meaning is, that posterity added to the wickedness of their ancestors. For they being cast out of their good land for their infidelity and disobedience, their posterity (saith he) continue exiles and vagabonds for their stubbornness in like practices; not being willing, to this day, to offer up the sacrifice of a contrite heart for their disobedience past, but rather (adding thirst to drunkenness) bless themselves when they hear the words of that curse, promising peace to themselves, though they walk on according to the stubbornness of their forefathers' hearts.

Ver. 20. The Lord will not spare him.] That is, not pardon, or pass by his wickedness without punishment.

But then the anger of the Lord and his jealousy shall smoke against that man.] These words import the highest degree of anger, that is, the severest plagues, which are the effects of the anger of an incensed majesty.

And all the curses that are written in this book.] Particularly in the foregoing chapter.

Shall lie upon him.] Not only fall, but remain upon him, to his utter ruin, as it follows in the next words.

And the Lord shall blot out his name from under heaven.] By his name is meant himself; so that this is a threatening of destruction to him and his posterity, till there be no memory of him left.

Ver. 21. And the Lord shall separate him unto evil, out of all the tribes of Israel.] Though he offended never so secretly, (for he speaks of one that blessed himself in his heart, &c. ver. 19.) God threatens to make him a public and notorious example of his vengeance to all the people of Israel.

According to all the curses of the covenant that are written in the book of the law.] It was a singular condescension in the Divine Majesty to enter into covenant with them; but it contained not only blessings to the obedient, but curses upon the disobedient; the latter of which were as certain as the former.

Ver. 22. So that the generations to come of your children that shall rise up after you, and the stranger that shall come from a far land, shall say.] That which follows, ver. 24.

When they see the plagues of that land.] This shews that these threatenings are denounced not merely against a simple idolater, but such an one as made it his endeavour to draw others from the worship of God; not being content to be drunk himself with heathenish superstition, but zealous to intoxicate as many as he could with it, and to root true religion out of the nation.

And the sicknesses which the Lord hath laid upon it.] In the Hebrew it is, The sicknesses wherewith he hath made it sick, i. e. the heavy punishments which he hath inflicted upon it, and thereby made it a miserable nation.

Ver. 23. And that the whole land is brimstone, and salt, and burning.] Or, as it may be translated, Is burnt up with brimstone and salt. For these make land barren and unfruitful; as Pliny particularly observes of salt, (lib. xxx. cap. 7.) "Omnis locus in quo reperitur sal, sterilis est, nihilque gignit." All ground in which salt is found is barren, and produceth nothing. (See Judg. ix. 45. Psal. cvii. 34. Jer. xvii. 6. Ezek. xlvii. 11. Zeph. ii. 9.)

That it is not sown, nor beareth, nor any grass groweth therein.] That neither nature nor art will make it fruitful.

Like the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah, Admah and Zeboim.] And the country about them, which was the most beautiful of all other in that part of the world, (Gen. xiii. 10.) but on a sudden turned into a filthy stinking lake, where no creature, neither fish nor fowl, can live.

Which the Lord overthrew in his anger, and in his wrath.] Being highly incensed by their wickedness, (see Gen. xviii. 20. xix. 24, 25.) as he was by the wickedness of the Jews; which was the more provoking, because they had such an example of his vengeance continually before their eyes, and yet went on in their evil ways, till they brought the like judgment upon all Judea. This was more exactly fulfilled in the last destruction of the Jews by the Romans, than in their first by the Babylonians: for the whole land was laid waste, and deserted by its inhabitants, and made a den of thieves; being brought to desolation by repeated returns of wars; more especially in the time of Adrian, when Julius Severus, as I observed upon the foregoing chapter, made such a devastation, that the whole country was turned, in a manner, into a wilderness.

Ver. 24. Even all nations shall say.] All that were near them, or came that way from far countries; as it goes before, ver. 22.

Wherefore hath the Lord done thus unto this land?] Which he formerly made so populous and plenteous.

And what means the heat of this great anger?] These exceeding dreadful calamities, which evidently proceeded from a Divine vengeance. For the Jews fought so valiantly, and defended Jerusalem so resolutely (as appears by Josephus), that the author of Schebet Judah had reason to say, That it was not want of arms, the unusual terror of new machines, but the anger of God, provoked by their wickedness, which was the true and only cause of their destruction. And, indeed, Titus himself said as much, That God fought for the Romans, and drove the Jews from their fortifications, Ἐπεὶ χεῖρές τε ἀνθρώπων, ἢ μηχαναὶ, &c. For what could the hands of men or machines have done against such strong towers? (See chap. xxxii. 22.)

Ver. 25. Then shall men say, Because they have forsaken the covenant of the Lord God of their fathers, which he made with them when he brought them forth out of the land of Egypt.] This account must be supposed to be given by the pious Jews, or by those who were made sensible, when it was too late, how steadfast God was in his covenant; which contained curses as well as blessings, as was before observed, ver. 21. and see vii. 9, 10. xi. 26—28.

Ver. 26. For they went and served other gods, and worshipped them whom they knew not.] This aggravated their sin, that they sought for acquaintance with strange gods, directly contrary to the covenant of God, (xii. 30, 31.)

And whom he had not given unto them.] Or, as it is in the margin, had not given (or divided) to them any portion; that is, never bestowed any benefit upon them, as the Lord their God had done, who brought them out of Egypt. Or, more simply (as Boetius thinks the words will bear), to whom no worship belonged.

Ver. 27. And the anger of the Lord was kindled against this land, to bring upon it all the curses that are written in this book.] So Moses foretold them, vii. 4. xi. 16, 17.

Ver. 28. And the Lord rooted them out of their land in anger, and wrath, and in great indignation.] Here is one word more to express his displeasure against them, than was used before, when he speaks of the destruction of Sodom, &c. ver. 23. And they all denote the great plagues threatened in Lev. xxvi. and in the foregoing chapter of this book.

And cast them into another land, as it is this day.] This may seem to relate only to their captivity in Babylon; for, after they were rooted out by the Romans, they were scattered into all lands, (xxviii. 63, 64.) But considering what goes before, (ver. 23, 24.) and that they were not quite rooted out (many of them remaining in the land when Nebuchadnezzar conquered them) till the desolation made by the Romans, I think these words relate to them also, and another land is only the singular number, as is usual, for the plural. And so the author of Schebet Judah understood it, who, quoting these words [cast them out into another land], adds, which experience now proves to be true.

Ver. 29. The secret things belong unto the Lord our God; but those that are revealed belong unto us, and to our children for ever, &c.] The Jews generally take these words to be meant of the punishment of secret sins, (particularly of idolatry, spoken of before, ver. 19.) which belongeth unto God, as the punishment of open sins belonged unto them, in obedience to his law, who commanded them to put to death him that seduced any person to idolatry, and to raze the city that apostatized unto it, (xiii. 5, 6, &c. 12, 13, &c.) And their negligence in doing their duty in this particular, made idolatry spread among them to their utter ruin. But these words may be understood as a farther answer to such inquiries, as that ver. 24. in which, if men persisted, and still asked, But why doth God thus punish his own people with such unusual severity, when there are many idolatrous nations, far worse than they, who continue still in their own land, and are not thus rooted out? Moses bids them silence such demands, and rest satisfied in this, That we cannot give an account of such things as God hath not revealed, particularly why he punishes some people, when he spares others who are as bad; but must mind our own duty, which he hath plainly revealed unto us, that is (as Moses concludes this chapter), to do after all his commandments which he hath given us in his law, believing he will greatly reward the obedient, and terribly punish, one time or other, all those that transgress it.

There may be also a more obvious sense of these words, if we translate them as some great men have done, The secrets of the Lord our God are revealed to us, and to our children. Thus Onkelos, whose judgment is very valuable; which Grotius follows, and before him Forsterus; and Paulus Fagius represents it as a commodious sense, and makes it the same with the words of the Psalmist, cxlvii. 20. "He hath not dealt so with any nation," &c. For this was a peculiar favour to the Jews, that those things which God before kept secret in his own breast he now manifested to them; that they might know how to order their lives so as to please him. But this made them liable to be punished more grievously than all other people, if they did not observe his will, which he most graciously discovered to them. And if we could give any credit to the Jews, who say that all words in the Bible that have extraordinary points upon them (of which there are but ten in the Pentateuch, and these words, lanu ulebenu, to us and our children, are the last of them) denote something peculiar and extraordinary, I should think that they relate to the revelation to be made by Jesus Christ, the great prophet promised to them, (chap. xviii.) unto which, if they did not give heed, the most dreadful punishments would be inflicted on them; as we see they have been for many ages, and are not yet ended.

CHAP. XXX.

Ver. 1. AND it shall come to pass, when all these things are come upon thee, the blessing and the curse, which I have set before thee.] God at the first bestowed great and singular blessings upon them; but when they grew so insensible of his mercy, as to violate the covenant he had made with them, then he sent his curses which he had threatened upon them: which were completed in their expulsion out of the good land, which he had given them; especially in their last expulsion by the Romans, which was rather an extirpation.

And thou shalt call to mind.] In the Hebrew, bring back to thy heart, as we observe in the margin of 1 Kings viii. 47. where there is the very same phrase, and there translated, shall bethink thyself, that is, reflect seriously both upon the blessings and curses, and consequently consider the truth of God in fulfilling both. In which consideration, repentance and conversion to God begin. (See Ezek. xviii. 28.)

Among all the nations whither the Lord thy God hath driven thee.] Where they could not choose but often think of all the blessings they had enjoyed in their own land, and might have still enjoyed, if they had not been disobedient; and all the curses which had befallen them till they were driven from thence, and had pursued them ever since. (See Lev. xxvi. 40, &c. Deut. iv. 29, 30, &c.)

Ver. 2. And shalt return unto the Lord thy God, and shalt obey his voice, according to all that I command thee this day, thou, and thy children, with all thine heart, and with all thy soul.] Repentance was completed by forsaking their idols, and returning to the worship of the Lord their God alone, and by obeying all the rest of his commands, and teaching their children to do the same; and all this with sincerity of heart. This they did, in some measure, after they were carried captive to Babylon; since which time we read nothing of their idolatry. But they fell into other sins, which stopped their ears to that great prophet, the Lord Christ, when he came to them; for which they are punished to this day, and will be till they repent and obey.

Ver. 3. Then the Lord thy God will turn thy captivity.] That is, bring those that were carried captive back again to their own land. Thus the word captivity is used, Psal. xiv. 7. Ephes. iv. 8.

And have compassion upon thee.] These words express the spring of all their happiness, viz. the Divine compassion, in pardoning their sins, which had been very provoking.

And will return and gather thee.] This is the effect of his compassion in their restitution, and recollection again into one body after their dispersion.

From all the nations whither the Lord thy God hath scattered thee.] This was fulfilled in part when they returned from Babylon; for then they who were scattered in other countries, flocked again to them; and will be more completely fulfilled when they shall believe on our blessed Saviour.

Ver. 4. And if any of thine be driven out unto the uttermost parts of heaven, from thence will the Lord thy God gather thee, and from thence will he fetch thee.] Unto this promise Nehemiah plainly alludes in his prayer to God, to prosper his endeavours for the restoration of Jerusalem.

(Nehem. i. 8, 9.) And, finding the truth of it confirmed by the king's gracious concession to him, he went about the work, though one, who was accounted a prophet (yea, several of the like quality), dissuaded him from the enterprise, as likely to prove dangerous to his person, (vi. 10—12, &c.) Ezra also tells us how Cyrus made a proclamation throughout all his kingdom, which was very large, that all the Jews might return, if they pleased, into their own country, (Ezra i. 1. 4. and see Zechariah vii. 7, 8.) And though, in their last dispersion by the Romans, they be far more scattered, and into more distant regions, than they were in the Babylonian captivity (according to Moses's threatening, xxviii. 64. of this book), yet, if they did now consider the cause of it, and lay to heart their sin in crucifying the Lord Christ, no doubt God would have compassion on them, and wonderfully restore them. For the Jews themselves apply this place (and have long done so) to their present condition, being of opinion that God hath appointed a prefixed time in his own mind, though he hath not declared it, when he will deliver them; but, if they did repent, he would shorten the days of their banishment, and immediately bring them to their own land. Thus the ancient Nitzacon, set forth not long ago by Wagenseil, p. 254. And R. Isaac, since him, and more lately, often insists upon this, in his Chissuk Emuna, published by the very same learned person; particularly Perek. vii. where he saith, "There can be no time prefixed for their deliverance, because it depends upon their repentance; whereby they may cut off the length of this banishment, provided they turn to God with their whole heart, and a full repentance." For which he alleges this place. And he repeats it again, (Perek. xxvii.) as the great comfort they have in this long banishment, that, upon their perfect repentance, God will be merciful to them, and overcome their sins, and perform this promise. Which I find still more lately mentioned in Manasseh ben Israel's book, De Termino Vitæ, lib. iii. sect. 3. where he saith, "Herein all the prophets imitate Moses, being wont, after terrible threatenings, to conclude with some singular consolation. Which made R. Aquiba (as the Talmudists report) fall a laughing, when all the wise men who were with him wept and lamented, at the sight of the ruins of Jerusalem and the temple. Which they wondering at, he said, After the clouds the sun will break out; and after the end of the evils which Moses threatened, we may hope for good things: for God is not more faithful in fulfilling the one, than in performing the other."

But, alas! in all ages hitherto there are no signs of repentance, much less of a perfect one; but they have been strangely hardened in their unbelief, and have bitterly reproached the Lord Jesus and his religion. Abarbinel himself, though a gentleman of a noble family, a well-bred person, and of an excellent understanding, is extremely guilty of this. And since his time Solomon Virgæ, in the age before us, considering the astonishing plagues that have befallen them, and that never any people, as he acknowledges, conflicted with so many miseries and so many ages as they have done, inquires the causes why the Divine Majesty should be so angry with them: he reckons seven; among which he accounts the putting of Jesus of Nazareth to death as one; yet not as a crime, but that which hath enraged Christians against them. For he wickedly illustrates this by that speech of Moses, Exod. viii. 24. which he thus translates, If we slay and sacrifice the abominable gods of the Egyptians in their sight, will they not stone us? Which is the highest reproach he could vomit against our Saviour; mingled with the most stupid folly, in giving that as a reason of the Divine anger, which at the most is only a reason in their account of men's indignation. (Schebet Judah, sect. 63.)

The most cruel usage which they have met with in all Christian countries, might thus exasperate and embitter their spirits; and I cannot excuse the violent hatred of Christians to them, and their barbarous treatment of them, though they therein fulfilled the Divine threatenings, as I have shewn upon the twenty-eighth chapter; which being ceased since the reformation of religion, the Jews have not been so virulent against our blessed Saviour; and it is to be hoped will be won to the obedience of faith by our Christian usage of them; when those other stumbling-blocks, which hinder their conversion, are removed out of the way.

Ver. 5. And the Lord thy God will bring thee into the land which thy fathers possessed, and thou shalt possess it.] Be again planted in it, as they were at their return from the captivity of Babylon; especially after they had laid the foundation of the house of the Lord, he blessed them exceedingly, Hag. ii. 18, 19. Zech. viii. 7—12.

And he will do thee good.] The prophet Zechary hath given a full explication of these words, viii. 13—15. and the prophet Jeremy before him, (xxxii. 42, 43, &c.) which was fulfilled in the building of the house of the Lord, though great opposition was made to it; and in the compassing Jerusalem with walls, and settling them in a state of liberty, according to the prophecy of Isaiah, lii. 1, 2.

And multiply thee above thy fathers.] The Hebrew words import, that he would make them greater than their fathers. Which he did, by their vast increase after they returned from Babylon: (see Zech. viii. 4, 5. and before him, Hos. i. 10.) which is manifest from their διασποραὶ, i. e. spreading themselves in so many colonies, through all Asia, both the great and the less; with Egypt, Greece, Italy, and Spain. (See Strabo, lib. xvi. concerning Joppa.) By this means they were very much exalted, as Zechariah prophesied, after their captivity; (xii. 6.) for, as they had their liberty in their own country (God being a wall of fire to them, while Jerusalem had no walls), so they spread themselves, as I said, and had their synagogues in Babylon, Arabia, Syria, and divers other countries beforementioned; and a great many proselytes also joined themselves to them.

Yet one cannot well think that so magnificent a prophecy as this is was entirely fulfilled after their return from Babylon, when they were tributaries to the Persians, and afterward fell under the power of the Grecians, under whom they suffered very much, especially in the days of Antiochus Epiphanes; whose death did not conclude their troubles, as Hermannus Witsius has shewn at large, in his Decaphylon, cap. 10. n. 9—12, &c. where he endeavours to prove that there was no moment of time, after their return from Babylon, wherein they could be said to be made greater than their fathers, especially in the days of David and Solomon: and therefore he concludes, that this promise is still to be completely fulfilled. And thus R. Isaac (in his book beforenamed, Chissuk Emuna) argues, (Perek vi.) that God did not bestow benefits upon them equal to those which their fathers enjoyed, much less superior, while the second temple stood; but all that time was full of straits and calamities; for which he alleges the prophecy of Daniel, ix. 25. And therefore saith, these words of Moses can by no means be thought to be fulfilled, when the tribes of Judah and Benjamin returned from Babylon, and left a vast number behind them, who would not come back with them, but stay there to this day.

Ver. 6. And the Lord thy God will circumcise thine heart.] By such singular benefits bestowed upon them, in a miraculous manner, God designed to take away the stubborn refractoriness of their spirits, (called hardness of heart, xxix. 19.) and to cut off all their wicked inclinations and dispositions to idolatry and superstition, which had been their ruin; which is called humbling their uncircumcised heart, Lev. xxvi. 41. But though God circumcised them, yet their hearts might remain uncircumcised, as appears from xxix. 3, 4. And therefore he calls upon them to circumcise their hearts themselves, (xvi. 10.) by laying to heart his benefits, and following the motions of his grace and holy Spirit, which thereby he put into their hearts: and their neglect of this, and resting merely in the circumcision of the flesh, was that which ruined them again.

And the heart of thy seed.] Accordingly, we find they were freed from idolatry after their return from Babylon; though still they continued in other sins. Which brought this present captivity (as they call it) upon them; another banishment being necessary (saith R. Isaac, in the book beforementioned, Perek. vii.) to purge them from their sins, by the severe afflictions which they now endure, and have long suffered; because their manifold sins, as he expresses it, need much scouring, by contusions and pressures. After which, he saith, they shall sin no more, but that shall be fulfilled which is written in the law, the Lord thy God shall circumcise thine heart, &c. quoting these very words of Moses. But, alas! they are not sensible for what sin they suffer. (See p. 96, 97. of Wagenseil's edition.)

To love the Lord thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, that thou mayest live.] See vi. 5. This prophecy, the Jews say, shall be fulfilled in the days of the Messiah, according to what Ezekiel saith, xxxvi. 26. A new heart will I give you, and a new spirit will I put into you, &c. So R. Isaac, in the place abovenamed, and in p. 83.

Ver. 7. And the Lord thy God will put all these curses upon thine enemies, and on them that hate thee, which persecute thee.] Their very restoration created them many enemies; whose hatred increased with their prosperity in their own land, and made them, when they had power, to persecute them. Whom God remarkably plagued, particularly Antiochus Epiphanes, who died in miserable torments.

Ver. 8. And thou shalt return.] This may relate as well to their return unto their own land, as to their turning unto God: of both which he had spoken before. And now, having mentioned their persecution, whereby many of them might be driven out of their country, I suppose he here promises their restoration to it again, when he had cursed their enemies.

And obey the voice of the Lord thy God, and do all his commandments, which I command thee this day.] Continue steadfast in their love to him, by a strict observance of all his commandments.

Ver. 9. And the Lord thy God will make thee plenteous in every work of thine hand, and in the fruit of thy body, &c.] The effect of their constant and sincere obedience he promises should be still greater prosperity, in all their undertakings, and in all their enjoyments. (See xxviii. 4, 5, &c.)

For good.] To encourage them to continue faithful in the service of God.

For the Lord will again rejoice over thee for good.] Delight only in blessing them; and not send any curses upon them. (See xxviii. 63. and Jer. xxxii. 41.)

As he rejoiceth over thy fathers.] In whose obedience he delighted, (Deut. x. 15.)

Ver. 10. If thou shalt hearken unto the voice of the Lord thy God, to keep his commandments, &c.] Persist in obedience to him.

And if thou turn unto the Lord thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul.] With a sincere love to all his commands, (ver. 2.) who had planted them assuredly in their land, with his whole heart, and his whole soul, as Jeremiah speaks, xxxii. 41. But herein they were defective, after they came out of the captivity of Babylon. For though they never returned again to idolatry, but kept close to the worship of God alone, yet they rested merely in the outward rites of religion, and had not a hearty love to God, and to all goodness; which made them reject the Son of God when he came among them, and fall under those long calamities, which will not end till they turn to him with all their hearts and souls.

Ver. 11. For this commandment which I command thee this day.] Of hearty love to God, and sincere obedience to all his commands, (ver. 2. 6. 8. 16.)

It is not hidden from thee.] Or, it may be translated out of the Hebrew, It is not too wonderful above thee; that is, abstruse and hard to be understood, because above their reach; but easy to be known and acquainted withal, because plainly revealed. Which is as true of the gospel, (unto which St. Paul applies these words, Rom. x. 6, &c.) as it was of the law of Moses: for therein our Saviour hath declared the mind and will of God to us, in such familiar words, that the most simple people may understand their duty.

Nor is it far off.] So that they should go to seek it, and learn it in some distant nation. R. Isaac, in his Chissuk Emuna, cap. 45. had his thoughts so fixed upon what is said ver. 4. that he fancies these words belong to that matter; and that Moses still speaks to them of repentance, which is of greater value than any other thing, and yet most easily acquired. Which cannot but make one wonder at their blindness; for, if repentance be so very easy, how comes it to pass that they remain impenitent for so many ages, and thereby, as they confess, prolong their miseries? And yet he repeats the same words in the second part of his work, Perek. lxxx. where he hath the confidence to say St. Paul misapplies this place.

Ver. 12. It is not in heaven, that thou shouldest say, Who will go up for us to heaven, and bring it unto us, that we may hear it, and do it?] R. Jacob Haesæi, in his preface to that part of the Mischna called Seder Nesim (as Guil. Vorstius observes upon Abarbinel about the Articles of their Faith), hath very fairly expounded this: which he takes to be a proverbial speech, to shew that there is no need of hard, or rather impossible labour, to come at the knowledge of God's will, as there is in many human sciences, where the mind of man is tired by several propositions and deductions, &c. before he arrive at what he seeks: but all things are plain and easy to be understood, and not hard to be performed. For God had revealed his mind clearly by Moses from heaven, and therefore none had need to go thither to desire God to acquaint them with it, which he had done of his own accord, out of his good-will towards them. And thus Grotius observes upon Rom. x. 6. out of several Greek authors, that they expressed things very difficult, by going up to heaven. Maimonides, indeed, to Jesodehatorah, cap. 9. and Abarbinel, in Rosch Amana, cap. 13. make these words an argument for the eternity and unchangeableness of their law, and that there should be no new revelation from heaven: but there is no colour for this from these words, the particle hu being of the feminine gender, and therefore doth not refer to God, but to the command beforementioned, plainly importing, that men could not pretend ignorance of their duty, nor had any reason to desire that somebody would go to heaven again for those things which Moses had already brought from thence. And thus the apostle most justly accommodates these words to the new revelation from heaven by the Son of God, which was not abstruse and difficult, but as plain and perspicuous as this now made by Moses.

Ver. 13. Neither is it beyond the sea, that thou shouldest say, Who shall go over the sea for us? &c.] Ὡς δεῖσθαι πολυχρονίου καὶ καματηρᾶς ἀποδημίας (to use the words of Philo, in his book concerning Rewards and Punishments), so as to need long and tedious voyages, laborious and wearisome travels, to fetch it from foreign countries. Such as the Greek philosophers took, who travelled into Egypt, and the eastern part of the world, to learn wisdom, which God now taught his people in the wilderness, without any pains to attain to it.

Ver. 14. But the word is very nigh unto thee.] Being brought to their very doors by Moses, the servant of God; who now delivered to them the mind of God, as the Son of God himself did afterward, when he came and dwelt among them.

In thy mouth and in thy heart.] Made so familiar to them, that they might always have it in their common discourse, to teach it their children; and had now been so often repeated, that it might be well laid up in their memory, never to be forgotten by them, (vi. 6—9. xi. 18—20.) It was also in the mouth of their priests, who were to teach them knowledge, (Malachi ii. 7.) and press it upon their hearts. Here the forenamed R. Isaac, in both the places forenamed, observes, that Repentance depends on the confession of the mouth and grief of the heart: but the largest confession and the sorest grief will not avail them, till they repent of their crucifying the Lord Jesus, and shall "confess him with their mouth, and believe in their heart, that God hath raised him from the dead," &c. as St. Paul speaks, Rom. x. 9, 10.

That thou mayest do it.] That they might have nothing to do but to put it in practice; and in order thereunto continually read it, and keep it in mind. In which the Jews were so diligent, that, as Josephus tells the gentiles (lib. ii. contra Apionem), they could as easily recite all the laws of God as tell their names. But here was their error, that they were not careful to do what they knew to be the will of God: and so, when he sent his Son among them, who plainly declared to them more fully the meaning of their holy books, they could not understand and receive that which they read every day. And indeed this is the common error (as Dr. Jackson well observes) of all corrupt minds, to seek that afar off, as if they were strangers to it, which is really in their mouth and in their heart, so that they would but be doers, and not only hearers of the word, as St. James speaks, alluding perhaps to these words of Moses. As St. Paul applies this whole passage to the gospel; which is that word of faith, so preached and published by the apostles, that it may be in all our mouths and hearts, without going to seek for any other infallible teacher.

Ver. 15. See, I have set before thee this day, life and good, death and evil.] Life and good, death and evil, may be but two words for the same thing, viz. all manner of happiness, and all manner of misery; both which he had at large set before them, in the twenty-eighth chapter. Or by life may be meant, long life in the land God had promised them; and good, all the prosperity they could wish for there: as, on the other side, death may signify their being cut off from the land of the living before their time; and evil, all the calamities he had threatened while they lived: and so the next verse seems to interpret it. Maimonides from these words observes, that the wills of men are under no force nor coaction, but are free agents; and, therefore, have precepts imposed upon them, with a punishment threatened to the disobedient, and a reward promised to those who keep God's commandments. Of which he treats at large in his preface to his Commentary upon Pirke Avoth, cap. 8.

Ver. 16. In that I command thee this day to love the Lord thy God, to walk in his ways, and to keep his commandments, and his statutes, and judgments.] This includes their entire obedience to all God's laws, which are comprehended under these three names. (See vi. 1. 5. vii. 11. x. 12, 13.)

That thou mayest live and multiply: and the Lord thy God shall bless thee in the land whither thou goest to possess it.] This is the explication of the life and good which he set before them, if they observed God's laws with sincere affection to them, (ver. 15.)

Ver. 17. But if thine heart turn away, so that thou wilt not hear.] Want of love to God, and of a due esteem of his wonderful love to them, made their heart turn away to other things, and not regard what he had revealed to them from heaven.

And worship other gods, and serve them.] This was the principal breach of the covenant of God.

Ver. 18. I denounce unto you this day, that ye shall surely perish; and that ye shall not prolong your days upon the land whither ye go, &c.] This is the explication of the death and evil he set before them, (ver. 15.)

Ver. 19. I call heaven and earth to record this day against you, that I have set before you life and death.] God, angels, and men, were witnesses that he had done his duty. See iv. 26. viii. 19. and, therefore, is owned by God himself to be "faithful in all his house," (Numb. xii. 7.)

Blessing and cursing.] They are the same with life and death: but he uses several words, to make them sensible that both proceeded from God; the one being the effect of his love and favour, and the other of his anger and high displeasure.

Therefore choose life, that thou and thy seed may live.] That is, choose to be obedient, without which they could not be happy. Or he wishes them to set their hearts on the happiness God had promised them, that it might incline them to do as follows.

Ver. 20. That thou mayest love the Lord thy God, and obey his voice.] Love is the noblest and the strongest spring of obedience.

And that thou mayest cleave unto him.] Obedience to God is the surest preservative from apostacy.

For he is thy life, and the length of thy days.] The author and giver of life; which he preserves and prolongs unto those who are obedient.

That thou mayest dwell in the land which the Lord sware unto thy fathers, to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob, to give them.] Which promise confirmed by an oath being faithfully fulfilled, he justly claimed their fidelity to him upon that account: which is the reason it is so often mentioned, (vi. 10. viii. 1. ix. 5. x. 11. xi. 9. 21. xix. 8.)

CHAP. XXXI.

Ver. 1. AND Moses went, and spake these words unto all Israel.] By this it seems plain to me, that after Moses had renewed the covenant with the people (mentioned in the foregoing chapter), he dismissed them, and retired to his own tent. But not long after gave them a new summons, (as he had done xxix. 2.) and went again to take his leave of them. The LXX. indeed seem to take the first words, as if the meaning was, that he went on with his discourse. For thus they render them, συνετέλεσε λαλῶν πάντας τοὺς λόγους τούτους, he finished speaking all these words. For which I see no warrant, nor is it likely he could speak all that here follows at the same time.

Ver. 2. And he said unto them, I am a hundred and twenty years old this day.] This shews these words were spoken not long before his death, which was this year, (xxxiv. 7.) Manasseh ben Israel would have us from hence observe, "The singular care God hath of those who serve him with a perfect heart, as Moses did; the days of whose years (saith he) are exactly proportioned. For so these words are expounded in Sota, cap. 1. 'To-day my years are completed; to-day I was born, and to-day I shall die:' for he was born on the seventh day of the month Adar, and on the same day of the same month he died. Thus Enoch (he adds) lived just three hundred and sixty-five years, which are proportioned to the days of the sun's annual course," lib. iii. de Termino Vitæ, sect. 5. But as there is no great weight in this observation, if it were true, so that which he saith of Moses is evidently false: for he did not die this very day, as appears from ver. 14. where he saith, "The days approach that I must die." Therefore the time was not yet come.

And I can no more go out and in.] Discharge the office I have long sustained of your governor and leader; (see Numb. xxvii. 17.) not because he wanted vigour, either of body or mind, (for that is contrary to xxxiv. 7. of this book) but because God did not think fit to permit him to conduct them any farther; as the following words explain it.

Also the Lord hath said unto me, Thou shalt not go over this Jordan.] The particle we translate also, often signifies for; and is so translated by us in divers places; particularly in Isa. iii. 7. Jer. xvii. 8. And being so taken here, the sense of these words is plain and easy; giving a reason why he could no longer take the charge of them, as he had done, because God had otherwise ordered; having told him he should not bring them into Canaan, which they were now ready to enter.

Ver. 3. The Lord thy God, he shall go over before thee.] Conduct them by the ark of his presence. (Josh. iii. 5. 11. and see Exod. xxiii. 23. and Deut. ix. 3.)

And he shall destroy these nations from before thee, and thou shalt possess them.] Exod. xxxiv. 11.

And Joshua, he shall go over before thee.] As their captain and leader when Moses had left them, (iii. 28. Josh. i. 2.)

As the Lord hath said.] When he was appointed the successor of Moses, (Numb. xxvii. 18. 21.)

Ver. 4. And the Lord shall do unto them as he did to Sihon and to Og, kings of the Amorites, &c.] See Numb. xxiv. 24. 34, 35.

Ver. 5. And the Lord shall give them up before thy face.] As he had promised before, vii. 23. where he saith, The Lord thy God shall deliver them unto thee. In the Hebrew the words are, before thy face. (See ix. 3.)

That ye may do unto them according to all the commandments which I have commanded you.] i. e. Utterly destroy them, and their altars, and images, and groves, &c. (See vii. 2, 3. 5. 27. xii. 1, 2, &c.)

Ver. 6. Be strong, and of a good courage.] By faith in God; which their forefathers wanting, were discouraged, and durst not go up and possess the land when God commanded them, (i. 28. 32.)

Fear not, nor be afraid of them.] Be not affrighted, much less dismayed at their multitude, their stature and strength, when you go to fight with them. The second word (afraid) only expresses a higher degree of the same passion of fear; signifying, being overcome with it. For that is the import of the Hebrew word aratz, which originally signifies to prevail over another. This he had said to their forefathers, i. 21. 29. and after repeated to them, iii. 2. 22. vii. 17, 18. 21.

For the Lord thy God, he it is that doth go with thee.] According to the assurance before given them, (xx. 4.)

He will not fail thee, nor forsake thee.] This promise, which here is general, in the next verse but one is particularly made to Joshua; and renewed to him by God himself, after the death of Moses, when they were about to enter into the land of Canaan, (Josh. i. 5.) And it is applied by the apostle unto all faithful Christians, to encourage their hope of being conducted through all difficulties and dangers unto their heavenly inheritance, (Heb. xiii. 5.)

Ver. 7. And Moses called unto Joshua, and said unto him in the sight of all Israel.] That they might have the greater reverence to his person and authority, and follow his conduct, as a leader appointed by God.

Be strong, and of a good courage.] He exhorts him to give a good example to all the people; these being the same words he had spoken to them, ver. 6.

For thou must go with this people.] Be their leader and commander-in-chief, by God's special order, (Numb. xxvii. 21.)

Unto the land which the Lord hath sworn unto their fathers to give them.] See viii. 1. x. 13. xxx. 20.

And thou shalt cause them to inherit it.] Put them into possession of it, (iii. 28.)

Ver. 8. And the Lord, he it is that doth go before thee, and will be with thee.] Josh. i. 9.

He will not fail thee, nor forsake thee.] See ver. 6.

Fear not, neither be dismayed.] The same which he said to the people, ver. 6. but was most necessary to be pressed upon him, who, by his undaunted resolution, was to put courage into them. The word we translate dismayed, is different in the Hebrew from that ver. 6. which is, be not afraid: but the LXX. and the Vulgar use the same word to express both; which denotes such a consternation, as disables a man to do his duty; which is the proper import of this word.

Ver. 9. And Moses wrote this law.] Some understand by this law, only the book of Deuteronomy; for which I can see no reason, the Scripture calling all that is contained in the five books of Moses by the name of the law. St. Paul, for instance, in Galat. iii. 21. asks this question, Do you not hear the law? and then quotes what we read in Gen. xvi. 21. And so Nehemiah saith, x. 34, 35. that they brought first-fruits unto God, as it is written in the law, viz. Exod. xiii. 12. xxiii. 19. And Josiah put away the workers with familiar spirits, &c. that he might perform the words of the law, (2 Kings xxiiii. 24.) which we find Lev. xix. 30. xx. 6. 27. And Hezekiah also, (2 Chron. xxxi. 3.) appointed the daily oblations, and those required at stated times, to be offered, as it is written in the law of the Lord, which plainly refers to the twenty-eighth and twenty-ninth of Numbers. And Joshua built an altar on Mount Ebal, (viii. 30, 31.) as it is written in the book of the law of Moses; which we find no where but in this book of Deuteronomy, (xxvii. 4.)

And delivered it unto the priests the sons of Levi.] Concerning this form of speech the priests the sons of Levi, see xvii. 9. It is probable Moses had wrote most of these five books some time ago (and so the foregoing words may be translated, Moses had wrote this law), but did not finish them till a little before his death, and then delivered them to the priests. But there is no necessity thus to understand it, for he might have had time enough between this and his death to write the whole Pentateuch; it being only said, ver. 14. Thy days approach, that thou must die; which doth not imply he was to die in a day or two, but there might be some weeks before his departure.

Which bare the ark of the covenant of the Lord.] It was most proper to deliver it unto them, who alone might touch the ark, in which this law was to be laid, (ver. 26.) The Kohathites, who were mere Levites, and not priests, did carry the ark in their travels through the wilderness, after the priests had covered it, and put in the staves thereof; (as I have shewn Numb. iv. 5, 6, &c.) but it is evident they served only as ministers to the priests, who, upon great occasions, bare the ark themselves. As when they passed over Jordan, (Josh. iii. 3. 6.) when they compassed Jericho, (Josh. vi. 6.) and when the temple of Solomon was dedicated, and the ark brought into it, (1 Kings viii. 3, 4. 6.) When David, indeed, brought the ark to Jerusalem, it is said the Levites bare it; but at the same time the priests also were summoned to take care of it; which shews the Levites bare it as their servants, (1 Chron. xv. 2. 11. 13—15.)

And unto all the elders of Israel.] As he delivered this book of the law, that is, the whole Pentateuch (as Abarbinel and others of the Jews understand it) unto the priests, commanding them to preserve it safe near the ark; (ver. 24.) so he delivered another copy of this book to the elders of every tribe, as the Jews affirm in Debarim Rabba: where they say (and it is highly probable) that Moses, before his death, wrote thirteen copies of the law (with his own hand as they add), and having delivered one unto the priests, to be preserved in the holy place, gave one to each tribe, which he committed to the care of the elders of it. Thus Maimonides, also, in his preface to Jad Chazakah, as Buxtorf observes, in Histor. Arcæ Fœderis, cap. 5. The intent of which was, I suppose, that all the people of each tribe might resort to it (as the whole nation were to resort to that in the sanctuary), if they doubted of any thing, which might be thought to be amiss, by the errors of transcribers.

Ver. 10. And Moses commanded them.] Both the priests and the elders, to take care of what follows.

At the end of every seventh year, in the solemnity of the year of release.] Mentioned xv. 1, &c.

In the feast of tabernacles.] When they had gathered in all the fruits of the earth, and thereby had greater leisure to attend to the hearing of the law read to them; which, when men's minds were also freed from cares by the release of their debts, was likely to make a greater impression upon them.

Ver. 11. When all Israel is come to appear before the Lord thy God, in the place which he shall choose.] As they were bound to do at this feast, and at Pentecost, and the Passover, (xvi. 16.)

Thou shalt read this law before all Israel in their hearing.] This order being directed, not to all Israel, but to a particular person, plainly imports, that the supreme governor, whosoever he was, had this charge laid upon him, to take care these laws should be read at this solemn time, that all the people might hear them; and therefore, I think, the Jews rightly say, that their kings, when they had them, were bound not only to look after this matter, but to read the law themselves to as many (that is) as could hear them, appointing the priests and the Levites to read it in as many other assemblies of the people as were necessary for the fulfilling of this precept. In order to which, a pulpit was set up in the court of the men of Israel on the very first day of the feast (for they did not think fit to defer it till the last, because it is here said, when Israel is come to appear before the Lord, not when they were ready to depart, as the Jews observe); the king going up into it, the minister took the book of the law, and delivered it to the ruler of the synagogue, who gave it to the sagan (or vicar of the high-priest), who delivered it to the high-priest, and he to the king; who stood up to receive it, and then sat down to read. All this expresses the reverence with which this holy book was delivered; and likewise the reverence with which they approached to the king; who, they say, began to read at this book of Deuteronomy (which is a compendium of the law), and proceeded, before he stopped, to those words, (vi. 4.) "Hear, O Israel," &c. which having also read, he omitted the rest till he came to chap. xi. 13. "And it shall come to pass, if thou wilt hearken diligently," &c. reading on to ver. 22. And then skipped to xiv. 22. "And thou shalt truly tithe," &c. reading on to the section concerning the king, (xvii. 14.) and then the cursings and blessings out of the twenty-seventh and twenty-eighth chapters, till he had ended all that section of the law. Thus the Mischna, in the title Sota, cap. 7. sect. 8. which Wagenseil hath lately illustrated with most learned annotations; and our Dr. Lightfoot also hath given an account of it long ago, in his Temple Service, chap. 17. sect. 1. where he saith, the king might sit down if he pleased, when he read, but it was esteemed more honourable if he stood; as king Agrippa did when he performed this office. And before he began to read, he made a prayer to God; and all this (he adds) was done in the court of the women. Which well agrees with what is said in the next verse, "Gather the people, men and women," &c. But it doth not contradict what I said before, of his reading it in the court of the men of Israel: for if the king were of the family of David, it was always done there; if he were not, then in the court of the women, as Wagenseil observes out of Maimonides.

Ver. 12. Gather the people together.] All that came to this feast could not meet in one place, but were divided into several assemblies, probably in their synagogues. For as many as the courts of Israel would hold meeting there, it is reasonable to think that the rest assembled in some other holy place. Such were their synagogues, which Philo (in his book of the embassy to Caius) calls places of secondary holiness. And Maimonides discourses at large of the holiness of synagogues and schools in his book of Prayer and the Priests' Blessing, cap. 11. (See upon Lev. xix. 30.)

Men, women, and children.] Though the males only were bound to go up to the great feasts, yet many devout women went also voluntarily, as appears by Hannah, 1 Sam. i. 3, 4. And all the women in Jerusalem were likewise bound to attend at these solemnities, with the children who were capable of instruction. (See Nehem. viii. 2, 3.) To whom some person of authority read the law in their court, while the king of the house of David was reading it in the court of the men of Israel.

And the stranger that is within thy gates.] Such as were proselytes to the Jewish religion; not excluding those who were only proselytes of the gate, if they would come to their assemblies.

That they may hear, and that they may learn, and fear the Lord your God, and observe to do all the words of this law.] That by this means they might be instructed in the true way of worshipping God (which is here called his fear), and to his worship and service add a careful obedience to all that he commanded in this book, which they might read (and were bound to do so) in their own private houses, and which they heard read every sabbath-day in their public synagogues. For which, indeed, there is no particular command in the law; but they being commanded to teach their children every day at home the things contained in the law, and consequently to read it, (vi. 7, 8. xi. 16.) they thought it most reasonable to have it read on the sabbath in their public assemblies, where some portion of the law was read; but now the whole volume, as an authentic testimony of the whole nation, to the truth of what is contained in these books.

Ver. 13. That their children which have not known any thing.] For the early instruction of posterity in the sacred authority of this law.

May hear, and learn to fear the Lord your God, as long as ye live in the land, &c.] Be preserved in the true religion, by so solemn an acknowledgment made by the king himself, that God delivered all these laws to Moses. Accordingly we find that Joshua, their supreme governor after the death of Moses, did read all the words of the law, not omitting a word that Moses commanded, before all the congregation, with women, and the little ones, and the strangers, that were conversant among them, (Josh. viii. 34, 35.) But from that time to the reign of Jehoshaphat, (2 Chron. xvii. 7, 8, &c.) which is commonly computed to be five hundred and thirty years, we find no mention of a public reading of it. Nor from that time to the eighteenth year of king Josiah, (2 Chron. xxxiv. 30, 31.) which was the space of two hundred eighty and two years; nor from that time till after the captivity of Babylon, (Nehem. viii. 2, 3, &c.) By which neglect they more easily fell into idolatry, and continued in it, more or less, till that captivity; for a forgetfulness of the law ensued upon this neglect.

Ver. 14. And the Lord said unto Moses, Behold, thy days approach that thou must die.] He admonishes him, that the end of his days upon earth was near, when he must resign up his office into the hands of Joshua, who had been before appointed his successor, (Numb. xxvii.)

Call Joshua, and present yourselves in the tabernacle of the congregation, that I may give you a charge.] This was done, I suppose, in the face of all the people, to whom Moses had been speaking, (ver. 1, 2.) to give Joshua the greater authority, and to make him reverenced by them, when they saw he was appointed by God himself to be their governor; as he had been before ordained publicly by God's order, (Numb. xxvii. 18, 19, &c.)

And Moses and Joshua went, and presented themselves in the tabernacle of the congregation.] In the court of the sanctuary, with their faces towards it; for it was not lawful for any but the priests to go into the sanctuary itself. Some indeed have thought, that, by a special order from God, Joshua was now admitted into it: but this seems to me to be contradicted by the next verse, which saith God appeared in a cloud over the door of the tabernacle.

Ver. 15. And the Lord appeared in the tabernacle in a pillar of a cloud.] This signifies, that the glory of the Lord (as other places speak) appeared unto them, and unto the people, as it had done upon many occasions, (Exod. xxxiii. 9, 10. Numb. ix. 15. xvi. 42, 43.)

And the pillar of the cloud stood over the door of the tabernacle.] Being a symbol of the Divine presence, whose glory appeared out of the cloud, as it did Numb. xvi. 42. For the cloud was always upon the tabernacle; (Exod. xl. 35. 38. Numb. ix. 18.) but when the Lord would strike an awe into the people, and move them to regard what he said or did, then the cloud stood at the door of the tabernacle, and the glory of the Lord came out of the most holy place, and appeared in it.

Ver. 16. And the Lord said unto Moses.] Out of the cloud, I suppose, as he did, Numb. xvi. 44.

Behold, thou shalt sleep with thy fathers.] He first admonished Moses again of his departure, in the audience, I suppose, of Joshua, who heard all the following admonition, to make him more carefully observe the end and design of it.

Sleep is a common word for death, either of good men or bad; which was not used merely as a soft expression of that, which the heathen dreaded as the most terrible of all things; but to put them in mind, perhaps, that death should not last always, but they should as certainly rise again, as they lay down (so the word is in the Hebrew) to sleep with their fathers.

And this people will rise.] In rebellion.

And go a whoring.] God, who searches all men's hearts, discerned such bad inclinations in this people, that he knew they would fall into idolatry (which is called going a whoring from him, as hath been often noted), notwithstanding all the means he had prescribed to prevent it. And therefore he adds one more, which was the learning them the following song; notwithstanding which, he foresaw, that after the death of Joshua, and the elders who survived him, they would forsake him, and worship other gods. (See Psal. cvi. 36. 38.)

After the gods of the strangers of the land.] This is an unusual phrase, signifying no more than what he calls in other places strange gods. Though some think it imports peculiarly the gods of the Canaanites, who were the former inhabitants, but, being expelled, became strangers of the land. And thus Onkelos seems to have understood it, who translates it, after the idols of the people of the land. Which was a high aggravation of their sin, that they should worship such gods as had not been able to protect their servants.

Whither they go to be among them.] This seems to countenance the foregoing exposition. And God charges them in future ages with this, as a very great guilt, that they worshipped the gods of the Amorites, in whose land they dwelt, (Judg. vi. 10.)

And will forsake me.] For he looked upon himself as forsaken (that is, not worshipped), if they worshipped any other god with him, (Exod. xx. 3.)

And break my covenant which I have made with them.] This being the principal thing in the covenant (as I have often observed), that they should worship him alone. (Exod. xx. 22, 23. xxiii. 32, 33. Deut. v. 3, 4, &c. vi. 3, 4, &c.)

Ver. 17. Then my anger shall be kindled against them in that day.] So we read it was upon their very first apostacy to idolatry, (Judg. ii. 14.) and continued so in all ages, as we read frequently in that and the following books. (See there, ver. 20. and iii. 8, &c.)

And I will forsake them.] Go no longer before them against their enemies, but deliver them up into their hands, (ver. 8.)

And will hide my face from them.] Withdraw my favour and protection. So that they were devoured, as it follows, by their enemies, and wild beasts; and many evils and troubles beset them; or, as the Hebrew phrase signifies, came upon them on a sudden. The prophet Ezekiel expresses this in these words, My face will I turn from them, (vii. 22.) The effect of which was, the Divine presence departed out of the sanctuary, and he left it (as he there speaks) to be polluted and defiled by robbers. And so it here follows.

So that they will say on that day, Are not these evils come upon us, because our God is not among us?] For whithersoever they went out, the hand of the Lord was against them for evil, as we read Judg. ii. 15. which was so remarkable a change, that it could not but at last make them reflect upon the cause of it; as we find it did, and moved them to cry unto the Lord for help, (iii. 9. 15. iv. 3, &c.)

Ver. 18. And I will surely hide my face from them, &c.] He repeats it again, because they were a people dull of hearing. Or the former words may relate to their first captivity, and these to the last (as they call it), wherein they now are. For they themselves take notice, that these words have been fulfilled by the many calamities which have befallen them since the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans. This appears from Schebet Judah, where Solomon Virgæ quotes this very verse, to prove that their present sufferings proceed not from nature, but from an angry God, more powerful than nature, as he speaks, sect. 13.

Ver. 19. Now therefore write ye.] This shews these words were directed both to Moses and to Joshua, who was to take care, after Moses's death, to see this command observed.

This song for you.] Which follows in the thirty-second chapter.

And teach it the children of Israel.] Make them get it by heart, as we now speak.

Put it in their mouths.] That they might sing it, and thereby preserve it in their memory. For it hath been always thought the most profitable way of instructing people, and communicating things to posterity, by putting them into verse; and especially children and young people are best taught in this way. And the greater moment any thing is of, the more carefully it ought to be preserved; which Plato himself thought could be done by no better means than this. And therefore, having spoken of the songs which he would have composed for the use of the people, he would have it enacted, Δεῖν πάντα ἄνδρα καὶ παῖδα, &c. that all men and children, whether bond or free, male or female, should be bound through the whole city to sing such songs, and never cease so to do, &c. (See Eusebius, lib. xii. Præpar. Evang. cap. 32.) And Plato himself, lib. ii. de Legibus; where he gives a great many cautions about this matter, and concludes that Τοῦτο δὲ Θεοῦ, ἢ Θείου τινὸς, ἂν εἴη, p. 657. this must be the work of a god, or some godlike man. As if he had been acquainted with what Moses, the man of God, or rather God himself, here ordained, that every one should have this song in their mouths, as a means to preserve them in the worship of God alone. However, this justifies the admirable discipline of the Hebrews in those ancient times, who were taught by such hymns, as the wisest men among the heathen in future times thought the best way of instruction. For which reason, as Aristotle reports in his Problems, (sect. 19. probl. 28.) people anciently sung their laws, as the Agathyrsi (he saith) continued to do in his days, Ὅπως μὴ ἐπιλάθωνται, that they might not be forgotten. Particularly the laws of Charondas (as Athenæus informs us out of Hermippus) were wont to be sung at Athens, παρ' οἶνον, over a glass of wine; and were therefore written in some sort of verse, or tunable measure, as our incomparable Dr. Bentley hath made it probable, in his late Dissertation on the Epistles of Phalaris, p. 373. Tully also (to add no more) tells us, that Cato, in his book de Originibus, reports, that it was the custom among the old Romans to have the virtues and praises of famous men sung to a pipe at their feasts; which he thinks they learnt from the ancient Pythagoreans in Italy, who were wont, carminibus præcepta quædam occultius tradere, to deliver in verses certain precepts, which were the greatest secrets in their philosophy; and composed the minds of the scholars to tranquillity, by songs and instruments of music. See upon Numb. xxi. 30. concerning this way of instruction.

That this song may be a witness for me against the children of Israel.] Testifying that they were sufficiently warned, and could not complain that they were not taught their duty, and told their danger; and reproving also their ingratitude, and putting them in mind how ill they requited their God, (ver. 21.)

Ver. 20. For when I have brought them unto the land which I sware unto their fathers, that floweth with milk and honey.] See vi. 10, &c. xv. 8, 9.

And they shall have eaten, and filled themselves, and waxen fat.] See viii. 10—12, &c. xxvii. 15.

Then they will turn unto other gods, and serve them, &c.] Against which he had most solemnly forewarned them, in the places beforementioned, and xi. 16. xii. 29, 30.

Ver. 21. And it shall come to pass, when many evils and troubles are befallen them, that this song shall testify against them as a witness.] That they are most justly punished for their foul ingratitude and unbelief, with which this song upbraided them; having told them plainly (xxxii. 18, 19.) what would be the effect of their forsaking him; and at the delivery of it, God having solemnly said here, (ver. 17.) that when they went a whoring from him he would forsake them, and hide his face from them.

For it shall not be forgotten out of the mouth of their seed.] The calamities which fell upon them, according to what is predicted in this song, brought it to their remembrance when they had forgotten it, or did not regard it. For these words do not seem to be a precept requiring them to remember this song, but a prediction, foretelling that their miseries should not suffer them quite to forget it.

For I know their imagination which they go about, even now, before I have brought them into the land which I sware.] He saw the secret inclinations and designs which were in their hearts; and perceived that at that very present they hankered, as we speak, after idols.

Ver. 22. Moses therefore wrote this song the same day.] And so did Joshua, (as he was commanded, ver. 19.) who spake the words of this song unto the people as well as Moses, xxxii. 44.

And taught it the children of Israel.] Commanded them to learn it, (ver. 19.) In order to which, the Jews say, every man was bound to write for himself a copy of it: and more than that, they make it one of the affirmative precepts (as Maimonides tells us), which obliged every Israelite to write out the whole book of the law with his own hand. For so they interpret those words, (ver. 19.) Write ye this song for you, as if they were spoken to all the people, and their meaning had been, Write ye this law for you, wherein is this song; for they were not to write the law by small parts and sections (as his words are), but all of it entirely. And if a man's parents had left him a copy, yet he was bound to write one himself; or if he could not write, to procure one to be written for him by some other person, &c. (See Schickard's Mischpat Hammelech, cap. 2. Theor. 5.)

Ver. 23. And he gave Joshua the son of Nun a charge.] That is, the Lord, who had hitherto spoken to him by Moses, now spake to him himself, and gave him this charge, to gain him the greater authority. For which end he had ordered Joshua to present himself before him, together with Moses, (ver. 14.)

Be strong, and of a good courage.] Which he repeats to him after the death of Moses, Josh. i. 6, 7.

For thou shalt bring the children of Israel into the land which I sware unto them.] I have appointed thee to be the captain of my people, to lead them into the land of Canaan.

And I will be with thee.] To give him success in all his enterprises. Which words being spoken in the audience of all the people, (as may be supposed from ver. 14.) made them readily submit to the authority of Joshua, and confide in his conduct.

Ver. 24. And it came to pass, when Moses had made an end of writing the words of this law in a book, until they were finished.] The whole book of his laws, which he put together before his death; as I said on ver. 9.

Ver. 25. That Moses commanded the Levites, &c.] The priests, who were of the tribe of Levi. (See ver. 9.)

Ver. 26. Take this book of the law, and put it in the side of the ark of the covenant of the Lord your God.] Not in the inside of it; for he doth not say, put it into the ark, but in the side of the ark, that is, on the outside, in a little box, as Jonathan and others expound it. For it is the very same phrase with that, 1 Sam. vi. 8. where the Philistines are said to have put the jewels of gold, which they returned for a sin-offering, in a coffer by the side of the ark; where none could put it but the high-priest, because nobody else might go into the holy place where the ark was. And therefore those priests who received the book of the law from Moses delivered it to Eleazar, to be there placed. See Buxtorf. Histor. Arcæ, cap. 5. and Huetius, more lately, in his Demonstratio Evangelica, propos. iv. cap. de Can. Libr. Sacrorum, sect. 8. where he observes, that R. Meir, in both the Talmuds, Abarbinel himself, and many others, have been of opinion, from this very place, that the book of the law was put into the ark itself, being no less precious than the tables of stone which were there. But the Scripture tells us, there was nothing in the ark save the two tables of stone, (1 Kings viii. 9. 2 Chron. v. 10.) and their reason is good for nothing, the two tables far excelling this book, because written by the finger of God; and therefore other great doctors among the Jews rightly place it without the ark, as the very words of Moses import.

That it may be there for a witness against thee.] It was deposited in that place as a public record, that if any one should falsify or deprave any thing in the law (as Abarbinel interprets it), he might be convicted out of this book, which was sacredly preserved to be produced as a witness against him. Or (as the author of Tzeror Hammor expresses it), that if they should be so wicked as to lose the books of the law, this copy, kept under the care of the priests, might remain to testify what was the will of God. As we see it did in the days of Josiah, when it was casually found in the house of God, as they were about the reparations of it: though I cannot say they found it in the side of the ark, but rather upon the roof of the house, or in the rafters; where the priests had hid it, as some of the Jews think, when Manasseh endeavoured to destroy this authentic copy of the law, as he had done all other that he could find; and when they came to uncover the house, there it appeared.

Ver. 27. For I know thy rebellion, and thy stiff neck.] I have been sufficiently acquainted with your perverse disposition.

Behold, while I am yet alive with you this day, ye have been rebellious against the Lord; and how much more after my death?] For it was not likely they would have a greater regard to Joshua than they had to him, who had such near familiarity with God, as never any man had.

Ver. 28. Gather unto me all the elders of your tribes.] I suppose after Moses had spoke to the people what God ordered, ver. 1, 2, &c. (see there), he dismissed them again, that he might write the book of the law, (ver. 9.) and deliver it to the priests, &c. and then write this song (which follows in the next chapter), ver. 19. 22, &c. which being done, he is ordered here to summon all the elders of the several tribes, (and with them all the people came, ver. 30.) that he might deliver to them, by word of mouth, the song which he had wrote.

And your officers.] I have frequently observed that those schoterim (which we translate officers) were but ministers to their elders or judges. (See Exod. v. 14. Deut. i. 15. xvi. 18.) Unto which I shall add here only the words of Abarbinel; The office of the schoterim was to see that the sentence which the judges had given was observed, and to compel men to it. They who would have more may find a long roll of authors, who are of this mind, both Jews and Christians, in Jo. Benedic. Carpzovius upon Schickard's Jus Regium; who hath also said a great deal to the same purpose, cap. 4. Theor. 14.

That I may speak these words in their ears.] The song which God had suggested to him, and commanded him to write, (ver. 19. 22.)

And call heaven and earth to record against them.] Call the whole world to witness how wicked they are, if they fall from God, after such care to preserve them in his obedience.

Ver. 29. For I know that after my death you will utterly corrupt yourselves.] Fall to the foulest idolatry. (Judg. ii. 19.)

And turn aside from the way which I have commanded you.] Departing from that way of God which I have delivered to you by this command. It was a very melancholy thing for Moses to leave the world in this belief, that all his pains would be lost upon them; but he comforted himself in doing his duty to the very last, and omitting no means to secure them from apostacy.

And evil will befal you in the latter days.] This seems to express a foresight, that they would not immediately revolt, but after the death of Joshua, and of the elders who survived him, (Judg. ii. 7. 11, 12, &c.)

Because ye will do evil in the sight of the Lord, to provoke him to anger through the work of your hands.] By making images, after the manner of other nations, and bowing down to them, and worshipping them, Judg. ii. 12, 13. iii. 7. where the groves signify the images in the groves.

Ver. 30. And Moses spake.] With the assistance of Joshua, xxxii. 44.

In the ears of all the congregation of Israel.] Whom the elders and officers (ver. 28.) had assembled, according to their tribes and families; unto whom they went severally, and spake these words in their hearing.

The words of this song.] Which follows in the next chapter, and much differs, in the raised expressions and loftiness of the style, from the rest of this book hitherto.

Until they were ended.] Omitted nothing, but completely delivered this song to them; or they spake all these words to them, at the same time, with one continued speech. I observed before that the most ancient way of instruction was by poetical compositions, which was more ancient than rhetorical discourses. And as their chief learning did consist of poetry, so the excellency of their poetry was seen in the proper and native subject of this faculty, that is, in matters of sacred use or observation: from whence the title of vates descended unto secular and profane poets, who retained the manner of speech used by the former. But, as Conradus Pellicanus here truly observes, (and see my notes on Exod. xv. 1.) the Scripture poetry doth not consist in the cadency and number of syllables, contrived to please the ear, but in brief and weighty sentences, simply and sincerely composed in a lively manner, to enlighten the understandings, move the affections, and stick in the memory. And the ancients (as a great man of our own observes) had this advantage of later poets, "That the fashion of the world (as he speaks), in their times, was more apt to ravish their thoughts with admiration; wonderful events being then more frequent, and their frequency not abating, but rather increasing their wonderment, because their variety was very great, and the apprehension of invisible or supernatural powers in those events was usual and undoubted. So that admiration was then enforced upon men and the breasts of those who diligently observed those events, or were any way disposed by nature to it, were inspired with lively and sublime affections, apt to vent themselves in such poetical phrases and resemblances as we cannot reach, unless we raise our invention by imitation, and stir up admiration by meditation and study. But now our senses being neither moved with such extraordinary effects of God's power, nor our minds bent to observe the ways of his wisdom, so as to be stricken with true observation of them, we have fewer good sacred poems than of any other kind."

Thus Dr. Jackson, book i. on the Creed, chap. 14. David Chytræus also hath an excellent discourse on this subject, to shew that the ancient poetry among the heathen contained the doctrine of God, and of celestial things; all the offices and rewards of virtue, with the punishment of vice; the history of their kings, and the noble acts of famous men, tom. i. of his works, p. 154, &c. where he confirms this out of the verses of Orpheus, who lived (as he computes) about a hundred and fifty years before David; and those of Pindar, Simonides, and the rest, who lived in the time of the war with Xerxes. But Moses led the way to them all; whose mind was raised to that sublimity of thoughts and speech which we find in his songs, by admiration of those strange events which he saw, Exod. xv. Numb. xxi. and here in the next chapter, wherein he was followed by Deborah, Barak, and Hannah, &c. in after-times, Judg. v. 1 Sam. ii.

CHAP. XXXII.

Ver. 1. GIVE ear, O ye heavens, and I will speak; and hear, O earth, the words of my mouth.] He calls angels and men to bear witness (xxx. 19.) that the Israelites had been admonished of their duty, and warned of their danger; and this, not by words of his own invention, but which were put into his mouth by the Spirit of God. Or (after an elegant form of speech) he calls upon all insensible creatures, every where, to listen to him, that he might awaken the Israelites out of their stupidity, or upbraid them as a people that had ears to hear, and would not hear him. And, as some of themselves have observed, he may be thought to intimate hereby, that if they would not hearken and keep his precepts, the heavens were forbidden to give them rain, and the earth to bring forth fruit. The gloss also of the Jerusalem Targum is not amiss, that Moses, being shortly to die, calls the heavens and the earth, which endure through all ages, to be witnesses against them when he was gone. But the following observation is too curious: That Isaiah, when he prophesied, i. e. being far remote from the heavens, and near to the earth, calls upon the heavens to hear, and the earth to give ear, or attend: whereas Moses, quite contrary, approaching now very near to the heavens, calls upon them to attend or give ear, and, being in spirit remote from the earth, bids it hear.

Ver. 2. My doctrine shall drop as the rain, my speech shall distil as the dew.] Or, Let my doctrine drop, &c. For this seems to be a prayer, that his words, which were sent from heaven to them, might sink into their hearts, and soften them, as the drops of rain and the dew do the earth, and produce such fruits of obedience as might make them happy.

As the small rain upon the tender herb, and as the showers upon the grass.] The aforesaid Targum thus paraphrases this whole verse: Let the doctrine of my law be as sweet upon the children of Israel as the rain; and the word of my mouth be received by them as the delectable dew: let it be as gentle showers refreshing the grass, and as the drops of the latter rain, descending and watering the blades of corn in the month of March.

Ver. 3. Because I will publish the name of the Lord.] For my song shall be concerning the Lord of heaven and earth, whose glorious perfections I will proclaim; which make him the sole object of your worship.

Ascribe ye greatness unto our God.] Acknowledge therefore the infinite power of our God; and his sovereign dominion over all; and give honour and service to none besides him.

These three first verses seem to be the preface to the song; and now follows the song itself; which Josephus calls Ποίησιν ἑξάμετρον, a poem in hexameter verse, (lib. iv. Antiq. cap. 8.)

Ver. 4. He is the Rock.] Always endures, and never changes; so that in him we may find at all times a sure refuge.

His work is perfect.] Whatsoever he undertakes, he perfects and completes it.

For all his ways are judgment.] He doth nothing without the greatest reason, and according to the rules of the exactest justice.

A God of truth.] Who is faithful to his promises.

And without iniquity.] And never deceives or wrongs any man.

Just and right is he.] Nor will he punish any man without a cause, or more than he deserves.

Maimonides takes the first words of this verse, He is the Rock, to signify the first principle, and the efficient cause of all things without himself. For so the word Rock is used, when God bids the children of Israel look to the rock out of which they were hewn, (Isa. li. 1.) that is, to Abraham their father, from whom they were descended. And so he thinks it signifies, ver. 18. of this chapter, Of the Rock that begat thee, thou art unmindful, i. e. of God, the author of their being. And again, ver. 30. their Rock (i. e. the Lord) sold them. (See More Nevochim, par. i. cap. 16.) And then by the next words, his way is perfect, he thinks is meant, that as he is the creator of all things, so there is no defect or superfluity in his works. For he takes these words to be the same with those, Gen. i. 31. God saw every thing that he had made, and, behold, it was very good. (See there, par. ii. cap. 28. and par. iii. cap. 25.) And as his works of creation are most perfect, so are his works of providence; for he governs the world with the greatest judgment and justice. So he seems to understand the next words, (par. iii. cap. 17.) all his ways are judgment. We are ignorant of the methods and reasons of his judgments, yet no injustice or iniquity is to be ascribed to him. But all the evil and all the good that befals any man, or the whole church, proceeds from the just and equal judgment of God. And more largely, cap. 49. "Our narrow minds cannot apprehend either the perfection of his works, or the equity of his judgments; for we apprehend his admirable works only by parts, whether we look upon the bodies of animals, or the celestial spheres: and in like manner we apprehend but a little of his judgments; for that of which we are ignorant in both, is far more than that which we know of either." I conclude this with the words of the author of Sepher Cosri, (par. iii. sect. 11.) "He that believes this, that all God's works are perfect, and his ways judgment, will always lead a sweet and pleasant life; all afflictions will be made light to him, nay, he will rejoice that his iniquities are hereby alleviated, and that he shall one day be rewarded for his patience; which he teaches men by his example, and thereby justifies the judgments of God." With respect to which, I suppose, the Jews now begin the prayer which they make at the burial of their dead, with this verse of Moses's song. Which prayer they call tzidduck haddin, i. e. just judgment, as Leo Modena observes, in his History of the present Jews, par. v. chap. 8.

Ver. 5. They have corrupted themselves, &c.] I know not how to justify this translation, nor that in the margin, He hath corrupted himself. Maimonides translates them better; making these words a question, and the next words in answer to them, in this manner: Did he (i. e. God, the Rock before spoken of) do him any hurt? For the Hebrew word scecheth, with lamed after it, signifies to hurt, or destroy, Numb. xxxii. 15. 1 Sam. xxiii. 10. (as Joh. Cocceius observes, in his Ultima Mosis, sect. 701.) And so the meaning is, Is God to blame for the evils that befall him? i. e. Israel. Unto which the answer follows in the next words, which we thus translate—

Their spot is not the spot of his children.] In the Hebrew, the first word of this sentence is lo, i. e. not, or no. Which the accent tipcha (as they call it) under it, shews is not to be joined with the words that follow (banau mumam), but taken by itself, being a denial of the foregoing question. And these words are thus to be translated, No, his children are their blot; i. e. all the evil that befalls them is the fruit of their children's wickedness. And so these words are in effect the same with those of Solomon, Prov. xix. "The foolishness of man perverteth his way, and his heart fretteth against the Lord:" he complains of God, when the fault is in himself. (See More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 12.)

Onkelos translates it thus: They corrupted to themselves, not to him, children that served idols; i. e. as Paulus Fagius observes, They hurt themselves, not God, when, leaving him the true God, they turned to idols; for the word corrupt is commonly used in Scripture, where it speaks of the sin of idolatry. The Jerusalem paraphrast aims at the same sense.

They are a perverse and crooked generation.] The whole body of them are untoward and untractable, walking contrary to God in all their ways; for there being a gemination (as they speak) of a syllable in the latter of these words (pethalthol), it increases the sense, and makes it the same with the superlative degree among us, importing the highest obliquity imaginable. And these words were never more exactly fulfilled than in the days of our blessed Saviour, who calls them a wicked and adulterous, a faithless and perverse generation, (Matt. xvi. 4. xvii. 17.) And in the days of the apostles, who call them Ἀτόπους, an absurd kind of people, (2 Thess. iii. 3.) who pleased not God, and were contrary to all men, (1 Thess. ii. 15.)

Ver. 6. Do ye thus requite the Lord, O foolish people and unwise?] He upbraids them with their senseless folly and foul ingratitude; which in the following words he demonstrates, by representing the obligations he had laid upon them.

Is not he thy father.] Having adopted them in a peculiar manner to be his children, above all other people.

Who hath bought thee?] When he rescued them from the slavery of Egypt.

Hath not he made thee.] Advanced them (for so the word asa is translated, 1 Sam. xii. 6.) to be a great and mighty people. (See Psal. c. 3.)

And established thee?] By settling them in excellent order, under the government of most wise and righteous laws. (See the fourth chapter of this book, ver. 7, 8.)

Ver. 7. Remember the days of old.] Look back as far as you are able.

Consider the years of many generations.] Consult the most ancient records; which would inform them how God chose their father Abraham long ago, and promised to bless his posterity, as he did Isaac and Jacob in a most eminent manner; and sent Joseph by a wonderful providence into Egypt to preserve them from starving, &c.

Ask thy father, and he will shew thee; thy elders, and they will tell thee.] All this is to express the same thing, that they should advise with those that knew more than themselves; and particularly with old men (as the word may be understood which we translate elders), who, by the benefit of their great age, had heard and seen more than others, and could tell them how God had dealt with them, ever since he brought them by a wonderful power out of the land of Egypt.

Ver. 8. When the Most High divided to the nations their inheritance.] He directs them still to look farther back, and they would find that long before Abraham's time God had them in his thoughts, even when he divided the earth among the sons of Noah and their posterity after the flood, (Gen. x. 5. 25. 32.)

When he separated the sons of Adam.] Or, the sons of men; who were one people, till he scattered them into several parts of the earth, and separated them into divers nations, by confounding their language, (Gen. xi. 8, 9.)

He set the bounds of the people, according to the number of the children of Israel.] He had then the children of Israel in his mind, before they were a nation; and made such a distribution to other people (particularly to the seven nations of Canaan), within such bounds and limits, as that there might be sufficient room for so numerous a people as the Israelites, when they came to take possession of that country.

How the LXX. came to translate these words thus, He appointed the bounds of the nations according to the number of the angels, it is hard to say. Bochartus hath made the best conjecture about it (which was hinted by De Muis before him), lib. i. Phaleg. cap. 15. that they had a bad copy before them, which left out the three first letters of Israel; and so they read Baneel, the children of God, meaning the Israelites. Instead of which some transcribers put the angels of God, because they are sometimes called his sons. Which led the ancient Greek fathers, who followed this translation, into great difficulties: and it grew a common opinion, that every nation was under the government of an angel; which seems to be the meaning also of the son of Sirach, Ecclus. xvii. 17. And many others fancying that God divided the nations according to the number of the children of Israel, when they came into Egypt, which was just seventy, they thence gather there were just so many distinct nations, and so many several languages; which is a conceit of some of the Jews, as Mr. Selden observes, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 9. But Bochart, in the place abovenamed, hath given the plain and simple meaning of this place in these words: "God so distributed the earth among the several people that were therein, that he reserved, or in his counsel designed, such a part of the earth for the Israelites, who were then unborn, as he knew would afford a commodious habitation to a most numerous nation."

Ver. 9. For the Lord's portion is his people.] And not satisfied with this kindness, he chose them alone, out of all other nations, to be under his special care, and to enjoy singular privileges, which none other had; and therefore they are called his peculiar treasure, (Exod. xix. 5.) This Origen maintains to be true against all the cavils of Celsus, lib. v. p. 250. edit. Cantabr. where he shews how beneficial their laws were; and that they were taught so early to know God, to believe the immortality of the soul, and rewards and punishments in the life to come, as demonstrated they were distinguished from all other people whatsoever. (See p. 260.)

Jacob is the lot of his inheritance.] This is the same thing repeated in other words; alluding to the manner of measuring and dividing lands by cords, as the word in the Hebrew is, which we translate lot. (See Psal. xvi. 6. and chap. 4. of this book, ver. 20.)

Ver. 10. He found him in a desert land.] There he first took the Israelites to be his peculiar people; for so the word we translate found frequently signifies. As in Psal.

cxvi. 3. the pains of hell gat hold upon me; where in the Hebrew the words are, found me. And in the New Testament, (Rom. iv. 1.) What shall we say then, that Abraham our father hath found? that is, attained.

In the waste howling wilderness.] Desolate and void of all sustenance; where nothing was to be heard but the howlings and yellings of wild beasts, (Deut. viii. 15.)

He led him about.] Conducted the Israelites from place to place, (Numb. xxxiii. 1, 2, &c.)

He instructed him.] Gave them his laws, (Exod. xx. 1, 2, &c. xxxiv. 1. 10, &c.)

He kept him as the apple of his eye.] Protected and defended them from all dangers with extraordinary care; for there is nothing of which we are more tender than the sight of our eyes; which God hath guarded by several coats and humours, and eye-lids fenced with hairs, to preserve it from hurt. Unto which R. Levi ben Gersom thinks these words allude.

Ver. 11. As an eagle stirreth up her nest, &c.] Eagles are observed to have a most tender affection to their young ones; who are here meant by her nest, as Bochartus observes (it being a common figure used by other authors, to put continens pro contento), whom she provokes to fly (which is meant by stirring up her nest) by fluttering over them with her wings stretched out. Upon which she takes them while they are so weak and feeble that they fail in their attempt to fly, and supporteth them till they recover strength to commit themselves unto the air. See Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. ii. cap. 3. and I. G. Vossius de Orig. et Progr. Idolol. lib. iii. cap. 77. where he observes, that this kindness to her young ones is chiefly found in the black eagle; though something of it be seen in others; which may be the reason they lay but a few eggs, because they are not able to educate many young ones with such tender care.

Ver. 12. So the Lord alone did lead him.] Numb. xiv. 14. This is an exact resemblance of God's tender care of his people Israel. Whom he solicited, by Moses and Aaron, to aspire after their liberty, when they were oppressed in Egypt; just as an eagle excites her young ones, when they lie drowsy in the filth of their nest, to fly away. And as the eagle flutters over them, with her wings spread abroad, so God by his Spirit moved the Israelites to be obedient to their deliverers out of Egypt. For Moses uses the very same word, when he speaks of the Spirit of God moving upon the waters, Gen. i. 2. And as the eagle carries her fainting young ones on her wings, so God supported them when they were weary, and upheld them in dangerous ways. Insomuch, that he is said to carry them in his arms, as a father doth his child, (Deut. i. 31. Hosea i. 1. 3.) See Bochartus in the place abovenamed, cap. 4.

And there was no strange god with him.] To help or assist him: but by his almighty power alone they were protected and preserved. Which made their sin the more heinous, in sacrificing to other gods, (ver. 17.) as if they had been their benefactors.

Ver. 13. He made him ride on the high places of the earth.] Brought the Israelites in a triumphant manner to possess a noble country, full of lofty and very fruitful mountains, which were in Canaan, where they lived deliciously. So to ride signifies, as Bochartus thinks, laute et opipare vivere. Which he justifies by that place in Hosea, x. 11. I will make Ephraim to ride; Judah shall plough, and Jacob shall break his clods; that is, saith he, the people of Israel lived in pleasure, when Judah lived laboriously, (par. i. Hierozoic. lib. i. cap. 41.) But to ride signifies, also, to subdue and conquer; which may be the meaning here, Psal. xlv. 4. lxvi. 12. and to have dominion and rule, as Maimonides interprets it, in his More Nevochim, par. i. cap. 70. In which sense it is said of God himself, in the next chapter of this book, He rideth upon the heavens for thy help, ver. 26. And he rideth upon Araboth the highest heavens, (Psal. lxviii. 4.)

That he might eat the increase of the field.] Abundance of corn and fruit.

And he made him to suck honey out of the rock.] Wild honey; which was esteemed an excellent food in that country, and was sometimes found upon the ground, sometimes in the hollow part of trees, and sometimes in the clefts of rocks, as Bochartus observes out of good authors, (Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. iv. cap. 15.) This rock-honey seems to be spoken of as the best of this kind, being joined with the finest wheat, Psal. lxxxi. ult.

And oil out of the flinty rock.] No part of this country being barren, but affording something or other for their sustenance; though some say that the olive-tree thrives best in rocky places. Columella himself observes, that it doth not delight either in low places or in high, but "magis modicos clivos amat," but rather loves the sides of moderately-rising hills, (lib. vi. cap. 6.) And D. Chytræus notes, that as the most generous wine is produced upon the Rhine, below Mentz, out of the hardest flints; "sic oleæ locis petrosis sterilibus non infeliciter proveniunt;" so olive-trees grow prosperously in stony and barren places, (tom. i. p. 173.)

Ver. 14. Butter of kine.] The use of butter was very ancient among the Hebrews, though lately known to the Greeks, (as I observed upon Gen. xviii. 8.) and it was accounted an excellent food.

And milk of sheep.] Which the Scripture often mentions, (Isa. vii. 21, 22. 1 Cor. ix. 1. 7.) And under the word tzon, as hath been often observed, goats also are comprehended, whose milk likewise is mentioned, Prov. xxvii. 27. Aristotle mentions both, and so doth Columella, and a great many others, in Bochart's Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 45. where he proves that they made butter of these milks, as well as of cows.

With the fat of lambs.] Well fed. For carim properly signifies pasture sheep, as the same Bochart there observes, (cap. 43.)

And rams of the breed of Bashan.] A country famous for excellent pasture; being εὔβοτος καὶ εὐανθὴς, &c. as St. Cyril calls it. (See Numb. xxxii. 1. 4.)

And goats.] Of the breed of that country.

With the fat of kidneys of wheat.] The Hebrews call the best of every kind of thing by the name of the fat. And the kidneys of wheat signify large and plump corn, affording great plenty of flour. Cajetan thinks it signifies wheat as big as a kidney; or rather, having that shape, as our kidney-beans have.

And thou shalt drink the pure blood of the grapes.] Most generous red wine; very clear and bright. So Achil. Tatius, lib. ii. calls wine αἷμα βοτρύων.

Maimonides, in his More Nevochim, par. ii. cap. 47. takes all the expressions in this verse to be metaphorical, signifying (as Onkelos allegorizes them) the possession of all their enemies' cities and goods, after they had poured out their blood like water on the ground.

Ver. 15. Jeshurun waxed fat.] Grew rich, saith Onkelos and the Jerusalem Targum.

And kicked.] Against him who fed him so plentifully and deliciously. It seems to be a metaphor taken from oxen, who, being stirred up with a goad to labour, lift up their heels and kick against him who pricks them forward. So did the Israelites when they were urged and pressed to their duty by the prophets; not only despised, but evil-entreated them.

Why Israel is called Jeshurun is not easy to resolve. Jo. Cocceius (in his Ultima Mosis, sect. 973.) derives it from Shur, which signifies to see, behold, or descry. From whence, in the future tense and the plural number, comes Jeshuru, which, by the addition of nun parogogicum, as they speak, makes Jeshurun, that is, The people who had the vision of God. I know nothing more simple, nor more probable than this; which highly aggravated their sin, who, having God so nigh unto them, (iv. 7.) and their elders having had a sight of him, (Exod. xxiv. 10.) were so ungrateful as to rebel against him, and worship other gods. Some refer this kicking to their revolt from the house of David; when Jeroboam, to preserve his new kingdom, set up the golden calves, to prevent the return of the people to their old master, by going up to Jerusalem to worship.

Thou art waxen fat, thou art grown thick, thou art covered with fatness.] This variety of expressions is used to signify how exceeding bountifully God had provided for them; and withal, how very wanton and insolent they were grown, as cattle fed in a fat pasture are wont to be. The words with fatness (after covered) are not in the Hebrew, but are well supplied out of other places, particularly Psal. xvii. 10.

Then he forsook God.] The Jerusalem Targum here hath it, They forsook the Word of God.

Which made him.] Advanced them from a desert where he found them, (ver. 6. 10.) into a very rich and plentiful country. This was the lamentable effect of their plethora, or fulness; unto which we are all too prone, as an excellent person of our own hath long ago observed. "Even such as seem most upright (saith he) when they wax fat, spurn with the heel, and cast away the memory of their misery, and of God's former mercy, behind their backs. And what was the reason that the Israelites waxed thus full and fat? Only because they did not use that exercise which God had appointed to keep them under, and preserve their hearts from being lifted up: (Deut. viii. 11, &c.) 'Take heed to thyself, lest when thou hast eaten, and filled thyself, &c. then thy heart be lifted up, and thou forget the Lord thy God, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt,' &c. The daily and lively representation, or recognition of their condition there, should have been as usual to them as their meat and drink, yea, as it were, their thanksgiving before and after meats," as our Dr. Jackson speaks, book xi. on the Creed, chap. 34. And Maimonides himself, mentioning those very words, "Lest when thou hast eaten, and filled thyself," &c. very well observes, that to prevent pride and apostacy, which grow out of great plenty, God commanded them to offer their first-fruits before him every year, with a solemn confession, how poor they were in the beginning, and then raised by God to be a mighty people, (Deut. xxvi. 5, 6, &c.) For which end the Passover was instituted, "That they might remember the day when they came forth out of Egypt all the days of their life," (Deut. xvi. 3.) See More Nevoch. par. ii. cap. 39.

And lightly esteemed the Rock of their salvation.] As there was a progress in their insolent forgetfulness of God, expressed in three phrases, which may signify three degrees of their stupidity (waxen fat, grown thick, and covered with fatness), so some observe as many degrees of their rebellion: first, they kicked against God, i. e. threw off the yoke of his laws, and refused to observe them; secondly, they forsook God, and fell into idolatry; and, lastly, they lightly esteemed the Rock of their salvation. Where the Hebrew word nibbel signifies more than a light esteem; for, if it come from nebelah, a dead carcass (as some think it doth), it denotes the greatest abhorrence, nothing being so much abominated among the Jews as a dead carcass, the touching of which was the highest pollution. And thus J. Cocceius and Campeg. Vitringa understand it; who observe that this was never so fulfilled as in their behaviour towards our Lord Christ, who was indeed the Rock of their salvation, and so vilely used by them, as if he had been the most loathsome man upon earth. So Vitringa expounds these words, (in his Observ. Sacr. lib. ii. cap. 9. p. 173.) "instar flagitii tractavit rupem salutis suæ." For this is a word used by God himself, when he would express his utter detestation of Nineveh, and his dealing with her according to her abominable wickedness, Nahum iii. 6. "I will cast abominable filth upon thee, and make thee vile," &c. and when he speaks of the disgrace he would put upon his own temple, Jer. xiv. 21. The LXX. indeed simply expound the word ἀπέστη, he departed; but the last words they expound ἀπὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ σωτῆρος αὐτοῦ, from God his Saviour, as Onkelos also, his most mighty Redeemer. Which, in the most eminent sense, is the Lord Jesus; for none brought such salvation to them, and wrought such a redemption for them, as he did; who is "the stone which God laid in Sion," &c. (Isa. xxviii. 16.) But instead of flying to him, as men in danger do to a rock, or strong fortress, they not only rejected him, but abused and put the highest indignities upon him.

Ver. 16. They provoked him to jealousy.] Made him extremely angry with them. For so jealousy is described as the rage of a man, Prov. vi. 34.

With strange gods.] Whom they fell in love withal, and worshipped. This was the ground of his jealousy, their falseness to God, who had espoused them to himself. And the Hebrew word zar (strange) we sometimes translate another, (Job xix. 27.) So that a strange god and another god are the very same, (Psal. lxxxi. 9. Exod. xx. 3.) Therefore God saith he will not give his glory to another, (Isa. xlii. 8.) and that their sorrows shall be multiplied that hasten after another god, (Psal. xvi. 4.)

With abominations provoked they him to anger.] I take this to be a repetition of the same thing, their idols being called abominations, because God exceedingly hates them, (vii. 25. 1 Kings xi. 5.) Though R. Solomon and Abarbinel, by abominations, here understand those filthy mixtures forbidden in Lev. xviii. with witchcrafts, and such-like wickedness. And Abarbinel refers the first part of this verse to the times under the first temple, when they worshipped the sun, moon, and stars; and the latter part of it to the times under the second temple, when, though they were free from idolatry, they were corrupted with other abominable filthiness.

Ver. 17. They sacrificed to devils, and not to God.] The Hebrew word schedim, which we translate devils, imports as much as destroyers; (as the devil is called, in the book of Revelation, ix. 11.) evil spirits delighting in mischief, and leading those that worship them into perdition. Though some think they are called schedim ironically, by way of scorn, the true God being Schaddai, the Omnipotent, and All-sufficient; and these called, by way of mockery, counterfeit gods, who had no power to help their worshippers, nor were sufficient to preserve themselves. Either of these accounts of the word is better than that of Manasseh ben Israel, who derives it from שדה a field, because they frequent desert places. But then they should have been called sedim, not schedim, as he must needs know, who was a great master in the Hebrew learning. The LXX. call them here δαιμόνια, and so doth the apostle, 1 Cor. x. 19. because the demons led men into the impiety of worshipping other gods, either themselves or other beings, which they persuaded simple people had some divinity in them; and that not only the stars, but even beasts here upon the earth, nay, onions and garlic, which they did not take to be gods, but things by which, as intermediate causes, their gods were pleased or offended with them, and therefore worshipped them.

To gods whom they knew not.] Or, as the words may be translated, gods that knew not them, that is, had never bestowed any benefits upon them: for, as it follows, they were new gods, never before heard of by their ancestors.

New gods, that newly came up.] Such as Jeroboam's calves, invented out of his own brain; and the gods of other nations, Moloch and Baal, which were new to the Israelites, and had not been known among them; for the demon gods were of no great antiquity: Bel, or Baal (as he is called in the Chaldee dialect), the first king of Babel after Nimrod, being the first that ever was deified (as Mr. Mede observes), or reputed a god after his death; whence all other demons were called Baalim, as all the Roman emperors were called Cæsars, from the first emperor of that name. (See p. 776.) Besides which the heathens had another higher sort of demons, which had never been linked to a mortal body, viz. those we call angels, who the Israelites were taught to be but ministers unto their God, and therefore not to be worshipped.

Whom your fathers feared not.] That is, did not worship. This was a great aggravation of their guilt, that when they would have other objects of worship, they did not return unto those whom their ancestors had reverenced (the Teraphim, for instance, which were the gods of Laban and Rachel), for whose worship they might have pretended tradition; but chose gods whom their forefathers were not acquainted withal; which was a token of a strange proneness to idolatry. And Maimonides, mentioning this verse, observes, that they worshipped not only things that had a being, but mere imaginations: for which he quotes these words of the book Siphri: "It was not enough that they worshipped the sun, moon, and stars, and celestial signs, but they worshipped their shadow." (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 46.)

Ver. 18. Of the Rock that begat thee.] God, the author of thy being. See ver. 4.

Thou art unmindful.] Being wholly intent to idols, which they themselves have made.

And hast forgotten God that formed thee.] Into a kingdom of priests, making them his peculiar people, (Exod. xix. 5, 6.)

Ver. 19. And when the Lord saw it, he abhorred them.] Cast them off as they had done him.

Because of the provoking of his sons and of his daughters.] For so they were till they corrupted themselves, and thereby highly incensed him against them: for nothing can be so provoking as the rebellion of children against a most indulgent parent. Maimonides translates it, By reason of his anger against his sons and his daughters, More Nevochim, par. i. cap. 36. where he observes, we never find the word caas (which is here used, signifying indignation), in Scripture, applied to God, but only when it speaks of idolatry.

Ver. 20. And he said.] Resolved.

I will hide my face from them.] See xxxi. 17, 18.

I will see what their end shall be.] Not cease my judgments till I have brought the sorest calamities upon them, and made an end of them, that is, of their polity and government.

For they are a very froward generation.] Incorrigibly wicked.

Children in whom there is no faith.] Who had broken their covenant with him (xxxi. 16.) so often, that they were not to be trusted, when they made profession of repentance. The book of Judges, and, indeed, their whole history, testifies to the truth of this.

Ver. 21. They have moved me to jealousy.] See ver. 16.

With that which is not God.] By worshipping God's creatures, or the work of their own hands.

They have provoked me to anger with their vanities.] The same thing, in other words; all the gods of the nations, whom the Israelites imitated, being mere vanities (or things of nought, as the Jerusalem Targum hath it), as hath been often observed.

And I will move them to jealousy.] He threatens to be even with them, and serve them in their kind.

With those that are not a people.] Who either were not a nation in being at this time, or so obscure, base, and ignoble, that they were not worthy the name of a nation. The Jews interpret it to the Chaldeans; whom God raised up on a sudden, when nobody would believe it, (Habak. i. 5, 6, &c.) to be a terrible scourge to them. (See Isa. xxiii. 13.)

And I will provoke them to anger with a foolish nation.] The Jews thought all nations so, except themselves. And, in one sense, all the gentiles were really so: for nothing was more foolish than to worship creatures meaner than themselves, (Jer. x. 8.)

The apostle applies this unto the bestowing the blessing of the Messiah, whom the Jews refused, upon the gentile world, (Rom. x. 19.) which strangely enraged the Jews; as we see, when our Saviour first mentioned it, Matt. xxi. 43, 44, &c. and when St. Paul did but speak of going to preach unto them, Acts xxii. 21, 22. and see 1 Thess. ii. 15, 16. And through all ages since it hath made them gnash their teeth to see so many nations subject unto our Saviour, and honour him as God, whom they rejected as the vilest of men.

Ver. 22. For a fire is kindled in mine anger.] Great and sore calamities are compared to fire in Scripture, (Ezek. xxx. 8.) which God here threatens to send upon them, as the woful effects of his heavy displeasure.

And shall burn unto the lowest hell.] Never cease till they have destroyed them. For hell and destruction seem to be the same, (Prov. xv. 11.) And therefore the lowest hell signifies the depth of misery.

And shall consume the earth with her increase.] Make an utter desolation in the country, (Isa. i. 7.)

And set on fire the foundations of the mountains.] Subvert the strongest fortresses, which were accounted impregnable. Such as Jerusalem (which Rasi thinks is here meant), in whose last destruction this was perfectly fulfilled, as it was in part at the first, (2 Kings xxv. 9.) For Titus himself, as Josephus relates, (lib. vii. de Bello Judaico, cap. 43.) observing the vast height of the walls, the bigness of every stone, the exact order wherein they were laid and compacted, &c. cried out—God was with us in this war, he drove the Jews from these munitions, ἐπεὶ χεῖρές τε τῶν ἀνθρώπων, ἢ μηχαναὶ, τί πρὸς τούτους τοὺς πύργους δύνανται: for what could men's hands or machines do against such towers? Which calls to mind what is related, not only by St. Chrysostom, Sozomen, Socrates, but by Ammianus Marcellinus himself, a heathen historian (lib. xxiii. beginning), how that when Julian, the apostate, ordered the temple of Jerusalem to be rebuilt, terrible globes of fire burst out, prope fundamenta, from the very foundations, which overturned all, burnt the workmen, and made the place so inaccessible, that they desisted from the attempt. The certainty of this hath extorted the same confession from the Jews themselves (David Ganz, in his Tzemach David, and R. Gedaliah, in Schal. Hakkabala), though they pretend the building went on and was finished, but after many years overthrown by an earthquake.

Ver. 23. I will heap mischiefs upon them.] Which shall miserably oppress and crush them.

And spend all my arrows upon them.] His judgments and plagues are often compared to arrows shot at them, (Psal. vii. 12, 13. xxxviii. 2. xci. 5.) And he speaks in the language of an archer, who shoots till he hath emptied his quiver, and hath not one arrow left.

Ver. 24. They shall be burnt with hunger.] This verse and the next explain what he means by arrows, which are here enumerated. And, first, he threatens a famine, with which he saith they should be burnt; either because these judgments are compared to fire, ver. 22. or because extreme hunger parches the inward parts, and makes the visage as black as a coal, as Jeremiah speaks, Lament. iv. 8.

And devoured with burning heat.] With fevers, and calentures, as they are called in hot countries.

And with bitter destruction.] With the pestilence; which he calls bitter, because it was incurable.

And I will send the teeth of wild beasts upon thee.] This was another of the sore judgments which God threatened to their disobedience. (See Lev. xxvi. 22.) Upon which Maimonides observed, that magicians were wont to promise them, by their arts, to free their cities, fields, and plantations from lions and serpents, and such-like hurtful creatures; unto whose power God delivered them, because they forsook him, and followed idolaters and magicians, (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 37.)

With the poison of serpents of the dust.] Whose bitings were deadly. And they were exposed to them, as well as to wild beasts, when they were forced to fly into wildernesses, and hide themselves in dens and caves; where some of them could not avoid being devoured by wild beasts, and bitten by serpents, which lay lurking in those holes. So Cocceius, in his Ultima Mosis, sect. 1271. where he notes also, that this was fulfilled in part when they were thrown by the Romans to wild beasts in the theatres, as Josephus relates, lib. vi. de Bello Judaico, cap. 16. 20.

Ver. 25. The sword without, and terror within, shall destroy.] They could no where be safe; for in the field the sword of their enemies cut them off; and at home they did not think themselves secure in their closest chamber, but died with fear, or made away themselves, lest they should fall into the hands of those that sought to destroy them. (See Lament. i. 20.) Or, perhaps, by the terror within, may be meant famine and pestilence, (Ezek. vii. 15.)

Both the young man and the virgin, the suckling, with the man of grey hairs.] He threatens to deliver them into such merciless hands, as would spare none, nor make any difference of sex or of age. This Huetius refers to the last destruction of Jerusalem, in his Demonstr. Evang. propos. ix. cap. 173. and Abarbinel also confesses it was then fulfilled.

Ver. 26. I said.] i. e. Resolved.

I would scatter them into corners; I would make the remembrance of them to cease from among men.] Utterly destroy them, so that not one of them should be found; and if any remained they should skulk, and not dare to appear among men.

Ver. 27. Were it not that I feared the wrath of the enemy.] He that is omnipotent is not capable of fearing any thing: but he speaks in our language, and gives this reason why he did not make them cease to be a nation, because he would not have their enemies insult, and grow outrageous in their insolent language, even against himself. Of which we find an instance, Isa. xxxvii. 28, 29.

Lest their adversaries should behave themselves strangely.] Ascribe all this to their false gods (as Cocceius understands it), which are called strange gods, (ver. 16.)

And lest they should say, Our hand is high.] Imagine their own power and valour had destroyed the Jews; as both the Assyrians and Chaldeans boasted. (Isa. x. 7, 8, &c. Habak. i. 15, 16.)

And the Lord hath not done all this.] And attribute nothing to the Most High in all the business. Certain it is, the wickedness of the Jews was so exceeding great, that their final extirpation had been accomplished many generations before it came to pass, had the Lord been only just, and respected nothing but their deserts, whom he very often preserved when they might have been justly destroyed, for such reasons as he himself here gives; that his glory might not be impeached among the nations, but they might see by the strange deliverances and restorations of the Jews, that "their God was a God of gods," most worthy to be honoured by all the world, as he himself speaks below, ver. 36. So Dr. Jackson well observes, book i. on the Creed, chap. 22. sect. 4.

The marginal translation of this last clause is also agreeable to the Hebrew, Our high hand, and not the Lord, hath done all this. To prevent which wrong construction of God's judgments upon them, he took such a time for the execution of them (as Conradus Pellicanus well observes), when the world began to be better instructed by the coming of Christ. So that Titus himself said, as I noted before, that it was God, and not the hands of the Romans, that destroyed them. (See xxix. 24. and this chapter, ver. 22.)

Ver. 28. For they are a nation void of counsel.] The Hebrew word abad (which is commonly translated perish, and here we translate void) signifies, in the Ethiopic language, is foolish or mad, as Job Ludolphus observes in his excellent history of that country. Which makes it probable this was the ancient sense of the word among the Hebrews, and gives the best account of this place, which may be thus translated, They are a nation foolish in their counsel. Whose counsels led them to such courses as utterly undid them; and when they seemed most wise they madly ruined themselves. And thus those words of Jeremiah may be best translated, "The heart of the king is foolish," (iv. 9.)

Neither is there any understanding in them.] They did not understand what was good for themselves; but imprudently chose that which did them mischief. Some refer this to the enemies of the Jews before spoken of: but that seems not so agreeable to what follows, which relates to the same persons, and most likely expresses God's compassion towards the senseless Jews. Huetius applies this to their stupid blindness at their last destruction; which they were so far from preventing, that they drew it upon themselves, as Josephus shews. (See xxviii. 28, 29.)

Ver. 29. Oh that they were wise.] So as seriously to consider God's dealing with them exactly, according to what he foretold them.

That they understood this, &c.] Or, as it may be translated, Then would they understand this, they would consider their latter end. They would soon perceive the hand of God in all that is befallen them; and that if they do not change their course, they will, in the conclusion, be utterly undone.

Ver. 30. How should one chase a thousand, and two put ten thousand to flight?] Whence should such an amazing change proceed? that the Israelites, who formerly with a handful of men put vast armies to flight, (Lev. xxvi. 8.) should now, though never so numerous, be beaten by one or two of their enemies, fleeing when none pursues them? (Lev. xxvi. 17. 36, 37. Deut. xxviii. 25.)

Except their Rock had sold them.] A little consideration was sufficient to make them understand, that this had been impossible if they had not forsaken their God; who thereupon delivered them up to the will of their enemies. For by their Rock is meant God; and his selling them is his quitting his interest in them, and giving them up to be slaves to those that hated them.

And the Lord had shut them up.] So that they could not escape the hands of their enemies.

Ver. 31. For their rock is not as our Rock.] None of the gods of the heathen (whom he calls their rock, because they relied on them for safety) have such power as he that gave us our being. So Maimonides interprets the word tzur, the spring and fountain of all things.

Our enemies themselves being judges.] Who were often forced to acknowledge his overruling power and providence, controlling all their designs. As the Egyptians confessed, Exod. xiv. 2. 5. and Balaam, Numb. xxiii. 19. 22. and the Philistines, 1 Sam. iv. 7, 8. and the king of Babylon, Dan. iii. 29.

Ver. 32. For their vine is the vine of Sodom, and of the fields of Gomorrah.] I suppose he speaks here of the Israelites, (giving an account why their enemies so shamefully chased them, ver. 30.) who are compared to a vine, which God brought out of Egypt, and planted in Canaan, (Psalm lxxx. 8.) And the prophet afterward calls them the plant of his pleasure, (Isa. v. 7.) Which was an ancient resemblance, as appears by this place; where he represents them as such a degenerate people, that they were as bad (nay, worse, as the marginal translation is) as the Sodomites, or the people of Gomorrah: and therefore deserved (ver. 26.) to be utterly destroyed, as they were. (See Isa. i. 10. Jer. ii. 21.)

Their grapes are grapes of gall, their clusters are bitter.] These words represent their actions (called fruit in Scripture) to be so wicked that they were not to be endured. And so Josephus describes them before their last destruction, lib. vi. de Bello Judaico, cap. ult. where he saith, if the Romans had delayed to fall upon such a wicked people, he thinks either the earth would have opened its mouth and swallowed them up, or a flood drowned their city, or thunder and lightning from heaven destroyed it, as it did Sodom. Πολὺ γὰρ τῶν ταῦτα παθόντων ἤμεγκε γενεὰν ἀθεωτέραν, for they were a more atheistical generation than they who suffered such things. And again, (lib. vii. cap. 30.) he saith, that the time when they were destroyed was so fruitful in all manner of wickedness among the Jews, ὡς μηδὲν κακίας ἔργον ἄπρακτον καταλιπεῖν, that there was no one work of wickedness that was not committed; nor can one imagine any thing so bad that they did not do; endeavouring publicly, as well as privately, to excel one another both in impiety towards God and injustice to their neighbours.

Ver. 33. Their wine is the poison of dragons.] This still represents their fruit, that is, their works, to be most pernicious, being compared to the poison of dragons. Many authors, indeed, say that dragons have no poison in them (as B. Chytræus and others observe); but as the Hebrew word thaanim signifies any kind of serpent, so it is certain that the dragons of Afric and Arabia had a deadly poison in them, though those of Greece had not; as the famous Bochartus shews at large, in his Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. iii. cap. 14. Who also observes, in another place, that the Hebrew word rosch signifying both the head and also poison; the poison of serpents lies partly in their gall, partly in their teeth, and partly in a little bladder under their tongue, (par. i. lib. i. cap. 4.)

And the cruel venom of asps.] The poison of asps is called cruel, because it is accounted the acutest of all other, instantly penetrating into the vital parts. Whence the proverb δῆγμα ἀσπίδων, the biting of asps, for an incurable wound. For they who are bitten with an asp seldom escape with their life; as Aristotle, Pliny, and a great many other authors observe, in Bochart. par. ii. lib. iii. cap. 5.

Ver. 34. Is not this.] That is, the vengeance he is going to speak of in the following verses. For this particle hu often refers to what comes after, not to what goes before, as Cocceius observes.

Laid up in store with me.] To be produced in due time.

Sealed up among my treasures?] He speaks of it as a matter determined or decreed, as deeds are which are signed and sealed, though not presently executed, but kept safely in a cabinet. And the meaning of this verse is, that though he do not speedily punish evil-doers, it is not because he doth not observe them, or forgets what they do; for he hath prefixed a time to reckon with them, as will appear in the issue.

Ver. 35. To me belongeth vengeance and recompence.] As the supreme Lord, Governor, and Judge of the world, whose office it is to punish offenders. It is evident the apostle, alleging these words, (Rom. xii. 19.) ἐμοὶ ἐκδίκησις, Vengeance is mine (or to me belongeth vengeance), exactly follows the Hebrew text, and not the present LXX. which render these words, ἐν ἡμέρᾳ ἐκδικήσεως ἀνταποδώσω, in the day of vengeance I will recompense.

Their feet shall slide.] Though they think themselves unmoveably fixed in their dominion, they shall certainly fall.

In due time.] Not so soon, perhaps, as men may expect; but when the great Judge of the world sees it most seasonable.

For the day of their calamity is at hand, and the things that shall come upon them make haste.] When they little thought of it, and prided themselves in their prosperity, God suddenly brought down the Chaldeans, who had been the great instruments of plaguing the Jews, (Isa. xlvii. 7—10, &c. Jer. l. 15. 27. 31. li. 6. 8.) And so shall the plagues of Babylon the great "come in one day. In one hour her great riches shall come to nought," (Rev. xviii. 8. 10. 17.)

Ver. 36. For the Lord shall judge his people.] Plead their cause, as the Scripture elsewhere speaks, (Jer. l. 34.) and deliver them from the oppression of their enemies; as this phrase is often used in the book of Psalms, (vii. 8. x. 18.)

And repent himself for his servants.] Have mercy upon them (as the Vulgar truly expresses the sense), and turn his hand, which punishes them, upon their enemies. (See Jer. l. 20. li. 24.)

When he sees that their power is gone.] That they are not able to help themselves. That is the due time or season, beforementioned, for God to interpose, when the enemies of his people think themselves irresistible, there being none able to oppose them.

And there is none shut up, or left.] Some refer this to persons, and others to things; and either way it signifies their condition to be so forlorn, that they could do nothing, either by men or by money, for their deliverance. J. Forsterus translates these words, custoditum aut neglectum, i. e. precious or vile. By which wonderful deliverance and restoration, when they were so totally destitute of all help, all the world was given to understand that there is no God like unto the Lord.

Ver. 37. And he shall say.] Or, It shall be said.

Where are their gods, their rock in whom they trusted?] It is dubious whether these words be directed to the Jews, or to the gentiles who had oppressed them. It seems most agreeable to take them as a reproach to the enemies of the Jews, who had long bragged of the power of their gods, and ascribed all their success to them, (ver. 27.) who now could not deliver them in their distress.

Ver. 38. Which did eat the fat of their sacrifices, and drank the wine of their drink-offerings.] For the same rites were used among the gentiles as among the Jews; who offered all the fat upon the altar, and there poured out the wine which accompanied the meat-offering, &c. (See Numb xv.) The LXX. refer this to the worshippers themselves, and translate it thus (agreeably enough to the Hebrew), The fat of whose sacrifices ye ate, and drank the wine of their drink-offerings. And Onkelos to the same purpose.

Let them rise up and help you, and be your protection.] From the calamity which was unavoidably coming upon them, (Isa. xlvi. 1, 2. 7. Jer. li. 17, 18.)

Ver. 39. See now.] Open your eyes now at last, and be convinced, by your sad experience, of your error.

That I, even I, am he.] That it is I, and none but I, who have made these changes in the world: first making you instruments in punishing my people; and now inflicting the like punishments upon you, (Jer. li. 24, 25. 49.)

The words in the Hebrew being, I, I am he, the author of the Old Nitzacon was sensible that we Christians might hence observe, that there are two who are here called God, the Father and the Son. And therefore takes care to inform his reader, that there are not two first principles of things. Which, as no Christian is so foolish as to affirm, so their own authors have acknowledged more persons than one, here called God. Thus Jonathan, in his paraphrase, plainly supposes another person in the Divinity, whom he calls the Word, when he thus explains this verse; When the Word of the Lord shall reveal himself to redeem his people, he shall say to all people, I am he that have been, and am, and shall be, (see Rev. i. 8.) and by my Word kill and make alive. I smote the people of Israel, and I will heal them in the end of the days. Which makes these words a plain prophecy of the Messiah, and him to be God. And so the Jerusalem Targum: See, that I now am he in my Word, and there is no god besides me: I am he who kill the living in this world, and raise the dead in the world to come, &c.

And there is no god with me.] As I have no superior, so neither have I any equal.

I kill and I make alive, I wound and I heal.] If I please to destroy any people for their sins, none can hinder me; and if any repent and implore my mercy, I restore them to perfect safety. R. Isaac, in his Chissuk Emuna, (par. i. cap. 6. sect. 20.) alleges these words as a prophecy of the resurrection of the dead in the days of the Messiah. And in another place, (cap. 10.) he alleges them as an effectual confutation of those ancient heretics who imagined two supreme powers; one of them, the author of all good; and the other, the author of all evil (which I observed upon Lev. xvi. to have been a very ancient opinion): for there could not be, they fancied, the same care which had an influence upon both. To remove which false conceit, God declares, I kill, as well as make alive, &c. And for the same reason he saith, in Isa. xlv. 7. I form the light, and create darkness; I make peace, and create evil; I the Lord do all these things.

Neither is there any that can deliver out of my hand.] Nor can any reverse the judgment that I pass upon men.

Ver. 40. For I lift up my hand to heaven.] Swear solemnly to do what follows; viz. be revenged on his enemies, as well as deliver his people. Thus Abraham anciently sware, Gen. xiv. 22. And when God promised to bring the Israelites into Canaan, he is said to lift up his hand, (Exod.

vi. 8. Nehem. ix. 15.) From whence some think the word promittere is derived, signifying to engage by stretching out the hand: and that from thence sprang the custom of stretching out, and lifting up their hand, when they sware. Which the gentiles practised, as those known words of Virgil inform us, Æneid. xii.

"Suspiciens cœlum tenditque ad sydera dextram."

When God therefore is said to lift up his hand to heaven, the meaning is, he swears by himself; as it here follows.

And say, I live for ever.] As sure as I live.

Ver. 41. If I whet my glittering sword.] Make all things ready for the execution of my judgments.

And my hand take hold of judgment.] I begin to punish.

I will render vengeance to mine enemies.] None shall stop my proceedings, to be fully avenged of them.

And will reward them that hate me.] For, as Jeremiah speaks, li. 56. The Lord God of recompences will surely requite. For it is the vengeance of the Lord: (as he speaks in the foregoing chapter concerning Babylon, l. 15.) Take vengeance upon her; as she hath done, do unto her.

Ver. 42. I will make mine arrows drunk with blood, and my sword shall devour flesh.] Make an exceeding great slaughter, (Isa. xxxiv. 5, 6.)

With the blood of the slain, and of the captives.] This signifies none should be spared: for they should be killed who were taken captive, as well as those who fell in the battle.

From the beginning of revenges upon the enemy.] How the Hebrew word paroth comes to signify revenges, I am not able to give an account; but in that sense we take it both here and in Judges v. 2. The word para, from whence it seems to be derived, signifies to make bare, or naked. And so the Vulgar Latin here understands it; and thence Joh. Forsterus hath given a probable sense of these words (taking rosch, which we translate beginning, for the head, as it properly signifies, or the king), in this manner, Because of the baring (i. e. making bare) of the head by the enemy; that is, the taking away of the kingdom and priesthood from Israel. The LXX. translate it ἀπὸ κεφαλῆς ἀρχόντων ἐχθρῶν, from the head of the princes of the enemies. Which is a sense very agreeable, if we could find any word in the Hebrew like to paroth that signifies princes or rulers. But I think there is a more simple sense may be given of these words than any of the forementioned, only by supposing the particle lamed to be omitted (as in many other places) before paroth, which is this, From the king to the slave of the enemies. For they were wont to shave their captives, as every one knows, by way of contempt and scorn. Which is the reason God threatens baldness so often to the Israelites by his prophets, when he was so angry with them, that he gave them up to be slaves. Next to this is the translation of Onkelos, I will take away (those words he adds) the crowns from the head of the enemy. Which was the making the king's head bare.

This universal slaughter is most notably expressed by Jeremiah, l. 35—37. 43. And some think this prophecy will be then most amply fulfilled, when the Jews shall be called, and made members of the church of Christ. (See Dr. Jackson, book xi. on the Creed, chap. 12.)

Ver. 43. Rejoice, O ye nations, with his people.] Here the particle eth is omitted before ammo, as I supposed, in the foregoing words, lamed to be before paroth. Which made the Vulgar translate these words, O ye nations, praise his people. But the LXX. discerned the true sense, and translate it as we do: the apostle having justified their translation in Rom. xv. 10. where he expresses this, word for word, as they do, εὐφράνθητε ἔθνη μετὰ τοῦ λαοῦ αὐτοῦ, Rejoice ye gentiles with his people. But it must here be noted, that before these words the LXX. have some other, which are very remarkable, Εὐφράνθητε οὐρανοὶ ἅμα αὐτῷ, καὶ προσκυνησάτωσαν αὐτῷ πάντες ἄγγελοι Θεοῦ, Rejoice ye heavens together with him, and let all the angels of God worship him (and then follows, rejoice ye gentiles with his people), which are not in the Hebrew, nor in the Chaldee, and yet the latter clause of them, προσκυνησάτωσαν αὐτῷ πάντες ἄγγελοι Θεοῦ, let all the angels of God worship him, are the very words of the apostle, Heb. i. 6. which seem to have been taken from hence out of the LXX. for they are no where else to be found in the Scripture. The margin, indeed, of our Bibles refers us to Psal. xcvii. 7. But there the words of the LXX. are otherwise, προσκυνήσατε αὐτῷ πάντες ἄγγελοι αὐτοῦ, worship him all ye his angels; which are in the second person; whereas here, and in the apostle, the words are in the third. We may therefore suppose rather, that the LXX. from ancient tradition among the Jews, added these words, before they translated this verse, to declare unto what time the fulfilling of them should principally belong. For Psalm xcvii. seems to be but a descant (as Dr. Jackson's words are) upon this part of Moses's song; from whence the Jews might learn the scope of it. And accordingly the apostle uses the words of the LXX. here in this place, rather than those of the Psalmist; because he would have the Hebrews understand and consider, that Moses himself had predicted the exaltation of the Son of God, as the Psalmist afterward expounded him.

There is another translation of these words of Moses, which is very agreeable to the apostle in Rom. xv. 10. Rejoice ye nations, who are his people. (See ver. 21. of this chapter.) Either way, this is a plain prophecy of the gentiles becoming one body with the people of Israel. And thus Kimchi himself translates it, Sing ye gentiles, who are his people: which began to be fulfilled after our Saviour's ascension to the throne of his glory in the heavens, when all the angels of God worshipped him. Hitherto Moses had supposed, in this song, great enmity between them: and that sometimes they had plagued Israel sorely; as at others, God rendered to them according to what they had done unto his people. But now he breaks out into a rapture of joy, to think that they should one day be reconciled, and made one people of God. And the LXX. thus understanding it, might well preface to their translation of this verse, with the words now mentioned, Rejoice ye heavens together with him. For if there be joy in heaven, as Procopius Gazæus well glosses, at the repentance of one sinner, how much more for the salvation of the whole world, by destroying the devil's tyranny? Which being to be performed by the advancement of the Son of God into the heavens, the next words might well be added, Let all the angels of God worship him. Which they had always done (the same Procopius observes) as their God who created them; but now they praise and extol his humanity, exalted at the right hand of God.

For he will avenge the blood of his servants.] These words seem to express some of the motives that should persuade the gentiles to become one body with the Jews (for such the apostles and all the first converts were), God's punishing all those who shed the blood of his servants; as the Christian martyrs are called in the book of the Revelation. In which confidence the LXX. add another sentence before these words, καὶ ἐνισχυσάτωσαν αὐτῷ πάντες υἱοὶ Θεοῦ, and let all the sons of God be strong in him.

And will render vengeance to his adversaries.] To all such as oppose this blessed union; and first to the Jews, who set themselves against it more than any others (being mad at the apostles for preaching to the gentiles), and then to the Romans, who persecuted all those who embraced Christianity.

And will be merciful unto his land.] This cannot be meant of the land of Israel, which was no longer God's land than any other, but of the whole earth (as Conrad. Pellicanus well explains it), in which that one people of God dwells, reduced (as he speaks) in the whole multitude of the faithful into one catholic church. For they all acknowledge, from the greatest to the least, that one only Omnipotent God, with no less devotion and affection, than Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Moses did.

And unto his people.] The whole world that believe in Christ, and are his faithful servants; whose blood he will avenge, (Rev. xix. 2.) and then set up his tabernacle with men, and dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and he will be their God; (Rev. xx. 3.) which I mention, because this part of the prophecy reaches unto the last times, and is not yet all fulfilled.

Thus this famous song concludes, which, as the Jews reckon, consists of seventy verses, each of which contains two distinct and entire sentences, and, as they fancy, is a compendium of the whole law of Moses. Nay, some of them (such are the idle conceits of this nation) think this hymn is so perfect a prophecy, that it contains in it the names of all the men in the world; which they undertake to find, and, by that versicle where it is, to tell what fortune he, whose name they seek, shall have in the world. Thus, instead of observing seriously what Moses foretold would certainly befal themselves, their superstition and hardness of heart have led them to vain conjectures concerning other men. See Jo. Wagenseil upon Sota, p. 164, &c. where he saith a Jew undertook to shew him his name in this song, which fell out in a verse that signified prosperity to him. And since him Martinus Mauritius, in his book De Sortitione Hebræorum, cap. 16. sect. 3—5.

Ver. 44. And Moses came, and spake all the words of this song in the ears of the people.] The very same that is said before he spake this song, (xxxi. 30.) and is now repeated at the conclusion of it, to express his fidelity in his office to the very last.

He and Hoshea the son of Nun.] Who was now his assistant in this work, as he was designed to be his successor after his death. He is commonly called Joshua, but Oshea was his name at the first, (Numb. xiii. 8.)

Ver. 45. And Moses made an end of speaking all these words to all Israel.] When he had made an end of speaking them, then he added what follows.

Ver. 46. And he said unto them, Set your hearts unto all the words which I testify among you this day.] Apply your minds to press upon yourselves the observation of all these things. For this expression is a little more than letting them be in their heart, (vi. 6.) or laying them up in their heart, (xi. 18.) For they were so to retain the remembrance of them, as to attend unto them, and consider them.

Which ye shall command your children to observe to do.] This necessary duty of instructing their children is often pressed, (iv. 10. vi. 7. xi. 19.) because without this care their religion would soon be lost; but, by this means, might be preserved and propagated to all generations.

All the words of this law.] Which they might be certain was delivered by God to Moses; there being as many witnesses of God's presence with him, as there were men in their nation. But he had seen so many instances of their unbelief, that he uses all the ways, manners, and forms (as Pellicanus observes), that he could think of, to urge them to obedience: by delivering them tables of their laws written by God himself, by books, by pillars, by blessings, cursings, obtestations, threatenings, long exhortations, songs, phylacteries, and other ceremonies, &c. which he continued to do as long as he had breath, and was able to speak, that they, and their posterity, might be happy.

Ver. 47. For it is not a vain thing for you.] You shall not employ your diligence in this matter unprofitably. The Jews upon these words have founded a maxim, which Maimonides often mentions, "That every precept hath its end and use; which (though they do not appear to us) are grounded upon strong causes and reasons." (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 26. and 50.) The design, for instance, of many ceremonial laws cannot now be fully discerned, because they were instituted directly contrary to the idolatrous rites of the Zabii; which are long since utterly abolished, and but imperfectly recorded in those ancient authors that speak of them.

Because it is your life.] The means to make you a happy people. Here are two benefits, saith R. Isaac, which are promised by the observation of this law; a spiritual and a corporal. The spiritual in these words, and the corporal in the next, ye shall prolong your days, &c. And he puts the spiritual first, though, among all corporal blessings, this of long life be the chief, (Chissuk Emuna, par. i. cap. 18.)

And through this thing.] By teaching your children to observe to do all that is commanded in this law.

You shall prolong your days in the land whither you go over Jordan to possess it.] Have the great blessing of a long life in all manner of happiness, which your posterity shall enjoy for many generations in the land of Canaan. By which it appears, that nothing else but contempt of this law could have ejected them out of this country.

Ver. 48. And the Lord spake unto Moses that self-same day.] Immediately after he had ended the foregoing song, and given them this admonition at the conclusion of it.

Ver. 49. Get thee up into this mountain Abarim.] Which he had pointed him unto before, and told him what he doth now, (Numb. xxvii. 12.)

Unto Mount Nebo.] Abarim was a ridge of hills, whereof Nebo was one. (See there upon Numb. xxvii. 2.)

Which is in the land of Moab, that is over against Jericho.] This is a more particular description of the site of this mountain than he gave before in the book of Numbers.

Behold, the land of Canaan, which I give unto the children of Israel for a possession.] Which he might easily do from the highest part of the mountain called Pisgah, (Deut. iii. 27.)

Ver. 50. And die in the mount whither thou goest up.] After he had taken a view of the land every way.

And be gathered unto thy people.] To Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. This signifies, saith R. Isaac, that he should be associated and joined to the souls of the just, who are called his people. For the people of Moses were not buried in Mount Abarim; and therefore he doth not speak of gathering his body to their bodies, but of his soul to their souls. (Chissuk Emuna, par. i. cap. 11.)

As Aaron thy brother died in Mount Hor, and was gathered unto his people.] See Numb. xx. 24. 28. xxxiii. 38.

Ver. 51. Because ye trespassed against me among the children of Israel, &c.] Rebelled against his commandment, as he speaks, Numb. xxvii. 14.

Because ye sanctified me not in the midst of the children of Israel.] Numb. xx. 12. xxvii. 14.

Ver. 52. Yet thou shalt see the land before thee.] He had earnestly begged of God that he might go over Jordan; but he denied him that favour, (Deut. i. 37. iii. 25. 27.) yet he was pleased to mitigate his punishment, by letting him enjoy a sight of that good country into which he might not enter.

But thou shalt not go thither unto the land which I give the children of Israel.] By which the Israelites should have learnt, that as Moses left them short of the promised land, and could not bring them into the possession of it; so his law did not contain a perfect revelation of God's will, but they were to expect something beyond it.

CHAP. XXXIII.

Ver. 1. AND this is the blessing.] As Jacob blessed his children, at his departure out of the world, when God had begun to fulfil the promise to Abraham, of giving him a numerous offspring; so Moses having seen them vastly increased, and ready to enter upon the land promised to them, (Gen. xv. 18, &c.) takes his farewell of them, with a blessing pronounced upon the people in general, and upon each tribe in particular. Which is in part prophetical, as the blessing of Jacob was, and delivered in the prophetic style, which hath some difficulty and obscurity in it; on purpose, perhaps, to excite their diligent study to inquire into the meaning. (See Gen. xlix. 1. 3.)

Wherewith Moses, the man of God.] Or, the prophet of the Lord, as Onkelos translates it: for prophets are called men of God in the holy books, (1 Sam. ix. 6—8. 1 Kings xiii. 1. 1 Tim. vi. 11. 2 Tim. iii. 17. 2 Pet. i. 21.) because, in the exercise of their sacred function, they did not deliver their own sense, nor the sense of other men, but the mind and will of God who spake by them.

Blessed the children of Israel before his death.] Before he went up into Mount Abarim to die, (xxxii. 49.) he prayed God to bless them; and also foretold their future state and condition. Such had been the ancient custom among the holy patriarchs (as we learn from the example of Jacob), to admonish their posterity upon their dying beds of such things as they thought most imported them: for then they could not but be thought to speak most sincerely; and their words were apt to be entertained with greater respect, and preserved in mind with greater care. Moses therefore, their deliverer, leader, and lawgiver, concludes his life in the same manner; and it is very likely deposited these dying words with them in writing.

Ver. 2. And he said, The Lord came from Sinai.] And, in the first place, he endeavours to make them sensible of what God had done already for them: and the chief of all his benefits being the revelation of his mind and will to them, he commemorates that as a common blessing to them all, before he begins to speak in particular to each tribe: for that is meant by the Lord came from Sinai; where he appeared in a most particular manner, and from thence promulgated his law with the greatest solemnity, (Exod. xx.) And thus the gentiles took an unwonted brightness in any place to be a token of the Ἐπιφάνεια, appearance, or advent, of some of their gods in that place. As also a great commotion in any place, they took for another token of it. See the illustrious Spanhemius, in his annotations upon Callimachus's hymn to Apollo, ver. 7. which they seem to have learnt from this appearance of God on Mount Sinai, and the quaking of that mountain, when God appeared on it.

And rose up from Seir unto them, and shone forth from Mount Paran.] There is no difficulty in the foregoing words, it being evident that God came down on Mount Sinai, and thence delivered his commands to the Israelites, and espoused them for his people. But how he rose up from Seir unto them, the country of Edom, and shone from Paran, the country of Ishmael, is not so easy to understand. The Jews, indeed, who are wont to solve all difficulties, by inventing what they please, are not troubled to give an account of these words; which signify, they fancy, that the Divine Glory first resided upon Mount Seir, where God propounded his law to the children of Esau; but they would not have it, because they found these words in it, "Thou shalt not kill;" he went, therefore, to Paran, and offered it to the children of Ishmael, but they refused it also, because they found these words in it, "Thou shalt not steal;" so he came to Sinai, and gave it to the Israelites, who said, "All the words which the Lord hath said will we do," Exod. xxiv. 3. Thus the Jerusalem Targum, and Pirke Eliezer, and some other more ancient authors, with this addition, that he offered the law to all the nations of the world, but they rejected it, because it was written, "Thou shalt have none other gods but me." But this looks so like a fable, that some of themselves are ashamed of it, and have given a better sense of the words, though I cannot say the true one. For thus Abraham Peritsol expounds them, The true law came out of Sinai to the Israelites, by which the Edomites were so enlightened, that God might be said to rise up to them also: and afterward the celestial influence shone out of this law to the Ishmaelites, who were the better for it. Thus Const. L'Empereur reports his sense in his Annotations upon Bava-kama, cap. 4. sect. 3. where he endeavours to make out a plainer sense of these words, in this manner: Though the mountain of Paran was nigher to Sinai than Seir was, and first occurred to those that went out of Egypt; yet there was great reason to mention Seir before it, because Moses had respect to the order of their journeys, and not to the site of the places. And their journeys were so directed by Divine Providence, that, fetching a long circuit, forward and backward, they should come to Canaan. In all which turnings and windings they were marvellously preserved and provided for, by the same good Providence which conducted them. Of this Moses here makes a thankful commemoration, how he led them from Mount Sinai to the borders of the land of Canaan, towards Mount Seir, as is expressly noted by Moses, (compare Deut. i. 19. with ii. 1. and Numb. xx. 14.) From whence, by reason of their infidelity, they were led back again towards the Red Sea, and encamped in the extremity of the wilderness, (Numb. xxxiii. 35.) where Ptolemy places Paran: (though there was another part of it called Paran, near Kadesh, Numb. xiii. 3. 27.) and from thence they were led back again in a long circuit to the east part of the land of Canaan. This may be one reason why these two places are mentioned together with Sinai, that God, who there appeared to them, was with them all the time they wandered about in the wilderness, till he brought them to the borders of Canaan, where they now were. And another may be, because in Mount Seir the brazen serpent was erected by God's order, for the cure of such as were bitten by serpents, when they looked on it; which was an illustrious type of our blessed Saviour, and the salvation wrought by him, (Numb. xx. 4. 9.) And in the desert to which Paran gave the name (because it overlooked the whole, though very large), they received the joyful news that they should march into Canaan: or, as D. Chytræus understands it, in the wilderness of Paran the seventy elders received the Spirit, to make them assistants unto Moses in the government, (Numb. x. 12. xi. 24, &c.) And here, I may add, Moses repeated his law to them, (Deut. i. 1. 5.) who seems, in this verse, to follow a metaphor borrowed from the sun, which first illuminates the air, and then rises, and then spreads abroad his beams; as God by degrees declared his presence with his people, whithersoever they went, first at Mount Sinai, then at Seir, and, last of all, here in the wilderness of Paran.

But it must be acknowledged, that these words may be interpreted in a more simple manner, they being but a farther amplification of what was said in the first words, the Lord came from Sinai. When at the same time he rose up from Seir, and shone forth from Mount Paran. For these mountains were very near one to another; or rather parts of one and the same ridge of mountains, as Con. Pellicanus here observes; and is more clearly made out by a very learned man among ourselves, (Dr. Hyde, in his excellent notes on Abraham Peritsol, Itinera Mundi, p. 73.) for Teman (which is the same with Paran, Habak. iii. 3.) was near to Edom, whose chief city was Bozrah, (Amos i. 12.) as that was near to Sinai.

The ignorance of the Mahometans is much to be pitied, who out of this place imagine they have found as good an authority for the Alcoran, as there is for the law of Moses, and for the gospel of Christ. For thus they interpret these words, God gave the law from Sinai, and the gospel from Seir (which they would have to be the same with Galilee, which our Saviour much frequented), and the Alcoran from Mount Paran; which they fancy is a mountain not far from Mecca. (See Dr. Pocock upon Greg. Abulfaraji, p. 183. and Guadagnolus Resp. pro Relig. Christiana.) But the last words of this verse, for them, are sufficient to confute these conceits; for they plainly shew that the whole verse speaks of the people of Israel.

And he came with ten thousand of saints.] Or, as our Mr. Mede thinks it should be translated, with his holy ten thousands, or myriads; that is, attended with an innumerable company of angels, who waited on him at the giving of the law. See Psal. lxviii. 7. Dan vii. 10. of which Enoch, perhaps, prophesied in part, Jud. 14, 15. And from hence it may be thought, that notion of the Jewish doctors, followed by St. Stephen and St. Paul, that the law was given by angels, had its beginning; (Mede, book ii. p. 437.) that is, they attended upon God, as his ministers, when he himself gave the law.

From his right hand.] With which we are wont to deliver things to other persons.

Went a fiery law for them.] For the law of Moses was given out of the midst of fire, and therefore called a fire of law, as the words are in the Hebrew, (Exod. xix. 16. 18. Deut. iv. 11, 12. v. 22—24.) The cabalists (as Reuchlin observes) fancy that God wrote the law in a globe of fire, and sent it to them. But the Jerusalem Targum is more sober, which thus expounds it, He stretched his right hand out of the midst of flames of fire, and gave the law unto his people. And Onkelos still better, The law written with his right hand he gave us out of the midst of fire. Or, as Campeg. Vitringa would have this latter part of the verse translated, On his right hand a fire, and out of the fire a law for them. The meaning being, that God came to Mount Sinai with that fire; for, in Scripture, to be on the right hand of any one, is to accompany him, (lib. ii. Observ. Sacr. cap. 4.)

By the conclusion of this verse it is apparent, that the former part of it belongs entirely to God's mercy unto the children of Israel, upon whom he bestowed his law, in most illustrious tokens of his presence. Which makes it highly probable, that his "rising up from Seir upon them, and shining from Mount Paran," belongs to the same matter; that is, the cloud wherein he descended on Sinai, with a vast host of angels, extended itself so far, as to cover the neighbouring mountains of Seir and Paran. Though the meaning may be, as I have shewn, that he continued his presence with them after they went from Sinai, through all their journeys in the wilderness of Seir and Paran, till they came to the place where they now were.

Ver. 3. Yea, he loved the people.] All this was the effect of his love and kindness to the people of Israel, whom he owned for his son, and his first-born, (Exod. iv. 22.) and therefore in a tender manner brought them out of Egypt, (Exod. xix. 4.) that he might instruct them in his laws.

All his saints are in thy hand.] Whereby he made them a holy nation, (as it there follows in Exod. xix. 5.) whom he took into his special care and most gracious protection, as this phrase signifies in many places, (Numb. iv. 28. 33.) And Onkelos refers it to the mighty power whereby he brought them out of Egypt: but it may have respect to God's preservation and support of them, when he gave the law in such a terrible manner, that Moses himself quaked, and yet none of them received any harm. As for the change of the person from his to thy, it is very frequent in this language, particularly in Dan. ix. 4.

And they sat down at thy feet.] The first word (which we translate sat down) being no where else found but here and Isa. i. 5. where it plainly hath another sense, hath occasioned various interpretations of this sentence. But most agree in this of Sol. Jarchi, that as scholars sat at the feet of their master round about him, while he taught them their lesson, so the people encompassed the mount where God was, and heard his law, which he thence delivered. But it is a question, whether there was such a custom of scholars in those days; and the people did not sit, but stood at the foot of the mount, (Exod. xx. 18.) Therefore Onkelos understands this of their sitting down, or pitching their tents, where the glorious cloud that led them rested, (Numb. x. 12. 33.)

Every one shall receive of thy word.] This still is commonly referred to the people's receiving the law. But Onkelos thinks it hath respect to their journeys "at the commandment of the Lord," (Numb. x. 13.) For so he interprets it, They went forward according to thy word. And so the Jerusalem Targum expounds these and the foregoing words; Behold, they were led, and came to the foot of his cloud, and went forward and rested, according to the command of his word. It takes in also the other sense of the word tucchu (as it signifies smiting in Isa. i. 5.) in this manner, Though he inflicted many chastisements upon them, yet they did not cease, nor desist from the doctrine of the law.

Ver. 4. Moses commanded us a law.] He commanded them to observe that law which God had given them, when he was about to depart from them. This he did in this very book, (i. 3. v. 1. vi. 1. viii. 1, &c.) He speaks of himself in the third person, which is very usual throughout all this book.

Even the inheritance of the congregation of Jacob.] As a peculiar blessing which God had bestowed on them, and on their posterity, above all other nations in the world, (Deut. iv. 8.) who, as they had not this law given to them, so they were not bound to observe it; as the Jews themselves conclude from this very place. Nor did they force any body to embrace this law, when they made a conquest of a neighbouring country, but left them to their liberty, provided they would become proselytes of the gate; that is, forsake idolatry, and keep the common precepts enjoined to all mankind. Thus Maimonides interprets the word inheritance. (See Schickard, in his Jus Regium, cap. 5. Theor. 17. and Grotius, de Jure Belli et Pacis, lib. i. cap. 1. sect. 16.)

The author of Etz-Hachajim, a MS. highly valued by the famous Wagenseil, saith, That when a child began to speak, the father was bound to teach him this verse. In which, instead of מורשת hereditary, some of the Jews read מאורסת espoused; as if the law were espoused to the Jewish nation. (See Wagenseil on Sota, p. 519. 520.)

Ver. 5. And he was king in Jeshurun.] Or, for he was king, that is, under God, the supreme ruler and governor of Israel; and therefore in his name, and by his authority, required them to observe these laws. Which plainly shews him to have had the supreme power in all things, both civil and sacred. Which is excellently expressed by our Mr. Thorndike, in his Review of the Rites of the Church, &c. p. 68. where he observes, "That the Israelites, being made a free people by the act of God bringing them out of Egypt, and entitling them to the land of Canaan, upon the covenant of the law, had Moses not only for their prophet and their priest (for by him Aaron and his successors were put into the priesthood, the tabernacle and all belonging to it consecrated), but also for their king, their lawgiver, their judge, and commander-in-chief of their forces, under God, if not rather God by Moses. For we find, that, after Moses's decease, either God by some extraordinary signification of his will and pleasure, stirred up some man in his stead for the time; or, if there was none such, ruled their proceedings himself, by urim and thummin answering their demands, and directing what to do, and what course to follow, in all the public affairs that concerned the state of that people. Whereupon, when they required Samuel to make them a king, he declared it was not Samuel, but himself, whom they had rejected: because they had rejected him whom God had immediately set over them in his own stead, by whose death the power returned to God, as at the beginning."

Concerning the word Jeshurun, see xxxii. 15. and Selden, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 2. n. 2.

When the heads of the people and the tribes of Israel were gathered together.] To renew their covenant with God, and to receive his last commands. (See xxix. 1, 2. 9, 10. xxxi. 28, 29.)

Ver. 6. Let Reuben live, and not die, and let not his men be few.] In the last clause of this verse, we repeat the word not (which is wanting in the Hebrew) without any necessity: for the words may be thus translated exactly, let Reuben live, and not die, though his men be few. Which seems to be a confirmation of the prophecy of Jacob, (Gen. xlix. 4.) that he should not excel, and yet should live, and not perish; that is, be in some measure a flourishing tribe, though not so numerous as some others. (See there.) And possibly it may be here suggested, that though they passed armed over Jordan before their brethren to settle them there, (according to their engagement, Numb. xxxii. 27. Josh. iv. 12, 13.) yet none of them should perish, but both they, and their wives, and children, that stayed behind them, should be all preserved.

Ver. 7. And this is the blessing of Judah.] As much as to say, Judah shall be remarkably blessed. For these words [this is the blessing] are used of none of the rest of the tribes, either of Reuben, which went before, or the others that follow after. Here is no mention made of Simeon (who was next to Reuben), because that tribe was included in Judah, with whom their possessions were mixed, (Josh. xix. 1.) and therefore they went together to make expeditions, (Judg. i. 3.) Judah also is here put before Levi, because it was to be the royal tribe, according to the prophecy of Jacob; which Moses was assured God would fulfil, and therefore prays as follows: And he said, Hear, Lord, the voice of Judah. Grant his petition, when he calls for help against his enemies. So Onkelos paraphrases it, Hear his prayer when he goes forth to war.

And bring him unto his people.] Return him home in peace unto his people; as the same Onkelos expounds it.

Let his hands be sufficient for him.] To avenge him of his enemies, as he also explains it.

And be thou a help to him from his enemies.] Suffer them not to prevail over him, but give him the victory, when he fights with them. So the Jerusalem Targum paraphrases these two last passages; Let his hands exercise revenge upon his enemies in battles, and do thou support and sustain him against those that hate him. This was notoriously fulfilled in this tribe, which was the most valiant and successful of all other. For in all their wars this tribe was the principal; and the safety of all the rest seems to have depended upon this. (See Judg. i. 1, 2, &c.

xx. 18.) And as these places shew that this was the most considerable tribe before they had kings; so after that it was able, together with Benjamin, to maintain its ground against the other ten tribes, and all other opposers.

Ver. 8. And of Levi he said, Let thy thummim and thy urim be with thy holy-one.] Continue in this tribe the high dignity of consulting with thee, and receiving directions from thee, by the high-priest, concerning the public safety. Or, as some take it (because thummim is here set before urim, which is not in any other place), make them upright and faithful, as well as understanding and knowing, in the discharge of their duty. For though by holy-one be principally meant the high-priest, who was in a peculiar manner anointed to be separated to the service of God, especially in this part of it, to approach him with urim and thummim, (which gave Aaron the name of the saint of the Lord, Psal. cvi. 16.) yet it comprehends all the rest of the priests and Levites in conjunction with him; for they were all separated unto the Lord, having signalized themselves (as we speak) by their early zeal for the Lord, when their brethren apostatized to idolatry. Of which Moses takes notice in the next verse, Who said unto his father, &c. I have not seen him, &c. regarded, that is, no relation when they executed the commands of God against the worshippers of the golden calf. See our learned Dr. Spencer, de Leg. Hebr. lib. iii. cap. 7. dissert. 7. where he treats also of these words, as they may be applied to our Lord Christ, the true holy-one of God; who is, indeed, a priest for ever, holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners, &c. (Heb. vii. 26.)

Whom thou didst prove at Massah.] Or, whom thou hast thoroughly proved. For the words in the Hebrew are, Whom in proving thou didst prove; the ancient interpreters not taking Massah for the name of a place (as we do), but for trying or proving. And so, indeed, the words in the Hebrew seem to import; the particle [beth] before Massah being different from that before Meribah [which is al], though we translate them both alike by the word at. And thus the Jerusalem Targum paraphrases, Whom thou didst prove, or try, and he stood in the trial; that is, approved himself perfect or upright, as Onkelos expresses it. This procured that tribe a blessing from the Lord, (Exod. xxxii. 26. 29.) and brought them into special grace and favour with him, as the word we translate holy-one signifies. For it is not kadoth, but chasid.

And with whom thou didst strive at the waters of Meribah.] Though God did severely chide and reprove Moses and Aaron (who were the heads of this tribe), when they were tried at the waters of strife, (Numb. xx. 12, 13.) yet they did not forfeit their office by the offence they then committed; and, therefore, Moses prays it might still continue in Aaron's posterity.

Ver. 9. Who said unto his father and to his mother, I have not seen him, neither did he acknowledge his brethren, nor know his own children.] This relates unto the impartial execution of judgment by the Levites, upon the worshippers of the golden calf, without respect of persons: (Exod. xxxii. 26, &c.) and as some will have it, to Phineas's zeal, mentioned in Numb. xxv. But, that it hath any respect to a more ancient judgment, given in the case of Judah and Thamar (as the Jerusalem Targum fancies), there is no ground to believe. (See Selden, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 8. n. 2.)

For they have observed thy word, and kept thy covenant.] See Exod. xxxii. 28, 29. Abarbinel, and others, make this to be the reason of what follows.

Ver. 10. They shall teach Jacob thy judgments, and Israel thy law.] Because they were so upright, as to take no notice of their dearest relations in judgment; therefore, they were entrusted with this office of teaching the people the statutes of God, that is, deciding all controversies which arose about any thing in the law. So the Jews expound it; and it is agreeable to what we read in the seventeenth chapter of this book, (ver. 9, 10.) and many other places, as Mr. Selden shews in the place forenamed, p. 372, &c. and our Mr. Thorndike, in his Religious Assemblies, chap. 2. where he observes, the teaching here mentioned consisted in declaring the meaning and obligation of the law in matters doubtful; as is apparent from Lev. x. 8—11. For though others might be members of their courts of judgment, yet they consisted chiefly of priests and Levites. As for teaching the people in their religious assemblies, that was not so much the office of the priests and Levites as of the prophets. For though the prophets, and the disciples of the prophets, were commonly priests and Levites (who, being most free from the care of estates and inheritances, and by their office, in his ceremonial service, came nearest to God of all other men, were most likely to be endued with an extraordinary degree of knowledge, and of the fear of God), yet it is certain, that the charge of teaching the people in their assemblies belonged as well to those prophets who were not priests and Levites as to those that were. (See him, p. 25.) And this was one reason, as Maimonides observes, why the tribe of Levi might have no inheritance in the land, that, being free from the trouble of ploughing and sowing, &c. they might wholly attend to the study of the law, and be able to teach Israel God's judgments, (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 39.)

They shall put incense before thee, and whole burnt-offerings upon thine altar.] This was the peculiar office and honour of the priests alone, to offer incense on the golden altar, and burnt-offerings upon the brazen. The Jerusalem Targum thus paraphrases it, They shall put incense of precious spice before thee, to pacify thine anger, and offer a most acceptable sacrifice upon thine altar.

Ver. 11. Bless, Lord, his substance.] The word we here translate substance, is translated wealth, viii. 17, 18. which consisted most in cattle (they having no land to till), which he prays God to increase, that they might have sufficient sustenance for themselves and their family. It is a strange fancy of some of the Jews, that whosoever offered incense grew rich, and therefore no priest was suffered to offer incense more than once, that so riches might be derived to them all. Thus they trifle, while their hearts are set on getting money, and not on growing good. (See Sheringham on Joma, p. 35, 36. and Mauritius de Sortitione Hebræorum, cap. 24. sect. 4.)

And accept the work of his hands.] All their ministry at the altar where the priests officiated; or about the tabernacle, of which the Levites had the care.

Smite through the loins of them that rise against him, and of them that hate him, that they rise not again.] For they who were enemies to the priests and Levites were enemies to religion, and to all civil government, which was chiefly administered by them, as was before observed. (See xvii. 8—12.)

Ver. 12. And of Benjamin he said.] He mentions him next to Levi, because the temple, in which the priests officiated, was partly situated in his lot.

The beloved of the Lord.] Or, being beloved of the Lord, as the LXX. interpret it, Ἠγαπημένος ὑπὸ Κυρίου.

Shall dwell in safety by him.] i. e. By the Lord; which signifies the stability of his portion, which had Jerusalem the holy city in it, as we read Josh. xviii. 28. For though Mount Sion was in the tribe of Judah, and so the sanctuary was there, (Psal. lxxviii. 68.) yet the city wherein it stood was not. Nay, the ancients think the altar of burnt-offering was in the tribe of Benjamin, as Kimchi observes upon that place beforementioned in Joshua. (See upon Gen. xlix. 27.) And there are reasons to make one think, that Sion, in the place forenamed, and in others, is to be taken in a large sense, comprehending Mount Moriah also, (on which the temple was built, 2 Chron. iii. 1.) which was in the tribe of Benjamin, and consequently the temple was situated in this tribe.

And the Lord shall cover him all the day long.] The glory of the majestical presence of the Lord shall be a shield over him (to defend him) continually; as the Jerusalem Targum expounds it.

And he shall dwell upon his shoulders.] For the Divine Majesty (saith Onkelos) shall dwell in his country. It being in the temple, and the temple in the tribe of Benjamin, where it stood upon Mount Moriah, as the head of a man doth upon his shoulders; as Dr. Lightfoot glosses in his Temple Service, p. 145. edit. 1. Or the word we translate here shoulders may signify, as it is translated in other places, sides, (Numb. xxxiv. 11.) or borders. And nothing is more certain, than that the Divine habitation was in the borders of Benjamin, whose lot touched Judah's at Jerusalem; and was so united to it, that when the rest fell off from Judah, the tribe of Benjamin always adhered to it.

This being the sense which the ancient interpreters give of this verse, and very agreeable to the words, I shall not trouble the reader with any other; but only mention a conceit of Conradus Pellicanus, who, by the beloved of the Lord here understands David, who dwelt in safety by Benjamin, though the king of that tribe persecuted him, for God covered and protected him continually from violence, &c. It is strange that a man otherwise judicious, and well acquainted with the Jewish learning, should propound this as the best interpretation he could think of, when there is nothing of a blessing upon Benjamin in it.

Ver. 13. And of Joseph he said.] This tribe follows next, his lot falling near to Benjamin, who lay between Judah and Joseph.

Blessed of the Lord be his land.] He foretells that this tribe should be situated in a most plentiful country, and enriched by the Divine blessing upon it.

For the precious things of heaven.] Sending fruitful showers from heaven.

For the dew.] Together with the evening and morning dews, which are no less refreshing to the earth than rain.

And for the deep that coucheth beneath.] He means springs of water which burst out of the bowels of the earth, for the use of man and beast.

Ver. 14. For the precious fruits of the sun.] Whose kindly heat brings them forth, and makes them grow to maturity.

And the precious things put forth by the moon.] For all fruits are plumped by the moon's cool and fattening moisture in the night, which is digested by the sun in the day. Or, this passage may relate to the several sorts of fruit which are produced every month. So Onkelos interprets it, It produceth also sweet fruits at the beginning of every month. For the word jerachim in the Hebrew, being in the plural number, signifies moons, i. e. months. And so the Jerusalem Targum translates it, in every new moon, which comprehends the whole month.

Ver. 15. And for the chief things of the ancient mountains, and for the precious things of the lasting hills.] Such as Mount Ephraim, and Samaria, and Bashan, which were exceeding fruitful in grapes and olives, and such-like excellent fruit: and called ancient and lasting, because they were made together with the earth, in the beginning; and not mounts cast up by the art of men. (See Gen. xlix. 20.)

Ver. 16. For the precious things of the earth.] This seems to relate to their arable land, which he foretells should bring forth great store of all sorts of corn.

The word meged, which we translate precious, is repeated five times in these three last verses, signifying that which in its kind is most excellent and eximious, as that great man Ezekiel Spanhemius observes upon Callimachus's hymn to Diana, ver. 245. where mentioning several instruments of music among the Greeks, whose names came from the Hebrew, he thinks one called Μάγαδις (which was ἀρχαῖον ὄργανον, as Athenæus saith, but he could not tell whether a wind or stringed instrument) came from this Hebrew word meged, for it was not of a Greek original. And in Cant. iv. 13. this word is translated pleasant, as all music is; but that especially which was made by this instrument Μάγαδις. For Plato, who took it for a stringed instrument, calls it πολυχορδώτατον, Anacreon saying he had one of twenty strings, as Spanhemius notes upon the hymn in Delum, p. 472.

And fulness thereof.] By the fulness of the earth may be meant, either the plenty and abundance of its fruits, or the ripeness thereof, as Bochartus observes in his Canaan.

And for the good-will of him that dwelt in the bush.] That is, of God, whose majesty (as Onkelos paraphrases) dwells in the heavens, and was revealed to Moses in the bush, (Exod. iii. 2. 4.) That is, the Schechinah there appeared in a most glorious manner, and the Lord told Moses he was there present, whose good-will, which is the fountain of all blessings (for to it they owed their deliverance out of Egypt, which God then promised to Moses out of the bush), he wished might be the peculiar portion of Joseph.

Let the blessing come upon the head of Joseph.] The word blessing is not in the Hebrew; but this being connected with the foregoing words, may be thought a prayer, that the good-will of God, the fountain (as I said) of all blessings, may rest upon Joseph. Or, as Onkelos translates it, Let all those things (beforenamed) come upon the head of Joseph. And so the Jerusalem Targum expounds it, Let all these blessings come, and be made perfect upon the head of Joseph.

Upon the top of him that was separated from his brethren.] That is, saith the same Targum, upon him that was made ruler over all the land of Egypt, and splendid in the honour given him by his brethren. (See this explained upon Gen. xlix. 26.)

Ver. 17. His glory is like the firstling of his bullock.] The ancients thought there was so much majesty in the countenance of a bull, especially of a young bullock in its prime, lifting up its head, that they made it an emblem of kingly power, as Bochartus hath shewn out of several good authors in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 29. And accordingly here it signifies, that the tribe of Ephraim should have royal authority established in it. For he doth not compare the person of Joseph to a young bullock, (though he was a goodly man, eminent for his beauty and comely proportions, Gen. xxxix. 6.) but the tribes which sprang from him, as appears from the last words of this verse; whose glory he here comparing to that of a young bullock, and its glory consisting in its strength, the power of the tribes of Joseph is hereby denoted; which was so great, that they were the chief support of the kingdom of Israel, which began in Jeroboam, who was king of ten tribes; after whom there followed a long race of kings till the captivity. There may be also some respect in these words unto Joshua, the first governor of all the people, who was of the tribe of Ephraim; as of Manasseh were Jair, Jephthah, and Gideon, who were famous men among the judges.

It is remarkable also here, that Joseph is compared to the firstling of a bullock, because Reuben being set aside for his incest, Joseph had the right of primogeniture, in part, translated unto him, (1 Chron. v. 1, 2.) and, in consequence of it, had a double portion in the land of Canaan.

It is to be noted likewise, that he is said to be like unto the firstling of his bullock, because there were not more goodly bullocks any where than in Bashan, (Amos iv. 1.) which fell to the share of some of the children of Manasseh, (Josh. xvii. 5.)

There have been some great men, who, from this place and other conjectures, have fancied that Joseph was worshipped in Egypt after his death, under the form of an ox, by the name of Serapis, which Bochartus hath confuted in the book forenamed, cap. 34.

And his horns are like the horns of an unicorn.] This is a farther description of the power and strength of the house of Joseph: for a horn is every where an emblem of mighty power and force, and an unicorn (as we translate the word reem) is a very strong as well as a stately creature. But Bochartus hath alleged a great many things to prove, that reem is a sort of wild goat in Arabia, as big as a deer, and of the same colour, which they now call gazellas, (par. i. Hierozoicon, lib. iii. cap. 27.) There were some of them sent lately to the French king by the divan of Tripoli, which had black horns, in shape like those of a goat, only they were round and pointed. But the tallness, strength, and swiftness of this creature, together with its fierce untameable nature, hath made Ludolphus (who at first was of Bochart's opinion) to conclude, upon second thoughts, that the reem in Scripture signifies the rhinoceros, as the Vulgar Latin here translates the word. See lib. i. Commentar. in Histor. Æthiop. cap. 10. n. 74. which seems not so well to agree with these words of Moses; which suppose the creature here spoken of to have two horns (he using the plural number), with which the two tribes descended from Joseph are very fitly compared. And so David mentions the horns of the reem, (Psal. xxii. 22.) But whatsoever creature it was, princes and great men were wont to be compared to it, as appears from Isa. xxxiv. 7. where the grandees (as we now speak) of Edom are called unicorns, as in the following words they are compared to bullocks and bulls.

With them he shall push the people together.] Throw down all that oppose him, particularly the Canaanites. For these (saith the Jerusalem Targum) are the great men of the Amorites, whom Joshua, the son of Nun, slew; who was of the tribe of Ephraim; and the captains which Gideon, the son of Joash, slew, who was of the tribe of Manasseh.

To the ends of the earth.] Of the land of Canaan.

And they are the ten thousands of Ephraim, and they are the thousands of Manasseh.] These things shall be performed by the numerous armies of Ephraim and Manasseh. Of these are the benedictions of these two tribes; the younger of which he signifies should be more powerful than the elder, according to the prophecy of Jacob, (Gen. xlviii. 19.)

Ver. 18. And of Zebulun he said, Rejoice, Zebulun, in thy going out.] About their business, as the Jerusalem Targum expounds it, that is, their merchandise; which they exercised upon the sea of Gennesaret, where they were situated, and not far from the Mediterranean; in which he prays they might have such good success, as to fill their hearts with joy. There are those who understand this of their going out to war against their enemies, which is the exposition of Onkelos. And so this phrase is often used, particularly in Gen. xiv. 8.; and the valour of this tribe is, upon one occasion, celebrated in Judg. v. 18. But Jacob's prophecy determines us rather to the other sense, Gen. xlix. 13. where he represents this tribe as mariners rather than soldiers. Though it must be acknowledged, that there were great numbers among them in David's time, who were expert warriors, (1 Chron. xii. 33.) and that the Israelites generally were not addicted to traffic, the sea-coast being possessed by the Philistines and the Canaanites, save only what belonged to this tribe.

And Issachar in thy tents.] The same Jerusalem Targum expounds it, Rejoice, ye house of Issachar, when ye come into your schools: for this was a learned tribe, at least in some ages, as appears from 1 Chron. xii. 32. But Jacob's prophecy rather determines us to another sense, which is, that they should grow rich by feeding cattle, and by husbandry: for which their country being very proper, they chose rather that quiet kind of life than merchandise. Though they were near neighbours to Zebulun, and for that reason, as well as because they were brethren by the same mother, are here put both together in one benediction. This seems also best to agree with the phrase of rejoicing in their tents; in which they are said anciently to dwell who fed cattle, Gen. iv. 10. And perhaps the learning that the children of Issachar are said to have had, in 1 Chron. xii. 32. which consisted in the understanding of the times, was nothing else but their skill in the proper seasons for sowing, and planting, and pruning, &c. to know what Israel ought to do in the management and improvement of their land; which was of great use, especially in that country.

Ver. 19. They shall call the people unto the mountain.] Here Moses predicts the house of God should be set upon a mountain; unto which, he saith, Zebulun (for the latter end of the verse shews he speaks particularly of them) should invite the rest of their tribes, by their forwardness and zeal, to go up to worship God at the three great festivals. So the Jerusalem Targum paraphrases, Behold, the people of the house of Zebulun shall be ready to go to the mount of the holy house of the Lord. Or, by the people, perhaps, he means the gentiles their neighbours, whom they should endeavour to bring to the service of the true God; which was especially fulfilled when Christ came. (Matt. iv. 15, 16.)

There they shall offer sacrifices of righteousness.] Liberal sacrifices, out of their honest gains by merchandise.

For they shall suck of the abundance of the seas.] Import abundance of various commodities, and grow rich by their traffic.

And of treasure hid in the sand.] This is a farther amplification of the same thing, relating particularly to their importation of gold, and silver, and precious stones, which are digged out of the earth. Some think it hath respect to the rich mines which were in this country; but of that I can find no proof.

Ver. 20. And of Gad he said, Blessed be he that enlargeth Gad.] That is, blessed be God, who hath allotted to him such a large inheritance; which he afterward also farther enlarged, as we read 1 Chron. v. 18—20.

He dwelleth as a lion.] Lives secure and fearless, though encompassed with enemies, whom the Gadites tore in pieces (as it here follows) if they offered to molest them. For this was a very warlike tribe, as we learn from 1 Chron. xii. 8. and therefore here compared to a lioness (so labi signifies), which equals a lion, if not exceeds him in strength and fierceness; as Bochartus hath observed out of good authors in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. iii. cap. 50. And so Onkelos here translates it, He dwelleth as a lioness. And the Jerusalem Targum puts in both, after this manner; He remains quiet, as a lion and a lioness; neither is there people or kingdom that shall stand before them.

And teareth the arm with the crown of the head.] Kills the princes with their kings, as Onkelos truly expounds it. For by arms are meant men of strength and power; and by the crown of the head is properly to be understood the chief commander, ruler, or king. And therefore the LXX. also translate crown of the head by Ἄρχοντα, prince, or supreme governor.

Ver. 21. And he provided the first part for himself.] He first received his portion in the land which they conquered, as Onkelos expounds it. Which he is said here to provide for himself, because this tribe (with Reuben, and part of Manasseh) desired to be possessed of the country of Sihon, which was accordingly given to them, (Numb. xxxii. 1, 2. 33.)

Because there, in a portion of the lawgiver.] Which Moses (who was their lawgiver) gave them by God's order; whereas the other nine tribes and a half had theirs given them by Joshua.

Was he seated.] The word in the Hebrew signifies hid, i. e. protected, when, going to the war in Canaan, they left their wives, and children, and cattle, without any defence, but God's providence, according to the promise they made to Moses, (Numb. xxxii. 16, 17, &c.) What the Jerusalem Targum, and Onkelos, and several of the rabbins, even Aharbinel himself, here say, of Moses being buried in this tribe (which they make the sense of these words), I think is no more to the purpose, than what the cabalists observe upon this place, that, in the blessing of Gad, the whole alphabet is found, because Moses our master (saith Baal-Hatturim) was buried in his territory, who observed the whole law from aleph to tau, i. e. from the beginning to the end. (See Theodoric Hackspan. Cab. Judaica, n. 10.)

And he came.] He speaks of this as a thing already done, because he certainly foresaw they would perform their engagement.

With the heads of the people.] With the chief commanders of the rest of the tribes of Israel. Or, as the words may be translated more literally, he came, the heads of the people; i. e. the Gadites marched in the front before the children of Israel. For so was the agreement between Moses and them, as we read in Numb. xxxii. 17. that they should go ready-armed before the children of Israel. Of which engagement Joshua put them in mind when they were entering into Canaan, (Josh. i. 14.) and they stood to it, (ver. 16, 17.)

He executed the justice of the Lord.] Upon the seven nations of Canaan, whom God commanded them to extirpate.

And his judgments with Israel.] Going in the foremost of the Israelites to battle, till the whole country was subdued to them, (Numb. xxxii. 21, 22. 29. Josh. xxii. 1—3, &c.)

Ver. 22. And of Dan he said, Dan is a lion's whelp.] Courageous as a young lion; so Onkelos. Which was most eminently verified in Samson, who was of this tribe; and whom "the Spirit of the Lord began to move in the camp of Dan," (Judg. xiii. 25.)

He shall leap from Bashan.] The tribe of Dan had no inheritance near Bashan; but he compares them to the young lions of that place. For lions haunted mountains, (Cant. iv. 8.) and this mountain in particular was famous for them, and bred very fierce ones; which every one knows leap upon their prey, when they assault it, and fasten their nails and their teeth in it. (So Bochart observes many ancient authors describe them, par. i. Hierozoicon, lib. iii. cap. 2. p. 739.) And thus did the Danites on a sudden leap from one end of Judah to another, and seized on the city of Laish, near to the fountain of Jordan, calling it by the name of Dan, as we read Judg. xviii. 29.

Ver. 23. And of Naphtali he said, O Naphtali, satisfied with favour.] That is, with the favour of God, which is explained in the next words.

And full with the blessing of the Lord.] The word full, as Maimonides observes, signifies that which is most perfect and absolute in its kind, (More Nevoch. par. i. cap. 19.) Such was the country of Galilee, wherein this tribe had their possession, which was πίων τε πᾶσα, καὶ εὔβοτος, &c. (as Josephus speaks, lib. iii. de Bello Judaico, cap. 4.) fat throughout in all its parts, and very fertile; planted with all manner of trees, insomuch that it invited him to husbandry, who was averse to labour; and by that means was entirely inhabited, and had no void space in all the country, &c.

Possess thou the west and the south.] The same Josephus makes this tribe to have possessed the east and the north in the upper Galilee, (lib. v. Antiq. cap. 1. p. 142.) which is directly contrary to what Moses here saith; therefore Bochartus (in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. iii. cap. 18.) judiciously expounds these words of Moses, not with respect to the whole land of Canaan, but to the Danites beforementioned. For the portion of Naphtali extended from the south of the city called Dan, or Laish, to the sea of Tiberias. And so the three Chaldee paraphrasts expound the Hebrew word jam (which we translate west) by the sea of Tiberias, or Gennesaret, which is the same; for the Hebrews call great lakes by the name of seas. And by this sea is not meant the Mediterranean, but the sea of Galilee, or Tiberias, or Gennesaret; for by all these names it is called, as Mr. Selden observes in his Mare Clausum, p. 21.

Ver. 24. And of Asher he said, Let Asher be blessed with children.] With a numerous and beautiful issue.

Let him be acceptable to his brethren.] All the rest of the Israelites shall court them, for their goodly aspect; or (as some rather think) he prophesies this tribe should win the favour and affection of others, by their affability and obliging behaviour; for which Jacob predicts they should be famous, (Gen. xliv. 21.)

And let him dip his foot in oil.] Be planted in a rich soil, full of olive-trees; which should make oil so plentiful, that they might not only wash their faces, but their feet in it. Onkelos translates, He shall be nourished with the delights of kings.

Ver. 25. Thy shoes shall be iron and brass.] Or, as in the margin, Under thy feet shall be iron; which hath made some think these minerals were digged out of Libanus, near to which lay the tribe of Asher; who, according to this exposition, trod upon a soil full of iron and brass. But no author, Bochartus saith, mentions any such thing as the brass of Libanus; and therefore some understand by these expressions, the barbarous people that dwelt in Galilee of the gentiles, who pressed the Asserites, as an iron shoe or fetters do the feet. But the Arabic here by minal, which we translate shoe, understands a bolt or bar; and renders this passage, Thy bolts shall be iron and brass; that is, as Onkelos expresses it, They should be as strong as iron and brass. And so Kimchi, expounding the words of Jonathan, (who interprets it, Thy habitation shall be as strong, &c.) saith the meaning is, Their country should be as well fenced, as if it had been shut up in brazen or iron walls; and R. Solomon to the same purpose. (See Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. vi. cap. 16.) But I have observed, that the same Bochartus acknowledges in his Phaleg. that Sarepta, (which the Hebrews call Zarephath, 1 Kings xvii. 9.) a city of Sidon, had its name from the brass and iron which were here melted; being in great plenty in that country, as the Hebrews gather from this blessing of the tribe of Asher (who were the inhabitants of those places), Iron and brass are under thy shoe, as he there interprets it, (lib. iv. cap. 34.) And so a very learned man, long before him, David Chytræus, expounds these words, and adds this observation; "Nam Sidon et Sarepta, quæ a metallis excoquendis nomen habet, in tribu Asser fuerunt." For Sidon and Sarepta, which had its name from the melting of metals there, were in the tribe of Asher.

And as thy days, so shall thy strength be.] The same Chytræus expounds it, All the time of their life, they should retain the same vigour of body and mind. Which seems to be the sense of Onkelos, As the days of thy youth, so shall thy strength be. And the Jerusalem Targum more expressly, Such as they were in the days of their youth, such they should be in their old age. Or simply, these words signify, that this tribe should grow stronger and stronger; which Hottinger seems to have aimed at, when he propounded this exposition in his Smegma Orientale, cap. 7. As are thy days, so are thy riches and wealth. Masius, quite contrary, upon Josh. xix. 31. interprets these words to signify, that they should have perpetual conflicts with the old inhabitants of the country. All which various interpretations proceed from the uncertain signification of the Hebrew word daba, which we render strength.

Ver. 26. There is none like unto the God of Jeshurun.] And now, having blessed every particular tribe, he concludes with this general demonstration of their happiness, that their God was not like the gods of other nations, but super-eminent in all perfections. And therefore they must needs be blessed (as the same Chytræus explains it), who had him propitious to them, as their father, their keeper, their defender, avenger, and saviour from all their enemies.

Who rideth upon the heavens in thy help.] Who commandeth in the heavens, as well as in the earth; and sends help and succour to thee from thence by thunder, lightning, and hailstones; as we read he did in many places, (Psal. xviii. 8, 9, &c. lxviii. 33—35.) "And as he that rides upon a horse, turns him this way, and that way, as he pleaseth, (they are the words of Maimonides in his More Nevochim, par. i. cap. 70.) so God by his power and pleasure commands the heavens; and is not fixed to them, as the soul of them (which was the foolish opinion of the Zabii), but, as the rider is far more honourable and excellent than the beast on which he sits, and of a quite different species from it; so God is represented by this metaphor (though but in a weak manner), as separate from the heavens, and of a more excellent nature, far transcending them, which are but the instruments he uses, to fulfil his will and pleasure."

And in his excellency on the sky.] Or, as it may be translated word for word, and in his magnificence, the clouds. From whence he sends such storms and tempests, as demonstrate his power.

Ver. 27. The eternal God is thy refuge.] Or, dwelling-place; to whom they might always betake themselves for safety, and never fail of it, (Psal. xc. 1.) In the Hebrew the words are, The eternal God is the habitation, or dwelling-place; from whence the Jews have framed this maxim, to preserve all men from having low thoughts of God, as if he was contained in any thing, God is the place wherein the world dwells, and not the world the place where God dwells. So Maimonides observes in the place abovenamed, out of Bereschith Rabba.

And underneath are the everlasting arms.] To support all those, with an unwearied power and care, who commit themselves unto him.

And he shall thrust out the enemy from before thee.] As he had carried them through the wilderness with an unwearied care, so he promises God would expel the Canaanites, and make room for them in their country.

And shall say, Destroy them.] Give the Israelites power, as well as authority, to root them out. For to say here is as much as to do, and therefore signifies executing their destruction.

Ver. 28. Israel, thou shalt dwell in safety alone.] Live in quiet and peace, separate from all other people: or, the Divine protection shall be sufficient for their security. This Rasi thinks was fulfilled in the days of Solomon: (1 Kings iv. 25.) but others of them think it is still to be fulfilled.

The fountain of Jacob.] That is, his posterity, who flowed from him as a river from a fountain, (Isa. xlviii. 1. li. 1.) Cocceius thinks these words should be joined to the foregoing in this manner, Israel shall dwell in safety alone by the fountain of Jacob, that is, by God. But though this may have some countenance from the ancient interpreters (as I shall observe presently), yet most go the other way; there being the like expression in Psal. lxviii. 26. Bless the Lord in the congregation, from the fountain of Israel: or, as it is in the margin, Ye that be of the fountain of Israel; i. e. are derived from him as your Father.

Shall be upon a land of corn and wine: also his heavens shall drop down dew.] In a fruitful country, upon which the heavens shall drop down refreshing dews. Onkelos paraphrases the whole thus, Israel shall dwell securely alone, according to the blessing wherewith Jacob's father blessed them, in a land of corn, &c. And so the Jerusalem Targum (making more express mention of the word fountain), Israel shall dwell by himself securely, from the fountain of benediction, wherewith Jacob blessed them, in a land producing wine and oil; and the heavens above are commanded to send dews and rain upon them.

Ver. 29. Happy art thou, O Israel.] He was not able farther to express their happiness, and therefore breaks out into admiration of it; exciting them thereby to be deeply sensible of it, and affected with it.

Who is like unto thee.] Who had the Lord for their God, as he said before, ver. 26, &c. and iv. 7, 8.

A people saved by the Lord.] Who have been redeemed by his mighty power. So the Jerusalem Targum, Whose redemption (I suppose he meant out of Egypt) is from the presence of the Lord. Who had preserved them ever since, and would still protect them, as it here follows.

This R. Isaac (in Chissuk Emuna, par. i. cap. 18.) saith, signifies the spiritual blessings God bestowed on them. For true felicity (saith he) doth not consist in victory over enemies, and plenty of corn, or such-like things, of which he had spoken before in the foregoing verse, but in the salvation of the soul, of which no nation in the world was secure but the Jews; which made Moses (saith he) break out into these words, O happy people saved by the Lord! As much as to say, Among all people, is there any saved like to thee? This he saith, because Christians were wont to tell them, that they fixed their minds wholly on the corporal felicity, which their law promised them; which made him look about to find out all that he could draw to a higher sense. And he fixes so much upon these words, that he repeats it again, a little after, that the salvation here promised is everlasting. And yet his eyes could not be opened to see, that this salvation was to be brought to them by the Messiah: and that our Lord Jesus is he, whose gospel is as full of such promises as their law is of the promises of corn, and wine, and oil.

The shield of thy help.] To defend them from all the assaults of their enemies. He adds this, saith the same R. Isaac, to shew that they to whom he promises spiritual blessings, are not thereby put out of hope of temporal; for the people that are saved by the Lord have him also for their shield and their sword, as it here follows.

And who is the sword of thy excellency!] To cut their enemies in pieces, so that they should glory and boast in magnificent victories over them. Or, as Onkelos translates it, From his presence are all the victories of thy valiant men.

And thine enemies shall be found liars unto thee.] Find themselves deceived in all their vain hopes of saving themselves or hurting the Israelites. Or, should be so afraid of them, that with feigned stories they should court their friendship, as the Gibeonites did. Or, more simply, should submit to them, though not heartily, yet out of fear, as this phrase is used, Psal. xviii. 44. lxvi. 3. and other places.

And thou shalt tread upon their high places.] Upon the necks of their kings, as both Onkelos and the Jerusalem Targum understand it, taking bamoth here for great men, in high stations. And thus Joshua did, as we read Josh. x. 21. But this word commonly signifies, either strong holds, or places of idolatrous worship; which neither their great men nor their gods themselves should be able to preserve from ruin.

CHAP. XXXIV.

Ver. 1. AND Moses went up.] Having thus declared his affectionate concern for the happiness of every one of them, he took his leave of the elders and all the people, and went up whither God had commanded him, (xxxii. 49, &c.)

From the plains of Moab.] In which was their last station before they entered into Canaan, Numb. xxxiii. 48—50. where God delivered several commands to them, Numb. xxxv. 1. xxxvi. 13. and where Moses spake to them what we read in this book, Deut. i. 5.

Unto the mountain of Nebo.] Which was the highest part of the mountain of Abarim, as appears from Numb. xxvii. 12. compared with Deut. xxxii. 49. Near to which there was a city of the same name, (Numb. xxxii. 38. Isa. xv. 2.)

To the top of Pisgah.] Which was the very top of the mountain Nebo. (See Deut. iii. 27. Numb. xxi. 20.)

That is over against Jericho.] A famous city on the other side of Jordan. I see no ground to believe that the people of Israel accompanied him hither (as Josephus tells the story), with so many tears, that Moses wept also; and having beseeched them not to take his departure so heavily, he dismissed them together with the elders, and remained there alone.

And the Lord.] Or, as Jonathan hath it, the Word of the Lord, who had accompanied him with his blessed presence through the wilderness.

Shewed him all the land of Gilead unto Dan.] God had often promised him that he should see the good land promised to their fathers, though not be permitted to enter into it, (Numb. xxvi. 12. Deut. iii. 27.) And now fulfils his word, and gives him a full prospect of it; bidding him first look northwards, through the whole land of Gilead (which comprehends all that was given to the two tribes and half on this side Jordan, where they now were) to the land of Naphtali, which was in the upper Galilee, beyond the sea of Gennesaret, as far as to the utmost northern border, which was then called Laish, and afterwards Dan, (Josh. xix. 47. Judg. xviii. 28.) and in latter times Cesaræa Philippi.

The mention of Dan, which was not the name of this place till after that tribe had conquered Laish, in the time of the judges, shews, that this was not written at the same time with the rest of this book, no more than what we read

(ver. 5, 6. 10.) of his death and burial, &c. (unless we suppose Moses to have given an account of his own death and burial by the spirit of prophecy, which is not probable), but it is most likely by Samuel, who was a prophet, and wrote by Divine authority what he found in the records which were left by Joshua and others who succeeded him; who gave an account of Moses's leaving the world, and of all that was done after, till the end of the time of the judges.

Ver. 2. And all Naphtali, and the land of Ephraim, and Manasseh.] Having seen the northern parts, he bade him turn his eyes towards the midland country, where Ephraim and Manasseh were situated.

And all the land of Judah.] Which lay southerly.

Unto the utmost sea.] By which some understand the Salt Sea, which lay on the south border of the land of Judah, (Numb. xxxiv. 3.) But then there will be no mention of the western part of Canaan, which lay upon the Mediterranean or Midland Sea, which is hereby meant.

Ver. 3. And the south.] And after he had seen the south, which the tribes of Judah and Simeon inhabited, he bade him take a view of the eastern parts of the country, as it here follows.

And the plain of the valley of Jericho.] All the region about Jordan, especially the lovely plain of Jericho; which is very much celebrated by other authors, and lay in the tribe of Benjamin.

The city of palm-trees.] Which is often mentioned in Scripture; sometimes without, and sometimes with the name of Jericho, (Judg. i. 16. iii. 13. 2 Chron. xxviii. 15.) which was so called, because a multitude of palm-trees grew about it, as Strabo (as well as Josephus) testifies in his Geograph. lib. xvi. p. 763. where he describes this plain, as Πεδίον κύκλῳ περιεχόμενον ὀρεινῇ τινι, &c. as encompassed about with mountains, after the manner of a theatre, abounding with palm-trees, and other garden-trees mixed with them, for the space of a hundred stadia. And there was also, he observes, Ὁ τοῦ βαλσάμου Παράδεισος, the paradise of balsam; which is a rare aromatic plant, like to the turpentine-tree, whose juice is of great virtue and value, &c. From which odoriferous plant growing here, some think this city had the name of Jericho, signifying sweet-smelling. So R. Judas, in the Gemara of Beracoth, where he mentions this tree as growing about Jericho, and thence derives its name from the Hebrew word reach, which signifies a sweet smell. This is more probable than the conjecture of D. Chytræus, who imagines Jericho to come from Jerec, which signifies the moon; and in their German language, he thinks, might be called Luneburgh.

Unto Zoar.] Which lay in the entrance of the Salt Sea.

Ver. 4. And the Lord said unto him.] After he had shewed him the land, the Word of the Lord (as the Jerusalem Targum hath it) spake these words to him which follow. And God having been wont to speak to Moses out of the cloud of glory, Josephus conceives that now he was encompassed with it, and from thence heard this voice; which the Jews fancy was so loud, that the people heard it into the camp. Thus at our Saviour's transfiguration upon the holy mount, a glorious cloud overshadowed him and his three apostles, who heard the voice say to them, This is my beloved Son, &c. The Samaritans, as Hottinger relates in his Smegma Orientale, cap. 8. p. 456. tell the story thus: That Joshua, Eleazar the priest, and all the elders accompanying him to the mount, fell into such a passion, when they were to take their leave, that they could not be parted from him. Whereupon the pillar of fire came down, which separated them from Moses, so that they saw him no more.

This is the land which I sware unto Abraham, unto Isaac, and unto Jacob, saying, I will give it unto thy seed.] Gen. xii. 7. xiii. 15. xv. 18, &c.

I have caused thee to see it with thine eyes.] Which the Lord strengthened, it is likely, with a greater vigour than usual, that he might take a larger prospect, than otherwise he could have done, of this country. Or, as some of the Jews understand it, he laid a map of it before his eyes, wherein every part of it was exactly described. But that might have been done in the plains of Moab, without going up into a mountain; therefore the other is more reasonable, that he strengthened his visive faculty with a greater power, to see the whole country in its length and breadth, &c. And therefore some of the rabbins have been so wise as to put both together, as J. Bened. Carpzovius observes out of several of them, (upon Schickard's Jus Regium, cap. 5. Theor. 16. p. 285.) who thus speak: "God shewed him the whole land, as in a garden plot, forty miles in breadth, and as many in length; and gave his eyes such a power of contemplating the whole land, from the beginning to the end, that he saw hills and dales, what was open, and what was enclosed, remote or nigh, at one view."

But thou shalt not go over thither.] This he had often said to him: and now mentions it, that he might die in a comfortable sense, that he had been as good as his word to him, and consequently carry this belief along with him into the other world, that he would make good the oath which he sware to their fathers, of bringing them into Canaan, and there fulfil all that he had foretold.

Ver. 5. So Moses, the servant of the Lord.] So God himself calls him after his death, in the next book, Josh. i. 2. 7. as the most eminent minister of his, that he had hitherto employed in Israel. But the observation of R. Bechai is not well founded, that he is not called the servant of the Lord till after he was dead, and then admitted unto the nearest familiarity with the Divine Majesty: for though these very words are not used, yet the Lord calls him my servant Moses, which is the same thing, Numb. xii. 7.

Died in the land of Moab.] For this country was still so called, because it anciently belonged to the Moabites, (see Numb. xxi. 26.) from whom Sihon had taken it, as Israel now had taken it from him: so that he really died in the land of Israel.

According to the word of the Lord.] The Jerusalem Targum expounds this very soberly, According to the sentence of the decree of the Lord; that is, as the Lord had determined and declared he should, xxxii. 49, 50. And so this phrase is commonly used in this very book, xvii. 6. 10, 11. as well as in other places of the Pentateuch, Numb. ix. 20. xiii. 3, &c. which will warrant this interpretation, That Moses did not die of any disease, nor was worn out with age, but merely because God, the supreme governor of all things, so ordered it. But some of the Jews, not satisfied with this, have far-fetched conceits concerning the death of Moses from these words: for because it is said he died, al pi, at the mouth (as the words are literally in the Hebrew) of the Lord, Maimonides himself saith, that their wise men think (and he seems of their opinion), that it signifies the Lord drew his soul out of his body with a kiss. And thus died Aaron and Miriam, but none besides them. Of Aaron indeed it is expressly said he died, al pi, of the Lord, but it is not said of Miriam; and yet they will have her to have had the same favour; that is, they died, saith he, of too much love, from the pleasure they had in the thoughts of God; which apprehension of God, conjunct with the highest love to him, he thinks is called kissing, (Cant. i. 2.) "Let him kiss me with the kisses of his mouth," (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 51.) But this is not the meaning of the phrase, though, no doubt, Moses departed this life in a most delectable sense and taste of the Divine love, having no unwillingness to die, nor being surprised with death; for he knew the time, and the place, and the manner of it: and as he did not die of any disease (as was said before), or of old age, or by external force, but only by the will and pleasure of God, who took his soul out of his body; so he did not part with it against his will, nor with any fear, but, with a placid mind and composed spirit, committed himself to God, in whose embraces (as we may speak) he expired: and this it is likely the ancient Jews meant, when they said, his soul departed with a kiss.

As to the time of his death, the Scripture doth not mention the year, the month, and the day; but the Jews commonly place it in the last month of the fortieth year after their coming out of Egypt, called Adar, and the seventh day of that month. Thus they say, in Seder Olam Rabba, cap. 10. and in their Calendar which they now follow; and so Patricides, in Hottinger's Smegma Orientale, p. 457. But our great primate of Ireland in his Annals observes, that it agrees better with the following history, to place his death in the first day of that month; and Torniellus makes the same computation, that it must be either in the latter end of the eleventh month, or in the beginning of the twelfth.

Ver. 6. And he buried him.] This refers to the words foregoing; viz. the Lord, who commanded his angels to bury him. So Epiphanius, ἐνεταφίασαν οἱ Ἄγγελοι, &c. Hæres. ix. p. 28. and see p. 600. Though in the Scripture active words are very often used passively, and the meaning may be only that he was buried, yet there is this to be said for the other sense, that thereupon it is thought, that the contest arose between Michael the archangel and the devil (as St. Chrysostom, Theodoret, Procopius Gazæus, and others take it), who would not have had him buried, but opposed it, that he might administer an occasion to the Jews to commit idolatry; though we never find that the Jews were given to the worship of relics, as our most learned Usher observes in his Annals. (See there.)

In a valley in the land of Moab, over against Beth-Peor.] This valley was in the land of Sihon, king of the Amorites, (iv. 46.) who had taken it from the Moabites, as I noted before, and was now possessed by the Israelites. And Beth-Peor was a part of the possession of Reuben, (Josh. xiii. 20.) which was a place where the temple of Peor anciently stood; from whence it had its name: for this idol is not only called Baal-Peor, but simply Peor; (Josh. xxii. 17.) and as Beth-Baal is the temple of Baal, so Beth-Peor is the temple of Peor, as I. Gor. Vossius observes, de Orig. et Progr. Idol. lib. ii. cap. 7.

Now by all these circumstances of his burial, it appears how frivolous that opinion of the Jews is, mentioned in Jalkut, out of Siphri, that Moses did not really die, but was translated into heaven, where he stands and ministers before God; which conceit Josephus himself follows, lib. iv. Antiq. cap. 8. where he saith, that he having dismissed the elders, who went with him to Mount Abarim, and then conversing awhile with Eleazar and Joshua, while he embraced them, νέφους αἰφνίδιον ὑπὲρ αὐτοῦ στάντος, a cloud on a sudden coming upon him, he was snatched out of their sight into a certain valley: which is not only beside, but contrary to the Scripture, which saith he died, and was buried in the valley. And yet some of the ancient fathers, particularly St. Ambrose and St. Hilary, have followed this opinion, that when Moses is said to die, it doth not signify the separation of his soul from his body, but his translation to a better life. See Sixtus Senensis, in his Bibliotheca, lib. v. Annot. 61. where he observes, this is not only against Scripture, but against the sense of almost all ecclesiastical writers.

But no man knoweth of his sepulchre unto this day.] These words, unto this day, shew that this passage was not written by Moses, as Josephus and Philo imagine, who say he wrote this by the spirit of prophecy. (See ver. 1.) The reason why his body was concealed most think to have been, lest in future times it should become an object of their worship. So R. Levi ben Gersom: "Future generations, perhaps, might have made a god of him, because of the fame of his miracles: for do we not see how some of the Israelites erred, in the brazen serpent which Moses made?" And the heresy of the Melchisedekians shews this was no vain fear, (as Hermannus Witsius observes, lib. i. Miscell. cap. 17.) if Epiphanius may be believed, who saith, that in Arabia Petræa, διὰ τὰ θεσήμεια θεὸν νομίζουσι, &c. they thought him to be God, because of his wonders he wrought, and worshipped his image. What would they have done, if they had had his very body? which he did not desire to be carried into Canaan, and buried among his ancestors, as Joseph ordered concerning his bones: for he understood, it is likely, the mind of God to be, that, as he should not go over Jordan while he was alive, so his body should not be carried over when he was dead; which R. Chama thinks might have proved dangerous, because in the time of their distress (especially at the captivity of the land) the children of Israel might have been prone to run to his sepulchre, and beg him with tears to pray for them, whose prayers had been so prevalent for them in his lifetime: for such a piece of superstition, it seems, crept in among them in latter ages; of which see Wagenseil upon the Gemara of Sota, cap. 1. sect. 52. annot. 2.

But though no man knew where Moses was buried when this was written, yet some Maronite shepherds, we are told, have pretended lately (1655) to find out his tomb, with this inscription in Hebrew, Moses, the servant of the Lord. A great stir was made about it, as the same Witsius observes, out of Hornius's Historia Ecclesiastica. But a learned Jew, he saith, so confuted the story, shewing it was another Moses whose tomb they found, that the report presently vanished; and the learned Wagenseil makes some probable guesses, that it was the tomb of Moses Maimonides. (See Annot. 6. in Gemara Sota, cap. 1. sect. 51.) But Bartoloccius, in his late Bibliotheca Rabbinica, tom. iii. p. 928, &c. hath made it very probable, that Hornius was imposed upon by somebody in this narration, there being no such authors known among the Jews as R. Jakum, or Jacomus ben Gad, who, he saith, confuted this tale.

Ver. 7. And was a hundred and twenty years old when he died.] A third part of which time, wanting one month, he had been employed in the government of Israel, as Josephus observes in the conclusion of his fourth book of Antiquities.

His eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated.] That is, he had all the vigour of youth remaining, there being not so much as a wrinkle in his cheeks: so some of the ancients interpret the last clause: others, he had not lost so much as a tooth out of his mouth. (See Bochartus, in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 45. p. 506.) Both Onkelos and the Jerusalem Targum refer it to the splendour of his countenance, which continued to the last. From hence it was that the heathen, who were not wholly unacquainted with this story, but had not a perfect knowledge of it, imagined that Moses was troubled to die, when he was so vigorous; for Trebellius Pollio, in the life of Claudius, saith, that the most learned mathematicians were wont to say, that no man lived beyond a hundred and twenty years: for though Moses lived a hundred and five-and-twenty years (so he mistakes), being " Dei, ut Judæorum libri loquantur, familiaris," a man familiar with God, as the books of the Jews tell us: yet he complaining that " juvenis interiret," he died when he was young, they say he was told by an uncertain God, that no man should ever live longer. This mistake arose from their misinterpretation of those words, Gen. vi. 3. " Yet his days shall be a hundred and twenty years:" for Huetius well observes, that this incertus Deus was the true God, the creator of heaven and earth; whom St. Paul saith they called also the unknown God, Demonstr. Evang. propos. 4. cap. 1. n. 57. And I cannot but add, that this passage out of Trebellius was taken notice of above a hundred years ago, by a learned man I have often mentioned, David Chytræus, to shew that these sacred books were not unknown to the heathen, and that they had a reverence for them.

Ver. 8. And the children of Israel wept for Moses in the plains of Moab thirty days.] The time of mourning for the dead was longer or shorter, according to the dignity of the person. And the Jews have a tradition which distinguishes between the days of weeping and mourning; the former of which never exceeded a month, which was the time they wept for Moses; the latter never lasted more than a year, as they gather from the example of the greatest doctor they ever had, R. Judah, who composed the Mischna; for whom they mourned twelve months. (See Schickard, in his Jus Regium, cap. 6. Theor. 19. and upon Gen. l. 3. 10. Numb. xx. 29.)

So the days of weeping and mourning for Moses were ended.] They lamented him completely thirty days, and no longer. By which it seems, that weeping and mourning (whatsoever difference was between them) were anciently of the same length, though the Jews, in the forenamed tradition, are pleased to make the one last much longer than the other.

Now by this, and what follows in the book of Joshua, we may certainly know the truth of what I said (on ver. 5.) concerning the day on which Moses died; for if we add unto these thirty days, which followed immediately upon it, the three days wherein the spies lay hid in the mountain, (Josh. ii. 22.) and allow three or four days more for their going and coming back, and then add the three days they lay by Jordan before they passed over, (Josh. iii. 2.) they make just a month and ten days, from the first day of the last month, when I supposed Moses died, unto the day they got safe over Jordan, which was the tenth day of the first month; whereas, if we reckon as the Jews do, that Moses died on the seventh day of the last month, it would have been the seventeenth day of the first month before they got over Jordan. I observe also, that, though the Talmudists generally make him to have died on the seventh day of Adar, yet there have been some who placed it on the first; for the Medrasch Rabbah, telling the story of Haman's casting lots to find the best time to do execution on the Jews, saith he pitched upon the month Adar, because it had been unlucky to the Jews, by the death of their master Moses therein. But he did not consider, saith that Medrasch, that as Moses died on the first day of this month, so he was born on the same first day.

Ver. 9. And Joshua the son of Nun was full of the spirit of wisdom.] To take the government upon him, and manage it prudently, as soon as Moses left them; which was necessary to be mentioned, that it might not be thought they wanted a head to conduct them, as their neighbours possibly might imagine, when the news came of Moses's death; for, as the Samaritans tell the story, (in Hottinger's Smegma Orientale, p. 462.) when they heard the lamentations which the whole congregation made for Moses, they began to rejoice, and gather their forces together to set upon the Israelites, as wanting a leader: but they soon found themselves mistaken, Joshua having taken the charge of them, and being endued with his spirit.

For Moses had laid his hands upon him.] Whereby he committed to him the supreme authority after his departure, and implored the Spirit of God to qualify him for it; for power to execute any office among the Jews was given by laying on of hands, whereby they were ordained and appointed to it. And this was a rite of prayer also, as many have observed, for the obtaining the gifts of the Spirit, which were necessary for the discharge of that office. And, though no words of prayer be mentioned, yet the very laying on of hands denotes it, as our learned Dr. Outram observes from this very place, and from 1 Tim. v. 22. lib. i. de Sacrif. cap. 15. n. 8. Of Moses's laying on hands upon Joshua, we read Numb. xxvii. 18, &c. And he was solemnly also, a little before Moses's death, presented unto God, by his own command, xxxi. 14, &c. of this book.

And the children of Israel hearkened unto him, and did as the Lord commanded Moses.] Obeyed him as their supreme governor, according to God's command, delivered to Moses, Numb. xxvii. 20. Deut. xxxi. 23. (See Josh. i. 16, 17, &c.)

Ver. 10. And there rose not a prophet since in Israel like to Moses.] This is a plain demonstration, that the promise God makes by Moses, that he would raise up " a Prophet like to him," (Deut. xviii. 15. 19, &c.) was not fulfilled either in Joshua or in Samuel (who it is likely wrote this chapter, as I said before), and the best of the Jews confess, shall not be fulfilled till Messiah come. Thus the author of Sephir Ikkarim, lib. iii. cap. 20. " It cannot be, but that a prophet shall at last arise like to Moses, or greater than he; for the king Messiah shall be as great or greater: therefore these words are not to be expounded, as if there should never be such a prophet, but that in all the time of the following prophets, till the cessation of prophecy, none should arise like to Moses. But after that, there shall be one like him, or rather greater than he."

Whom the Lord knew face to face.] Or, as De Dieu thinks it should be translated, Who knew the Lord face to face. This was one pre-eminence of Moses above all the prophets, that he conversed more familiarly with God than any of them did. See Numb. xii. 8. which place explains this: for to know him face to face, was to speak familiarly to God, and to hear God speaking in like manner unto him. And so the Jerusalem Targum expounds these words; only instead of the Lord, he saith, Who knew the Word of the Lord talking with him, and delivering to him most excellent laws, for the good government of his people. In which laws he still lives, they all remaining upon record to this day, when the laws of all the famous lawgivers, whom the gentiles honoured as gods, are obliterated: but it must be observed, that in this, wherein Moses excelled all the prophets, our blessed Saviour far transcended him: for he was "in the bosom of the Father," (John i. 18.) and spake "what he saw and heard," &c. (Josh. iii. 11. 32.)

Ver. 11. In all the signs and the wonders which the Lord sent him to do.] The Jerusalem Targum hath it, Which the Word of the Lord sent him to do in the land of Egypt, to Pharaoh, and to all his servants, and to all his land. (See iv. 34. vi. 22. vii. 19.) In these signs and wonders Moses excelled all the prophets, doing more miracles than all that succeeded him, as Maimonides observes, More Nevoch. par. ii. cap. 35. But our blessed Saviour excelled him in this, as well as them; doing more wonders than all the prophets put together had done from the beginning of the world, and far greater also than theirs, (John xxi. ult.)

Ver. 12. And in all that mighty hand, and in all that great terror which Moses shewed.] As the former verse relates to what he did in Egypt, so this hath respect unto their passing through the Red Sea, and to all that befel them in the wilderness, both at the giving of the law, and afterward till this time: so the Jerusalem Targum expounds these words, In all that strong hand, and in all those great visions, which Moses managed. And Onkelos to the same purpose.

In the sight of all Israel.] In the place forenamed Maimonides insists much upon this, that Moses wrought all his miracles publicly, the whole congregation being witnesses of them. And so our Saviour commonly wrought his (till they sought to kill him) in their synagogues, at their public feasts, when there was the greatest concourse of the people of Israel: so that in this he was a prophet "like unto Moses," though infinitely superior; which some of the old Jews could not but discern (as I observed upon chap. xviii.) when upon these words of Isa. lii. 13. "He shall be exalted, and extolled, and be very high," they thus gloss in Tanchuma, which is an ancient book among them, "This is the king Messias who shall be exalted above Abraham, extolled above Moses, and be very high above the angels of the ministry." Upon which Conradus Pellicanus thus glosses, and concludes his commentary, as I shall do mine, with these words: "What it is to be above the angels, let the Jews explain: we can understand nothing by it, but the very Word of God, which was in the beginning with God, and was God, by whom all things were made, and without him nothing was made, viz. the Lord God of hosts: to whom, in perfect unity, God the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, be all honour and glory for ever." Amen.

Thus ends the Pentateuch, which, as our great primate of Ireland computes, contains the history of two thousand five hundred and fifty-two years and a half, from the beginning of the world to the death of Moses.

THE BOOK OF JOSHUA.

THIS title doth not necessarily signify that this book was written by JOSHUA, as the five foregoing were by Moses, but only that it contains the acts done by Joshua. Yet there wants not arguments to prove that Joshua was the author of this book: for though Grotius and many other modern writers, with some of the ancients, think they find reasons in the book itself against this opinion; yet the ancient Talmudists, and several of the latter, ascribe it to him, being principally induced thereunto by those words in the last chapter of this book, ver. 26. which I cannot say are an evident proof of it (for those words may relate only to the covenant mentioned in that chapter); but thus they say expressly in Bava-bathra, cap. 1. "Joshua wrote his own book, and the eight last verses of the law;" and then concerning the five last verses of this book, they write after this manner in the same place; "Eleazar wrote the twenty-ninth verse, &c. of the twenty-fourth chapter, as Phineas did ver. 33." And there are men of excellent learning who have undertaken to answer all that can be objected unto this, (particularly Daniel Huetius, in his Demonstratio Evang. propos. 4.) Which objections I shall consider in their proper places, where they seem to arise in this book.

Which the Jews reckon among the first prophets (as they call them), though it contain only a history of what passed till the death of Joshua; which, in all likelihood, he would not neglect to write himself, as Moses did what passed in his time, that every tribe and every family might have an unquestionable title to their inheritance under his own hand, who had by God's order made a division of the land; and that all posterity might see the promises made unto them by Moses were so punctually fulfilled, that there failed not aught of any good thing which the Lord had spoken, but all came to pass; as he observes xxi. 45. and that in a short time: for this book contains the history of the Israelites, from the death of Moses to the death of Joshua; that is, as some compute, for the space of seventeen years, or rather near twenty-seven. (See upon xiv. 10.)

CHAP. I.

Ver. 1. NOW, after the death of Moses.] Thus those books are wont to begin, whose argument relates to the book beforegoing. As the book of Judges is in this manner connected with this of Joshua, and the book of Ruth with that of Judges; and the LXX. make such a preface to join the book of Lamentations with the prophecy of Jeremiah.

After the death of Moses.] I suppose immediately after the days of mourning for him were ended, (Deut. xxxiv. 8.)

The servant of the Lord.] See Deut. xxxiv. 5.

It came to pass, that the Lord spake unto Joshua the son of Nun.] Out of the sanctuary, it is most likely, from whence he had spoken to him a little before Moses's death, and made him a promise of what he orders him now to accomplish, (Deut. xxxi. 14. 23.) and where Eleazar was appointed long before to ask counsel for him, when there was great occasion, (Numb. xxvii. 21.)

Moses's minister.] Who had attended upon Moses from the beginning, in his highest employment, (Exod. xxiv. 13. Deut. i. 38.)

Ver. 2. Moses my servant is dead.] He hath finished his work, and can do me no farther service.

Now therefore arise.] Put an end therefore unto your mourning for him, and go about the business which he hath left thee to perform.

Go over this Jordan.] Within sight of which they lay encamped.

Thou, and all this people, unto the land which I do give to them, even to the children of Israel.] As he promised when he changed his name from Oshea into Joshua, (Numb. xiii. 16. Deut. i. 38. Deut. iii. 28.)

Ver. 3. Every place.] Within the limits mentioned in the next verse.

That the sole of your foot shall tread upon, that have I given you, as I said unto Moses.] He would not have them doubt of what Moses said from him (Deut. xi. 24.) though he were dead.

Ver. 4. From the wilderness.] This was the bounds of the country on the south.

And this Lebanon.] Which was the bounds on the north. And Joshua seems now to have been in sight of it; to which the Divine Majesty directed his observation, as the most eminent mountain in those parts of the world.

Even unto the great river, the river Euphrates.] Which was the eastern bounds, and called by other authors the great river, as I have observed on Deut. i. 7.

All the land of the Hittites.] Who were a very powerful people in the country, dwelling, together with the Amorites, in the mountainous parts of it; (Numb. xiii. 29.) some of which were of the race of the giants, and are therefore particularly mentioned, to shew that the most terrible people should not be able to stand before Joshua; but he should either destroy them, or expel them, and make them flee their country, as these Hittites did; of whom we read, and of their kings, 2 Kings vii. 6.

Unto the great sea.] The Mediterranean, which was the western border, as it here follows.

Towards the going down of the sun, shall be your coast.] See upon Deut. xi. 24. and other places.

Ver. 5. There shall not any man be able to stand before thee all the days of thy life.] Deut. vii. 24.

As I was with Moses, so I will be with thee.] To subdue all the people of Canaan before him; as he did the Egyptians, the two kings of the Amorites, and the Midianites before Moses: to counsel also, and advise him in all difficulties, as he had done Moses.

I will not fail thee, nor forsake thee.] See upon Deut. xxxi. 6. 8. On which promise they relied in future times, (1 Kings viii. 57.)

Ver. 6. Be strong, and of a good courage.] This charge he had given him before the death of Moses; (Deut. xxxi. 23.) and David gave the same to Solomon, (1 Chron. xxviii. 20.)

For unto this people shalt thou divide for an inheritance the land which I sware unto their fathers to give them.] He had promised him, in the place beforenamed, that he should bring them into the land, &c. and here now adds, that he should settle them in the possession of it, by assigning every one their portion in it; which he did by such a Divine direction, as silenced all disputes about it.

Ver. 7. Only be thou strong, and very courageous, that thou mayest observe to do according to all the law which Moses my servant commanded thee.] It requires the greatest courage and resolution, especially in a governor, to be truly pious and religious, by observing the laws himself, and seeing them observed by others.

Turn not from it to the right hand or to the left.] By adding to it, or taking away from it, (Deut. xii. ult.) or, more simply, no way deviate from it; for it is a metaphor from men in a journey, who go straight forward in the plain highway, and turn not aside into by-paths, which lead they know not whither.

That thou mayest prosper whithersoever thou goest.] Or do wisely, as it is in the margin; for it is the greatest policy to be truly religious.

Ver. 8. This book of the law.] The original of which was preserved in the sanctuary; from whence God now spake to him, (Deut. xxxi. 26.)

Shall not depart out of thy mouth.] He was to read in it continually, that he might instruct others, and be thereby an example to all future governors and kings, according to the law, (Deut. xvii. 18, 19.) By which it is evident, that Joshua had a copy of the law; which was then written and extant in his time.

But thou shalt meditate therein day and night.] His other weighty employments were not to hinder him from pondering, as well as reading, the law of God; because it was to be his rule in all his private transactions and public administrations.

That thou mayest observe to do according to all that is written therein.] Which was not possible, without the serious and attentive consideration beforementioned.

For then thou shalt make thy way prosperous, and then thou shalt have good success.] Or do wisely. Prudence and prosperity go together; but no prudence comparable to the strict observance of the laws of God, upon which the felicity of kingdoms and states depends.

Ver. 9. Have not I commanded thee? Be strong, and of a good courage; be not afraid, neither be thou dismayed: for the Lord thy God is with thee whithersoever thou goest.] He confirms him in the resolution he had put into him, (ver. 6.) by two arguments, the Divine vocation, and the Divine presence with him. (See Deut. i. 29, 30. xxxi. 6—8.) The latter of which the Targum thus expresseth, For the Word of the Lord thy God shall be for thy help, in every place where thou goest. (See ver. 14.)

Ver. 10. Then Joshua commanded the officers of the people, saying.] I have often observed, that as schophetim were judges, who heard causes in their courts, and pronounced sentence; so schoterim were inferior officers belonging to the court, who summoned people to attend, and executed the sentence: for after Moses had mentioned (Deut. i. 15.) the chief of their tribes, captains over thousands, and hundreds, and fifties, and tens, he at last mentions these officers among their tribes; who were employed, it appears by this place, in the camp, as well as in the courts of justice.

Ver. 11. Pass through the host, and command the people, saying, Prepare you victuals.] They were to make proclamation not only in all the four camps of Israel, but in the several tribes who were under those standards, to provide themselves with such victuals as the country of Sihon and Og, which they had lately conquered, afforded. For being, after three days, (iii. 1.) to remove very early in the morning, perhaps they might not have had time to gather manna sufficient, and to prepare it before they began their march.

For within three days.] See iii. 1, 2.

Ye shall pass over this Jordan.] Which was not so far from Shittim, where they now lay, but they could see it.

And go to possess the land, which the Lord your God giveth you to possess it.] He constantly remembers them of this donation from God; both to strengthen their faith, and to excite their thankfulness. "For they got not the land in possession by their own sword, neither did their arm save them; but his right hand, &c. because he had a favour to them," as the Psalmist speaks, xliv. 3.

Ver. 12. And to the Reubenites, and to the Gadites, and to half the tribe of Manasseh, spake Joshua, saying.] Here he begins to do according to the command of Moses, as God before directed him, ver. 7, 8. For Moses had given this charge to the Reubenites, &c. when he gave them their possession on this side Jordan, Numb. xxxii. 20, 21, &c. and put them in mind of it again, Deut. iii. 18, &c.

Ver. 13. Remember the word which Moses, the servant of the Lord, commanded you, saying.] It is very observable, how gently and not imperiously Joshua exercises his authority, at his first entrance upon his office. For he only puts them in mind of what Moses required from them, and leaves them to reflect upon the promise they made to him.

The Lord your God hath given you rest, and hath given you this land.] That is, actually bestowed upon them a country to settle in. For here their wives, and children, and cattle remained (with a sufficient number of persons to look after them), when they marched into Canaan, as it follows in the next verse.

Ver. 14. Your wives, your little ones, and your cattle, shall remain in the land which Moses gave you on this side Jordan; but ye shall pass before your brethren armed.] March in the front of them, to shew their forwardness to bring them into the same happy condition with themselves.

All the mighty men of valour to help them.] Such as Joshua picked out; for it is evident they did not all go over, but only forty thousand of them, (iv. 13.) The rest, though fit for war, were left to defend their wives, children, and flocks, while those mighty men of valour went to help their brethren.

Ver. 15. Until the Lord have given your brethren rest, as he hath given you.] A settled possession of the land of Canaan, as they had of the land of the two kings of the Amorites.

And they also have possessed the land which the Lord your God giveth them.] He would have them look upon the conquest of the land as certain, because God had made a grant of it to their brethren.

Then ye shall return to the land of your possession, and enjoy it, which Moses, the Lord's servant, gave you on this side Jordan, towards the sun-rising.] According to the agreement which Moses had made with them, (Numb. xxxiii. 20—22.)

Ver. 16. And they answered Joshua, saying, All that thou commandest us we will do, and whithersoever thou sendest us we will go.] It is likely, this was the answer not only of the Reubenites, Gadites, and Manassites, but of all the rest of the tribes; before whom Joshua put these two tribes and a half in mind of their duty: which they all engage to perform exactly; these words containing a full recognition of Joshua's authority, and their absolute submission to it.

Ver. 17. According as we hearkened unto Moses in all things, so will we hearken unto thee.] Here they acknowledge his authority to be equal to that of Moses, who was undoubtedly set over them by God, as they now own Joshua to be.

Only the Lord thy God be with thee, as he was with Moses.] These words are not a restriction of their obedience, which did not depend upon his successes, but a solemn prayer to God, of whom they desired no other governor than Joshua, that he would make him as victorious as Moses was over all their enemies. Therefore, some translate the words, not only, but may the Lord thy God, &c. or, Since the Lord thy God hath promised to be with thee. The Targum paraphrases these words as he did ver. 9. Only let the Word of the Lord thy God be thy helper, as he was to Moses.

Ver. 18. Whosoever he be that doth rebel against thy commandment, and will not hearken unto thy words in all that thou commandest him, he shall be put to death.] This seems to be the voice of all the people, and of their elders, or a decree made by the elders, as the Jews understand it: who, looking upon Joshua to be a king, as Moses was, extend this to all the kings of Israel in following times. So Guil. Schickard observes out of Maimonides in his Mischpat Hammelech, cap. 4. Theor. 14. p. 101. But it should rather be said, that Joshua was a king and a prophet as Moses was; and the law, as Rasi observes, ordered him to be put to death that transgressed the orders of Moses, and of a prophet.

Only be strong, and of a good courage.] He had the greater reason to be courageous, since they resolved, as one man, to stand by him, and never to disobey him. And therefore the word rak, which we translate only, should rather be translated therefore, as it plainly signifies, xiii. 6. where, speaking of the land that remained to be possessed, God promises to drive out the inhabitants, and therefore bids Joshua to divide it to the Israelites for an inheritance.

CHAP. II.

Ver. 1. AND Joshua the son of Nun sent.] Or had sent, before the directions given to the officers, mentioned in the foregoing chapter, ver. 10, 11. which best agrees with the twenty-second verse of this chapter, and the rest of the story.

Out of Shittim.] Which was in the plains of Moab, where Israel now lay, (Deut. xxxiv. 1.) called Abel-Shittim, Numb. xxxiii. 49.

Two men.] Which were sufficient for the business they went about.

To spy secretly.] So that none were privy to it among the Israelites but Joshua; who, it is probable, did not send them without an order from God, who intended to dispose things so, that they should bring back to him a great encouragement to his faith.

Saying, Go view the land.] Not the whole country of Canaan, but only that part of it which lay about Jericho, as it here follows: whose fortifications they were to observe, and the approaches to it, with the strength that was in it.

And they went.] Over the fords of Jordan, I suppose, mentioned ver. 7.

And came into a harlot's house, called Rahab.] Who kept a public house, or an inn, to entertain strangers: by going into which, they thought they would be less suspected of any design. The word zonah, which is commonly translated a harlot, the Chaldee paraphrase renders pundakitha; which is plainly the Greek word Πανδοχία, signifying she kept a house of public reception. And so St. Chrysostom calls this woman, in his second sermon of repentance, πανδοχεύτριαν· for there is no doubt she kept a public house. But such persons, in those days, made their bodies as public as their houses; and, therefore, she is constantly called Rahab the harlot by the ancients; and even by two apostles, who call her πόρνη, (Heb. xi. 21. James ii. 25.) For so she had been, though now, it is probable, converted by the faith which was wrought in her. Which was so eminent, that she was not only admitted into the society of God's people, but married into a noble family of the tribe of Judah, from whom Christ sprung, (Matt. i. 5.) and is propounded as an example of lively faith unto all Christians, (Heb. xi. 31. James ii. 25.)

And lodged there.] Took up their lodging in her house, by a Divine direction, as appeared afterward.

Ver. 2. And it was told the king of Jericho.] Who was not negligent, we may well think, to set a watch to observe who came in and went out of the city.

Saying, Behold, there came men in hither to-night.] In the evening, which was the most proper time to come into the city undiscovered, because then the people, whose business lay out of the city, were generally going home to their own houses.

Of the children of Israel.] As they judged by their habit, or language, or aspect.

To search out the country.] For they could not think they came for any other end.

Ver. 3. And the king of Jericho sent unto Rahab, saying, Bring forth the men that are come to thee, which entered into thy house: for they be come to search out all the country.] He sent some officers with a warrant to apprehend them, and to require her to deliver them up into their hands, as enemies of their country.

Ver. 4. And the woman took the two men, and hid them.] Or rather had hidden them before the officers came; having heard, it is likely, a rumour that they were discovered, and search would be made for them.

And said thus, There came men unto me, but I wist not whence they were.] She could not deny that she received such strange guests, but would not own that she knew from what country they came; nor was it her business to make such inquiry, her house being open unto all.

Ver. 5. And it came to pass, about the time of shutting of the gate.] The gate of the city, next to her house, which was wont to be shut (as they are now in all well-governed cities) at a certain hour.

When it was dark.] And consequently few or none stirring in the streets.

The men went out; whither they went I wot not.] She would have them think they went both out of the house and out of the city; though she knew not which way they went, it being dark.

Pursue after them quickly; for ye shall overtake them.] Yet it was so little a while since they went out, that she would have them believe they could not, if they made haste, but overtake them before they got over Jordan. For if they were Israelites, it might be certainly concluded they went that way. Nobody can say that Rahab did not tell an untruth; but this may be said in her excuse: that it is no wonder if she thought it lawful, if not necessary, so to do, for the saving of the life of innocent men. Since several great philosophers have been of that opinion, and some of the ancient fathers of the church; particularly St. Austin confesses it to be a very difficult question, cap. xv. ad Consentinum: and Arius Montanus upon this very place, makes it one's duty to elude those who we think intend to do mischief to others: which he pretends to justify by many examples, in a discourse concerning Men's true and certain Duties. But that is too bold an undertaking; since the fathers before St. Austin, and all the Jews, condemn this practice.

Ver. 6. But she brought them up, &c.] Or rather, she had brought them up to the roof of the house. Which was made flat, so that men might lie or walk upon it in those countries. (See Deut. xxii. 8.)

And hid them with the stalks of flax, which she had laid in order upon the roof.] Covered them all over with the stalks of flax, which I suppose were newly cut, and laid upon the roof of the house to be dried by the sun, till they were fit to be peeled. Or, as some think, these were stalks of flax cut the year before; and made use of now to shew that nobody was gone upon the roof, where she laid them.

Ver. 7. And the men pursued after them the way to Jordan, unto the fords.] Where Jordan was so shallow that men might wade, or so narrow that they might soon swim over it. There the pursuers lay three days, waiting to catch them in their return.

And as soon as they which pursued them were gone out, they shut the gate.] Which, being opened to let the pursuers out, was immediately shut again; that if the spies lurked in the city, they might not escape in the dark; and that no other person might enter, who they might possibly think lay watching an opportunity to get in.

Ver. 8. And, before they were laid down.] To compose themselves to sleep; which after their journey they might be glad to take any where.

She came up unto them upon the roof.] To bring them down, it is likely, to a more commodious lodging.

Ver. 9. And she said unto the men, I know that the Lord hath given you the land.] Wonder not that I have taken such care of your preservation; for I believe in the Lord as you do, and know that he hath bestowed this country upon you for your possession.

And that your terror is fallen upon us, and that all the inhabitants of the land faint because of you.] She was the more confident of their success; because she observed the people of the land were struck with such a dread of them, as not to be able to defend their country against them. (See Deut. xi. 25.)

Ver. 10. For we have heard how the Lord dried up the water of the Red Sea for you, when you came out of Egypt.] And there overthrew Pharaoh and his host, after he had smitten him and his country with divers miraculous plagues. The report of which was come to them, as well as their passing through the sea: which, though it was forty years ago, was remembered with astonishment.

And what you did unto the two kings of the Amorites that were on the other side Jordan, Sihon and Og, whom ye utterly destroyed.] This was a thing of fresh memory, and could not but strike them with consternation; these two kings being very potent; and their near neighbours and allies. For they were part of the Amorites, who dwelt in the mountainous parts of this country; as was before observed.

Ver. 11. And as soon as we heard these things.] As Moses prophesied they would, (Exod. xv. 14, 15.)

Our hearts did melt.] The same phrase in Deut. i. 28. where we translate it discouraged; and so it is here explained in the next words.

Neither did there remain any more courage in any man because of you.] The most valiant among them were utterly disheartened.

For the Lord your God, he is God in heaven above, and in the earth beneath.] This is a plain confession of the true God, the creator of heaven and earth; wherein he rules and governs all things according to his pleasure. This is her faith celebrated by the apostle to the Hebrews, which moved her to entertain the spies, and to preserve them with the danger of her own life, if she had been discovered.

Ver. 12. Now therefore, I pray you, swear unto me by the Lord.] The Targum hath it, by the Word of the Lord. An oath was the greatest security that could be desired for the performance of what they promised. For all nations expected grievous punishments would fall upon perjured persons; which they that feared the Lord, the true God, above all men dreaded. (See Selden, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 11. n. 4.)

Since I have shewed you kindness.] As they could not but acknowledge.

That ye will also shew kindness to my father's house, and give me a true token.] She asked two things of them; first, that she and her whole family might be preserved, as she had preserved them; and then, that they would give her such a token, as should not fail her; but upon the sight of it, the Israelites should abstain from doing them any hurt.

Ver. 13. And that you will save alive my father and my mother, and my brethren, and my sisters.] This is a particular explication of what she meant by her father's house, in the foregoing verse; and shews that she had no husband, nor children.

And all they have, &c.] All her kindred, as we translate it, vi. 23. Or the children of her brethren and sisters: or, perhaps, all their cattle, that they could bring with them into her house.

Ver. 14. And the men answered her, Our life for yours.] They sware to her (it appears from ver. 17.) and wished they might perish, if they did not preserve her and her family. For they did not doubt but Joshua would ratify what they promised; though without his authority, for the public good and safety.

If ye utter not.] Do not divulge or declare to any one.

This our business.] In the Hebrew, this our word; i. e. this agreement they had made with her. Lest others should shelter themselves under her roof, or use that token they intended to give her; and thereby secure themselves from destruction. In this they shewed great prudence and management; taking care that their gratitude might not prove an obstruction to the public justice.

And it shall be, when the Lord hath given us the land, that we will deal kindly and truly with thee.] Upon this condition, they promise, when they had taken Jericho, (for that is here meant by the land, ver. 1.) they would keep their word faithfully with her, and be as kind to her as she had been to them.

Ver. 15. Then she let them down by a cord, through the window.] Which in those countries were large, as appears by the story of Jezebel, whom her eunuchs threw down out of a window, 2 Kings ix. 30. 33.

For her house was upon the town-wall.] Both the time (which was in the night) and the place were very commodious to contrive their escape; because her house was adjoining to the wall of the city.

And she dwelt upon the wall.] I take the meaning to be, that the apartment she reserved for herself was next to the wall, and built upon it; the rest of her house towards the street being kept for strangers. This gave her the fair opportunity, without any noise, to let them down.

Ver. 16. And she said unto them, Get ye to the mountain, lest the pursuers meet you.] This was prudent advice, not to go towards Jordan presently, but first to one of the mountains, wherewith the plain of Jericho was surrounded, as Josephus tells us: (lib. i. de Bello Judaico, cap. 12, 13. and lib. v. cap. 4.) and the Scripture itself informs us as much, 2 Kings ii. 15, 16.

Digitized by Microsoft®

And hide yourselves there.] In some of the caves, which were frequent in the mountains.

Three days.] For so long she thought the pursuers might stay about Jordan, waiting for their return.

Until the pursuers be returned; and afterward may ye go your way.] Which she thought probably would be within that time; and perhaps she understood their orders were to stay no longer.

Ver. 17. And the men said unto her.] As she was about to let them down; for it was not safe to have this discourse together after they were down; which might have been overheard by the watch.

We will be blameless of this thy oath which thou hast made us to swear.] The meaning is, that it should not be their fault if their oath was not kept; and therefore they now name the token, upon which the preservation of her family should depend; with some other conditions that were reasonable to be observed. Which they mention, to shew how studious they were not to be guilty of violating their oath.

Ver. 18. Behold, when we come into the land, thou shalt bind this line of scarlet thread.] It is called a cord before, ver. 15. and no doubt consisted of so many threads twisted together, as made it a line strong enough to hold the weight of a man's body, and not break. But there are those who doubt whether the Hebrew word scheni signify any thing of the colour, but only a twined or twisted cord, funiculum conduplicatum, or contortum; from shanah to double. (See Gataker in his Miscellanea, cap. 40.)

In the window which thou hast let us down by.] Or rather, dost let us down by. For she was about to do it, but had not done it, when they had this discourse with her. Some refer this to the window at which she let them out; but it is most natural to refer it to the line. For by that they were let down; and it was to remain in the window, that the Israelites might see it, as the token that that was the house which was to be saved. Procopius Gazæus compares this scarlet line with the blood which Moses ordered to be struck upon the side-posts of their doors, which was a token they should be preserved, (Exod. xii. 7. 13.)

And thou shalt bring thy father, and thy mother, and thy brethren, and all thy father's household home to thee.] That is, all their children; and perhaps near relations, such as uncles, aunts, and cousins; as we seem to understand it, vi. 23. And one cannot but think, that great-grandfathers and grandmothers, if she had any alive, were comprehended in these words.

Ver. 19. And it shall be, that whosoever shall go out of the door of thy house into the street, his blood shall be on his head, and we will be guiltless.] They would be bound to preserve none but those who kept in the house. Which was but reasonable, for they did not know how to distinguish them from others, if they were in the street.

And whosoever shall be with thee in the house, his blood shall be on our head, if any hand be upon him.] They would as soon die themselves, as let any of those perish. An emblem of our safety and salvation, by continuing constantly in the church in faith and holiness. For her house was a very fit figure of the church, especially of the gentiles; who, like her, had gone a whoring after idols, but were converted to serve the living God.

Ver. 20. And if thou utter this our business, then we will be quit of the oath which thou hast made us to swear.] They repeat the condition mentioned ver. 14. as of great importance. (See there.)

Ver. 21. And she said, According to your word, so be it.] She agreed to all the conditions they imposed upon her.

And she sent them away, and they departed.] After this mutual agreement, confirmed with an oath.

And she bound the scarlet line in the window.] Immediately, as some think; that the spies might know where to look for it hereafter, and that she might have always before her eyes such a comfortable pledge of her safety. It was more prudent also, as Arius Montanus observes, to do it now, than when the Israelites came to besiege the place; for that novelty might have made the people of Jericho suspect some correspondence.

Ver. 22. And they went, and came unto the mountain, and abode there three days, until the pursuers were returned.] Being furnished, it is likely, with sufficient provision by Rahab. Many think they stayed there but one whole day, and part of other two, which, according to the style of the Scripture, may be called three days: but their only reason for it is to make these three days, and those mentioned in the first chapter, ver. 11. to be the same, which is not probable.

And the pursuers sought them throughout all the way, &c.] Which led to the fords of Jordan. This expresses their diligence, though it wanted success; and, perhaps, there were more ways than one that led thither; in all which they placed themselves, or some other persons, to watch for them.

Ver. 23. So the two men returned, and descended from the mountain.] From whence, perhaps, they could see when the pursuers came back; or they had some intelligence of their return; or, as I said before, that they had commission only to search for them three days.

And passed over.] The river Jordan.

And came to Joshua the son of Nun, and told him all things that befel them.] Since they left him. This shews that Joshua sent them so privately, that it was unknown to the people, (as I expounded, ver. 1.) for they give him alone an account of what had happened unto them. (See vi. 17.)

Ver. 24. And they said unto Joshua, Truly the Lord hath delivered into our hands all the land: for even all the inhabitants of the country do faint because of us.] This was part of what they had learned from Rahab, (ver. 9, &c.) who had strengthened their faith by her own.

CHAP. III.

Ver. 1. AND Joshua rose early in the morning.] The next morning after he had commanded the officers to warn the host to prepare for their removal, (chap. i. 10, 11.)

And they removed from Shittim.] Where they had lain now above two months; for they came hither on the first day of the eleventh month of the fortieth year after they came out of Egypt. (See Deut. i. 3.)

And came to Jordan, he and all the children of Israel.] Which river, as Josephus tells us, was sixty stadia from Shittim; but it is so uncertain what his stadia or furlongs were, that one can only guess how many of our miles threescore of them made. Most think about seven.

And lodged there before they passed over.] The Hebrew word jalinu doth not necessarily signify that they lodged there only one night, for it often denotes a longer time of abode; and, therefore, the Vulgar Latin translates it morati sunt, they stayed there; viz. three days, as it follows in the next verse.

Ver. 2. And it came to pass, after three days, that the officers went through the host.] In the end of the three days beforementioned, (chap. i. 10, 11.) he sent the same officers there mentioned to make a new proclamation; for it seems to me most reasonable to take all this story in the order wherein it is related, only supposing the spies to have been sent before the first proclamation made by the officers (as I observed, ii. 1. the words may be translated). And thus our great primate of Ireland understands it: After Joshua was confirmed in his office, (chap. i. ver. 1, 2, &c.) he sent out the spies, and then commanding the people to provide themselves victuals, he marched from Shittim to Jordan; and the third day (after that command to provide themselves victuals) he gave a new command to prepare themselves to pass over Jordan the next day.

Ver. 3. And they commanded the people.] By order from Joshua, and in his name and authority.

Saying, When ye see the ark of the covenant of the Lord your God, and the priests the Levites bearing it.] "Hitherto (saith Kimchi, upon this place) the Levites (that is, the children of Kohath) carried the ark; but now the priests are appointed to that office, for the greater sanctification or honour of it, and because of the miracle which was to be wrought before it. Our rabbins say, that the priests carried it thus three times; now in this place, and when they compassed Jericho, and when Zadok and Abiathar brought it back to Jerusalem, when David fled from Absalom," (2 Sam. xv. 29.) Unto which he adds a fourth, when it was brought into the temple which Solomon built; for the Levites were not permitted to go into the sanctuary, much less into the most holy place, into which it was carried by the priests, (1 Kings viii. 6.)

Then ye shall remove from your place, and go after it.] By this it appears the ark was carried in the front of them; whereas usually it was ordered to be carried in the middle of their camps, as we read Numb. ii. 17. But at their first removal from Mount Sinai, which was a time extraordinary, it marched before them for three days, (Numb. x. 33.) and so it did now (and at no other time), when they were to enter into Canaan, for a special reason also, as I shall observe on the next verse. Concerning the phrase the priests the Levites, see Deut. xvii. 9.

Ver. 4. Yet there shall be a space between you and it, about two thousand cubits.] This is a demonstration that it was not usual for the ark to go before the whole army; for if it had, there would have been no need to instruct them at what distance they should keep from it, which would have been constantly observed.

By measure.] It is likely they measured the distance by a line, at which the people were at first set; and then walking in equal paces with the priests, kept at the same distance, though, perhaps, not precisely; for they might chance to move a pace or two faster, or take larger paces; and therefore he saith about two thousand cubits.

That ye may know the way by which ye must go.] There was the very same reason for the ark's going before them now, that there was when they came from Mount Sinai; for then it was to search out a resting-place for them; i. e. to shew them where they should rest; and now it was to lead them in the way they were to march, unto their long-expected settlement in the promised land. If it had not been for this, it would have been carried in its usual place; but the pillar of the cloud, which hitherto conducted them, having now left them, as R. Solomon observes, this supplied its place, and went before them, as that had been wont to do.

For ye have not passed this way heretofore.] They were to be led in an untrodden path, which the power of God (of whose presence with them the ark was the symbol) made for them.

Ver. 5. And Joshua said unto the people.] The night before they went over Jordan, as appears by the latter part of the verse; and, perhaps, he spake this himself, at the head of every one of their tribes, it being of great importance.

Sanctify yourselves.] Other places tell us what was their usual sanctification. (See Exod. xix. 10, 11. Numb. xi. 18.) But, besides the legal purifications, one cannot but think that he intended they should dispose their minds by holy meditations and prayer to God to receive his benefits, and to be more sensible of them when they were bestowed on them.

For to-morrow the Lord will do wonders among you.] Which he would have them be in a condition to observe, and to lay to heart; and, in order thereunto, prepare themselves by serious thoughts of God, and of his providence, as well as by washing their bodies, and abstaining from their wives, which were a part of the sanctification here intended.

Ver. 6. And Joshua spake unto the priests.] The next morning.

Saying, Take up the ark of the covenant.] Upon their shoulders, for so it was to be carried, (Numb. vii. 9.)

And pass over before the people.] This precept had been unnecessary, if they had been wont to carry it before the people.

And they took up the ark of the covenant, and went before the people.] After Joshua had spoken what follows, ver. 7, 8, &c. But it is mentioned now to shew the readiness of the priests, as well as of the people, to obey the commands of Joshua; whom they looked upon as a prophet, as Moses was, who had power to give extraordinary orders from God. Such were these for the priests to carry the ark, and to march with it before the people, not in the midst of their camps.

Ver. 7. And the Lord said unto Joshua.] By an audible voice, I suppose, from the sanctuary, near unto which he now was; the priests being about to take out the ark from thence, to carry it before the people.

This day.] The tenth day of the first month, on which the paschal lamb was, by the law, to be set apart, to be offered four days after, (Exod. xii. 3.)

Will I begin to magnify thee in the sight of all Israel.] By doing such wonders before them all, as should convince them Joshua was appointed by God to be their supreme governor, who should give them possession of the land of Canaan. (See iv. 14.)

That they may know that, as I was with Moses, so I will be with thee.] See i. 5. From the time of Moses to the days of Saul, God declared, by some extraordinary things, whom he would have to be the supreme governor of his people, whose authority he established by doing wonders.

Ver. 8. And thou shalt command the priests that bear the ark of the covenant, saying.] Every thing was done by his order, that it might appear he was powerful with God, who wrought those wonders at his word.

When ye are come to the brink of the water of Jordan.] Jordan then overflowed beyond its banks; therefore they were not to go to the brink of the river, but of the water.

Ye shall stand still in Jordan.] And there stop till the waters above were suspended, and those below run away; and then they went and stood in the midst of the river, (ver. 17.)

Ver. 9. And Joshua said unto the children of Israel, Come hither.] To the sanctuary, I suppose, where he now was, (ver. 7.)

And hear the words of the Lord your God.] Which Joshua reported to them from God, who was about to demonstrate himself to be the omnipotent Lord of all creatures, and in a peculiar manner their God, in covenant with them, and full of kindness to them.

Ver. 10. And Joshua said, Hereby ye shall know that the living God is among you.] These are the words of the Lord their God, who is called the living God, in opposition to the idols of the heathen; who could do nothing, much less such miracles as demonstrated the God of Israel to be the eternal Lord of heaven and earth, who giveth life to all things; and he is said to be among them (or in the midst of them) whom he takes into his protection, to defend and preserve them from all evil.

And that he will without fail drive out from before you.] Most certainly make good his promise made to Abraham long ago, (Gen. xv. 18, &c.) because he lives for ever to perform his word.

The Canaanites, and the Hittites, and the Hivites, and the Perizzites, and the Girgashites, and the Amorites, and the Jebusites.] Here all the seven nations are mentioned, (as they are Deut. vii. 1.) though sometimes only six of them are mentioned, the Girgashites being omitted. (See Exod. iii. 17.)

Ver. 11. Behold, the ark of the covenant.] So called, because in it were the two tables of the covenant between God and them. It is frequently called the ark of the testimony, (Exod. xl. 20, 21. Numb. iv. 5. and here in this book, iv. 16.)

Of the Lord of the whole earth passeth before you.] To take possession of the land of Canaan, which he gave them as Lord of the whole earth, and as particularly engaged by his covenant to bestow upon them. The author of the book Cosri understands this, as if the ark of the covenant was called the Lord of the whole earth; because God was so present with it, that where the ark was, there were wonders wrought, which ceased in its absence. (Par. iv. sect. 3.) D. Kimchi and Jos. Albo say the same; and I find Andreas Masius following this fancy; because there is an accent after the ark of the covenant, distinguishing those words from what follows, which (say they) are therefore added by apposition. But Bonfrerius hath confuted this very judiciously, observing, that the accent is not of that nature; and, therefore, the LXX. the Chaldee, Vulgar Latin, Symmachus, Aquila, the Syriac, and Arabic, translate it as we do, the ark of the covenant of the Lord of the whole earth. (See Buxtorf, de Arca, cap. 1.) And yet, I know not how it came to pass, some have been so bold as to alter our translation in some printed copies, which I have met withal, where these words are thus translated, the ark of the covenant, even the Lord of the whole earth.

Into Jordan.] By which miracle they were confirmed in their belief of his promise, when they saw the waters of Jordan flee before him.

Ver. 12. Now therefore take ye twelve men out of the tribes of Israel.] To do what he should command them, (iv. 2, &c.)

Out of every tribe a man.] The tribe of Levi was one of the twelve, upon all accounts but only in the dividing of the land: Ephraim and Manasseh being but one, viz. the tribe of Joseph.

Ver. 13. And it shall come to pass, as soon as the soles of the feet of the priests that bear the ark of the Lord, the Lord of the whole earth.] Here the ark of the covenant is called the ark of Jehovah (not Jehovah), who is the Lord, or governor and ruler of the whole earth: in which is comprehended the sea, and the rivers, and all waters, which he commandeth as he pleaseth.

Shall rest in the waters of Jordan.] Dip their feet in the brim of the waters, as it is explained ver. 15.

That the waters of Jordan shall be cut off from the waters that come down from above.] The waters which now ran in one stream, were divided over against the place where the priests trod; so that the lower part of them ran down the channel towards the Dead Sea; and those above not coming down to supply their place, the ground was left dry.

And they shall stand on a heap.] viz. The waters above, towards the head or springs of the river, were made to stand still, as if they were congealed; rising in a heap, piled one upon another, but not running down at all.

Ver. 14. And it came to pass, when the people removed from their tents to pass over Jordan, and the priests bearing the ark of the covenant before the people.] The priests moved first, and then the people followed them, at such a distance as Joshua had prescribed, (ver. 3, 4.)

Ver. 15. And as they that bare the ark of the covenant were come unto Jordan, and the feet of the priests that bare the ark were dipped in the brim of the water.] Which had overflown, as it here follows, beyond the bounds of the channel.

For Jordan overfloweth all his banks at the time of harvest.] This is meant of barley-harvest; which began about the Passover, as many have observed; and particularly Hermannus Conringius, in his book De Initio anni Sabbatici. (See upon Deut. xvi. 9.) And it appears by the next chapter, (iv. 19.) that it was in the first month, or the month Abib, when the Passover was to be kept; and therefore must signify that harvest. (See also 1 Chron. xii. 15.) This was likewise a time when the river was more likely to overflow than in wheat-harvest; because now the snow began to melt that was in the neighbouring mountains, especially in Lebanon; at the foot of which was the fountain of Jordan. By which the river was always swollen at this time, and thereby the miracle increased. Such overflowings of other rivers, greater than this, are observed by authors, at certain seasons; with which I shall not trouble the reader.

Ver. 16. And the waters, which came down from above, stood.] Stopped, and ran no farther; but were driven back unto those that were coming down.

And rose up upon a heap.] Instead of flowing down the channel, were lifted up into the air; and appeared like a mountain, as the Vulgar Latin translates it.

Very far from the city Adam.] At a great distance from a city then called Adam, which lay upon the river.

That is beside Zaretan.] The former was a small city, and therefore its situation is described by a place of greater note called Zaretan, which lay on one side of it, in the plain of Jordan, as we read 1 Kings vii. 46.

And those that came down towards the sea of the plain, even the salt sea, failed, and were cut off.] Those waters of the river, which were below, towards the salt sea, into which Jordan emptied itself, ran all thither, and so left the channel perfectly dry, that the people might pass over, which they did, directly over against Jericho.

And the people passed over right against Jericho.] Having that famous city in their view; from whence, perhaps, the people on the walls might, with amazement, see the Israelites walk through the river on dry ground. It was a great refreshment also to the Israelites after their march, to pitch their tents in so goodly a plain as this before Jericho.

Ver. 17. And the priests, that bare the ark of the covenant of the Lord, stood firm on dry ground, in the midst of Jordan.] In one and the same place and posture, with their faces towards Jericho.

And all the Israelites passed over on dry ground.] Keeping, I suppose, the same distance, of two thousand cubits from the ark; for there was room enough on either side to march by it, and not come near it.

Until all the people were passed clean over Jordan.] Which they could not do in a short time, unless we suppose them to have marched all in a-breast, which is not likely. For there was a certain place called, ever after, by the name of Bethabara, to preserve the memory of their passing over there; which is mentioned John i. 28. It made, therefore, the faith and constancy of the priests very remarkable, who remained so long in the middle of the river, till the whole multitude were got over, without fear of that great mountain of waters from above coming tumbling down upon them.

They who look upon this part of the Divine history as improbable, if not incredible, should consider, what a shame it is to have less faith than the heathens: who, lest their gods should be thought less powerful than the God of Israel, forged those stories which the Persians tell of Zoroaster's passing over rivers; and the Greeks of Inachus dried up by Neptune; and other such-like; which Huetius hath collected in his Quæstiones Alnetanæ, lib. ii. cap. 12. n. 15. Why then do they call in question the power of the true God; who, either by himself, or by his angels, could easily stop the course of a river which he himself made; and both make the waters rise up in a heap, as high as he pleased; and also stand so reared up, in a firm hardness, as if they had been congealed?

CHAP. IV.

Ver. 1. AND it came to pass, when all the people were clean passed over Jordan, that the Lord spake unto Joshua, saying.] It is likely he went to return thanks unto God for so wonderful a mercy; and then God spake to him what follows:

Ver. 2. Take you twelve men out of the people, out of every tribe a man.] He bids him now call together the twelve men formerly chosen, iii. 12.

Ver. 3. And command you them.] I suppose Joshua had some of the elders, or heads of the tribes, that joined with him in this office.

Saying, Take you hence out of the midst of Jordan.] Which continued perfectly dry for some space after they were all gone over; that is, till the priests removed from thence.

Out of the place where the priests' feet stood firm, twelve stones.] Some understand this so precisely, as if they were to take them from under the very soles of the priests' feet, which is not probable; but only near to the place where they stood. For the priests did not stir a step from the place where they first stood; and therefore none can tell how they should take these stones from under their feet, and place others in their room, (ver. 9.) while they remained standing fixed in the same place.

And ye shall carry them over with you.] In the sight of all the people, to make the miracle more known among them all.

And leave them in the lodging-place where you shall lodge this night.] As a monument of this miraculous work of God; which remained ever after in Gilgal; the place where they lodged that night, ver. 19, 20.

Ver. 4. Then Joshua called the twelve men whom he had prepared, &c.] Before they passed over Jordan, (iii. 12.)

Ver. 5. And Joshua said unto them, Pass over before the ark of the Lord God into the midst of Jordan.] This is a Divine order to go back again into the river, to the very place where the priests stood with the ark; by which these twelve men were dispensed withal, to come nearer to the ark than the rest of the congregation.

And take ye up every man a stone upon his shoulder.] Great stones, as big as they could well lift and carry. So the Hebrew word imports, ver. 3.

According unto the number of the tribes of the children of Israel.] That they might publish in every tribe this evident testimony of the power of God; which laid the bottom of the river dry for so long a time, that they not only all went over on dry ground, but some of them returned again, and took up these stones, and laid others in their room, (ver. 9.)

Ver. 6. That this may be a sign unto you.] A token of what God had now done for them.

That when your children ask their fathers in time to come, saying, What mean these stones?] It was natural for men, in future ages, seeing great stones (in a place, perhaps, where there were no more), and just twelve of them, laid together, or one upon another, to ask how they came there, and for what end they were brought thither, and by whom.

Ver. 7. Then shall ye answer them, That the waters of Jordan were cut off, before the ark of the covenant of the Lord; when it passed over Jordan, the waters of Jordan were cut off.] This was to give them occasion to report, at large, what God had done for them at their entrance into Canaan; that their posterity might be affected with it, no less than themselves.

And these stones shall be for a memorial to the children of Israel for ever.] To keep in memory this miracle in all ages to come, as long as this nation lasted. All people have been wont to erect monuments of stone to preserve the memory of covenants or victories, or other great things. And though there was no inscription upon these stones, yet the number of them, and the place where they lay, which was not stony, was sufficient to signify some memorable thing; which, upon inquiry, would be made known to those that saw and observed them.

Ver. 8. And the children of Israel did so as Joshua commanded, &c.] That is, the twelve men did according to his order, both in taking up the stones and carrying them to the place where they lodged.

And laid them down there.] Which, perhaps, were erected into a kind of pillar, that they might look like a monument of something done thereabout. Or, they were so placed, as to be so many little monuments of God's mercy. (See ver. 20.)

Ver. 9. And Joshua set up twelve stones in the midst of Jordan, in the place where the feet of the priests that bare the covenant stood.] This renders it probable, that the other twelve stones taken out of Jordan were set up in Gilgal, as these, taken out of some of the fields thereabouts, were erected in the midst of the river, to testify to all posterity their miraculous passage over it at this place.

And they are there unto this day.] From hence, not only such men as Mr. Hobbes, but Masius, and Grotius, and divers others, have argued, that this book was not written by Joshua, but by some person who lived at a great distance from his time, as these words, they fancy, import. But this is a mere fancy; for if Joshua wrote this book in his old age, or, at least, then added his last hand to it (as it is probable he did), he might as well use these words as one that lived a hundred years after. And, at this rate of arguing (as Huetius observes), Moses must not be the author of the book of Deuteronomy, (where he speaks in the same style, x. 5. xi. 4.) nor St. Matthew the author of the gospel, which he wrote not many years after our Saviour's death; who uses the very same words, xxvii. 8. xxviii. 21. (See Demonstr. Evang. propos. iv. cap. 24.)

Ver. 10. For the priests that bare the ark stood in the midst of Jordan.] It is remarkable in this whole relation, that when the priests are mentioned, these words are still added, that bare the ark, or, the ark of the covenant, (both in this chapter, ver. 9. 16. 18. and in the foregoing, ver. 13—15. 17.) to shew that this miracle was not to be ascribed to them, but to the power of the Lord, unto whom they ministered.

Until every thing was finished that the Lord commanded Joshua to speak unto the people.] Concerning the taking up of the twelve stones, and placing others in their room; and all that preceded concerning their passing over the river; which, it is likely, he exhorted them to do cheerfully.

According to all that Moses commanded Joshua.] We do not read that Moses gave any particular directions about the foregoing matters; therefore the meaning is, that Joshua strenuously executed all that God ordered, as Moses had admonished him, Deut. iii. 28. and other places.

And the people hasted, and passed over.] This doth not refer to all the people, as if they went a swift pace over the river, out of fear of the waters overwhelming them (as some think), but to such as remained still behind the ark, to attend its motion. Who now seeing all that Joshua commanded was finished, made haste to get over the river, as their brethren had done before them. It is said, indeed, (ver. 1.) that when all the people were clean passed over, Joshua gave order about the twelve stones: but the meaning is, when the main body of the people were gone over: for it appears by the next verse, that they had not all entirely passed over until now.

Ver. 11. And it came to pass, that when all the people were clean passed over.] So that none were remaining in the plains of Moab, from whence they came.

That the ark of the Lord passed over, and the priests.] They who went first into the river came last out: it being by the power of the Lord, whose ark the priests bare, that the course of the river was stopped, and a way made for all the people to pass over.

In the presence of the people.] Who beheld the water standing still on a heap, while the ark was in the river; but come tumbling down when it was gone. Which demonstrated that it was God's presence with them, to which alone they owed this miraculous mercy.

Ver. 12. And the children of Reuben, and the children of Gad, and half the tribe of Manasseh, passed over armed before the children of Israel, as Moses spake unto them.] They were the first that passed over, (according to their engagement, Numb. xxxiii. 20, 21. 27. of which Joshua had put them in mind, i. 13.) ready to encounter any enemy that might have opposed their landing.

Ver. 13. About forty thousand, prepared for war.] Or, ready armed (as it is in the margin), and prepared to fight, in case they met with any opposition. It is observable, that in the last muster, made not long ago, of those that were fit for war, in their several tribes, there were above forty thousand in the tribe of Reuben alone; and above fifty thousand in that of Manasseh, (Numb. xxvi. 7. 34.) And therefore it is likely, Joshua picked out only this number of chosen men; and left all the rest to look after their families and flocks.

Passed over before the Lord unto battle.] Being passed over the river, they stood in battle array before the ark; at the distance, I suppose, of two thousand cubits.

In the plains of Jericho.] Where it might be supposed the people of Jericho would have encamped, to hinder their passage.

Ver. 14. On that day the Lord magnified Joshua in the sight of all Israel.] As he promised, iii. 7.

And they feared him, as they feared Moses, all the days of his life.] This wonder gained him the like respect and reverence, that the dividing the Red Sea did to Moses. (Exod. xiv. 31.)

Ver. 15. And the Lord spake unto Joshua, saying.] All this business was managed purely by the Divine direction.

Ver. 16. Command the priests that bear the ark of the testimony, that they come up out of Jordan.] The midst of which river, where they stood, being the lowest and deepest part of it, they are properly said to come up when they left that station.

Ver. 17. Joshua therefore commanded the priests, saying, Come ye up out of Jordan.] Where they waited for the Divine order, and did not stir till they received it.

Ver. 18. And it came to pass, when the priests that bare the ark of the covenant of the Lord were come up out of the river Jordan, and the soles of the priests' feet were lifted up unto the dry land.] Where the waters of Jordan, when it overflowed farthermost, were never wont to come.

That the waters of Jordan returned into their place.] The channel was filled again by the descent of the waters. Which for some time had stood heaped up, and could not stir; but now were let loose to keep their ancient course.

And overflowed all his banks, as they did before.] Which was done, it is likely, by a gradual descent of the water, and not by the tumbling down of that great heap all at once.

Ver. 19. And the people came out of Jordan on the tenth day of the first month.] In which month they came out of Egypt, upon the fifteenth day of it: so that there wanted just five days of forty years since their coming from thence.

And encamped in Gilgal.] A place very famous in after-times, because of their first encampment here; where they seem to have continued for several years, during the wars of Canaan. Here also they were circumcised (from whence the place had its name, ver. 9.) and kept the first Passover; the tabernacle and the ark remaining here, as long as the Israelites kept their station in this place. See ix. 6. x. 6. 43. xiv. 6. which was, I suppose, till the war was ended; and they had also begun to divide the land. (See xiv. 6.) After which the tabernacle was fixed in Shiloh: (xviii. 1. xxii. 9. 12.) though still Gilgal continued a famous place, as appears from Judg. ii. 1. 1 Sam. xi. 14, 15. xiii. 4, &c.

In the east border of Jericho.] That is, between Jordan which lay behind them, and Jericho which lay before them.

Ver. 20. And those twelve stones, which they took out of Jordan, did Joshua pitch in Gilgal.] We are not told in what form they were pitched; whether they remained single and distinct, or, as Josephus will have it, joined together in the form of an altar. It seems to agree best with the end and intention of them, if we conceive them to have been set down single, but in some order (suppose three in a row), representing, like so many little pillars, the twelve tribes of Israel; who passing over Jordan on dry ground, a man out of each tribe was ordered to bring a stone, and place them here, for a perpetual memorial (ver. 7.) of what God had done for them. For stones, every one knows (especially some sorts of them), are of a very durable nature, and therefore used by all nations in the monuments they have made to preserve the memory of persons and things. Insomuch, that if it be true which Procopius reports (in his second book de Bello Vandalico) concerning the two pillars erected by the Canaanites, who fled into Africa before the face of Joshua, with an inscription signifying their expulsion by him; I conclude it to have been done in imitation of these stones, whereby Joshua preserved the memory of the miraculous way which was opened to him, for their expulsion.

Ver. 21. And he spake unto the children of Israel, saying, When your children shall ask their fathers in time to come, saying, What mean these stones?] See ver. 6. where he had said this, at the time they took up the stones; and now repeats it, when they pitched them. For then he may be thought to have spoken only to the twelve men; but now to all the twelve tribes.

Ver. 22. And ye shall let your children know, saying, Israel came over this Jordan on dry land.] That it might not be left to every man's liberty to give what answer they pleased to their children, when they inquired the meaning of these stones, he sets down the very words they should speak unto them; that they might be sure to be duly instructed in the wonderful mercy of God to their nation.

Ver. 23. For the Lord your God dried up the waters of Jordan from before ye, until ye were passed over.] He would have posterity made sensible it was a Divine benefit bestowed on them by the Divine Power: which alone could stop the course of a river, till a whole nation passed over on dry ground.

As the Lord your God did to the Red Sea.] At the same time he would have them take occasion to remember them of another miraculous mercy, like unto this, though superior to it. Which the prophets, in after times, delighted to commemorate together, as appears from Psal. cxiv. 5.

Which he dried up before us, until we were gone over.] What he did for their forefathers he did for them, who reaped the happy fruit of it: just as the saving of Noah and his family in the ark was the saving of all mankind, who sprang from them.

Ver. 24. That all the people of the earth might know the hand of the Lord.] All nations round about, who heard of this, might be made sensible of the power of the God of Israel.

That it is mighty.] Which can do all things.

And that ye might fear the Lord your God for ever.] The people of Israel, especially (for whom these wonders were wrought), might religiously worship and serve him: for so the fear of God frequently signifies in Scripture: and therefore the LXX. here translate these words, ἵνα ὑμεῖς σέβησθε Κύριον τὸν Θεὸν ὑμῶν, that ye may worship the Lord your God; which includes in it all the duty owing to him. And so they translate the last words for ever, ἐν παντὶ ἔργῳ, every thing that you do.

CHAP. V.

Ver. 1. AND it came to pass, when all the kings of the Amorites.] These were the principal inhabitants, and the most valiant in all the country; as hath been formerly noted.

Which were on the side of Jordan westward.] This seems to be added, to shew, that, besides the two kings of the Amorites, Sihon and Og, whom they had already subdued on the other side of Jordan, eastward, there were other kings of the same nation on that side of Jordan, where the Israelites now were. And it is not improbable, that these kings commanded the Hittites, Hivites, and Jebusites, as well as the Amorites.

And all the kings of the Canaanites, which were by the sea.] i. e. The Mediterranean, where the people properly called Canaanites dwelt; though there were colonies of them spread in other places. The LXX. here call them βασιλεῖς της Φοινίκης, the kings of Phœnicia: for upon that sea were the principal cities of the ancient Phœnicians, viz. Tyre and Sidon. But though the people that lived upon the sea-coast were peculiarly called by this name of Phœnicians, yet they were so powerful, that the whole country was called χώρα τῶν Φοινίκων, the country of the Phœnicians; as the LXX. call the land of Canaan, ver. 12. of this chapter.

Heard that the Lord had dried up the waters of Jordan from before the children of Israel, until we were passed over.] This sounds like the language of Joshua, or of some other person then present, when this wonder was wrought; which astonished those that lived in the remotest parts of the country; who little thought of an invasion on that side (which, it is likely, made them not draw any forces that way), imagining the river, especially when it overflowed all its banks, was a sufficient security unto them on that frontier.

That their hearts melted; neither was there spirit in them any more, because of the children of Israel.] They quite lost their courage; which began to fail them before, as we read chap. ii. ver. 11. Or, as the LXX. expound it, their understanding failed them; and they were in such a consternation, that none knew what to advise for their safety. In which the providence of God is much to be observed, that, by this means, the Israelites were securely circumcised (as it here follows); whereas, if the people of Canaan had been courageous and watchful, they had taken them at a great advantage, if they had then fallen upon them; as appears by the story of the Shechemites, Gen. xxxiv. 25. They had leisure also, without any disturbance, to celebrate the Passover, (ver. 10.)

Ver. 2. At that time the Lord said unto Joshua.] The next day, which was the eleventh day of the first month; as our primate Usher and others judge most likely.

Make thee sharp knives.] Or, as it is in the margin of our Bibles, knives of flints: which stones were plentiful, it is likely, in the mountains thereabouts. And, after they had marched forty years in the wilderness, it is probable (as Theodoret notes) that they were not provided with such knives as we use, of iron. By the very words also of Joshua it appears he speaks of knives they were now to provide; and not of such as they had already. Nor is it strange such knives should be used, for they were common in the eastern countries, as may be gathered out of the Talmud, in the treatise of the Sabbath; where they say, in the killing of beasts, they use either a flint-stone (so they interpret the word tzur), or glass, or a quill. From whence Theodoric Hackspan concludes, that if sharp stones sufficed for the killing of beasts, there was no need of any other in circumcision. Who observes also, that the Jews say, they might circumcise with any instrument, made either of stone or glass, but not of a quill; because there was danger it might slit and hurt so tender a part. And at this day they do circumcise in the east with knives made of stones, such as Zipporah, it is supposed, used in the circumcision of her son, (Exod. iv. 25.) See this question debated in Sixtinus Amama's Antibarbarus, lib. ii. p. 282. Justin Martyr thinks there was some mystery in the use of these knives. (See his dialogue with Trypho, p. 341, 342.)

And circumcise again the children of Israel the second time.] This doth not signify that they who had been circumcised heretofore, were to be now circumcised again (from whence some have drawn an argument for the repeating of baptism, as St. Austin tells us), but that there had been such a general circumcision heretofore ordered, as there was to be now after a long omission of that rite. And it is probable that it was at Mount Sinai, in the first month of the second year after they came out of Egypt. When they kept a Passover on the fourteenth day of that month, (Numb. ix. 1—3.) and before they kept it, circumcised all that had not been circumcised in Egypt, or since they came out of it. For no uncircumcised person, nor any one who had a son, or a man-servant in his house uncircumcised, was capable to be admitted to it. We do not read, indeed, of the neglect of circumcision in Egypt, or in that year wherein they came out of it; but, considering the great oppression they lay under in that country, and the several distresses they were in, after their deliverance, for three months, till they came to Sinai; and the absence of Moses a long time after they came thither; it is very probable this rite was omitted, till God called upon them (as he did now) to celebrate the Passover; and then they were constrained to take care of it, because otherwise they could not have kept it. (See Selden, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 2. n. 1.)

Ver. 3. And Joshua made him sharp knives, and circumcised the children of Israel.] Ordered every one that wanted it to be circumcised; and, it is probable, not only all those that came over Jordan, but such of the Reubenites, Gadites, and Manassites, as were left on the other side, were circumcised also, and all in one day, that they might be in a condition to eat the passover: nor need it seem strange that it was dispatched in such a short time, for they might employ as many hands as they pleased in this work, there being no necessity that a priest or a Levite should do it, but it might be performed by their fathers or mothers, or any other person.

At the hill of the foreskins.] In the Hebrew, at Gibeah Naaraboth; which some take to be the name of the place where they were circumcised; but then that place was so called from the foreskins that were there thrown; which were so many, that being laid upon a heap and covered with earth, they made a little hillock, as the Jews conceive. (See Pirke Eliezer, cap. 29.)

Ver. 4. And this is the cause why Joshua did circumcise.] The reason of this order, and of the execution of it, is here given.

All the people that came out of Egypt, that were males, even all the men of war, died in the wilderness by the way, after they came out of Egypt.] That is, all that were then twenty years old, for such only were reputed men of war, and were guilty of the sedition mentioned in Numb. xiv. for which they were doomed to perish in the wilderness.

Ver. 5. Now all the people that came out were circumcised.] Not only those that died for their rebellion, but all the rest under twenty years old, were generally circumcised, except some infants, who (as I said upon ver. 2.) might have been neglected during their heavy oppression there.

But all the people that were born in the wilderness by the way as they came forth out of Egypt, them they had not circumcised.] Never since they removed from Mount Sinai, where it is likely there was a general circumcision, as there was now to be before their celebrating the Passover, which had not been kept since that time.

Ver. 6. For the children of Israel walked forty years in the wilderness, till all the people that were men of war, which came out of Egypt, were consumed, &c.] These words seem to give the reason why they were not circumcised, because they were in a wandering condition, while they remained in the wilderness, and did not know when the cloud would remove from the tabernacle to lead them to another place; which if it had done when children were newly circumcised, their lives might have been endangered by motion, while they were sore. This, a great many think, made Moses dispense with circumcision by God's direction. We do not find him, indeed, consulting God about it; but he was satisfied that God approved of this reason for the omission of it. R. Jose, as Mr. Selden observes, gives this account of the whole business: "The Israelites kept but one Passover all the time they were in the wilderness; the reason was, in that year (which was the next to that wherein they came out of Egypt) their tents were pitched in a place where they might safely circumcise the males that had been lately born, lest the neglect of it should hinder the legitimate eating of the passover. But in all the time following, wherein they wandered in the desert, they did not circumcise their children, because of their incommodious journeys, and the danger of circumcision by the way;" so that they could keep no more Passovers till they came to Canaan. This is a far better reason than what many of them give, who say circumcision was omitted, because the north wind never blew all the time they were in the wilderness; and wounds are very dangerous when it doth not blow. Whence their medical maxim mentioned in the Talmud: "In cloudy days, and when the east wind blows, we neither circumcise nor open a vein." (See Buxtorf. Synagog. Judaica, cap. 4.) But if this matter be well considered, we cannot rest satisfied with the foregoing reason; for all the time they were in the wilderness, children were born, and women lay in; and there was greater danger by their motion, while they were in labour, and when they were newly brought to bed, than there was in their children's being circumcised, who were sore but for a few days; whereas the others were not fit to go abroad, or to travel, in a great many. For which, and for several other reasons, Fortunatus Scacchus thinks this was not the cause why they were not circumcised during their travels in the wilderness; but the true reason was, that they did not look upon the precept of circumcision as obliging them, till they came to settle in the land of Canaan: for in the covenant which Moses made with them at Mount Sinai, there is nothing said about circumcision, unto which they were bound by the covenant made with Abraham, (as our Saviour observes, John vii. 21.) and that runs thus: "I will give unto thee, and unto thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger, &c. Thou shalt keep my covenant therefore, thou, and thy seed after thee, &c. Every man-child shall be circumcised," Gen. xvii. 8—10. (See Sacror. Elæochrysm. Myrothec. 2. cap. 54.)

Ver. 7. And their children, whom he raised up in their stead, them Joshua circumcised.] Now that they were come to their rest in the land of promise.

For they were uncircumcised, because they had not circumcised them by the way.] For the reason abovementioned: to which this may be added, that several great men (such as Theodoret and St. Jerome among the ancients) think that circumcision, being a note of distinction between the Israelites and other people, there was no need of it in the wilderness, when (as Cedrenus speaks) they were παντὸς ἀλλόγενους κεχωρισμένοι, separated from all strangers by the wilderness itself. Others think, that the mixed multitude of Egyptians, who, moved by the miracles they had seen done in their country, went out of it with the Israelites, and joined themselves to them, were the cause of this omission; for they could not presently incorporate with them by receiving circumcision; and therefore it was suspended, that these Egyptians might not look upon themselves as quite a different people: but longer than till they came to Canaan they would not have it discontinued, when all, Egyptians as well as Israelites, received it, that they might not be upbraided as a people of a different original. And as the omission of it in the desert made the proselytes who came out of Egypt equal with the Israelites, while they stayed there; so, as a most learned friend of mine (Dr. Alix) suggests to me, it shewed, that there was no absolute necessity of this rite, and that it could not be of eternal obligation.

Ver. 8. And it came to pass, when they had done circumcising all the people, that they abode in their places in the camp.] Lay still without motion (which would have hindered the healing of the sore), and had not the least disturbance given them by the people of Canaan.

Till they were whole.] Which they were against the Passover; for, reckoning the eleventh day for one, there were four days between their circumcision and the Passover, which was not kept till the fourteenth day at even, when the pain was pretty well over, for it was smartest on the third day. (See upon Gen. xxxiv. 25.)

Ver. 9. And the Lord said unto Joshua, This day have I rolled away the reproach of Egypt from off you.] It is commonly thought, that by the reproach of Egypt is meant nothing else but uncircumcision, with which the Israelites always reproached other people, particularly the Egyptians, among whom they had long dwelt, and with whom they were best acquainted. But our learned Dr. Spencer thinks the reproach of Egypt is the slavery to which they had been there long subject, but now were fully declared a free people by receiving the mark of the seed of Abraham, and made heirs of the promised land. This he very often repeats, lib. i. de Leg. Hebr. Ritual. cap. 4. p. 44. 51. 55. And no doubt Joshua now chose, immediately upon their entrance into the land of Canaan, to cause them to be circumcised, not only as a token they peculiarly belonged to him, but to oblige them to be careful to observe all the laws of God; many of which could not, and others were not observed in the wilderness, but were now to be regularly practised, because they held the land of Canaan by this tenure. To this purpose also Theodoret discourses, in his questions upon this book; They were made now lords of the promised land, who were lately slaves in Egypt; for they could not be the legitimate children of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and heirs of the promises made to them, till they were circumcised. Ralbag hath another notion of it; That the Egyptians seeing the Israelites wander so long as they did in the wilderness, reproached and flouted them, as if they were brought thither to be destroyed, and not to possess the land of Canaan; from which reproaches God now delivered them, when he assured them, by enjoining their circumcision, that they should shortly enjoy that country which God promised; but which no uncircumcised person might inherit: but the first is the plainest and most unconstrained sense.

Wherefore the name of the place is called Gilgal unto this day.] This was the first original of the name, which this place had ever after; for Galal, in Hebrew, from whence this word comes, signifies to remove, take away, or devolve. And so here the LXX. translate the word gallothi (I have rolled away) by ἀφεῖλον, and the Vulgar

Latin by abstuli (I have taken away); which makes it strange that Josephus should say (lib. v. Antiq. cap. 1.) that this word Gilgal signifies liberty, whom Theodoret follows; as if this place was so called, because now they found themselves perfectly freed from the Egyptians, and from all the troubles they endured in the wilderness.

Unto this day.] These words are alleged by some against Joshua's being the author of this book; to which an answer hath been given, iv. 9.

Ver. 10. And the children of Israel encamped in Gilgal.] Continued their camp there, as they were enjoined, ver. 8.

And kept the Passover.] Which was the second Passover that had been kept since its first institution, the first being observed the second year after their coming out of Egypt at Mount Sinai; after which it had been omitted thirty-nine years, because many of the people were uncircumcised.

On the fourteenth day of the month at even.] According to the command of God, (Exod. xii. 6.)

In the plains of Jericho.] Where the tabernacle was in the midst of their camp, unto which they brought their lamb, for it could be sacrificed no where else, (Deut. xvi. 2.) And therefore hither the Reubenites, and Gadites, and Manassites, on the other side Jordan, came to offer this sacrifice; which was easier for them, than it was in aftertimes to go up to Jerusalem.

Ver. 11. And they did eat the old corn of the land.] Which the people of the country had left in their barns when they fled into Jericho, and other strong holds.

The morrow after the Passover.] There is a great dispute among the Jews, whether this were the fifteenth day of the month, which was properly the next day after the Passover, or, as others take it, the sixteenth day, which was the solemn sabbath kept on the first day of unleavened bread, (Lev. xxiii. 10, 11.) when they were to wave the sheaf of the first-fruits before the Lord. The former are in the right.

Unleavened cakes.] That is, they kept the feast of unleavened bread, which was distinct from the Passover, as I observed, Exod. xii. 15, &c.

And parched corn on the self-same day.] This was new corn, which was growing that year they entered into Canaan, of which it was not lawful to eat, till they had offered the sheaf beforementioned, (Lev. xxiii. 14.) and therefore it is made an argument by some, that it was the sixteenth day of this month when this corn was parched.

Ver. 12. And the manna ceased on the morrow after they had eaten of the old corn of the land: neither had the children of Israel manna any more.] Because they had no need of it (as Kimchi and others interpret it), being supplied by the store of old corn which they found in the land of Canaan, and by what was growing upon the ground.

But they did eat of the fruit of the land of Canaan that year.] After they had offered the sheaf beforementioned, (Lev. xxiii. 11.) So that manna ceased on the sixteenth or seventeenth day of the first month, having continued with them forty years, wanting about a month. So R. Bechai truly interprets these words, (Exod. xvi. 35.) not to signify forty years complete, but near forty years; for it began to fall on the fifteenth day of the second month, and ceased on the sixteenth or seventeenth day of the first month of the fortieth year after they came out of Egypt; and therefore, to shew that they were not to expound those words, They did eat manna forty years, in a strict and precise sense, Moses immediately adds, until they came to a land inhabited;—they did eat manna until they came to the borders of the land of Canaan; which was exactly fulfilled, Gilgal being on the borders of the land, where it now ceased; but it continued till that time, though they came to a land inhabited, when they conquered the kingdoms of Sihon and Og.

Ver. 13. And it came to pass, when Joshua was by Jericho.] After he had performed these solemn rites of circumcision and the Passover, Joshua went to take a view of Jericho, and to observe, as generals are wont to do, the approaches to it.

That he lifted up his eyes and looked.] These words signify a sudden apparition of a person to him; for so this phrase is used, when something new and unexpected presents itself, as one is intent upon something else, (Gen. xviii. 1. Dan. x. 5.)

And, behold, there stood a man before him.] Whom he took to be a man.

With his sword drawn in his hand over against him.] He seemed to be a soldier, or rather a great commander, and stood directly opposite to him.

And Joshua went unto him.] Such was his undaunted courage, with which God had inspired him.

And said unto him, Art thou for us, or for our adversaries?] He demands of him, whether he came to help the Israelites, or the people of Canaan; for whom (it appears by the answer) Joshua suspected he came to fight.

Ver. 14. And he said, Nay.] i. e. I am not on the side of your adversaries.

But as captain (or prince) of the host of the Lord am I now come.] By the host of the Lord is here meant the whole body of the people of Israel, whom the Lord himself led forth out of Egypt, as his army, (see Exod. xii. 41.) and now appeared in this manner, that he might shew he would still conduct them, as their chief commander and leader, by whom they should be victorious over their enemies: for though many take this to have been a created angel (Michael, suppose, the chief of them), yet it is evident that Joshua did not think him so to be, for he fell down and worshipped him, as we read in the words following.

And Joshua fell on his face to the earth.] With the profoundest reverence.

And did worship.] Which he durst not have given (for God alone is to be adored), nor would an angel have received, without such a check as an angel gave St. John, (Rev. xxii. 10.) if he had not taken him to be the Divine Word that was come to fight for them. So the Chaldee paraphrase upon Josh. x. 42. "It was the Word of the Lord that fought for them," according to God's promise, i. 9. 17. This a most learned friend of mine (Dr. Alix) shews was the judgment of the ancient Jewish church, (see his late book on that argument, p. 234.) and it is most certain was the judgment of the ancient Christians, particularly of Justin Martyr, Eusebius, and Theodoret. (See Valesius in his Annotations upon Eusebius's Ecclesiastical History, lib. i. cap. 2. p. 7.) And therefore our great primate of Ireland fears not to say in his Annals, "Jesus Dominus noster, princeps militiæ patris sui, Jesu typico ad Jerichuntem gladio stricto apparens, promittit se populum defensurum;" that is, Jesus our Lord, the Prince of his Father's host, appearing to him who was a type of him at Jericho, with a drawn sword, promised to be the defender of the people: where he seems by the captain of the Lord's host to understand our Lord, who commands angels themselves; for they are sometimes called the host of heaven. (1 Kings xxii. 19. Luke ii. 13.) And it may very well be thought the meaning here.

And said unto him, What saith my Lord unto his servant?] Joshua was possessed of such a deep sense of the greatness of this person, that he humbly desires to receive his commands, and he would obey them.

Ver. 15. And the Captain of the Lord's host said unto Joshua, Loose thy shoe from off thy foot, for the place where thou standest is holy.] This is the fullest evidence that can be given of the Divinity of this person that appeared to him; who was so far from reproving him for doing him too much honour, that he commanded him to do much more; for that which he here requires, is the highest acknowledgment of a Divine presence that was used among the eastern nations, as the same Dr. Alix observes. And considering that these are the very same words which were spoken to Moses, Exod. iii. 2, 3. we learn the reason why God commanded this to Joshua; which was, for the strengthening of his faith, that as now he was placed in Moses's stead, so God would be with him, as he had been with Moses. And thus Joh. à Coch discourses very reasonably upon the Gemara of the Sanhedrin, cap. 6. n. 3. "This angel, who suffered himself to be worshipped, and by whose presence the place where he appeared was sanctified, so that Joshua was commanded to put off his shoes, no doubt was He whom all the angels in heaven worship."

And Joshua did so.] Put off his shoes, in token of reverence to that place; which was holy, while that Divine presence remained there, though not after it was gone: and it continued there for some space of time, to give Joshua advice, and to encourage him to hope for his protection and assistance; as appears from ver. 2. of the next chapter.

CHAP. VI.

Ver. 1. NOW Jericho was straitly shut up, because of the children of Israel.] The Targum understands it as if he spake of the strong fortifications of Jericho, which made it needful Joshua should be encouraged in his enterprise against it. But the words in the Hebrew are literally (as is noted in the margin of our Bibles) did shut up, and was shut up, which plainly relates to the strict guards which were kept, that none could get into the city, nor get out of it: so it is explained in the next words.

None went out, and none came in.] They shut up their gates so close, that none could go out to carry intelligence to Joshua; and they were blocked up so close by the Israelites (to which the latter part of the foregoing words may perhaps refer), that none could get in to bring any intelligence or relief to the inhabitants of Jericho.

Ver. 2. And the Lord said unto Joshua.] The same person speaks to him (all agree) who is called the Prince of the Lord's host in the foregoing chapter; and here is called Jehovah. Which shews he was not a created angel, but God himself; who alone could promise and perform what follows.

See, I have given into thy hand Jericho, and the king thereof, and the mighty men of valour.] Who were gathered together in this place out of several nations: it being a frontier city, which they made as strong as they were able, and defended by the most valiant men they had in the country. (See xxiv. 11.) For we are to suppose that they had refused the offers of peace, which God ordered to be first sent unto them, (Deut. xx. 10.) and, trusting to their forces, took up a desperate resolution not to yield upon any terms.

Ver. 3. And ye shall compass the city, all ye men of war, and go round the city once.] At such a distance, I suppose, that they could not reach them from the city, with their arrows or stones slung against them.

Thus shall ye do six days.] Once every of those days, in such order as is described, ver. 6—9. This looked not like making war; but appeared to the besieged, it is probable, as a pastime.

Ver. 4. And seven priests shall bear before the ark seven trumpets of rams' horns.] Such trumpets as they used to blow withal in the year of jubilee, (Lev. xxv. 9.) for so the phrase is in the Hebrew, trumpets of Jobel: and I have observed elsewhere, that rams' horns not being hollow, trumpets could not be made of them.

And the seventh day ye shall compass the city seven times.] The seventh day's march differed in two things from the other six; that they compassed it but once on other days, and made not the least noise, but now seven times, and made a great shout at the end of the last circuit. Concerning this number seven, see Drusius upon this place, and upon Lev. iv. 6. Grotius saith of it, in short, (upon 2 Chron. xxix. 21.) heptas sacris propria; the number seven is proper to sacred things: as appears by the seven angels and seven trumpets, (Rev. viii. 2.)

And the priests shall blow with the trumpets.] All the time they marched so often round the city. (See Tertullian, lib. ii. adv. Marcion, cap. 21.)

Ver. 5. And it shall come to pass, that when they make a long blast with the rams' horns.] A loud sound, protracted after a rustic manner, as Bochart interprets it in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 43.

And when ye hear the sound of the trumpet.] And were commanded by Joshua to shout, (ver. 16.)

All the people shall shout with a great shout.] Such as soldiers use when they make an onset upon a place, or when armies meet to give battle.

And the wall of the city shall fall down flat.] Or, fall under it, as it is in the Hebrew; which seems to signify, that the foundations of the wall were subverted, so that it sunk and fell into the ditch, or (as the Jews explain it) sunk into the very ground on which it stood, so as to leave no ruins, as in the common fall of walls; in which they suppose another miracle.

And the people shall ascend up every man straight before him.] The whole wall did not fall down, for Rahab's house stood, which was upon the wall, (ii. 15.) But such wide breaches were made every where round about, that the Israelites went straight forward, and found an easy entrance into this city, which the amazed inhabitants had no heart to defend; or rather, the whole wall sunk into the earth, only Rahab's house was left standing, which made the thing more remarkable. And thus God demonstrated, that it was his wonderful power which overthrew the city, against which they brought no engines nor battering rams, &c. ἀλλὰ μόνη φωνῇ σάλπιγγος κεραίνης, καὶ εὐχῇ δικαίου, &c. as Epiphanius speaks, Hæres. lxvi. n. 83.

Ver. 6. And Joshua the son of Nun called the priests, and said unto them, Take up the ark of the covenant.] This is the second time that the priests are ordered to carry the ark, which belonged to the office of the Kohathites. (See iii. 3.)

And let seven priests bear seven trumpets of rams' horns before the ark of the Lord.] As the Lord commanded, ver. 4.

Ver. 7. And he said unto the people, Pass on and compass the city, and let him that is armed pass before the ark of the Lord.] This explains ver. 3. where he seems to command only the men of war to compass the city. But the meaning is, that the whole body of the people should march in this circuit, the men of war going before the ark, and the rest of the people following it, as it is explained ver. 9.

Ver. 8. And it came to pass, when Joshua had spoken unto the people.] By the priests, as the LXX. understand it.

That the seven priests, bearing the seven trumpets of rams' horns, passed on before the Lord, and blew with the trumpets, and the ark of the covenant of the Lord followed them.] According to the direction given ver. 6.

Ver. 9. And the armed men went before the priests that blew with the trumpets.] Here the order of their march explains the command, ver. 7.

And the rear-ward came after the ark.] That is, the rest of the people who had no arms, old men, women, and children, came in the rear of the ark. Concerning the word measseph (which we translate rear-ward), see Numb. x. 23. From whence may be gathered, that by this rear-ward is meant the tribe of Dan; as the Targum, Rasi, and Kimchi, understand it; who by the armed men beforementioned, understand the Reubenites, Gadites, and Manassites, who were engaged by Moses to go "armed before the Lord to war," Numb. xxxii. 20. and renewed this engagement to Joshua, i. 12, &c.

The priests going on, and blowing with the trumpets.] The words priests is not in the Hebrew, which made the Vulgar to translate the words in such a manner as if the whole multitude beforementioned made a sound with trumpets, "Buccinis omnia concrepabant." But there being no order for any to blow with trumpets but only the priests, our translators have done well to supply that word from ver. 4. as they do also ver. 13. where this is again repeated.

Ver. 10. And Joshua had commanded the people, saying, Ye shall not shout, nor make any noise with your voice, neither shall any word proceed out of your mouth.] They were not to talk to one another as they went along, but march in a profound silence, before and after the Lord, waiting on him, to see what he would do for them.

Until the day I bid ye shout, then shall ye shout.] That is, on the seventh day, after they had compassed the city seven times.

Ver. 11. So the ark of the Lord compassed the city, going about it once.] It is uncertain upon what day they began to do this; but it is very probable (as the Jews say in their larger Chronicle) that it was the next day after the seven days of unleavened bread were ended.

And they came into the camp, and lodged in the camp.] They spent the rest of the day in the camp to refresh themselves, and lay there the following night.

Ver. 12. And Joshua rose up early in the morning.] viz. That morning of the first day of compassing the city.

And the priests took up the ark of the Lord.] These words, and those that follow in the next verse, give a particular account of what was done the first day, according to that which was said in general, ver. 8, 9.

Ver. 13. And the seven priests, bearing seven trumpets of rams' horns before the ark of the Lord, went on continually.] Without resting or making any stop, in a continued motion, till they had finished their circuit.

And blew with the trumpets.] As soon as they began their motion.

And the armed men went before them, but the rear-ward came after the ark, the priests going on, and blowing with the trumpets.] Till they had ended their circuit.

Ver. 14. And the second day they compassed the city once.] In the same order before described.

And returned into the camp.] As they had done the first day, (ver. 11.)

And so they did six days.] The remaining four days were spent in the same pompous show, without striking a stroke, or speaking a word, that the subversion of the city might be ascribed wholly to the power of God, which secretly undermined the walls, and threw them down.

Ver. 15. And it came to pass on the seventh day.] The Jewish writers say this was the sabbath, as Raymundus observes in his Pugio Fidei, and Jos. de Voysin in his Annotations upon him, p. 625. But I shall only mention the words of Kimchi, which are these: "The ark of the Lord compassed the city the first time, on the first day of the week: so our doctors, of pious memory, have delivered, that the seventh day whereon the city was taken was the sabbath, though they killed and burnt upon that day; for he that commanded the sabbath to be observed, commanded it now to be profaned for the destruction of Jericho, as he commanded burnt-offerings to be sacrificed on this day:" which is the very instance whereby our blessed Saviour justifies his doing some works upon the sabbath-day. And here I cannot but note, that it was Jehovah, according to this explication, who gave this command to compass the city on this day as well as any other. That great Lord who gave the command to keep the sabbath now dispensed with it: he that spake from Mount Sinai was the person who appeared to Joshua: for, whether this day was the sabbath or not, it is certain, one of the seven days wherein they were thus employed was the sabbath, and consequently their resting on that day was dispensed withal, by the same authority that made the law of the sabbath.

That he rose early about the dawning of the day.] All the six days, I suppose, they rose early, as they did upon the first; (ver. 12.) but upon this day, very early, as soon as they could see, because they had seven times as much work to do as they had upon the other days.

And compassed the city after the same manner seven times.] Not with a continued motion, I suppose, but resting awhile (perhaps after each circuit) to refresh themselves; otherwise, by such motion, they might have been dispirited, and unfit to attack Jericho, when the wall of it fell down before them.

Only on that day they compassed the city seven times.] For so the Lord ordered, ver. 4.

Ver. 16. And it came to pass at the seventh time.] As soon as they had ended the seventh circuit.

When the priests blew with the trumpets.] Such a long sound as is mentioned, ver. 5.

Joshua said unto the people.] By such officers as he had appointed to give the order, when they heard that unusual sound of the trumpet.

Shout.] In assured hope of victory, as it follows in the next words, for the Lord hath given you the city.

Ver. 17. And the city shall be accursed.] All the commands given in this, and in the two following verses, could not be delivered just before he bade them shout; but they had been given some time before they began to march the seventh time about the city. And if any thing of these matters was repeated now, it was very briefly, by bidding them remember the orders they had received concerning the city and all that was therein.

I have observed elsewhere, that this word cherem (which we translate accursed) signifies sometimes the gift itself, which is devoted to God for his uses, (Lev. xxvii. 24.) sometimes that which is devoted to perpetual destruction, by the right which God hath to punish capital enmities to him, as here in this place. And thus, Mr. Selden observes, the great Sanhedrin might devote those to destruction, who in war did not observe such charges as were given them; of which they find an instance in Judg. xxi. 5. (See him, lib. iv. de Jure Nat. et Gentium, cap. 6.)

Even it and all that are therein to the Lord.] As the first-fruits of their victories, in the land of Canaan. All whose inhabitants God ordered to be exterminated; but thought fit to make such an example of the first that refused to submit, as to raze their very city, and command it never to be built again: for that this was done by a particular order from God, appears from 1 Kings xvi. 34. Thus he commanded even such cities in Israel to be destroyed, as should hereafter revolt to idolatry, Deut. xiii. 15—17.

Only Rahab the harlot shall live, she and all that are with her in the house.] Which is explained in the execution of this order, ver. 23.

Because she hid the messengers.] Who sware unto her that she should be preserved: and therefore, both in justice and gratitude, Joshua was bound to take care of her; and, no doubt, had order from God to make good the oath of the spies.

That we sent.] This seems to import, that Joshua sent the spies by the advice or consent of the elders; though it may signify no more but that he sent them upon a public account. (See chap. ii. 1. 23.)

Ver. 18. And you, in any wise, keep yourselves from the accursed thing.] Take heed, lest you meddle with any of the spoils which are devoted to God, and appropriate them to your own use.

Lest ye make yourselves accursed, when ye take of the accursed thing.] Bring yourselves under the same sentence of being devoted to destruction.

And make the camp of Israel a curse.] And, more than that, expose the whole camp to the same danger. For many times God takes occasion to punish the whole body of a people for their other sins, when some of them only have hig ly offended him.

And trouble it.] Disturb the course of their victories.

Ver. 19. But all the silver and gold, and vessels of brass and iron.] And other metals, I suppose.

Are consecrated to the Lord.] Except the gold and silver of their images, which were utterly to be destroyed, according to an express command of God, Deut. vii. 25, 26.

They shall come into the treasury of the Lord.] Which was in the tabernacle. To the service of which such things were wholly appropriated, and might not be applied to any other use. But it is very probable, that before such things were put into the treasury they were purified, by making them go through the fire: according to the law, Numb. xxxi. 22, 23. The Jews think these things were given to God, because the city was taken on the sabbath.

Ver. 20. So the people shouted, when the priests blew with the trumpets.] As they had been commanded, ver. 16.

And it came to pass, when the people heard the sound of the trumpet, and the people shouted with a great shout.] This is repeated to shew, that this was all that the people contributed to the expugnation of this city: which they wholly ascribed unto God.

That the wall fell down flat.] As the Lord had promised, ver. 5.

So that the people went up into the city, every man straight before him, and they took the city.] As it was easy to do, when the garrison was in such a consternation, at the sudden fall of the wall, without any visible force to throw it down; that, in all likelihood, they could make little or no resistance.

Ver. 21. And they utterly destroyed all that was in the city, both man and woman, young and old, and ox, and sheep, and ass, with the edge of the sword.] See Deut. xx. 16, 17. Some have observed that there are no camels here mentioned, which were not commonly bred in this country; much less mules, which were not known in the land of Israel till the days of David. As Bochart concludes from the mention, upon several occasions, of oxen, sheep, and asses; but never of these creatures till his time. But if there were any other animals in Jericho besides these here named, they were all killed; for that was the law of the cherem. As for their killing of infants and women, see Grotius, lib. iii. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 4. sect. 9. And it must also be remembered, that they were a people guilty of such foul idolatry, that it was fit the whole race of them should be destroyed, as Sodom was; where all the children perished, as well as others. And this was a type of the entire destruction of New Babylon, mentioned in the Revelation.

Ver. 22. But Joshua had said unto the two men that had spied out the country.] He had given this order before the falling of the wall; when they began their march on the seventh day, the seventh time, and before they shouted.

Go into the harlot's house.] Which, by the wonderful providence of God over her, was left standing, with part of the wall upon which it was built, when the rest sunk into the ground.

And bring out thence the woman, and all that she hath.] With her in the house.

As ye sware unto her.] Chap. ii. 14.

Ver. 23. And the young men that were spies went in, and brought out Rahab, and her father, and her mother, and all that she had; and they brought out all her kindred.] By this it appears, that all related to her, who took shelter under her roof, were preserved from destruction. Such is the great clemency of God, who, for the sake of one excellent woman, spared a great many that had nothing to deserve his favour.

And left them without the camp of Israel.] They were brought out of the house, because it was to be burnt, with all the rest of the city: which was to be laid desolate without inhabitant. And they were carried without the camp of Israel, because it was holy by the presence of the Lord there: which made it unlawful for them to enter into it, till they had abjured their gentile superstition; and by circumcision (and by baptism, as the custom was in after-times, if not now) admitted into the body of the Israelites.

Ver. 24. And they burnt the city with fire, and all that was therein.] By the just judgment of God upon it, for the horrible wickedness committed therein. (See Grotius, de Jure Belli et Pacis, lib. iii. cap. 12. sect. 2.)

Only the silver, and the gold, and the vessels of brass, and iron, they put into the treasury of the house of the Lord.] As had been enjoined before they took the city, ver. 19.

Ver. 25. And Joshua saved Rahab the harlot alive, and her father's household, and all that she had.] It is likely her father and his household gave credit to what she said; and consequently were converted, as she was, to the true religion, by what they had heard before, and now saw with their own eyes, of the wonderful works of God.

And she dwelleth in Israel unto this day.] Was incorporated with the Israelites, and made a member of their body; as all her kindred, it is likely, were: at least, they became proselytes of the gate (as they called those who renounced idolatry, and worshipped the God of Israel), though they were not circumcised. Concerning this phrase unto this day, see before, iv. 9.

Because she hid the messengers which Joshua sent to spy out Jericho.] Which proceeded not merely from her humanity, but was a noble act of courageous faith.

Ver. 26. And Joshua adjured them at that time, saying.] He made the elders and heads of their several tribes (I suppose) bind themselves by a solemn oath, and they took the same security of all the people; adding a curse upon themselves and their posterity, if any of them broke this oath.

Cursed be the man before the Lord.] This shews that this cherem, whereby he adjudged him and his family to destruction who should rebuild Jericho, was a sentence pronounced by the Lord, and not by Joshua, without his order. And so we read expressly in the first book of the Kings, xvi. ult. See concerning this cherem, Mr. Selden, lib. iv. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 7. p. 505.

That riseth up and buildeth this city Jericho.] Whose ruins God would have remain, as a perpetual monument of his power and of his severity. So Maimonides, in his More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 50. "This anathema (saith he) was pronounced, that the miracle of the subversion of Jericho might be kept in perpetual memory: for whosoever saw the walls sunk deep into the earth (as he understands it), would clearly discern that this was not the form of a building destroyed by man, but miraculously thrown down by God."

He shall lay the foundation thereof in his first-born.] That is, in the death of his first-born.

And in his youngest son shall he set up the gates of it.] The meaning is, in the progress of the work, the rest of his children should die: and when he had finished it (which was when he set up its gates) he should lose the last of them. Which was fulfilled exactly in the days of Ahab, as we read in the place beforenamed, (1 Kings xvi. 34.) Which, by the way, shews this book of Joshua to have been older than the book of the Kings.

We are not to imagine that this anathema reached any farther, than to the builder of Jericho and his family; not to those who should inhabit it after it was rebuilt. For there was a company of prophets who made no scruple to settle here in future times, (2 Kings i. 15.) And if it had been built in any other place, and not on the ruins of the old city (though they had given it the name of Jericho), one cannot think he that built it would have fallen under this curse. Which either he did not mind, or did not believe, otherwise he would not have adventured to restore this city: unto which he was tempted by its pleasant situation, (2 Kings i. 19.)

Ver. 27. So the Lord was with Joshua.] Thus God made good his promise to him, i. 5. 9. where the Targum, as I observed, hath it, The Word of the Lord thy God shall be thy helper. And so these words run in that paraphrase, And the Word of the Lord helped Joshua: that Divine Person who appeared to him, and encouraged him in this undertaking, chap. v. 13, 14, &c.

And his fame was noised throughout all the country.] There was no part of the country which did not hear of their wonderful entrance into it over Jordan; and of the miraculous taking of Jericho; and the execution done there; which made the name of Joshua famous among them, as a captain before whom rivers fled, and the strongest walls fell down flat.

CHAP. VII.

Ver. 1. BUT the children of Israel.] That is, one among them. Which is an usual form of speech in the Holy Scriptures, to ascribe that to many indefinitely wherein one alone is concerned; because, where men are united in a society, they are all to partake in the good or evil that every of their members doth. Instance of which we find in Gen. viii. 4. xix. 29. xxiii. 6. Judges xii. 7. Matt. xxvi. 8. See Bochart in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 17. p. 212. and a great many more instances he heaps up, par. ii. lib. v. cap. 3. p. 669.

Committed a trespass in the accursed thing.] Offended God by purloining to his own use some of the spoils which were devoted to destruction, or appropriated to God's treasury, with a curse upon him that meddled with them.

For Achan the son of Carmi.] Who is called Achar in 1 Chron. ii. 7. because he having troubled Israel (as the word Achar signifies, ver. 25. of this chapter), it is likely, that, in aftertimes, they turned his name into Achar, instead of Achan.

The son of Zabdi.] Who is called Zimri, 1 Chron. ii. 6.

The son of Zerah, of the tribe of Judah.] For we find Zerah was the son of Judah, and came with him into Egypt when he was very young; for we read of no children he had, (Gen. xlvi. 12.) And if we suppose him to have begotten Zabdi when he was seventy years old, and allow as many years before Zabdi begat Carmi, and as many before Carmi begat Achan; we may make account (with Bonfrerius) that Achan was now about fifty years old; an age wherein many men begin to be more covetous than they were in their youth.

Took of the accursed thing.] What it was he himself confesses, ver. 21.

And the anger of the Lord was kindled against the children of Israel.] The sin of one member of the body provoked the Divine Majesty to express his displeasure against them all (which they deserved upon other accounts), that they might be awakened to find out, and to punish him who had brought them into great danger.

This preface is made to this chapter, to shew whence the ill success they had at Ai proceeded.

Ver. 2. And Joshua sent men from Jericho to Ai.] Called Hai in Abraham's time, (Gen. xii. 8.) Which Joshua, I suppose, had summoned to surrender, according to the precept in Deut. xx. 10. but they had refused. It was a city about three miles distant from Jericho, as the Jews say in Semoth Rabbah; which Masius takes to signify three leagues.

Which is beside Beth-aven.] Whether Beth-aven here signify a city, or a wilderness, is uncertain. (See xviii. 12.)

On the east side of Beth-el.] A place which was but one league from Ai, as Masius computes, and lay westward of it, (Gen. xii. 8.) for the war was carried on from the east, where Jericho was, to the western parts of the country. It was called Beth-aven in future times, by way of reproach, when the golden calves were set up in it; which made it not a house of God (as Beth-el signifies), but a house of iniquity; i. e. idolatry, which is the import of Beth-aven. But it is plain from hence, that these were two distinct places.

And spake unto them, saying, Go up and view the country. And the men went up and viewed Ai.] How it lay, and how it was fortified, &c. And it seems to have been seated in the hilly country; and belonged to the Amorites, (ver. 7.)

Ver. 3. And they returned unto Joshua, and said unto him, Let not all the people go up; but let about two or three thousand men go up, and smite Ai, &c.] They thought this number would be sufficient, because, as it follows in the end of the verse, they were but few; and therefore they would not have all Israel put to the trouble of marching thither. In which counsel a good providence of God interposed; for if the flight of three thousand men put the Israelites into such a consternation, (as we read, ver. 5, 6.) what a condition would they have been in, if all the people had been put to the worse? as they would have been, if they had attacked Ai, while this guilt remained among them.

Ver. 4. So there went up thither of the people about three thousand men; and they fled before the men of Ai.] Who seeing so small a number, came out and engaged the Israelites; whose courage quite failed them, so that they seem not to have struck a stroke, but immediately ran away. For God had left them; to whom they owed all their valour and victories.

Ver. 5. And the men of Ai smote of them about thirty and six men.] Of the hindmost of them, it is most likely, who could not run away so fast as the rest.

For they chased them from before the gate.] Of the city Ai.

Unto Shebarim.] A place, I suppose, between Ai and Jericho; which the Targum thinks had its name from the rout of the Israelites there.

And smote them in the going down.] Till they came to the plains of Jericho. For Ai standing on a hill, there was a descent from thence thither.

Wherefore the hearts of the people melted.] As wax doth before the fire, (Psal. lxviii. 2.) or as ice before the sun.

And became as water.] Weak and wavering, in uncertain resolutions, not knowing what to do.

Ver. 6. And Joshua rent his clothes.] As the manner was when they were full of grief, upon occasion of any great calamity, or the commission of any great crime. Which custom was very ancient, (Gen. xxxvii. 34. xliv. 13.) and continued in the times of the prophets, who make it a crime that men did not rend their clothes when grievous sins were committed.

And fell to the earth upon his face.] To make his supplication to God for mercy.

Before the ark of the Lord.] Not in the sanctuary, but with his face towards it. In imitation of which, the precentor in the Jewish synagogue, at this day, falls down before the chest, wherein they keep the book of the law, when he takes it out to read; as Buxtorf observes in his Synag. Judaica. And on solemn fast-days, as the Mischna tells, such prostrations were usual.

Until the even-tide.] Continued all day in fasting and prayer to God.

He and the elders of Israel.] Who rent their clothes, I suppose, as he had done; and then presented themselves in this mournful manner before God to implore his mercy.

And put dust upon their heads.] This was still a higher expression of great grief, and of a deep sense of their unworthiness to be relieved. Which was very usual in this nation, (1 Sam. iv. 12. 2 Sam. i. 2, &c.) and was imitated by the gentiles: as we see in the example of the Ninevites, (Jonah iii. 6.) and of Achilles, who bewailed the death of Patroclus by throwing dust on his head, and lying down in the dust, as Homer describes it in Iliad Σ. ver. 23, 24.

Ver. 7. And Joshua said, Alas! O Lord God.] A form of speech dolefully bewailing their forlorn condition: which did not misbecome so great a captain as Joshua was; for the most generous spirits have the most tender sense of humanity, as Arius Montanus excellently discourses upon this place.

Wherefore hast thou at all brought this people over Jordan, to deliver us into the hands of the Amorites, to destroy us?] This is not a sinful expostulation with God (for Joshua is not reprehended for it, but graciously instructed), but only a confession of his ignorance, why God should do such wonders for them as he had done, and now let them fall into the hands of those enemies whom they had conquered on the other side of Jordan. And it is as if he had said, I am confounded in my thoughts, being unable to understand why, &c. and consequently, he humbly desired to be informed in the reason of this change of his providence.

Would to God we had been content, and dwelt on the other side Jordan!] As far as he could apprehend, they had better have rested satisfied with what they had in possession, than be thus defeated in their attempt to acquire more.

Ver. 8. O Lord, what shall I say.] What course shall I take? or, how shall I answer the reproaches of our insulting enemies?

When Israel turneth their backs before their enemies?] What hope is there of conquering them or preserving ourselves?

Ver. 9. For the Canaanites, and all the inhabitants of the land, will hear of it.] They that are at the greatest distance, by the sea-side, will hear the report of our defeat, which will soon be spread over the whole country.

And shall environ us round about.] Be encouraged thereby to gather all their forces together and surround us.

And cut off our name from the earth.] Utterly destroy us.

And what wilt thou do unto thy great name?] And, which was worse, God would lose the glory of all the miracles he had wrought, and be thought unable to accomplish what he had begun to do for his people. This argument Moses had formerly pressed, (Exod. xxxii. 12. Numb. xiv. 16. Deut. ix. 28.) and God himself, in the song which he bade Moses teach the people, makes use of it. (Deut. xxxii. 26, 27.)

Ver. 10. And the Lord said unto Joshua, Get thee up; why liest thou thus upon thy face?] These words are not a reproof, but a gracious answer to his prayers; for when a person who supplicates a prince is commanded to rise up from his knees, it is a token of acceptance.

Ver. 11. Israel hath sinned.] See ver. 1.

And they have also transgressed my covenant which I commanded them.] They had promised obedience to all God's commands, (Exod. xxiv. 7.) and assured Joshua they would do whatsoever he bade them, (i. 16—18.) And this was a late command delivered by him from God, that they should not meddle with any thing devoted to God, with a solemn curse.

For they have even taken of the accursed thing.] That which belongs to me, ver. 1.

And have also stolen, and dissembled also.] Not only purloined that which God reserved to himself, but denied it after the fact was done. For I suppose Joshua, after the destruction of Jericho, had made inquiry, whether the silver and gold, &c. were brought into the treasury, and whether they had destroyed all other things, as God commanded; and they all answered, that they had.

And they have put it even amongst their own stuff.] To conceal it from discovery: or, it is an expression of his impudent transgression of God's command, in converting it immediately to his own private use. For in this verse the crime is aggravated in a gradual manner, in that Achan had not only sinned, but against the covenant they had solemnly made with him; and that in a matter of great importance, in which he had lately laid his injunctions upon them: having not only taken to himself what belonged to God, but done it by way of stealth, as if he could not see it; and likewise denied the doing of it; and persisting in the sin, by mixing what he had stolen with his own proper goods.

Ver. 12. Therefore the children of Israel could not stand before their enemies, but turned their backs before their enemies, because they were accursed.] By having a man among them who was fallen under the curse of God.

Neither will I be with you any more, except you destroy the accursed from among you.] These words shew that only one man among them was accursed, though they all suffered for it; and were to continue to suffer, till he was destroyed. For now that they knew there had been such a crime committed among them, they had been as guilty as Achan if they had not punished it.

Ver. 13. Up.] He was not still lying on the ground, for God had bid him rise before, and he, I suppose, had obeyed him: but this is a word whereby he quickens him to make all the speed he could, to do as he now directed him.

Sanctify the people.] Call upon them to sanctify themselves; as it here follows.

And say unto them, Sanctify yourselves.] As they did when they were to meet the Lord at Mount Sinai, (Exod. xix. 10, &c.) and as they were lately commanded to do when he led them over Jordan, (iii. 5.) For now they were to appear before his majesty, that an inquisition might be made who he was that had been guilty of this foul crime.

To-morrow.] For he would not have the guilt remain any longer upon them.

For thus saith the Lord God of Israel, There is an accursed thing in the midst of thee, O Israel.] He speaks in this style, both to awaken them to sanctify themselves, and also to appear before the Lord next morning.

Thou canst not stand before thine enemies, until ye take away the accursed thing from among you.] Both the person that had violated the anathema, and the thing he had purloined.

Ver. 14. In the morning therefore ye shall be brought.] Before the Lord.

According to your tribes.] Some principal persons of every tribe, representing the rest, were set before the Lord.

And it shall be, that the tribe which the Lord taketh shall come according to the families thereof; and the family which the Lord shall take shall come by households; and the household which the Lord shall take shall come man by man.] There is no difficulty in these words, but only to understand how this inquisition was made, and the author of the fact discovered: which is not here expressed, there being no words to signify how the Lord took one tribe, and family, and household, and person, from the rest. The Jews (who are never at a loss in these matters) tell us, that when they stood before the sanctuary, the high-priest was in it with the urim and thummim; wherein were twelve stones, with the names of the children of Israel engraven in them. And when that tribe, suppose, to which the guilty person belonged, was called, that stone in which was the name of that tribe changed colour; and so it did when the family, and the household, and the person, were called. But this is a mere fancy, of the stones shining, or becoming duskish; by which, I have shewn elsewhere, answers could not be given to inquiries by urim and thummim. And what others of them say is not much better: for instance, Kimchi, who tells us some are of opinion, that they being made to pass before the ark, the guilty could not stir a foot. (See several other conceits in Buxtorf's Historia Urim et Thummim, p. 304, &c.)

But the plainest account of this matter is this, that they were discovered by casting of lots, in the presence of God; which was an usual way in aftertimes of discovering noxious persons, (1 Sam. xiv. 41, 42. Jonah i. 7.) So Josephus, lib. v. cap. 1. and Ralbag.

Ver. 15. And it shall be, that he that is taken with the accursed thing shall be burnt with fire.] After they had stoned him to death with stones, (ver. 25.)

He and all that he hath.] His children, and his cattle; his tent, and all his goods; as it is explained ver. 24.

Because he hath transgressed the covenant of the Lord.] See ver. 11.

And because he hath wrought folly in Israel.] Committed a very heinous sin.

Ver. 16. So Joshua rose up early in the morning.] It is probable he acquainted nobody with these orders; but made all the haste he could to put them in execution: for if they had been known abroad, Achan's guilt might have made him flee from so terrible a sentence.

And brought Israel by their tribes; and the tribe of Judah was taken.] Who, if we may believe the Jews, immediately stood to their arms, and would not lay them down, till they saw the man apprehended and punished who had done this thing.

Ver. 17. And he brought the family of Judah, &c.] Every family of that tribe, till that of the Zarhites was taken.

And he brought the family of the Zarhites man by man.] That is, every head of their several households, as he was directed, ver. 14.

And Zabdi was taken.] That is, the lot fell upon his household.

Ver. 18. And he brought his household man by man; and Achan the son of Carmi, the son of Zabdi, the son of Zerah, of the tribe of Judah, was taken.] Here the Samaritan Chronicle tells the very same story with the Talmudists, that the stone in the breast-plate of the high-priest, in which was engraven the name of Judah, was darkened when Achan was named. (See Hottinger's Smegma Orientale, cap. 8. p. 505.)

Ver. 19. And Joshua said unto Achan, My son.] All great minds are full of tenderness and compassion; and nothing more unbecomes a prince than violent passion: which Joshua was so far from expressing on this occasion, that he speaks to him with the greatest mildness imaginable.

Give, I pray thee, glory to the Lord God of Israel.] The Samaritan Chronicle, beforenamed, paraphrases this not amiss: Lift up thine eyes to the King of heaven and earth, and acknowledge that nothing can be hid from him; who knows the greatest secrets.

And make confession unto him, and tell me now what thou hast done.] Openly confess thy guilt; and relate to me what it is, that thou hast converted to thine own use.

Hide it not from me.] Who thou seest have God at hand, to discover that which none of us know but thyself.

Ver. 20. And Achan answered Joshua, and said, Indeed I have sinned against the Lord God of Israel.] Which the Samaritan Chronicle thus expresses; I acknowledge that I have grievously sinned before God, who knows all secret and hidden things: for I have prevaricated against the covenant of God, and against his ambassador.

And thus and thus have I done.] Committed this sin, with such circumstances as here follow.

Ver. 21. When I saw among the spoils.] He doth not say in what place; but the forenamed Chronicle saith, it was as he entered into one of their temples.

A goodly Babylonish garment.] There are a great many opinions about this garment; which Bochartus most probably judges to have been a various garment, as the LXX. translate it; that is, of divers colours, wherein were several figures either woven or wrought with a needle: for which sort of work Babylon was famous, insomuch that they were called painted garments; which made a most glorious show, and therefore was very inviting to the eye of Achan: who was tempted by its lustre, to reserve one of these garments for his own use, or to sell; for they were of an immense price. See him in his Phaleg. lib. i. cap. 6. where he hath a long dissertation about this garment.

And two hundred shekels of silver.] Which is as much as a hundred German dollars, as Masius observes.

And a wedge of gold.] In the Hebrew a tongue; for it had that shape.

Of fifty shekels' weight.] This may be understood two ways; either that it was worth so many shekels in value, that is, fifty dollars; or, that it weighed as much as fifty shekels, that is, three hundred dollars. The last sense Masius thinks most probable.

Then I coveted, and took them.] To his own use; when he should have brought them into God's treasury, (James i. 15.)

And, behold, they are hid in the earth in the midst of my tent.] Till he could have time to dispose of them to his best advantage.

And the silver under it.] The silver was immediately under the Babylonish garment, and the gold under that: for both silver and gold are here meant, though one only mentioned.

Ver. 22. Then Joshua sent messengers, and they ran to the tent.] Lest any one should remove them, and render the fact dubious; and that the children of Israel might be speedily expiated.

And, behold, it was hid in his tent, and the silver under it.] They found the Babylonish garment (as was said before) hid in the earth, and the silver and gold under it. The LXX. indeed, understand it, as if the gold and Babylonish garment were uppermost, and the silver under them: for so they translate these words, both here and in the foregoing verse, τὸ ἀργύριον ὑποκάτω αὐτῶν, the silver under them. The wedge of gold, perhaps, was wrapped in the Babylonish garment; and so the silver might be said to lie either under it, or under them.

Ver. 23. And they took them out of the midst of the tent.] Where he told them he had buried these things.

And brought them unto Joshua, and unto all the children of Israel.] For they were all assembled at the tabernacle, waiting to see the issue of this matter.

And laid them before the Lord.] That the fact might be manifest, and the Lord acknowledged to be omniscient.

Ver. 24. And Joshua, and all Israel with him.] By an universal consent.

Took Achan the son of Zerah.] He was Zerah's great-grandchild.

And the silver, and the garment, and the wedge of gold.] Which God would not have put into his treasury, after they had been thus perverted to a private use.

And his sons, and his daughters.] This seems very hard, that they should be executed in such a terrible manner, as here follows, for their father's fault. But the Jews in Pirke Eliezer say, they were punished because they were privy to their father's stealth, and concealed it. Others think this was a necessary severity in the beginning of a new empire, and of a plentiful fortune, upon which they now entered; that they might not wantonly abuse it. But there are those who think this is but a seeming difficulty; Achan alone being stoned (as we read in the next verse, all Israel stoned him with stones), and his children brought forth to be spectators of it. And when it is said, in the conclusion of the next verse, they stoned them with stones, it relates to his oxen, and asses, and sheep, which were stoned with him. (See Guil. Vorstius, in his annotations on Pirke Eliezer, p. 224.)

And his oxen, and his asses, and his sheep, and his tent, and all that he had.] This was done, to represent to the people the heinousness of this offence; and to strike such a terror into them, that they should not dare to commit the like.

And they brought them unto the valley of Achor.] Which had its name from him, ver. 26. (See there.)

Ver. 25. And Joshua said.] He was the sole judge, as the Jews think, in this matter. And whereas, by the law, none might be condemned out of the mouth of one witness, nor was any judge to sit alone without assistants (according to their doctors), nor any man's testimony to be admitted against himself (because, in a mad fit, he might undo himself), yet their king had this singular prerogative, that he might try a man alone by himself, and condemn him out of the mouth of one witness, nay, from his own confession; as Joshua did here (who was their king or supreme governor) in Achan's case; and as David did afterward in the case of the Amalekite, 2 Sam. i. 15. (See G. Schickard, in his Jus Regium, cap. 4. Theor. 14.) But Joshua is impertinently alleged as a proof of this extraordinary power; for it was God who convicted Achan, and pronounced this sentence; which Joshua only put in execution.

Why hast thou troubled us? the Lord shall trouble thee this day.] The doctors in the Jerusalem Talmud, in the treatise Sanhedrin, cap. 6. fancy there is a peculiar emphasis in these words, this day. As if he had said, In this day thou shalt be troubled, but thou shalt not be troubled in the world to come. For they think that he having given glory to God, by confessing his sin, had all his punishment here.

All agree Joshua alludes to his name; the word Achar signifying to trouble or disturb. Or rather, his name was changed from Achan unto Achar, because of this disturbance which he gave to all Israel.

And all Israel stoned him with stones.] Which was a punishment of great crimes, as I have observed elsewhere. See Lev. xx. 9. 11—13, &c. as I remember. This is said to be done by all Israel; because they were all present, and consenting to it.

And burnt them with fire, after they had stoned them with stones.] Burnt their dead carcasses. Why they were both stoned and also burnt, Eliezer in his Pirke, and Vorstius upon him, gives a reason in the place abovenamed.

Ver. 26. And they raised over him a great heap of stones unto this day.] As a monument of his sin, and of God's judgment upon him. Thus they did with Absalom, 2 Sam. xviii. 17. And houses or cities which were destroyed, are said to be turned into a heap, (Isa. xxv. 2.) or heaps, (Jer. ix. 11.) as a token of their utter ruin.

And the Lord turned from the fierceness of his anger.] Was reconciled to his people, after they had executed his sentence against him, that provoked his anger. So the Samaritan Chronicle: Thus the anger of God was removed from the children of Israel, and he was pleased with what they had done. (See Deut. xiii. 17.)

Wherefore the name of that place.] Where he was stoned and burnt.

Was called The Valley of Achor, unto this day.] From that time all the people called this place by that name, in memory of this execution done upon Achar: so he was also called ever after this. For though his name was Achan, yet from henceforward they called him Achar, the troubler of Israel. And so he is here called in the Syriac version, and by Josephus, Athanasius, Basil, and others mentioned by Bochartus; as Ezra himself also calls him, 1 Chron. ii. 7. See Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 31. in the latter end.

CHAP. VIII.

Ver. 1. AND the Lord said unto Joshua.] Who, it is likely, now consulted God about their progress in this war: which he had not done before, (vii. 2.) being sufficiently authorized by what God had often said to him, and by their success against Jericho: but this late defeat before Ai, might make him think it necessary to take advice of the Divine Majesty, before he attempted any thing farther.

Fear not, neither be dismayed.] Because of the late ill success; of which he now knew the cause; which was removed.

Take all the people of war with thee.] This order may seem strange, since the people themselves thought two or three thousand were sufficient, if God were with them. But God would have them all to share in the spoil of Ai; that they who had obeyed him in abstaining from laying their hands on any thing in Jericho, might be now rewarded for it, by the prey of this city; as it follows in the next verse.

And arise, go up to Ai.] Which it appears by this was in the hill country.

I have given into thy hand the king of Ai, and his people, and his city, and his land.] He bids him be confident of a complete victory, as if he had already won it.

Ver. 2. And thou shalt do to Ai and her king as thou didst to Jericho and her king.] Only with such difference, as follows in the next words.

Only the spoil thereof, and the cattle thereof, shall ye take for a prey unto yourselves.] None of the silver or gold, or any thing else, was separated to God's use, nor ordered to be destroyed; but they were to enjoy it all entirely themselves.

Lay thee an ambush for the city behind it.] On the west of it; for they were now in Gilgal, which lay eastward.

Ver. 3. So Joshua arose, and all the people of war, to go up against Ai.] In obedience to the Divine direction, (ver. 1.)

And Joshua chose out thirty thousand mighty men of valour, and sent them away by night.] When they were less liable to be observed.

Ver. 4. And he commanded them, saying, Behold, ye shall lie in wait against the city, even behind the city.] Like a great general, he assigns their post to every part of the army.

Go not very far from the city.] Lie as close to it as you can, without being discovered.

But be ye all ready.] To seize upon the city, when all the people were drawn out of it.

Ver. 5. And I, and all the people that are with me, will approach unto the city.] As if they intended to assault it.

And it shall come to pass, when they come out against us, as at the first.] Which he rationally presumed they would, being flushed with such good success.

That we will flee before them.] Counterfeit a flight, as soon as they appeared.

Ver. 6. For they will come out after us, till we have drawn them from the city.] Pursue them, with all their force.

For they will say, They flee before us, as at the first: therefore we will flee before them.] He gives the reason of their flight, without striking of a stroke (as we now speak), that all the people might be enticed out of the city, in pursuit of them, as he concluded they would be; because now there was a greater number of the Israelites than before; which would require their whole power to deal withal.

Ver. 7. Then ye shall rise up from the ambush, and seize upon the city.] Upon the signal given, mentioned ver. 18.

For the Lord your God will deliver it into your hand.] He would not have them fear to enter the city; which he assured them God would put into their possession.

Ver. 8. And it shall be, when ye have taken the city, that ye shall set the city on fire.] The gate where they entered, or some of the skirts of the city; as a token they were possessed of it. For they were to take the spoil of the city before they burnt it, (ver. 28.)

According to the commandment of the Lord shall ye do.] And not transgress, as Achan did.

See, I have commanded you.] Acquainted them with the will of God; in the observance of which they might be confident of success.

Ver. 9. Joshua therefore sent them forth, and they went to lie in ambush.] He selected these thirty thousand men out of the rest of the army; and when it was dark they went upon the forenamed design.

And Joshua lodged that night among the people.] The forenamed detachment (as we now speak) was commanded by some great officer, in whom Joshua confided; but he himself lay all night in the body of the army; that he might be ready in the morning to give the necessary orders.

Ver. 10. And Joshua rose up early in the morning, and numbered the people.] He first gave orders to the officers (for he could not do it himself alone) to see that none of the people were wanting.

And went up, he and the elders of Israel, before the people to Ai.] And when he commanded them to march, he was attended by the elders of Israel, leading them on towards Ai. But it is uncertain who are here meant by the elders of Israel. Some think, the chief commanders in the army; but they are never called elders, much less the elders of Israel. But the rulers and judges are called by this name, who, I suppose, waited upon Joshua as a council of war: being men authorized by God to assist the supreme governor, (Numb. xi. 16. 24, 25.)

Ver. 11. And all the people, even the people of war that were with him, went up and drew nigh, and came before the city.] The distance between Gilgal and Ai being but three leagues, it is likely, the people being mustered early in the morning, they got thither before noon. Those words, even the men of war that were with him, seem to be opposed to the thirty thousand, whom he had sent before to lie in ambush, (ver. 3.)

And pitched on the north side of Ai.] Here the main body of the army lay, behind the hills, it is likely, so that they were not discovered till the evening, or the next day.

Now there was a valley between them and Ai.] Where they of Ai, I suppose, drew up; when they resolved to engage them.

Ver. 12. And took about five thousand, and set them to lie in ambush between Beth-el and Ai.] Which places were but a league distant one from the other. (See vii. 2.)

On the west side of the city.] Where the former detachment was ordered to lie, ver. 4. But these seem to have been a distinct party from them, and sent, it is likely, for another purpose; to intercept all those that might think to save themselves, by flying through by-ways, which they were to guard. There are those, indeed, who think that there were but thirty thousand men in all employed in this expedition against Ai; and out of them these five thousand men were sent to lie in ambush, that they might, in convenient time, set fire to the city. (See Masius.) But this is so directly contrary to God's command, to take all the people of war with him, ver. 1. and to what is said ver. 3. 11. that I cannot think it to be true. One had better say, this party was added to strengthen the thirty thousand men in their undertaking.

Ver. 13. And when they had set the people, even all the host that was on the north of the city, and their liersin wait on the west side of the city.] That is, when things were thus disposed about the evening.

Joshua went that night into the midst of the valley.] To pray to God, it is likely, for a blessing upon their enterprise.

Ver. 14. And it came to pass, when the king of Ai saw it.] That is, was informed of their investing the city on the north side of it; which, it is likely, was in the evening, or late that night.

That they hasted.] He called a council, and they speedily resolved to dislodge the Israelites.

And rose up early, and the men of the city went out against Israel to battle, he and all his people.] The meaning is, all that could fight went out, and their king at the head of them.

At a time appointed.] They had agreed all to issue out at several gates (it is likely) at a certain hour.

Before the plain.] He means, perhaps, the valley which lay between Ai and the camp of Israel; before which they drew up their army to engage the Israelites.

But he wist not that there were liers in ambush against him behind the city.] The king had no intelligence of that strong party, which Joshua had sent to lie behind the city; they keeping, I suppose, their gates shut, (as they did at Jericho, that none could get in or go out, vi. 1.) and suspecting no danger from the western coast where they lay, but only from the east, whence they knew the Israelites were to march.

Ver. 15. And Joshua, and all Israel, made as if they were beaten before them.] At the first onset, Joshua himself turned his back, and all the rest of his army; as if they durst not stand before them.

And fled by the way of the wilderness.] Which lay between Jericho and Ai.

Ver. 16. And all the people that were in Ai.] Who were able to fight.

Were called together to pursue them.] I suppose some of the men of war might be left in the city till they saw the Israelites fly, and then they were all called out (as ver. 14. is to be understood) together with those of Beth-el, who were come to their assistance; being near neighbours, and both under the same king.

And they pursued after Joshua, and were drawn away from the city.] They were so eager in their pursuit, that they were drawn to a greater distance from Ai than they would have been, if they had considered the danger of leaving it naked.

Ver. 17. And there was not a man left in Ai.] None that were able to fight.

Or Beth-el, that went not out after Israel.] For they of Beth-el, it appears by these words, were come to the assistance of Ai, before any of the army of Israel arrived: for afterward they could not, because the ambush lay between Beth-el and Ai, (ver. 9.)

And they left the city open, and pursued after Israel.] There was not so much as a man left to guard the gates; but all were engaged in the pursuit.

Ver. 18. And the Lord said unto Joshua.] God secretly suggested to him, that now was the time for the ambush to fall upon the city; when their army was drawn so far from it, that they could not return soon enough to relieve it.

Stretch out the spear that is in thy hand towards Ai.] He bids him face about (as we now speak) and stop the flight of the Israelites. It is much disputed what the Hebrew word chidon signifies; which the Vulgar Latin translates a shield. But Bochartus hath taken a great deal of pains to shew, that it every where signifies in Scripture a spear (as we translate it), or a lance, or some kind of such-like offensive weapon; especially in this place, he thinks, there can be no doubt of it: for it was a weapon he had in his hand, and was to stretch forth towards the city; that it might be a signal to those in ambush to rise and enter the city; and to those who fled to make a stand, and encounter the enemy. To which purpose, nothing could be more proper than a spear, with a flag, it is highly probable, at the end of it (like to our ensigns), which made it more visible. (See Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 8. p. 135, &c.) The LXX. here translate it γαῖσον, which Suidas says signifies a kind of weapon, οἷον δόρατος, like to a spear. See the same most learned author, in his Canaan, lib. i. cap. 42. p. 744.

For I will give it into thy hand.] As he promised, ver. 1.

And Joshua stretched out the spear that he had in his hand towards the city.] That all Israel might see it; as they did the rod of Moses, when they fought against Amalek.

Ver. 19. And the ambush rose quickly out of their place.] Being admonished by some Divine suggestion (as Masius thinks) as well as by the signal, that now was the time to execute their design.

And they came as soon as he had stretched out his hand.] Which they might see from some of the hills, at the back of which they lay. But why they should watch for this sign, or understand what it meant, unless Joshua had received this order, and told it them before they went, cannot be conceived.

And they entered into the city, and took it.] For there was nobody to oppose them.

And hasted and set the city on fire.] In one place; which, it is likely, was on the north side of the city; that both the Israelites and the people of Ai might see the smoke. This the Lord had strictly commanded, (see ver. 8.) which made them make such haste, as soon as they had possessed themselves of the city, to set fire to it.

Ver. 20. And when the men of Ai looked behind them.] I suppose there was a great shout made by all the Israelites, when they saw the smoke ascend; which made the men of Ai look about them.

They saw, and, behold, the smoke of the city ascended up to heaven.] The firing of any out-houses, or barns, was sufficient to make such a smoke; for it is certain the city was not yet burnt. (See ver. 28.)

And they had no power to flee this way or that way.] Either they were so dismayed, that they stood stock-still (as we speak), or found themselves so environed, that they could no way escape. For on the north and east sides, the great army came upon them; and on the west the ambush issued forth against them; and the other five thousand men blocked up their way on the south: which could not but very much amaze and perplex their minds; and the more, to see all their vain-glorious hopes vanished, which their king no doubt had entertained, of stopping the progress of the Israelites, and being the deliverer of his country.

And the people that fled to the wilderness turned back upon the pursuers.] Ver. 15. They counterfeited a flight no longer, but now boldly looked their enemies in the face.

Ver. 21. And when Joshua and all Israel saw.] By this it is plain the whole body of the men were here; and not only three thousand of them, as some suppose. (See ver. 12.)

That the ambush had taken the city, and that the smoke of the city ascended.] Whereby they understood it was taken.

Then they turned again, and slew the men of Ai.] After they had made a stand awhile, and rallied, they fell upon the men of Ai, and made a great slaughter of them.

Ver. 22. And the other issued out of the city against them; so they were in the midst of Israel, some on this side and some on that side; and they smote them, so that they let none of them remain or escape.] By this stratagem they were all entirely cut off.

Ver. 23. And the king of Ai they took alive, and brought him to Joshua.] Perhaps they were ordered so to do, that he might be made a public spectacle of the Divine vengeance.

Ver. 24. And it came to pass, when Israel had made an end of slaying all the inhabitants of Ai.] That is, the men of war.

In the field, in the wilderness wherein they chased them.] By this it appears, that they fled before the Israelites as soon as they turned upon them, having no heart to fight them, (ver. 20.)

And when they were all fallen by the edge of the sword until they were consumed.] This is repeated to express a complete victory.

That all the Israelites returned unto Ai.] From whence they counterfeited a flight.

And smote it with the edge of the sword.] All the people that were left in it, as every one was that was not able to go to war.

Ver. 25. And so it was, that all that fell that day, both of men and women, were twelve thousand.] By which it appears this was no great city; and that they who were sent to view the country had reason to think a small party sufficient to subdue it, (vii. 2, 3.) For the men of Beth-el seem to be included also in this number, being mixed with those of Ai, from whom the Israelites could not distinguish them.

Even all the men of Ai.] The inhabitants of the city (as it follows in the next verse) and the territory about it, great and small, men and women.

Ver. 26. And Joshua drew not his hand back, wherewith he stretched out the spear, until he had utterly destroyed all the inhabitants of Ai.] But kept his arm extended with the spear in it, as Moses's rod was lifted up during the fight with Amalek. Or, the meaning may be, that he himself charged them, and continued to fight as long as there was a man left.

Ver. 27. Only the cattle, and the spoil of the city.] i. e. Their silver and gold, and household-stuff, &c.

Israel took for a prey unto themselves according unto the word of the Lord, &c.] Who was so far from reserving any of these things to himself, that he made an express grant of them to the Israelites, (ver. 2.)

Ver. 28. And Joshua burnt Ai.] After they had gotten all the spoil of it, which had been lost if it had been burnt before by the liers in ambush. (See ver. 8. 19.)

And made it a heap, even a desolation, unto this day.] Laid it waste, so that it was known only by its ruins for a long time after, as it was at the time when this was written. (See ver. 11. 26.)

Ver. 29. And the king of Ai he hanged on a tree.] Being the head of a very wicked people, who was fit to be made a public spectacle of God's displeasure. Lipsius, in his book de Cruce, lib. i. cap. 11. produces this as an ancient instance of crucifying notorious malefactors. But that is a great mistake, crucifixion being no Jewish, but a Roman punishment. Nor were crucified persons hanged and strangled, as the king of Ai and Haman were, but fastened alive to a cross, with nails struck into their hands and feet. The LXX. indeed here expound it, he was hanged, ἐπὶ ξύλου διδύμου, wherein they seem to have respect to the figure of the cross; but there is no such thing in the Hebrew. (See Numb. xxv. 4.)

Until the even-tide; and as soon as the sun went down, Joshua commanded that they should take his carcass down from the tree.] For so God had commanded, Deut. xxi. 22, 23. (See there.)

And cast it at the entering of the gate of the city.] Where he was wont to sit in judgment; and, in all probability, had exercised a great deal of injustice and cruelty.

And raised thereon a great heap of stones, that remaineth unto this day.] As they did upon Achan, vii. 26. and for the same end, to be a monument of his being hanged near to this place.

Ver. 30. Then Joshua built an altar unto the Lord God of Israel in Mount Ebal.] If this mount lay between Ai and Beth-el (as Gerardus Mercator endeavours to prove by many arguments), then this altar, we may well think, was built immediately after the taking of Ai, as soon as they came into possession of this mount: for they looked upon themselves, no doubt, as obliged to fulfil the command of God, given them by Moses, as soon as it was possible. But the Scripture plainly describes this Mount Ebal as near Shechem, for there was only a valley between Ebal and Gerizim, from whence Jotham spake to the men of Shechem, (Judg. ix. 7.) which was a great way distant from Ai. And therefore we must suppose that which is here related not to have been done till they had the country about Shechem.

Ver. 31. As Moses, the servant of the Lord, commanded the children of Israel.] Deut. xi. 29, 30. xxvii. 2, &c. See in those places.

As it is written in the book of the law of Moses, An altar of whole stones, over which no man hath lift up any iron.] The altar was built according to the direction given by God in a foregoing law of his, Exod. xx. 25. and repeated in Deut. xxvii. 5, 6. (See there.)

And they offered thereon burnt-offerings unto the Lord, and sacrificed peace-offerings.] For now they renewed their covenant with God the third time, as I observed upon that chapter in Deuteronomy, ver. 10.

Ver. 32. And he wrote there, upon the stones, a copy of the law of Moses, which he wrote in the presence of the children of Israel.] It is a great question what it was he wrote upon these stones. Some fancy all the five books of Moses; others only the book of Deuteronomy; which is more likely than the other; but too long for these stones to contain, or for him to write, in the presence of all Israel. Others, therefore, think only the ten commandments, or a compendium of the law of Moses; or, perhaps, the blessings and cursings: but Fortunatus Scacchus, with some probability, conjectures, that he only wrote the words of the covenant, by which the children of Israel acknowledged they held the land of Canaan of God, as their great Lord; upon condition they observed his laws, to which they and their posterity were obliged. And this he principally grounds upon those words, (Deut. xxvii. 3.) Thou shalt write upon them all the words of this law. Where the Hebrew word hazoth (this) he thinks hath a particular respect to what he is speaking of; viz. their going over Jordan to possess the land which God gave them, upon condition they observed his statutes. (See Sacror. Elæochrysm. Myrothec. lib. ii. cap. 57. p. 570, &c. and my notes upon Deuteronomy, xxvii. 3.)

Ver. 33. And all Israel, and their elders, and officers, and their judges, stood on this side of the ark, and on that side.] With their faces towards the ark.

Before the priests the Levites, which bare the ark of the covenant of the Lord.] Who were to pronounce the blessings and the cursings prescribed by the law. (See Deut. xxvii. 24.)

As well the stranger as he that was born among them.] For the law made no distinction between them, (Levit. xix. 34.)

Half of them over against Mount Gerizim, and half of them over against Mount Ebal, as Moses, the servant of the Lord, had commanded before.] In Deut. xxvii. 12, 13. (See there.)

That they should bless the people of Israel.] There were cursings, as well as blessings pronounced: but the intent of cursing was, that they might avoid those sins against which they were denounced; and thereby obtain a blessing.

Ver. 34. And afterward he read all the words of the law, the blessings and the cursings, according to all that is written in the book of the law.] viz. In Deut. xxvii. ver. 15—17, &c. The word afterward is not to be neglected, which imports, that after the building of the altar, and the offering sacrifices thereon, and writing the law on the stones, and disposing the people in their place about the ark, then he read the law to them. Which was likely to be heard with the greater attention, when they were thus prepared to receive it, and had solemnly worshipped God, and owned his authority.

Ver. 35. There was not a word of all that Moses commanded which Joshua did not read before all the congregation of Israel.] viz. All that Moses directed in Deut. xxvii. or, as others will have it, the whole book of Deuteronomy, wherein these blessings and cursings are contained. (See Deut. xxxi. 13.)

With the women, and the little ones, and the strangers that were conversant among them.] By the strangers here mentioned, (and in ver. 33.) are to be understood such as were proselytes to their religion: and had undertaken to observe this law, as well as themselves; and therefore were to be made acquainted with it. And that they might be moved to have the greater regard to it, Joshua himself, their chief governor, read it to them. So some of the Jews understand it; after the priests had read the blessings and cursings, then Joshua read all the commanding and forbidding precepts in the law.

CHAP. IX.

Ver. 1. AND it came to pass, when all the kings which were on this side Jordan, in the hills, and in the valleys, and in all the coasts of the great sea.] By the great sea, is meant the Mediterranean; where those people, peculiarly called Canaanites, dwelt, as hath been observed. And the Amorites seem to have been the principal inhabitants of the hilly country, in the south of Judea. (See on Deut. i. 7. 19, 20.)

Over against Lebanon.] The LXX and the Vulgar understand this, as if he spake of those that dwelt near Lebanon.

The Hittite, and the Amorite, the Canaanite, the Perizzite, the Hivite, and the Jebusite.] Thus they are reckoned up in Deut. xx. 17. where the Girgashites are omitted, as they are here. (See an account of it in my notes upon that place: and on chap. xvi. of this book, ver. 10.)

Heard thereof.] Of the taking of Jericho and Ai: for what is said, in the words immediately foregoing, concerning the Israelites meeting at Mount Ebal, is not inserted as a thing wherein these nations were concerned.

Ver. 2. That they gathered themselves together, to fight with Joshua and with Israel.] They entered into a confederacy to oppose Joshua's farther progress in the conquest of their country. But they did not gather themselves to battle, till they heard what Gibeon had done.

With one accord.] The whole country were unanimous in that resolution: and thereupon rejected the summons which Joshua had sent them to surrender themselves and their cities to him.

Ver. 3. And when the inhabitants of Gibeon.] Or, But when, &c. Gibeon was a city in the mountainous country; for we read afterward of a high place at Gibeon.

Heard what Joshua had done to Jericho and to Ai.] They being Hivites (ver. 7.) had at the first rejected the offers of peace which Joshua sent them, as the rest of their nation (ver. 1.) had done. But hearing that Joshua had taken Jericho and Ai, and destroyed all their inhabitants, they repented of that resolution; and consulted how they might, by some means or other, make their peace with the Israelites.

Ver. 4. And they did work wilily.] It being too late to surrender their city to Joshua upon such terms, as he is supposed to have offered (for there was no mercy to be shewn them, after they had stood out against the three proclamations, which the Jews say were made to them), they contrived how to put a fallacy upon the Israelites, and by craft and cunning procure their favour. (See my annotations on Deut. xx. 10, 11.)

And went.] They chose some from among them, who went in the name of the rest, towards the camp of Israel.

And made as if they had been ambassadors.] Pretending that they were sent upon an embassy to them, from a far country; as they affirmed, ver. 6.

And took old sacks upon their asses.] Wherein was their provision.

And wine-bottles, old, and rent, and bound up.] Where they were rent.

Ver. 5. And old shoes clouted upon their feet.] As if they had been worn out, and patched up, with long travel.

And old garments upon them; and all the bread of their provision was dry and mouldy.] It is observed by Arius Montanus, that nothing is said of the decay of their wine: which they pretended, it is likely, to have drank all up, in so long a journey. For it was not so easy to procure sour wine as mouldy bread.

Ver. 6. And they went to Joshua unto the camp at Gilgal, and said unto him, and to the men of Israel.] They addressed themselves to him, as the head of the people; and he had his council about him: who, in all probability, are here called the men of Israel. Though some conceive, that they had laid hold of every one they met withal, and beseeched them to admit them to their friendship.

We are come from a far country.] To sue to you for your friendship.

Now therefore make ye a league with us.] As they might do with those that accepted the offers of peace, which they sent them, (Deut. xx. 11.) and therefore much more with those who came to seek to be at peace with them: and were not inhabitants of the land of Canaan, but came from a far country; which they gave as a reason, why they should make a league with them. And, indeed, they had been to blame, if they had denied their petition: as the Romans were, who, when they were grown great, refused to receive a remote nation into their protection (as Appian tells us), who by their ambassadors submitted themselves to their power, because they did not see they were likely to get any thing by them. Which Bodinus (in his book against Malestret-tus de Caritate Rerum) censures as a base action, and injurious to Almighty God. "As if (saith he) the majesty of ruling and administering justice, especially to miserable and ill-instructed people, were not the greatest gift of God; and the highest honour of which a man is capable in this world."

Ver. 7. And the men of Israel said.] This shews that the men of Israel beforementioned, were not ordinary persons, but such as had authority to treat with ambassadors.

Unto the Hivites.] Unto those who came from Gibeon, who were really Hivites, as is expressly said, xi. 19.

Peradventure you dwell among us.] Are some of the people of this land; which are commanded to rout out.

And how shall we make a league with you?] Then it is utterly unlawful for us to do what you desire: for God hath often forbidden it. (Exod. xxiii. 32, 33. xxxiv. 12—16. Deut. vii. 2, 3, &c. and other places.)

Ver. 8. And they said unto Joshua.] With whom alone they had a desire to treat.

We are thy servants.] This doth not signify that they were ready to yield themselves to be tributaries to the Israelites, or accept of any terms that should be imposed on them: but are only expressions of great humility and civility; acknowledging the Israelites to be superior in power and strength, and therefore desiring their protection in their liberties. Thus Abraham addressed himself to the travellers, whom he entertained as greater persons than himself, (Gen. xviii. 3, 4.) And Jacob calls himself and his household the servants of Esau, (Gen. xxx. 20.) And thus Batricides understood their language here; who says the king of Gibeon wrote a letter to Joshua, wherein he desired security from him; and presented him with great gifts, as Hottinger observes in his Smegma Orientale, cap. 8. p. 507.

And Joshua said unto them, Who are ye? and from whence come ye?] They being backward to name the country from whence they were sent; it begat a reasonable suspicion in Joshua, that they were some of the people of Canaan.

Ver. 9. And they said unto him, From a very far country thy servants are come.] They still avoid giving a particular account of their country, but answer in general terms; in which commonly lies deceit.

Because of the name of the Lord thy God.] To divert him from pressing them to give a more satisfactory answer, they pretend religion had invited them to take this long journey: which they knew would procure them a favourable audience.

For we have heard of the fame of him, &c.] Of his miraculous works, particularly those which he did to deliver them from the Egyptian slavery; which, as it is evident, were come to their knowledge: so it is very reasonable to believe such wonderful things were the motives that made them seek for the Israelites' friendship; they being wrought upon, as Rahab was, to embrace their religion.

Ver. 10. And all that he did to the two kings of the Amorites that were beyond Jordan, to Sihon king of Heshbon, and to Og king of Bashan, which was at Ashtaroth.] They say not a word of the drying up of Jordan, and of the taking of Jericho and Ai: but prudently conceal their knowledge of those things, because they would have it supposed the tidings of those wonders could not yet be arrived at a country so far off, as they pretended theirs to be.

Ver. 11. Wherefore our elders.] The principal persons in their country: who were the rulers and governors of it.

And all the inhabitants of our country.] With the unanimous consent of all the people.

Spake to us, saying, Take victuals with you for the journey.] Made choice of us for this embassy; and ordered us to provide ourselves with necessaries for so long a journey.

And go to meet them.] To prevent the Israelites from entertaining any hostile intentions against them.

And say unto them, We are your servants: therefore now make ye a league with us.] The Samaritan Chronicle saith, they had orders to tell Joshua that they would embrace the Jewish religion; and refuse nothing, great or small, that he should desire of them. And, indeed, one would think, by what they said before, that they had a sense of the God of Israel, as superior to all other gods: and consequently, were disposed to become worshippers of him. For which reason he was pleased to dispose things so, that, by their wiles, they should compass their end, and be entertained into the friendship of the Israelites.

Ver. 12. This our bread we took hot for our provision out of our houses.] When it was newly come out of the oven.

On the day we came forth to go unto you; but now, behold, it is dry, and it is mouldy.] This they say to demonstrate that they came from a country far distant from Canaan. Which, though it was not true, yet there are those (particularly Puffendorf) who think it was not culpable, nor properly a lie; being a device to save their lives. For who will reprehend a person (saith he), who by a fiction preserves himself from being killed by an enemy? especially in such a case as this, wherein the Israelites suffered no damage by their craft? for what loss doth he sustain who is hindered from shedding another man's blood, but hath it in his power to despoil him of all he hath, and bring him into perpetual servitude, so disarmed and weakened that he can never rise up against him? Thus he. Which is a doctrine that ought not to be allowed.

Ver. 13. And these bottles of wine which we filled were new; and, behold, they be rent: and these garments and our shoes are become old by reason of the very long journey.] They use thus many words, to divert him from making any farther inquiry, what the name of their country was (lest some among the Israelites, who had many strangers in their camp, should have been able to disprove them), and mention only the long time they had spent in their journey, that he might be moved to be kind unto those who had taken so much pains to beg the favour of the Israelites.

Ver. 14. And the men.] That is, the persons mentioned ver. 7. who were the οἱ ἄρχοντες (as the LXX. here say), the princes or rulers of Israel.

Took of their victuals.] Not to eat them, but to inspect and examine them, whether their provision was so dry and mouldy as they pretended. For the word we translate victuals, is the very same with that we before translate provision, (ver. 5.) Which shews he doth not speak of victuals now prepared, but which they brought along with them. Some, indeed, think the meaning is, that they entered into a league with the Gibeonites, by tasting their victuals. But as this must suppose that they had made a feast for the entertainment of these princes, and invited them to it (which is altogether unlikely), so the making a league with them follows after this, in the next verse, and therefore was not made by taking of their victuals.

And asked not counsel of the mouth of the Lord.] These words may seem to favour the sense now mentioned; that by eating with them (which was a token of friendship) they had performed part of the ceremony which belonged to the making of leagues, without consulting the Divine Majesty about it, but hastily believing an improbable story. (See Gen. xxvi. 30, 31. xxxi. 44, 45.) But the meaning of these words may be no more than this; that they depended wholly upon their own judgment, and that founded on such slight examination of the truth, as only taking their victuals into their hands, and inspecting them, when God was near at hand to give them advice if they would have consulted him; and, it is probable, would have allowed them to make a league with the Gibeonites on such conditions as he directed.

Ver. 15. And Joshua made peace with them.] Following the opinion of the princes; who took them to be what they pretended.

And made a league with them, to let them live.] Not merely to spare their lives (which, supposing them to belong to a far country, they had no warrant to take away), but to let them continue in the enjoyment of all they had. For to live, in Scripture, signifies to be happy; and therefore he promised not to hurt, but to protect them in their rights and liberties.

And the princes of the congregation sware unto them.] Ratified the league by a solemn oath: the violation of which, in future times, was severely punished, (2 Sam. xxii. 6.)

Ver. 16. And it came to pass, at the end of three days after they had made a league with them, that they heard that they were their neighbours, and that they dwelt among them.] Speedy news being sent by the pretended ambassadors to Gibeon of their good success (as we may well think), there were great rejoicings made there, as Arius Montanus supposes. The report of which came to the Israelites three days after the league was concluded.

Ver. 17. And the children of Israel journeyed.] Not the whole body of the people, but a party was sent to understand the truth.

And came unto their cities on the third day.] On the third day after they began their march thither.

Now their cities were Gibeon, and Chephirah, and Beeroth, and Kirjath-jearim.] The capital city was Gibeon, (called a royal city, x. 2.) upon which the other three were dependents. The three first of which fell afterward to the tribe of Benjamin, (xviii. 25, 26.) as the last was in the tribe of Judah, (xv. 60.)

Ver. 18. And the children of Israel smote them not.] Though they were not such as they supposed, but Canaanites, who were under the curse of God; yet they did not destroy them, for the reason following.

Because the princes of the congregation had sworn unto them by the Lord God of Israel.] Some think their oath did not bind them, because it was made upon a false supposition, that the Gibeonites were no part of the seven nations of Canaan. But if this were true, as it is not, (see Grotius, de Jure Belli et Pacis, lib. ii. cap. 13. sect. 4.) the princes judged right, that it had been very scandalous, and would have highly dishonoured the name of God, by whom they had sworn, if they had broken their oath. By the keeping of which, the reverence which the Gibeonites had already to the Divine Majesty was very much increased; whereas it had been vile in all people's eyes, if the Israelites had not expressed this great regard unto it.

And all the congregation murmured against the princes.] Or, But all the congregation murmured, &c. because they were hereby deprived of the spoil of those cities.

Ver. 19. But all the princes said unto all the congregation.] Their unanimity in this opinion was of great moment to quiet the people's discontent.

We have sworn unto them by the Lord God of Israel.] Especially since they had engaged themselves, by a solemn oath, to their great and glorious Lord, who fought for them, and gave them all their victories, (ver. 13, 14.) For so the Targum here expounds these words, We have sworn by the Word of the Lord God of Israel.

Now, therefore, we may not touch them.] That is, do them any hurt; which we cannot do without breaking our oath, and forfeiting his favour.

Ver. 20. This we will do unto them, we will even let them live.] As they had covenanted, ver. 15.

Lest wrath be upon us, because of the oath which we sware unto them.] Lest God be very angry with us for breaking our oath. Which Joshua, as St. Ambrose observes, religiously observed, " Ne, dum alienam perfidiam arguit, suam fidem solveret," that he might not be guilty of so shameful a thing as to break his faith, whilst he reproved their perfidiousness. (Lib. iii. de Officiis, cap. 10.)

Ver. 21. And the princes said unto them.] But they added this.

Let them live.] Though we let them live, because we must be as good as our word, which is the meaning of the last words of this verse (which must be joined with these), as the princes had promised them.

But let them be hewers of wood, and drawers of water.] Yet they shall not be equal to us in all privileges, but we will make them in some sort serviceable to us; in such employments as will save us a great deal of labour.

Unto all the congregation.] They were not to be hewers of wood, and drawers of water, for every private person, but for the benefit of the whole congregation of Israel, who were bound to find wood and water for the service of God at the tabernacle. Which burden it was now resolved should be laid upon the Gibeonites; and thereby the children of Israel eased of it, ver. 23. where they are said to be made hewers of wood and drawers of water for the house of the Lord. This was no breach of their oath, for they did not make them absolutely slaves, but only a sacred kind of servants (as Josephus calls them), being employed about the house of God, which was in itself honourable, and not base and contemptible. Some think they were afterward called Nethinim, which signifies persons given to God for his service; of whom we read in 1 Chron. ix. 2. Ezra viii. 20. and other places.

Ver. 22. And Joshua called for them.] For the ambassadors, with whom he had made a league.

And he spake unto them, saying, Wherefore have ye beguiled us, &c.] Imposed upon our belief by a false story.

Ver. 23. Now therefore ye are cursed.] Notwithstanding our oath, you must not quite escape that curse of God which hath long lain upon all the people of Canaan, part of which you are. For a servile state of any sort, to which they were reduced, was no small punishment (called here a curse), and so much the more grievous, because it was to be perpetual.

And there shall none of you be freed from being bondmen.] None of them were to continue freemen, but have a servitude imposed upon them: not, indeed, such an one as made them entire slaves, but only condemned them to the laborious employment which here follows.

And hewers of wood, and drawers of water, for the house of my God.] This is the limitation of their servitude; which did not extend to all things, but only to these and such-like (it is probable); to hew stones, for instance, for the reparation of the temple after it was built, and to carry them to those who were employed in that work. Grotius hath well expressed their condition, "Addicti sunt personali cuidam servituti," they were addicted to certain personal servitude; whereas, if they had dealt plainly and openly with the Israelites, they might have been admitted only to pay a certain tribute. (Lib. ii. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 13. sect. 4. n. 3.)

Ver. 24. And they answered Joshua, and said, Because it was certainly told thy servants, how that the Lord thy God commanded his servant Moses to give you all the land, and to destroy all its inhabitants, therefore we were sore afraid of our lives because of you, and have done this thing.] They first give an answer unto Joshua's demand, Wherefore have ye beguiled us? Which was done to save themselves, if they could, by any shift, from that destruction which they believed God had decreed against all the inhabitants of their land; and they did not know how to evade it, but by this artifice; which, since it arose from some degree of faith, God suffered to take effect, that they might remain for ever among the Israelites, as an unquestionable witness of their miraculous conquest of the land of Canaan.

Ver. 25. And now, behold, we are in thy hand: as it seemeth good and right unto thee to do unto us, do.] Here they humbly submit to the doom he had passed upon them, or to any other imposition he should think fit to load them withal.

Ver. 26. And so he did unto them, and delivered them out of the hand of the children of Israel, that they slew them not.] But Joshua would take no farther advantage of their submission, but contented himself with this burden alone; which, by a public decree, he laid upon them. It appears by this, that some gentiles had more goodness in them than many of the children of Israel; who would have destroyed these well-disposed people (if Joshua had not hindered) who were better believers, being struck with a greater fear of God's threatenings than themselves.

Ver. 27. And Joshua made them that day hewers of wood, and drawers of water.] He passed this sentence into a law; that, from henceforth, they should be subject to this servitude; in which they served God faithfully even to the times of Nehemiah: who tells us great numbers of the Nethinims (who many great men make no doubt were of the posterity of these Gibeonites) returned from Babylon to rebuild Jerusalem and the temple, (Nehem. vii. 46, &c. 73.)

For the congregation, and for the altar of the Lord, even unto this day.] They served the congregation (who otherwise must themselves have done it) by serving the altar with wood and with water. Which, that they might do regularly, it is probable, they were dispersed throughout all the coasts of Israel, where the priests and Levites were settled, and came and served with them in their courses, and (as Conradus Pellicanus thinks) were maintained out of the public stock, and the profits of the altar. For they did not keep possession of their cities, but surrendered them to the tribe of Benjamin and Judah, to whose lot they fell; as we read in the following part of this book.

Concerning these words, unto this day, see iv. 9.

At the place which he should choose.] Which was now at Gilgal; afterward at Shiloh; and some time in Gibeon it fell; which was a city given to the priests; (Josh. xxi. 17.) and, as Maimonides saith (in his treatise of the Building of the Temple), after Shiloh was destroyed, the tabernacle was placed in Nob, and then in Gibeon: in which two places it continued fifty and seven years.

CHAP. X.

Ver. 1. NOW it came to pass, when Adonizedek king of Jerusalem.] Who seems to have been the most potent prince in Canaan, and carried in his name an honourable title, which had been anciently given to the kings of this place; who had been famous for doing justice. For, it is probable, that ever since Melchizedeck, who was king of Salem (the same with Jerusalem), and truly king of righteousness, as his name signified; they affected this title, though they did not always answer their character: for this Adonizedek (whose name imports the law of righteousness) had none of the virtues that were in Melchizedeck.

King of Jerusalem.] It is probably thought that this city held the name of Salem, which it had in Abraham's time, till the Israelites came into the land of Canaan; and then they called it Jerusalem, when they first took possession of it. Which they did not so fully, but that still the Jebusites dwelt there with the children of Benjamin, (see Judg. i. 8. 21.) who were so weak, that the Jebusites, in time, recovered it wholly to themselves, and expelled the Benjamites; see Judg. xix. 10. where it is called Jebus, though the other name is also acknowledged; because the Israelites called it Jerusalem, while the Jebusites, having prevailed, called it Jebus.

Heard how Joshud had taken Ai.] By which means the Israelites were come nearer to him, than when they took Jericho.

And had utterly destroyed it, (as he had done to Jericho and her king, so he had done to Ai and her king.)] And therefore it highly concerned him to provide, the best he could, for his own safety.

And how the inhabitants of Gibeon had made peace with Israel.] Especially, since one of the prime cities of the country had submitted to the Israelites.

And were among them.] Joined in society with them, or come as we now speak) into their interest.

Ver. 2. Then they feared greatly.] All his people thought themselves in great danger; they as well as their king having heard of the terrible execution Joshua had made at Jericho and Ai.

Digitized by Microsoft ®

Because Gibeon was a great city.] Having others depending on it.

As one of the royal cities.] The Vulgar Latin takes no notice of the particle caph (as), but saith it was a royal city. And, indeed, that particle doth not always denote likeness, but only the truth of the thing spoken of; as in Hosea iv. 4. and many other places of the New Testament, as well as the Old, (John i. 14. Phil. ii. 7.) But I think here it should be expressed, as we do in our translation; because Gibeon was not a royal city, that is, had no king in it that we read of; but was, notwithstanding, equal to those cities that had kings, being governed by elders, (ix. 11.) who were persons of very great authority.

And because it was greater than Ai.] More populous.

And all the men thereof were mighty.] The inhabitants were esteemed men of great valour; which made their revolt to the Israelites the more considerable.

Ver. 3. Wherefore Adonizedek king of Jerusalem sent unto Hoham king of Hebron, and unto Piram king of Jarmuth, and unto Japhia king of Lachish, and unto Debir king of Eglon, saying.] All these cities afterward belonged to the tribe of Judah; as appears from the following part of this book.

Ver. 4. Come unto me, and help me.] He was the most active in the war, and seems to have been of greatest power; calling the other kings only as auxiliaries to him.

That we may smite Gibeon.] He thought to discourage others from yielding, by making this city an example of their vengeance.

For it hath made peace unto Joshua, and with the children of Israel.] Forsaken the interest of their country, and gone over to our enemies.

Ver. 5. Therefore the five kings of the Amorites, the king of Jerusalem, &c.] It is certain that Hebron belonged to the Hittites; as Jerusalem did to the Jebusites. But the Amorites being the most powerful people in Canaan, (as appears from Gen. xv. 16.) had, it seems, brought them under their power, and set kings of their own nation over them. Whence it is, that the Gibeonites, who were originally Hivites, (ix. 17.) are said to be of the remnant of the Amorites, (2 Sam. xxi. 2.) because they were fallen under their power, when Joshua conquered their country.

Gathered themselves together.] Had a general meeting, and sent out a summons to all their people, who were fit for war, to rendezvous (as we speak) at the place they appointed.

And went up.] Though they lived in the high country, yet Jerusalem was still higher; where they seem to have all met, according to Adonizedek's desire, ver. 4.

They and all their hosts, and encamped before Gibeon.] Laid siege to it.

And made war against it.] Began to assault it.

Ver. 6. And the men of Gibeon sent unto Joshua to the camp to Gilgal.] Or, had sent, as soon as they heard of their march towards them.

Saying, Slack not thy hand from thy servants.] They doubted not of his succour, because they were his servants who had put themselves under his protection; but begged it might be speedy, for fear they should be overpowered by such numerous forces as were coming against them.

Come up quickly, and save us, and help us: for all the kings of the Amorites, that dwell in the mountains, are gathered together against us.] They did not hope to be preserved without his help; nor unless it arrived quickly.

Ver. 7. So Joshua ascended from Gilgal, he, and all the people of war with him, and all the mighty men of valour.] These last words are the explication of the former, as if he had said, All the people of war, even all the mighty men of valour. For it is not likely he took along with him all the fighting men (some of which were necessary to guard the camp at Gilgal), but only the choicest of them; on whose valour he could most rely, and who could march most swiftly to the relief of their confederates.

Ver. 8. And the Lord said unto Joshua.] Before he stirred a foot, he consulted the Divine Majesty about this expedition; who encouraged him to undertake it.

Fear them not: for I have delivered them into thine hand; there shall not a man of them stand before thee.] He promised him an entire victory; which emboldened him to fall upon them undauntedly.

Ver. 9. Joshua therefore came upon them suddenly, and went up from Gilgal all night.] Accordingly, Joshua made all the haste he could towards them, marching all night, that he might surprise them in their quarters (as I suppose he did) before they could draw out their army against him.

Ver. 10. And the Lord discomfited them before Israel.] The suddenness of the attack, no doubt, put them into great confusion. And besides, God struck a terror into them, which made them seek for safety by flight, rather than fighting.

And slew them with a great slaughter at Gibeon.] Near to the city, as the particle beth signifies in many places; particularly in the second chapter of this book, where Rahab's house is said to be upon the wall (we translate it, near or adjoining to the wall), and v. 13. where Joshua is said to be Bejericho, near to that city, for he was not in it when the Captain of the Lord's host appeared to him. (See Bochart's Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 50.)

And chased them along the way that goeth up to Beth-horon.] To the place which was called by this name, when this book was written; for there was no such place now; it being built after they were settled in Canaan by Sherah, daughter or grand-daughter of Ephraim; as we read in 1 Chron. vii. 24.

And smote them to Azekah, and unto Makkedah.] Two cities afterward in the tribe of Judah, (xv. 35. 41.) For, in the great confusion wherein they were, by the hailstones falling upon them (as it here follows), they fled backward and forward, as we speak, sometimes this way, sometimes the quite contrary (for Beth-horon lay northerly, and these other towns in the south), according as the hailstones, by the shifting of the wind, flew in their faces.

Ver. 11. And it came to pass, as they fled from before Israel, and were in the going down to Beth-horon.] Which was seated on the side of a hill; and seems to have taken its name from this wonderful storm here mentioned: for Beth-horon signifies as much, as the house or place of fury or anger.

That the Lord cast down great stones from heaven upon them.] The LXX. call them λίθους χαλάζης, hailstones of a vast bigness; which some think were accompanied with thunder and lightning. And thus the ancient heathen say, that Hercules was assisted in his war against Albion, &c. (See Vossius, lib. i. de Orig. et Progressu Idolol. cap. 26.)

And that raining of stones is not a fable, but a real truth, see him also, lib. iii. cap. 12. Plutarch also, in the life of Timoleon, relates how a terrible storm, in the face of the Carthaginian army, gave him a great victory over them, with a very few forces which he had to encounter them. They that desire to see more to this purpose may look into Huetius's Quæstiones Alnetanæ, lib. ii. cap. 12. sect. 12.

Unto Azekah.] This storm meeting them at Beth-horon drove them back to Azekah, as I observed on the foregoing verse.

And they died.] They upon whom the hailstones fell were killed by them.

They were more that died with the hailstones than they whom the children of Israel slew with the sword.] For they could not flee from the stones which came from heaven, as they did from the sword of Israel.

Ver. 12. Then spake Joshua unto the Lord.] This song, as the Hebrews call it, (see Masius.)

In the day when the Lord delivered up the Amorites before the children of Israel.] It is not certain at what time of the day he spake what follows. Many think, when the sun was declining; others, rather in the morning. For he marched all night to surprise them, and in all probability fell upon them by break of day; and having routed and chased them for some hours, and killed great numbers of them, and seen others fall by the hailstones, concluded he should destroy them all, if he had but time enough before night came to favour their escape. Which made him pray that he might have light to continue his pursuit, and gain a complete victory over them.

And he said, in the sight of Israel.] It is a frivolous observation of Maimonides, that, because it is not said in the sight of all Israel (before whom Moses did his miracles), Joshua was inferior to him, even when God wrought this stupendous miracle at his request: for all Israel did not hear him speak these words, but only some few; as many, perhaps, as were with Elijah at Mount Carmel, when he brought fire down from heaven to consume his sacrifice. But there is no question that Israel signifies all the army; who heard, or were told what he said.

Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon.] He desired it might stand immoveable, in that part of the heavens where he saw it now shining upon Gibeon.

And thou, Moon, in the valley of Ajalon.] There were more Ajalon's than one; and it is not certain which it is he means: but it is most likely that in the tribe of Dan, (xix. 42. Judg. i. 35.) which was farthest from Gibeon; for we must suppose these two places to have been at some distance, otherwise Joshua could not have seen the sun and the moon both appear at the same time; as it is probable they were both now in his eye, when he spake these words. It is not fit to enter into such questions as these; in what sign the sun now was, and whether the moon was in her increase or decrease, &c. They that can make, and are disposed to such inquiries, may consult Bonfrerius.

Ver. 13. And the sun stood still, and the moon stayed.] Thus Callimachus represents the sun as stopping the wheels of his chariot, to behold a chorus of nymphs; which so highly pleased him, that it made him prolong the day (ver. 181, 182. of his hymn to Diana):

Ἦλθε παρ' Ἠέλιος καλὸν χορὸν, ἀλλὰ θεῆται
Δίφρον ἐπιστήσας, τὰ δὲ φάεα μηκύνονται.

Where Ezek. Spanhemius excellently notes, that what the poets only fancied might be, was really done in the days of Joshua; and wishes Grotius had not followed some of the Jews, who make this only a poetical phrase to express a long summer's day: for the prophet Habakkuk represents it otherwise, and so do many of the Talmudic doctors. They that can consult Huetius also, in his Alnetanæ Quæstiones, (lib. ii. cap. 12. sect. 27.) will find enough to shame those who disbelieve this history: when they read a great number of stories among the heathen, which shew they thought it within the power of their gods to do such things. And, among other memorable things, he doth not forget the ancient tradition of the Egyptians, related by Herodotus, (in his Enterpe, cap. 142.) concerning the stupendous alteration of the course of the sun. And our Dr. Jackson hath observed, that the heathen people of those times did note this miraculous event, and deliver the tradition of it to their posterity; who, as men are wont to do, endeavour to assign some cause of it. And the poets in ages following ascribe it (with some additions) unto that unnatural murder which Atreus committed: at which the heavens blushed, and the sun stood still. For this bloody fact, if Statius mistake not, was in the time of the Theban war; and that is placed, by good chronologers, about the time of Joshua's conquest of Canaan. (See book i. upon the Creed, chap. 15.) But in this he was deceived, for Atreus lived in the days of the Judges.

Until the people had avenged themselves upon their enemies.] Till they had gained a complete victory, and utterly destroyed their enemies.

Is not this written in the book of Jasher?] The Targum expounds it, in the book of the law: as if the meaning was, that there God had foretold what wonders he would do for his people. But from the marginal translation (which is, the book of the upright, or of righteous men) others take it for a book where was recorded the wonderful things done by or for the religious heroes. And there are some probable arguments that it was written in verse, to fix these things in the memory of the people. Grotius is of this opinion: for we find mention of it no where else, but only in 2 Sam. i. 18. and there it is mentioned upon account of a song made upon the death of Saul and Jonathan by king David, who caused it to be recorded in this book. Which was not accounted sacred (being written by several hands and in several ages), and so not preserved with such care as this and the other canonical books were. As for their opinion who think this book contained the ancient annals of the Jews more largely than they are recorded in this and the following books, it hath no ground at all; but is invented merely to frame an argument from thence, that Joshua was not the author of this book; but that it was collected in aftertimes, out of this great Chronicle, by somebody who made an abridgment of it. But Du Pin hath well observed, that it is not said here the wars of Joshua were related in the book of Jasher; but only that mention is made therein of the miracle by which the moon stood still.

So the sun stood still.] There is no more mention of the moon; for it was the light of the sun that made the day.

In the midst of heaven.] This doth not necessarily signify that it stood still precisely in the meridian point; but that it appeared visibly to every body, fixed in the same place where it was, when Joshua spake the foregoing words, to which he was moved, no doubt, by a Divine inspiration.

And hastened not to go down about a whole day.] It may be simply translated, a whole day: the particle caph, as I observed before, signifying oftentimes nothing of similitude, but the very thing itself. Therefore I look upon Maimonides's explication as ungrounded; who by kajom thamim (as a whole day) understands only as the longest day in summer, (More Nevochim, par. xi. cap. 35.) Which was a poor business, it being now summer-time, when this miracle was wrought: and, as Lyra thinks, in the month of June.

Ver. 14. And there was no day like that before it, or after it, that the Lord hearkened to the voice of a man.] That is, did at his desire (or rather command) such a stupendous thing as this. Whereby he gave an evident demonstration, that he who did such wonders in Egypt, and at the Red Sea, and the river Jordan, had an absolute power not only over the elements (as we call them) and all inferior creatures, but over the heavenly bodies, the sun, moon, and stars, whom the heathen worshipped. They have strange love to cavilling, who would hence have it thought this book was not written by Joshua: when, if he wrote it in his old age, there were many days passed since this prodigy, as Huetius well observes in his Demonstr. Evang. p. 186. See various opinions about the length of this day in Sixtinus Amama's Antibarbarus Biblicus, lib. iii. p. 381, &c.

For the Lord fought for Israel.] By throwing stones from heaven upon their enemies; and giving the Israelites strength to pursue them; and stopping the sun's course, that they might not want light for their pursuit; and preserving them from the stones which fell upon their enemies, and not upon them, though mingled with them in the fight.

Ver. 15. And Joshua returned, and all Israel with him, unto the camp to Gilgal.] The LXX. in the common copies wholly omit this verse; because Joshua did not return to Gilgal, till he had done what follows: and then he speaks of his return, in the same words and syllables, ver. 43. but it is in the edition of Hervasius, 1540. as my most learned friend Dr. Alix informs me; and the meaning of it here, therefore, is no more than this; that he was about to return, till he heard where the five kings were; and that many of the enemies were still remaining.

Ver. 16. But these five kings.] Mentioned ver. 3.

Fled.] Escaped the sword of the Israelites by flight; being provided, perhaps, with swift beasts for that purpose; and taking some by-ways, separate from their scattered forces, so that the hailstones did not fall upon them.

And hid themselves in a cave.] Which they knew to have secret lurking-places in it; where they could not be easily discovered.

At Makkedah.] In the confines of that city. Which not being yet taken, Joshua could not command great stones to be rolled upon the mouth of the cave, if it had been in the city itself.

Ver. 17. And it was told Joshua, saying, That the five kings were hid in a cave at Makkedah.] It is likely Joshua had given a particular charge about them; and they made no inquiry what was become of them, till it was discovered, that they were in this place.

Ver. 18. And Joshua said, Roll great stones upon the mouth of the cave.] To hinder their coming out.

And set men by it for to keep them.] He ordered a guard also, to see that none removed the stones.

Ver. 19. And stay you not, but pursue after your enemies.] They that brought this intelligence, were, it is likely, some officers in the army; whom he would not have to stop their pursuit of the scattered Canaanites, by looking after these kings; but leave it to others to take care to keep them safe shut up in the cave.

And smite the hindermost of them.] He means all that they could overtake in their flight.

Suffer them not to enter into their cities.] And hinder the rest from retreating into their own cities; by which means they would not remain in a body together; but dispersed here and there, where they could save themselves.

For the Lord your God hath delivered them into your hand.] Given you an opportunity to complete their destruction.

Ver. 20. And it came to pass, when Joshua and the children of Israel.] i. e. The children of Israel, by the command and direction of Joshua, who sent out strong parties to pursue them; but he himself seems to have gone to lay siege to Makkedah.

Had made an end of slaying them with a very great slaughter, till they were consumed.] Till there was none of them to be seen in a body together.

That the rest which remained of them entered into fenced cities.] Those few that escaped got into such fortified cities as they could reach.

Ver. 21. And all the people.] Who had been sent out, and engaged in pursuit of the enemy.

Returned to the camp to Joshua at Makkedah.] Where, no doubt, he had ordered a general rendezvous, as we now speak, of the whole army that had been employed in this war.

In peace.] The LXX. translate it ὑγιεῖς, sound and safe; and the Vulgar, "sani et integro numero;" sound and without the loss of a man. Which is to be understood of that detachment sent to pursue them, (ver. 19.) who came all safe to the camp, and not a man of them lost, or so much as wounded.

None moved his tongue against any of the children of Israel.] There was not so much as a dog that barked at them. For that word dog is to be supplied (as Bochartus thinks) according to what we read, Exod. xi. 7. (See Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 55.) It is an expression of the great tranquillity wherein they were, and of an entire victory, there being not so much as a dog left to disturb them.

Ver. 22. Then said Joshua, Open the mouth of the cave, and bring out those five kings unto me out of the cave.] The wisdom of Joshua is here observed by Arius Montanus, who would not do this execution till all the people were returned to the camp to be witnesses of it. And he might have added, that he executed them before he assaulted Makkedah, that the inhabitants of that city might see there was no hope of any succour from those kings who had been very powerful.

Ver. 23. And they did so, and brought forth those five kings unto him out of the cave, the king of Jerusalem, the king of Hebron, &c.] They are named in the same order as in ver. 3. according to their rank and quality; for next to the king of Jerusalem, who was the chief, the king of Hebron seems to have been of greatest note; and so of the rest. The same Montanus thinks it probable, that as they brought them forth and set them before Joshua, they said, This is the king of Jerusalem; and then, This is the king of Hebron, &c.

Ver. 24. And it came to pass, when they brought out those kings to Joshua, that Joshua called for all the men of Israel.] That is, all the men of war.

And said unto the captains of the men of war which were with him.] That is, the great officers of the army.

Come near, put your feet upon the necks of these kings.] Who lay bound, I suppose, prostrate upon the ground.

And they came near, and put their feet upon the necks of them.] Not out of insolence and pride; but in token that these kings and their countries were brought in absolute subjection to them; and that God had fulfilled his promise, (Deut. xxxiii. ult.)

Ver. 25. And Joshua said, Fear not, nor be dismayed; be strong, and of good courage.] The same that Moses had said to them all long ago, Deut. i. 21. 29. and God had lately said to Joshua, i. 6, 7. 9. and might be said with greater reason now, when they saw their greatest enemies lie prostrate under their feet.

For thus shall the Lord do to all your enemies against whom you fight.] To all the inhabitants of Canaan.

Ver. 26. And afterward Joshua smote them, and slew them.] After they had trampled upon them he ordered them to be killed.

And hanged them on five trees.] As a mark of infamy, whereby a terror was struck into all others.

And they were hanging on the trees till the evening.] Exposed to this contempt all that long day; which God made on purpose that they might do all the great things beforementioned, and what follows, before the night came upon them. Then their bodies were taken down, not in honour to them, but in honour to the land of Israel, where God now dwelt. So Aben Ezra.

Ver. 27. And it came to pass, at the time of the going down of the sun, that Joshua commanded, and they took them down off the trees, and cast them into the cave wherein they had been hid, &c.] He had given this order as soon as they were hanged, according to the law of Moses, by which he acted before at Ai, (viii. 29.) And with their bodies he cast all the instruments of their punishment (the trees, and whatsoever fastened them unto them) into the cave, as Maimonides saith, and the Samaritan Chronicle here particularly observes.

Ver. 28. And that day Joshua took Makkedah.] The same day the king of it was hanged; and it seems to be probable it was on that long day (as I said before) which God made that they might complete their conquest of these kings; and when they had done, take this city also. Our great primate of Ireland indeed, by that day, understands the same day that he set down before the city; which he thinks was some time after what is before related.

And smote it with the edge of the sword, and the king thereof he utterly destroyed.] He was slain among the rest, and not taken alive as the king of Ai was.

Them, and all the souls that were therein.] All the fighting men, together with the women and children; because they had refused the offers of peace, sent them from Joshua, before he invaded their land.

He let none remain.] But saved the cattle, which they took, with their goods, for a prey.

And he did to the king of Makkedah as he did to the king of Jericho.] What he did to the king of Jericho is not recorded; but by what is said of other kings, it is probable that he hanged him up after he was found dead.

Ver. 29. Then Joshua passed from Makkedah.] This only signifies what was their next expedition; for it is likely they refreshed themselves awhile before they left this place.

All Israel with him.] All that he brought along with him to the relief of Gibeon. (See ver. 7.)

Unto Libnah.] A city which fell to the share of the tribe of Judah, in the division of the land, (xv. 42.) and was one of the cities given to the priests, (xxi. 13. 1 Chron. vi. 57.)

And fought against Libnah.] Laid siege to it, and planted their batteries against it.

Ver. 30. And the Lord delivered it also, and the king thereof, into the hand of Israel.] They made an easy conquest of it, because God gave it up into their hand.

And he smote it with the edge of the sword, and all the souls that were therein, &c.] The same words whereby the destruction of Makkedah is described, ver. 28. For both these cities favoured the five kings beforementioned, and therefore (as Conradus Pellicanus thinks) were destroyed utterly, not only by the command of God, but by the right of war. But the command of God was the only ground, as it is expressed, ver. 40.

Ver. 31. And Joshua passed from Libnah, and all Israel with him, unto Lachish.] Another city which fell to the tribe of Judah, (xv. 39.) and was not far from Libnah.

And encamped against it, and fought against it.] This, it seems, was a stronger city than either of the former; for there is no mention of an encampment against them before they began their assault.

Ver. 32. And the Lord delivered Lachish into the hand of Israel.] He doth not add, and the king thereof, as he doth of Makkedah and Libnah, (ver. 28. 30.) because he was one of the five kings which he had lately hanged, and they had not, it is likely, set a new one on his throne, (ver. 23.)

Which took it on the second day.] After they began the siege; or, the second day after the taking of Makkedah and Libnah. The former is most likely, because their encampment against it signifies they spent some time before it.

And smote it with the edge of the sword, &c.] These words, and the following, are the very same with what he said before of the two forenamed cities; only he doth not add, he let none remain, which is to be supposed.

Ver. 33. Then Horam king of Gezer came up to help Lachish.] This was a city afterward in the tribe of Ephraim, (xvi. 10.) belonging to the Levites, (xxi. 21.) and not far from Gibeon, as may be guessed from 1 Chron. xiv. 16.

And Joshua smote him and his people, until he had left him none remaining.] If he destroyed his city at this time, he returned to Lachish. And it is probable, he sent forth a detachment to fight Horam and his army; who having routed them, destroyed also their city, and then went on with the siege of Lachish.

Ver. 34. And from Lachish Joshua passed unto Eglon.] Which also belonged afterward to Judah, (xv. 39.) and seems to have been as considerable as Lachish; for it follows, that they encamped against it, and fought against it, as they had done against the other. Their king was one of the five who were killed and hanged before, (ver. 23.)

Ver. 35. And they took it on that day.] The same day they set down before it; for none came to their relief, as Horam did to help Lachish, which may be one reason that city was not taken till the second day, (ver. 32.)

And smote it with the edge of the sword, &c.] The same he had said of the forenamed cities; only he saith, he utterly destroyed all that were therein on the same day, which is the same with those words, he let none remain.

Ver. 36. And Joshua went up from Eglon, and all Israel with him, unto Hebron; and they fought against it.] This was also a city of Judah, (as every one knows, xv. 54.) and was seated in the mountainous country, as the former were in the plain, which is the reason he is said to go up to it from Eglon.

Ver. 37. And they took it, and smote it with the edge of the sword, and the king thereof.] Their king was one of the five whom Joshua had lately killed and hanged. But, it seems, they had set up a new one, being a city of great note, which had other cities depending on it, as it follows in the next words.

And all the cities thereof.] It was not only one of the royal cities, which had other cities subject to it (as Gibeon had, which was a kind of royal city), but of very great power. For these words import, as if there were many cities under its jurisdiction.

And all the souls that were therein: he left none remaining, &c.] In this conquest, Caleb was very instrumental, and signalized himself (as we now speak) by driving out the three sons of Anak (xv. 13, 14.) who were slain there, (Judg. i. 10.) Thus we must understand this history; or else say, as some do, either that Joshua only took the city and destroyed it, but could not take the citadel, or strong fort, on the top of the mountain, (which doth not seem to be exactly true, for we read in the next chapter, ver. 21, 22. that he cut off the Anakims from the mountains, &c.) or that, after he had destroyed it, as is here related, the Anakims came from Gaza, and other cities of the Philistines, whither they now fled, and peopled it again, but were expelled again by Caleb, as some understand xiv. 12. (See Judg. i. 10.)

Ver. 38. And Joshua returned, and all Israel with him, to Debir, and fought against it.] He had not been there before, but having gone as far south and west as he thought fit, (even as far as Gaza, which was in the western coast, ver. 41.) he turned his course towards the camp at Gilgal, which was now north-east from him, and in his way thither took Debir, which also was a city of Judah, (xv. 49.) and one of the cities of the priests, (xxi. 15. 1 Chron. vi. 58.) called also Kiriath-Sepher, and Kiriath-Sanna.

Ver. 39. And he took it, and the king thereof, and all the cities thereof, &c.] It was a great city (we may gather from hence, like to Hebron), in the conquest of which Othniel the brother of Caleb did great service, and therefore it was given to him, as we read, xv. 15—17. and Judg. i. 11.

Ver. 40. So Joshua smote all the country of the hills, and of the south, and of the vale, and of the springs, and all their kings.] He forbears to name all the cities he took, and, in short, saith he subdued the whole country that lay south and west (as it is explained in the next verse), of whatsoever sort it was; both the hilly and the low country: for they that describe countries are wont to have respect to two things; the condition and quality of the soil, and then the situation: the first of these he expresses in this verse, and the other in the next. For here he describes it as partly hilly and dry, and partly plain and full of springs.

He left none remaining, but utterly destroyed all that breathed.] Which must be restrained to mankind; for they kept their cattle as a prey to themselves.

As the Lord God of Israel commanded.] This is added as a justification of the Israelites, from all imputation of cruelty or severity; for they only executed a Divine sentence against this people for their abominable wickedness, (Lev. xviii. 24, 25, &c.) wherewith the Israelites would have been in danger to be infected, if they had not been extirpated.

Ver. 41. And Joshua smote them from Kadesh-barnea.] Which was in the south of Canaan, as appears from Numb. xxxiv. 4. and chap. xv. of this book, ver. 3. where it is mentioned as belonging to the tribe of Judah.

Even unto Gaza.] A city of the Philistines, in the west part of Canaan, towards the south.

And all the country of Goshen.] There was a city in the tribe of Judah of this name, which lay in the mountains, as Hebron did, in the southern part of the country, (xv. 51.) From which city, the region thereabouts was called the country of Goshen: which had excellent pasture-ground in it, and was well watered (like that country in Egypt of the same name), and thence was called Goshen, as Conradus Pellicanus conjectures; because the Hebrew word geshem signifies large showers, which make the earth fruitful.

Even unto Gibeon.] Which was in the more northerly part of the country. And therefore, as before he gave an account of his conquest from the south to the west; so here of his conquest from the south to the north.

Ver. 42. All these kings, and their land, did Joshua take at one time.] In one expedition.

Because the Lord God of Israel fought for Israel.] Which made their conquest easy and speedy. The Targum hath it, The Lord God of Israel, by his Word, fought for Israel. That is, by him who appeared to Joshua as the captain of the Lord's host, ver. 13, 14.

Ver. 43. And Joshua returned, and Israel with him, unto the camp to Gilgal.] To refresh themselves with the company of their wives and children; and to make those who were left to defend them partakers of their booty; but especially to return solemn thanks to God for their victories at his house, which was now settled at Gilgal.

Our great primate of Ireland thinks, that this war with the five kings, that came against Gibeon, &c. concluded this famous year. In the first part of which Moses took the kingdoms of Sihon and Og on the other side Jordan; and in the latter part of it Joshua conquered a great part of the land of Canaan; and in the middle of it the manna ceased, and they ate of the fruit of the country. So that in the autumn of this year they began to sow, and consequently, from this time, they began to number their sabbatical years. (See him in his Annals, A. M. 2554.) But another great man (Dr. Alix) admonishes me, that this is against the opinion of the ancient Jews, who suppose that the first year of the semitah was the fourteenth after their entrance into Canaan: for the land must have been divided before it was cultivated; and so the sabbath of the land must be seven years after the division.

CHAP. XI.

Ver. 1. AND it came to pass, that when Jabin king of Hazor.] This city was the metropolis of the northerly part of Canaan, (ver. 10.) and fell to the share of the tribe of Naphtali in the division of the land, (xix. 36.) Jabin was the name of the king of the Canaanites in this part of the country in future times, and reigned in this very city, (Judg. iv. 2.)

Heard of these things.] Of the conquest Joshua had made of so many kings, and their kingdoms, in the south and the west part of the land.

That he sent to Jobab king of Madon.] This is the name of a place we read of no where else, but was subject, no doubt, unto Hazor, as the rest were.

And to the king of Shimron.] A place afterward in the tribe of Zebulun, near to the country of Naphtali, (xix. 15.)

And to the king of Achshaph.] In the tribe of Asher, (xix. 25.) These two last places Arius Montanus thinks were more remote from Hazor than Madon, and lay towards the south near Mount Tabor, being the only southern people that remained after the five kings were destroyed. But towards the north, and the east, and the west, there were many still left, whom Jabin now gathered together.

Ver. 2. And to the kings that were in the north of the mountains.] Or, mountainous country, near Lebanon; for that was in the north part of Canaan.

And in the plains south of Cinneroth.] In the flat country, which lay south of the lake called afterward Gennesaret, now Cinneroth. (See Numb. xxxiv. 11.)

And in the valley.] Some conjecture he means that pleasant valley between Mount Hermon and Mount Gilboa, called the valley of Jezreel.

And the borders of Dor.] A city, with a country belonging to it, in the tribe of Manasseh, (xvii. 11.)

On the west.] Upon the midland sea. Where Josephus mentions (in his second book against Appion) a city called Dora, near Mount Carmel. (See Bochartus in his Canaan, lib. i. cap. 41. p. 752.)

Ver. 3. And to the Canaanite.] The people peculiarly so called.

On the east, and on the west.] It hath been noted before, that some of this people lived in the east near Jordan; and other of them in the west, near the midland sea. (See Numb. xiii. 29.)

And to the Amorite, and the Hittite, and the Perizzite.] There were other Amorites scattered up and down the country, besides those who were subject to the five kings mentioned in the foregoing chapter, ver. 5. who were all now assembled together by Jabin, with the rest of the Hittites and Perizzites (who were in several parts of the country), that they might make as powerful an army as could be raised.

And the Jebusite, in the mountains.] About Jerusalem, where they kept a strong hold till the time of David; as the Perizzites lived in other mountainous and woody countries, as Bochartus observes.

And to the Hivite under Hermon.] This was a mountain in the north-east part of the country, where some Hivites were settled, as others were about Gibeon. That Hermon was easterly, appears from Psal. lxxxix. 12. whence it is that the Hivites are called Kadmonites, that is, easterlings, (Gen. xv. 19.) as Bochart hath observed in his Phaleg. lib. iv. cap. 36. and in his Canaan, lib. i. cap. 19.

In the land of Mizpeh.] There were several cities of this name; one in the tribe of Judah, (xv. 38.) another belonging to Benjamin, (xviii. 26.) and two more beyond Jordan in the land of Gilead; one in the tribe of Gad, the other in the tribe of Manasseh, or very near it; which gave name to the country about it, and seems to be here intended.

Ver. 4. And they went out.] The kings of all these people.

They and all their hosts with them, much people, even as the sand that is upon the sea-shore in multitude.] A vast army, which could not easily be numbered; or, which covered the place where they were encamped, as sand doth the sea-shore; so that nothing could be seen but armed men, horses, and chariots, &c. It is a proverbial speech in Scripture for vast numbers of men, or great quantities of corn; or exceeding much knowledge and wisdom, as every one knows.

With horses and chariots very many.] This made them the more formidable, because the Israelites were all footmen: who might easily be beaten by a strong body of horse; especially when they had chariots also, which carried men in them, (see upon Deut. xx. 1.) and they had great numbers also of them, as these words intimate. Josephus makes their chariots alone to have been twenty thousand. The land of Canaan, indeed, did not breed horses (as I have often observed), but they might easily procure them out of Egypt, and they trusted much to this kind of forces, wherein the Egyptians excelled most people. (See Deut. xvii. 16.)

Ver. 5. And when all these kings were met together.] In some place which the king of Hazor appointed for a general rendezvous. For though this multitude were of different nations, yet they all now combined against the Israelites. But it was a great providence of God, that as all this country was not united under one head, but divided into several petty kingdoms; so they did not all enter into a confederacy at the first against Joshua, but fought severally; only five of their kings joining together. Though now they seem to have seen their error; and therefore, all that remained, joined, as one man, to oppose Joshua's further proceeding.

They came and pitched together at the waters of Merom, to fight against Israel.] They marched to these waters, and there formed a camp, to prepare, and set themselves in order, to give Israel battle. These waters, all agree, were that lake which Josephus calls Σάμα χωνίτιδα, from the abundance of fishes that were in it: for Samachon, or Semechon, in the Arabic language, signifies a fish, (as Bochart observes in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. i. cap. 6.) and Joshua here calls the waters of Merom; that is, the upper waters; for this lake was near the fountain of Jordan, which ran through the lake of Tiberias, and fell into the lake Asphaltites, or the Dead Sea. With respect to which waters, these were called the upper, they being lower. And here they pitched rather than any other place, being under the jurisdiction of Jabin, who had called them together: for Hazor, where he reigned, was situate upon this lake, as Josephus tells us, lib. v. Antiq. cap. 6.

Ver. 6. And the Lord said unto Joshua.] Who went, it is probable, (as he had done formerly, x. 8.) to consult the Divine Majesty, how he should manage himself upon this great occasion.

Be not afraid of them.] Some collect from hence (even Josephus himself) that Joshua was possessed with some fear, when he heard of such a numerous army, and so well appointed, coming against him. But I do not think it at all probable, that after so many late assurances and signal demonstrations, as God had given him of his presence with him in this war, he should be capable of this passion. (See the first chapter of this book, ver. 2, 3. 6, 7. 9. iii. 7. 9, 10. v. 13—15. x. 8.) Therefore these words were spoken to him, that he might animate the people, whose hearts were apt to fail them, when they saw such terrible enemies.

For to-morrow, about this time.] It is not certain what this time was; but it is likely in the morning after he had marched all night, (as he did against the five kings, x. 9.) that he might fall upon them unexpectedly.

I will deliver them up all slain before Israel.] The LXX. translate it τετροπωμένους, put to flight. Which agrees with what follows; for it is certain they were not all slain, but many of them fled, and the Israelites pursued them: and therefore other copies of the LXX. have it τετρωμένους, wounded; so broken and shattered, that they were all in effect dead men.

Thou shalt hough their horses.] Cut their hamstrings, and thereby render them unfit for future service.

And burn their chariots with fire.] That they might be no more used; no, not by the Israelites themselves.

Ver. 7. And Joshua came, and all the people of war with him, against them, to the waters of Merom.] He did not wait for their motion; but attacked them as they lay in their quarters; for that is signified by the next word.

Suddenly.] When they thought not of an enemy near them; but were consulting, perhaps, how to manage the war against the Israelites.

And they fell upon them.] When they were unprovided to make such resistance as they would have done, if they had been ready to receive them.

Ver. 8. And the Lord delivered them into the hand of Israel, who smote them.] Routed and killed a great many of them.

And chased them to great Zidon.] This, it seems, was a large city, and of great note in these days (for there was no Zidon the less), built by the eldest son of Canaan (as Josephus thinks), from whom it had its name. (See Gen. x. 15.) It lay in the north-west part of Canaan, upon the sea.

And unto Misrephoth-maim.] It is thought by some that this was a place where there were hot waters, which I shall not examine, but only note it is a probable conjecture, from xiii. 6. that it was a place in the country of Zidon where they made salt.

Unto the valley of Mizpeh eastward.] See ver. 3. This signifies, that, in their confusion, some of them fled westward to Zidon and Misrephoth-maim, and others eastward towards Mizpeh.

And they smote them, till they left them none remaining.] As they divided themselves, and fled several ways; so did the Israelites send out several parties, both to the west and to the east, who pursued them so close, that they let not a man of them escape.

Ver. 9. And Joshua did unto them as the Lord bade him: he houghed their horses, and burnt their chariots with fire.] We do not read, as Kimchi notes upon this place, of any horses or chariots which the five kings, mentioned in the foregoing chapter, brought into the field; because they went only to besiege Gibeon, and hoped to take it presently by an assault, in which there was no use of horses and chariots; which they did not want, no more than these kings, who abounded in them, and placed their principal confidence in their horsemen and chariots. Which was the reason God commanded them to hough their horses; that is, to cut their nerves and sinews in their hams, which Josephus translates ἀχρήστους ποιεῖν, to make them useless and unprofitable: for God would not have his people place their safety and security in this, but in himself alone, as good people always did, (Psal. xx. 7.) Accordingly, when David had conquered Hadedezar, and taken from him a great number of horses and chariots, he disabled all the horses, after this example of Joshua (as if God intended by him to teach all future rulers of his people what to do), reserving only as many as would serve for a hundred chariots, (2 Sam. viii. 4.) And Schickardus observes, out of the Jewish authors, that they were wont thus to enervate all the horses they found in the king's stables after his death, that they might not be of use to his successor. (See his Mischpat Hammelech, cap. 6. Theor. 19. and Bochart's Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 11.)

Ver. 10. And Joshua at that time.] Before he thought of returning to his camp at Gilgal.

Turned back.] From pursuing those that fled towards the western coast.

And took Hazor.] Which was in the eastern part of the country, upon the lake beforementioned.

And smote the king thereof with the sword.] This was one reason, it is likely, why he made haste to invest Hazor; because the king thereof, who was the chief author of this war, had escaped out of the battle, and thought to defend himself there.

For Hazor before-time was the head of all those kingdoms.] Not of all the kingdoms of Canaan; but of all those mentioned in the beginning of this chapter. Which was another reason why he fell upon it at this time; that by taking the most considerable city of this part of Canaan, all the rest might be disheartened to hold out against him.

Ver. 11. And they smote all the souls that were therein with the edge of the sword, utterly destroying them; there was not any left to breathe.] See x. 40.

And he burnt Hazor with fire.] Which the Canaanites afterward rebuilt, and possessed it for some time; another king of the same name reigning in it, (Judg. iv. 2.) For the kings of this city were called Jabin in many successions, as the Egyptian kings were called Pharaoh, and the kings of the Philistines Abimelech, &c.

Ver. 12. And the cities of those kings, and all the kings of them, did Joshua take.] viz. Those mentioned ver. 2, 3. whom Jabin drew into confederacy with him; and perhaps were his dependents.

And smote them with the edge of the sword; and he utterly destroyed them.] That is, all their inhabitants.

As Moses, the servant of the Lord, commanded.] Deut. vii. 2. and many other places.

Ver. 13. But as for the cities that stood still in their strength.] The Hebrew words all thillam (which we translate in their strength) literally signify on their heap, as is noted in the margin of our Bibles; that is, were seated in an eminent place, and therefore of greater strength than those that stood in the plain. Thus Bochart interprets it in his Canaan, lib. i. cap. 29. from whence he thinks came the names of Thelasar, (2 Kings xix. 12.) and of Thelabib, (Ezek. iii. 15.) And thus I observe the prophet Jeremiah speaks, xxx. 18. Jerusalem shall be built on her own heap, or high hill. But the meaning may be, according to our translation, the cities whose walls were not battered down in the taking of them.

Israel burnt none of them.] Because they intended to dwell in them; and would not be at the charge and pains of building new walls for their safety.

But Hazor only; that did Joshua burn.] Because it was the capital city, and began this war against them; which being laid desolate by the Israelites, without inhabitant, the Canaanites took their opportunity to rebuild it, and settle themselves there again.

Ver. 14. And all the spoil of these cities, and the cattle, the children of Israel took for a prey unto themselves.] As the Lord allowed them to do at Ai, (viii. 2.)

But every man they smote with the edge of the sword, until they had destroyed them, &c.] Because God had often commanded these nations should be rooted out for their abominable wickedness; lest the Israelites should be drawn in to imitate them in their filthy lewdness, as I observed from Lev. xviii. 24—26, &c. See also xx. 22, 23, &c.

Ver. 15. As the Lord commanded Moses his servant.] See Exod. xxxiv. 11, 12, &c.

So did Moses command Joshua.] See Numb. xxvi. 19. Deut. xxxi. 7.

And so did Joshua: he left nothing undone of all that the Lord commanded Moses.] Which is a demonstration that Moses left in writing what we read the Lord commanded in the foregoing books, and that they were not written (as some pretend) in later times: for then it would have been impossible for Joshua to have executed every thing that he commanded, unless he had had the book of the law before him for his direction. But so desirous are some men to weaken the authority of these holy books, that from hence they argue this book of Joshua could not be written by himself, but some other; because he gives himself this high commendation. So the author of Theolog. Polit. who by the same reason might have rejected St. Paul's Epistles as none of his, and Cæsar's Commentaries; for both of them relate their own virtues, and the noble things they did.

Ver. 16. And Joshua took all that land.] Belonging to the kings beforementioned.

The hills, and all the south country, and all the land of Goshen, and the valley, and the plain.] This is a description of his whole conquest, as appears from x. 40.

The mountain of Israel.] It is very uncertain what place this was; but many think it probable to be Beth-el: where God appeared to Jacob as he went to Padan-Aram, and promised to give him this land, (Gen. xxviii. 12, 13.) and where he dwelt, by God's direction, after he came from Padan-Aram, and God appeared again to him there, and made him the same promise, and changed his name from Jacob to Israel, (Gen. xxxv. 1. 9, 10, &c.)

And the valley of the same.] Belonging to the same mountain. But Conradus Pellicanus thinks the singular number is put for the plural, and thus explains the whole verse: The land of Israel was partly in the hill-country, partly in the south towards Egypt, partly in the plain near the great sea, and the sea of Sodom, and the spring of Jordan, near Tabor, in Galilee. And moreover, the mountains of Israel were the two Carmels, Hermon, Gilead, Lebanus, those about Jerusalem, and many other.

Ver. 17. Even from the Mount Halak.] Or the stony mountain, as Bochart interprets it, lib. i. Canaan, cap. 5.

That goeth up to Mount Seir.] Which was the bounds of the country of Edom.

Even unto Baal-Gad, in the valley of Lebanon, under Mount Hermon.] As in the foregoing words he expresses the bounds of Joshua's conquest southward; so hither they reached northward. And this seems to be a description of the length of the country which he took from the king of Hazor, and all those that joined with him, as Archbishop Usher understands it.

And all their kings he took, and smote them, and slew them.] So that none appeared to make head against him.

Ver. 18. Joshua made war a long time with all those kings.] But those kings were so many, and made such great opposition, that he spent six years (as the forenamed great person computes) in this war before he could finish it.

Ver. 19. There was not a city that made peace with the children of Israel.] This is the reason the war continued so long, because there was but one city that surrendered on such terms as had been offered them; but all the rest obstinately refused to yield unto Joshua.

Save only the Hivites, the inhabitants of Gibeon.] See viii. 3. Who, if they had truly discovered who they were (which out of fear they concealed), and begged peace, they might have obtained it on such conditions as were proposed to all.

All other they took in battle.] By force of arms.

Ver. 20. For it was of the Lord to harden their hearts, that they should come against Israel in battle.] Being a people obstinately wicked, God ordered things so in his providence, that they were emboldened (notwithstanding the wonders they had certainly heard were done for Israel) to fight with them. By which it appears the Gibeonites were a better sort of people, who considered what God had done in favour of the Israelites.

That he might destroy them utterly, and that they might have no favour.] Which they might have found, if they had not been so fool-hardy (as we speak) as to imagine they could withstand those before whom the river Jordan fled, and the walls of Jericho fell down flat.

But that he might destroy them, as the Lord commanded Moses.] In many places, particularly in Deut. vii. 2. xx. 16, 17.

Ver. 21. And at that time.] That is, in the war beforementioned, and perhaps in the conclusion of it; after he had left none to oppose him in other places, but only in those mountainous countries which were of difficult access.

Came Joshua.] Either from the camp at Gilgal, or from destroying the kings and their countries, of which he had been speaking in this chapter.

And cut off the Anakims.] Who were a distinct people (Arius Montanus thinks) from the Canaanites; of a fierce, cruel, and tyrannical disposition, who oppressed all their neighbours.

From the mountains.] Where they had settled, and, it is likely, strongly fortified themselves: which moved Joshua to let them alone till he had finished his other conquests. Concerning these Anakims, see Numb. xiii. 22, 23.

From Hebron.] Called also Kiriath-Arba, the city of Arba, who was a great man among the Anakims. (See Bochartus, in his Canaan, lib. i. cap. 1. p. 363.)

And Debir.] Called also Kiriath-Sepher, as I noted before.

And Anab.] This, as well as the two forenamed cities, fell to the tribe of Judah, (xv. 50.)

And from all the mountains of Judah.] All the mountainous country which afterward fell by lot to that tribe.

And from all the mountains of Israel.] All the mountainous country which was in the rest of the tribes of Israel, where these people, it is likely, fled for safety.

Joshua destroyed them utterly, with their cities.] Which it seems they had in those mountainous countries of Israel; besides Hebron, Debir, and Anab, in the tribe of Judah.

Ver. 22. There were none of the Anakims left in the land of the children of Israel.] He rooted them out of the whole country which the Israelites conquered.

Only in Gaza, in Gath, and in Ashdod, there remained.] Three cities of the Philistines; unto which either some of them escaped, and there took shelter, or they had been there from ancient time, and the Israelites could not yet expel them. For they did not possess themselves of the country of the Philistines till the time of David; when we find some of these giants still there; particularly in Gath. But, that there were any of them at Ascalon, the famous Bochart shews to be an error in the place beforementioned, (lib. i. Canaan, cap. 1.)

Ver 23. So Joshua took the whole land.] Which either the Canaanites or the Anakims possessed; that is, subdued it so that none rose up against him, though many places were not yet in the possession of the Israelites. (See xiii. 1, 2, &c.) For which were many reasons; one of which was, because the Israelites were not yet so many as to be able to people the whole country, and keep the beasts of the field from multiplying upon them: (Exod. xxiii. 29.) and two more reasons are added, Judg. iii. 1. 4.

According to all that the Lord said unto Moses.] Deut. xxxi. 7, 8.

And Joshua gave it for an inheritance unto Israel.] Deut. iii. 28.

According to their divisions by their tribes.] Numb. xxvi. 53. xxxiii. 54.

And the land rested from war.] None of the lords of the Philistines, or any other, adventured to give any disturbance to the Israelites in their possessions; but they enjoyed them quietly: and thereby had liberty to make a division of the country; which God ordered them to go about, chap. xiii.

Now began the seventh year from the time the Israelites first ploughed and sowed in the land: and therefore was the first sabbatical year that they observed after Joshua had brought them to their rest in the land of promise. An emblem (as our great primate of Ireland observes) of that eternal sabbatism, or rest, unto which the true Jesus will bring his people, (Heb. iv. 8, 9.) And from this they were to reckon unto their jubilee, mentioned Lev. xxv. 8. 13. But that was not from their entrance into Canaan, but from the seventh year after the division of the land, as I observed before upon the last verse of the tenth chapter.

CHAP. XII.

Ver. 1. NOW these are the kings of the land, which the children of Israel smote, and possessed their land.] Before he gives an account of the division of the land, he thinks fit to lay before every one's eyes, as in a table, the land they had conquered; which was to be divided.

On the other side Jordan, towards the rising of the sun.] There they began their conquests, before they passed over Jordan.

From the river Arnon, unto Mount Hermon.] So the bounds of this conquest are described by Moses, Deut. iii. 8. iv. 48. (See there.)

And all the plain on the east.] That is, on the east of Jordan, (see Deut. i. 1.) called the plain of Moab, Deut. xxxiv. 1.

Ver. 2. Sihon king of the Amorites, who dwelt at Heshbon.] He was the first king whose land they conquered and possessed. (See Numb. xxi.)

And ruled from Aroer, which is upon the banks of the river Arnon.] See Numb. xxi. 24.

And from the middle of the river.] In which stood the city called Aroer. For Ar never was in the hands of Sihon; but his kingdom was bounded by it, on that side. (See Deut. ii. 36. iii. 16.)

And from half Gilead.] In the Hebrew, and half of Gilead; there being nothing to answer to the word from: which being left out, the sense is plain, that half of the country of Gilead belonged to Sihon, as the other half did to Og, (ver. 5.)

To the river Jabbok, which is the border of the children of Ammon.] Thus his country is constantly described; particularly in Numb. xxi. 24. Deut. iii. 16.

Ver. 3. And from the plain, &c.] There is nothing answering to the word from in the Hebrew; which may most clearly be translated, and the plain: and so the LXX. only retaining the word araba, which we translate plain. This was another part of Sihon's country, a great plain, which lay eastward of the sea of Cinneroth, and the salt sea; by which it was bounded on the west.

The way to Beth-Jeshimoth.] Which, by the next words, is thought to have lain towards the south.

And from the south, under Ashdod-Pisgah.] The meaning seems to be, that on the south it was bounded by Ashdod-Pisgah. (See Deut. iii. 17.) I do but touch these things, leaving them to a very learned friend and brother of mine, who hath most accurately considered every part and place of this country.

Ver. 4. And the coast of Og king of Bashan.] The next conquest they made was of the kingdom of Og, who was of the remnant of the giants. (See Deut. iii. 11.)

That dwelt at Ashtaroth and Edrei.] See Deut. i. 4. Some would gather from this place, and from xiii. 12. that he had two royal seats, one at Ashtaroth, another at Edrei; and that he lived sometimes in the one, and sometimes in the other.

Ver. 5. And reigned in Mount Hermon.] At the bottom of which some other people lived, who were conquered by Joshua, (xi. 17.)

And in Salcah.] This was one of his cities, in that part of his kingdom which was next to Hermon, as some conjecture from xiii. 12. But others think it was in the southern part of this country, possessed afterward by the Gadites; which they gather from 1 Chron. v. 11, 12. 16.

And all Bashan, unto the border, &c.] See an account of this, and of all that follows in this verse, Deut. iii. 13, 14.

Ver. 6. Them did Moses, the servant of the Lord, and the children of Israel, smite.] These two kings were conquered by Moses before they came into Canaan, (Numb. xxi.)

And Moses, the servant of the Lord, gave it for a possession to the Reubenites, and Gadites, and the half tribe of Manasseh.] See Numb. xxxii. and Deut. iii. 12. xiii. 8. He gives Moses the title of the servant of the Lord twice in this verse, to make them sensible that this war against the two kings beforenamed was made by Divine authority; and that their land was afterward given to the Reubenites, &c. by the same authority.

Ver. 7. And these are the kings.] They that follow in the rest of the chapter.

Of the country which Joshua and the children of Israel smote on this side Jordan.] In the late wars, beforementioned in this book.

On the west.] Westward of Jordan.

From Baal-Gad, in the valley of Lebanon, even unto the Mount Halak, which goeth up to Seir.] This was the northern and southern bounds of the country of these kings. (See xi. 17.)

Which Joshua gave unto the tribes of Israel for a possession, according to their divisions.] Unto the rest of the tribes, who had not their share on the other side Jordan, (xi. 23.)

Ver. 8. In the mountains, and in the valleys, and in the plains.] This is a description of the condition of the country; in which valleys and plains differ only in this, that the former were such as lay between mountains, and the latter, the flat country, which was remote from mountains.

And in the springs.] Which commonly were at the foot of mountains.

And in the wilderness, and in the south country.] These are joined together, because their wildernesses were southerly, in the hottest and driest part of the land: whereby we are not to understand countries without people; but that were thinly peopled, in comparison with other parts of the land. For we read of houses and towns in the wilderness, 1 Kings ix. 18. xi. 34.

The Hivites, the Amorites, and the Canaanites, &c.] This may relate either to the kings, or the countries, forementioned.

Ver. 9. The king of Jericho, one.] He is first mentioned, because first conquered.

The king of Ai.] He was the next.

Which is beside Beth-el, one.] The people of which place came to assist the king of Ai; and were conquered at the same time, (viii. 17.)

Ver. 10. The king of Jerusalem, one.] Who was the next that opposed Joshua, and therefore next mentioned, (x. 1.)

The king of Hebron, one.] He, and the three next, the kings of Jarmuth, Lachish, and Eglon, (ver. 11, 12.) joined with the king of Jerusalem, and were vanquished at the same time.

Ver. 12. The king of Gezer, one.] He came out to help Lachish, and was smitten at the same time, (x. 33.)

Ver. 13. The king of Debir, one.] Mentioned x: 38.

The king of Geder, one.] We read not of him before; but we find several towns in the tribe of Judah of the same or neighbouring name, viz. Gederah, and Gederoth, and Gederothaim, and Geder, (xv. 36. 41. 56. 2 Chron. xxviii. 18.) All which, as Bochartus observes, have their name à sepimento, from the fence that was about them, (lib. i. Canaan, cap. 36.)

Ver. 14. The king of Hormah, one; the king of Arad, one.] We have no mention of these kings before; but we know that Hormah was a city in the tribe of Judah, (xv. 30. Judg. i. 17. 1 Sam. xxx. 30.) and afterward given to Simeon. (Josh. xix. 4.) Arad also was a place in the tribe of Judah, as appears by the story in Judg. i. 16.

Ver. 15. The king of Libnah, one.] Mentioned before, (x. 29.)

The king of Adullam, one.] This was a city in the same tribe of Judah, (xv. 35. 1 Sam. xxii. 1.)

Ver. 16. The king of Makkedah, one.] See x. 26.

The king of Beth-el, one.] We read not of any king here before; but it seems there was one depending upon Ai, (viii. 17.)

Ver. 17. And the king of Tappuah, one.] There were two cities of this name; one in the tribe of Judah, (xv. 34.) the other in the tribe of Ephraim, (xvii. 8.) It is probable the latter is here meant; because the king of it is mentioned next to the king of Beth-el, which was in the confines of Benjamin and Ephraim. And immediately follows the king of Hepher; which was a place not far off, in the tribe of Zebulun.

The king of Hepher, one.] We read of the land of Hepher, in 1 Kings iv. 10. Which St. Jerome saith was in the tribe of Zebulun, near Sephorim, or Diocæsarea.

Ver. 18. The king of Aphek.] There were two Apheks in this country which Joshua conquered, one in the tribe of Judah, (xiii. 53. 1 Sam. ix. 1. xxix. 1.) another in the tribe of Asher, (Josh. xix. 53.) Which of them is here intended, cannot certainly be determined.

The king of Lassaron, one.] This place is never named any where else in Scripture. But I take it for Saron (as the Vulgar Latin here doth, leaving out the first syllable), which was a city near Lydda, as we learn from Acts ix. 35. And the country about it was very pleasant and fruitful, (Isa. xxxiii. 9. xxxv. 2.) There was another Saron also on the other side of Jordan, in the east, in the country of the Gadites, (1 Chron. v. 16.) of which some think the prophet Isaiah speaks, lxv. 10.

Ver. 19. The king of Madon, one; the king of Hazor, one.] Both these are mentioned before, as conquered by Joshua, (xi. 1.)

Ver. 20. The king of Shimron-Meron, one; the king of Achshaph, one.] These two are mentioned in the same place, (xi. 1.) And Shimron was in the tribe of Zebulun; and Achshaph in the tribe of Asher, (xix. 15. 25.) The former hath the addition of Meron to it in this place, to distinguish it from some other Shimron; which some think was in the tribe of Ephraim, called Shomeron, or Samaria.

Ver. 21. The king of Taanach, one.] A city given to the tribe of Manasseh, (xvii. 11.) and in the confines of Zebulun. It belonged to the Levites: (xxi. 25.) but the old inhabitants were not expelled out of it, (Judg. i. 27.)

The king of Megiddo, one.] This city fell to the same tribe, as we read in the same place; and was near the river Kishon; as may be gathered from Judg. v. 19. The Canaanites were not driven out of this city, (Judg. i. 27.)

Ver. 22. The king of Kedesh, one.] There were two cities called Kedesh, or Kadish; one in the tribe of Judah, (xv. 23.) the other in the tribe of Naphtali, (xix. 37.) The latter is here meant; for it was a fenced city, as we read there; but the other was of no note.

The king of Jokneam of Carmel, one.] A city in the tribe of Zebulun, at the bottom of Mount Carmel, near the river Belus, (xix. 11.) and one of the cities of the Levites, (xxi. 34.) It had its name from its delightful situation, as Bochart conjectures, lib. i. Canaan, cap. 28.

Ver. 23. The king of Dor, in the coast of Dor, one.] A city in the lot of the tribe of Manasseh, (xvii. 11.) which had a large territory belonging to it, called after its name: for it was a royal city, and one of the most ancient in Phœnicia, as Bochart observes. So strong, also, that the Israelites could not get possession of it (or could not keep out the ancient inhabitants), when it fell to the portion of Manasseh, (Judg. i. 27.) Nor could Antiochus Sidetes, in future times, take it, though he laid siege to it with a very great army, (lib. i. Canaan, cap. 41.)

The king of the nations of Gilgal, one.] This Gilgal is not the place where Joshua encamped when he came over Jordan; for there was no city there, nor any king of that country, but the king of Jericho. That place also had its name from the circumcision of the Israelites there, (ver. 9.) We have no mention indeed of any other Gilgal in Scripture; but St. Jerome says, in his time, there was a place called Golgol, about six miles from Antipatris, which was near the sea, not far from Joppa. Hither, it is likely, merchants from several countries resorted; and thence the chief ruler there was called the king of the nations of Gilgal. Some finding mention of Galilee of the nations, fancy that it is the place here meant. But that name, for some part of Galilee, was not known in the days of Joshua; being occasioned by Solomon's giving Hiram twenty towns in this country, (1 Kings ix. 11.) So the same St. Jerome.

Ver. 24. The king of Tirzah, one.] It is not certain in what part of the country this city was; but it is very probable in the lot of the tribe of Ephraim. For Jeroboam (who was of this tribe) and his successors, made it the royal seat until the building of Samaria, (1 Kings xiv. 17. xvi. 23, 24.)

All the kings, thirty and one.] Some cannot believe that in so small a country there were so many kings. But they should consider, that these kings were only petty princes, or lords of cities, which had a few villages depending on them, the inhabitants of which were their tenants. This appears by ver. 9. where we read of the king of Beth-el; which was so small a place, that he and the king of Ai, joined together, had but twelve thousand subjects, (viii. 25.) For kingdoms, like all other things, were anciently very small in their beginning. See upon Gen. xiv. 1. and Grotius upon the first verse of this chapter, and Masius upon the seventh. Unto which may be added, that Cæsar, in his fifth book of his Commentaries, speaks of four kings here in the county of Kent alone: how many then were there in all Britain? for it appears by Tacitus, that the Silures and the Brigantes had their own kings also. And Cæsar informs us, that in France there were as many kings as princes; and so it was in Spain, as Livy writes. And Vopiscus, in the life of the emperor Probus, relates, that when he was in Germany, "reguli novem ex diversis gentibus," &c. nine petty kings came from divers nations, and threw themselves at his feet; as he himself wrote to the senate of Rome, in a letter which is there recorded. In which he calls them novem reges, nine kings.

CHAP. XIII.

Ver. 1. NOW Joshua was old and stricken in years.] To what age he was advanced we cannot certainly know; because we do not know how old he was when they came out of Egypt. Some think three and forty; and then he was fourscore and three when they came into Canaan: and now, it may be gathered by probable conjectures, wanted not much of a hundred.

And the Lord said unto him, Thou art old and stricken in years, and there remaineth yet very much land to be possessed.] Which, in his declining age, he could not hope to live to conquer; and therefore he would have him go about another business, (ver. 7.)

Ver. 2. This is the land that yet remains.] To be subdued hereafter.

All the borders of the Philistines.] Who lay in the south-west part of Canaan, near the sea.

And all Geshuri.] Which was a city, and a country in the north-east, not far from Hermon, belonging to the lot of the tribe of Manasseh. (See Deut. iii. 14.)

Ver. 3. From Sihor, which is before Egypt.] He describes more largely the borders of the Philistines, whose country extended along the sea-coast, south and north, from Sihor, which was a little stream from one of the branches of the Nile, whereby Palestine was bounded on that side. (See Gen. xv. 18. and Vossius de Orig. et Progr. Idolol. lib. ii. cap. 74.)

Even unto the borders of Ekron northward.] A famous city among the Philistines, where Baal-zebub was worshipped, called in the New Testament the prince of the devils (or demons), because he was the principal god of the people of Palestine. This city was given to the tribe of Judah at first, (xv. 45.) afterward to the tribe of Dan, (xix.) though neither of them could get possession of it.

Which is counted to the Canaanite.] For the Philistines were not original inhabitants of this country, which belonged to the offspring of Canaan, the youngest son of Ham; whereas the Philistines were descended from Misraim, his second son; who expelled the Avites out of this country; as we read Deut. ii. 23. and see my annotations on Gen. x. 14. 19.

Five lords of the Philistines.] Which country was under the government of five lords, as they are constantly called in Scripture; in the Hebrew, seraim, or seranaim; which seems to be an ancient Phœnician word (the same with sarim) for a ruler of a province, or city. The LXX. call them Σάτραπαι, and the Vulgar Latin, reguli, petty princes. But they are never called melakim, i. e. kings, in Scripture, as the rest of the princes of Canaan are. Which inclines me to think that their government was not so absolute, as that of the rest of the kings of Canaan. Only we read in future times, that Achish was king of Gath; having, it seems, in David's days, made himself more absolute than the former lords of that place.

The Gazathites, and the Ashdothites, the Eshkalonites, the Gittites, and the Ekronites.] These people had their names from the five principal cities in this country, where they inhabited; which are commonly known.

Also the Avites.] These were a people mixed with them, being a remnant (as I said before) of the ancient inhabitants of this country. But there was no distinct lord of them; there being but five in all; and so many without one over these. Some have confounded them with the Hivites; but their name is quite different in the Hebrew, and so is their country. For the Hivites lived in Hermon in the north; and these here in the west. From whence, though they were driven by the Caphtorites, (Deut. ii. 23.) yet some of them, it seems, remained; as several of the Canaanites did, when the Israelites dispossessed them of their country. See Bochartus, in his Phaleg. lib. iv. cap. 36. who thinks they were not the offspring of Canaan; but it is manifest they inhabited part of the country belonging to him: for Sidon was the first-born of Canaan, who was settled on that coast; and the border of the Canaanites is said to be from thence unto Gaza, (Gen. x. 19.)

Ver. 4. From the south.] Of the Philistines' country.

All the land of the Canaanites.] All that tract of land which belonged to the people properly called Canaanites; who lived upon the sea-coast.

And Mearah.] We find no mention of this place elsewhere: some translate it, a cave.

That is beside the Sidonians.] Who were in the northern point of that sea-coast.

Unto Aphek.] See xii. 18. where I observed there were two cities of this name; but it is most reasonable here to understand that in the tribe of Asher; whose king though Joshua had slain, he had not taken his country.

To the borders of the Amorites.] Who were in these parts: for they being a mighty people had dispersed themselves, not only in the east, and in the south, but in these northern regions.

Ver. 5. And the land of the Giblites.] A people inhabiting a city called Gebal, and the country about it, near to Tyre and Sidon; as appears from Ezek. xxvii. 9. and in 1 Kings v. 18. they are mentioned as stone-cutters, sent by Hiram king of Tyre to king Solomon. (See also Psal. lxxxiii. 7.)

And all Lebanon towards the sun-rising.] They extended their conquests thus far, (xi. 17.) but could not subdue the eastern part of this country.

From Baal-Gad under Mount Hermon, unto the entering into Hamath.] Concerning Baal-Gad, see xi. 17. and concerning the entering into Hamath, Numb. xxxiv. 8.

Ver. 6. All the inhabitants of the hill-country.] In the northern parts of the land.

From Lebanon.] This shews what hilly country he speaks of.

Unto Misrephoth-maim.] A place beforementioned, xi. 8. where, as I observed, some render it hot waters, or baths: for sharaph signifies to burn, and maim is waters. And I may add, there are those that think they were lime-kilns, others glass-furnaces; but most likely salt-pits.

And all the Sidonians.] Who were near to the inhabitants of Libanus, westward upon the sea.

Them will I drive out before the children of Israel.] If they persisted constant in his worship and service. Which they did not; and therefore we never read that the Sidonians were conquered by the Israelites: and the people of Lebanon were only made tributaries in the days of David and Solomon.

Only.] Or rather therefore, as the word rak sometimes signifies. (See chap. i. ult.)

Divide thou it by lot unto the children of Israel for an inheritance.] Though they be not yet driven out, yet, since I have promised to expel them, assign all the forementioned countries to the children of Israel by lot, as the inheritance I have bestowed upon them. Which gave them a strong assurance they should have all this land; both because God had given it to them for an inheritance, and ordered it to be divided by lot.

As I have commanded thee.] Or, as I now command thee, and give thee authority to do.

Ver. 7. Now therefore divide this land for an inheritance unto the nine tribes, and the half tribe of Manasseh.] Both that which was conquered, and that which remained unconquered, was to be divided, that every tribe might know what belonged to them, by God's gift; and be encouraged to attempt the conquest of it when they were able; and be preserved from entering into any covenant or society with those who kept their inheritance from them; and likewise hinder the unconquered people from joining their forces together to recover their country; the Israelites inhabiting the cities and fields that lay between them.

Ver. 8. With whom.] That is, with the other half of the tribe beforementioned.

The Reubenites and Gadites have received their inheritance, which Moses gave them, beyond Jordan eastward.] See Numb. xxxii. 33, &c.

Even as Moses, the servant of the Lord, gave them.] Which he did by order from God; and therefore they were not to be disturbed in their possession, (Deut. iii. 18.)

Here the words of God to Joshua (ver. 1.) end; and in the next verse the writer of this book begins to describe the country which God ordered to be given to the forenamed two tribes and a half, that there might be no future dispute about this division; but it might be held as good as that which was made by lot among the rest of the tribes.

Ver. 9. From Aroer, that is upon the brink of the river Arnon, and the city that is in the midst of the river.] See xii. 2. and Deut. iii. 16.

And all the plain of Medeba unto Dibon.] These are two cities which the Amorites took from the Moabites, (as we read Numb. xxi. 30.) and the Israelites took from them when they conquered Sihon their king. The former of them was in the portion of the Reubenites; the other of the Gadites: and when the ten tribes were carried captive, they returned into the possession of the Moabites again. For Isaiah speaks of them as belonging to Moab, xv. 2.

and so doth Jeremiah, xlviii. 22. The plain of Medeba seems to be the same with the plain of Moab.

Ver. 10. And all the cities of Sihon king of the Amorites, which reigned in Heshbon, unto the border of the children of Ammon.] See Numb. xxi. 24, 25, &c.

Ver. 11. And Gilead, and the border of the Geshurites, and Maachathites.] Geshur and Maacha were two cites near Mount Hermon, in the extreme bounds of this country northward, whose inhabitants the Israelites could not drive out, (ver. 13.) and yet their land was divided among them.

And all Mount Hermon, and all Bashan unto Salcah.] See all this verse explained, xii. 5. I shall only add, that Maacha was in the tribe of Manasseh, and is the city which Ptolemy calls Epicæros. Which name the Chaldee paraphrast uses both here and xii. 4, 5. and Deut. iii. 14. instead of Maacha, as Bochart observes, lib. ii. Phaleg. cap. 6.

Ver. 12. All the kingdom of Og in Bashan, which reigned in Ashtaroth and in Edrei, who remained of the remnant of the giants.] See xii. 4. and Deut. iii. 11.

For these did Moses smite, and cast them out.] These Rephaim (which we translate giants) were perfectly conquered, and rooted out by Moses. They were smitten in Abraham's time, by Chedorlaomer, (Gen. xiv. 5.) but recovered strength so much, that their country, when Moses conquered it, was called the land of giants, Deut. iii. 13.

Ver. 13. Nevertheless the children of Israel expelled not the Geshurites and Maachathites.] See ver. 2.

But the Geshurites and the Maachathites dwell among the Israelites unto this day.] For Joshua growing old (ver. 1.) made no further conquest, but left this people unsubdued, as Moses also had done.

Ver. 14. Only unto the tribe of Levi he gave no inheritance.] For the tithes of the whole country were instead of their portion in land, (Deut. xviii. 2.) And this is set down here by Joshua, as formerly by Moses, to shew that they had as indisputable a right to the tithes as their brethren had to the land.

The sacrifices of the Lord God of Israel made by fire are their inheritance.] That is, the inheritance of the priests; for the whole tribe of Levi had nothing to do with them. See Numb. xviii. where the portion of the priests and of the Levites is exactly set down; and see ver. 33. of this chapter, and xiv. 3. xviii. 7.

As he said unto them.] See Numb. xviii. 20, 21. where this is distinctly said, both with respect to the priests and to the Levites.

Ver. 15. And Moses gave unto the tribe of the children of Reuben inheritance according to their families.] Having said in general what Moses gave to the two tribes and a half, he proceeds to set down in particular what share each of them had in this country: that so they might no more quarrel among themselves about their portion, than the nine tribes and a half quarrel with them all. And, first, he mentions what part of the land was given to Reuben; which was divided into as many portions as they had families.

Ver. 16. Their coast was from Aroer, that is on the bank of Arnon, &c.] See ver. 9. Aroer itself was in the tribe of Gad, (Numb. xxxii. 34.) unto which the portion of the Reubenites reached.

Ver. 17. Heshbon, and all the cities that are in the plain.] He means the plain beforementioned, ver. 9.

Dibon.] It is said plainly, in Numb. xxxii. 34. that it belonged to the Gadites; for it was, as Masius well judges, in the confines of both tribes; and so was inhabited by both. Which is to be said also of Heshbon, here ascribed to the Reubenites; but in xxi. 39. is said to be a city of the Levites in the tribe of Gad. And so we read also in 1 Chron. vi. ult. And this is still more evident; for Heshbon, which in this verse is reckoned to the Reubenites, in the twenty-sixth verse of this very chapter, is said to be given to the tribe of Gad; which is a demonstration they had it between them.

Bamoth-Baal, and Beth-Baal-meon.] We read of Bamoth not far from this country, Numb. xxi. 19. but no where else of Bamoth-Baal; which, it is probable, was some high place where Baal was worshipped; for we read of high places in this country, Numb. xxi. 28. We find mention of Baal-meon in many places, particularly Numb. xxxii. 38. where it is said to be given to this tribe. And the addition of Beth to it, signifies there was some house, that is, temple of Baal in this place.

Ver. 18. And Jahaza.] Here they fought with Sihon. (See Numb. xxi. 23.)

And Kedemoth.] From whence Moses sent friendly messengers to Sihon, to desire a peaceable passage through his country, (Deut. iii. 26.)

And Mephaath.] This, with the two foregoing, were Levitical cities in the tribe of Reuben, (xxi. 36, 37. 1 Chron. vi. 78, 79.)

Ver. 19. And Kirjathaim, and Sibmah.] These two are mentioned in Numb. xxxii. 37, 38. as given to the Reubenites.

And Zareth-shahar.] We do not read of this city any where else.

In the mount of the valley.] In the mount which overlooked the great plain beforementioned; which may be supposed to be one of the mountains of Abarim, where this city, and perhaps the two former, were seated.

Ver. 20. And Baal-Peor.] It seems to have had its name from the filthy idol which was there worshipped by the Moabites, (Numb. xxv. 3. 5. see Deut. xxxiv. 6.)

And Ashdod-Pisgah and Beth-Jeshimoth.] See xii. 3.

Ver. 21. And all the cities of the plain.] As well as those mentioned in the mountain which overlooked it, (ver. 19.)

And all the kingdom of Sihon king of the Amorites.] That is, all the forementioned places belonged to the kingdom of Sihon. But they had not all his kingdom given them; for it was shared between them and the Gadites, as appears from ver. 27.

Whom Moses smote with the princes of Midian.] Not in the war with Sihon, mentioned Numb. xxi. but in another war after that, undertaken by a particular command of God, (Numb. xxxi.)

Evi, and Rekem, and Zur, and Hur, and Reba.] Who are mentioned as killed in that war, (Numb. xxxi. 8.)

Which were dukes of Sihon.] This is the reason why they are here mentioned, because, though they lived in Midian, yet they were tributaries to Sihon; and, it is likely, assisted him in his war with Israel, in which though they then escaped, yet afterward they were slain by them.

Dwelling in the country.] It is uncertain whether he meant that Sihon had given them some place in his country to dwell in (that they might be ready on all occasions to assist him with their forces), or that they were settled in the country of Midian; whereas some of that people were unsettled, and moved from place to place, like to the ancient Nomades. However it was, they were such great men in Midian, that they are called kings, Numb. xxxi. 8. as here they are called princes; but much inferior to Sihon, whom they served only as great commanders under him. So our translators, I suppose, understood it, which made them render the Hebrew word nesiche by the English word dukes; which we elsewhere translate nobles, in Psal. lxxxiii. 13.

Ver. 22. Balaam also the son of Beor, the soothsayer.] He had been a prophet, but degenerated into a soothsayer, or diviner, (see Numb. xxii. 5—8.) and became a prophet again for the sake of Israel.

Did the children of Israel slay with a sword among them that were slain by them.] It is hard to give an account why he is here mentioned; unless we suppose him to have been an adviser of Sihon, and those dukes that joined with him to undertake the war; as it is certain he was of the Midianites to draw in the Israelites to commit idolatry, (Numb. xxv. 17.)

Ver. 23. And the border of the children of Reuben was Jordan, and the border thereof, &c.] This river was the bounds of their country westward.

Ver. 24. And Moses gave inheritance unto the tribe of Gad, &c.] As he had done to the Reubenites, ver. 15. (See there.)

Ver. 25. And their coast was Jazer.] See Numb. xxi. 32. and xxxii. 35.

And all the cities of Gilead.] That lay next to Jazer: for half of Gilead was given to the children of Manasseh, (ver. 31.)

And half of the land of the children of Ammon.] The children of Israel took nothing from them, but were expressly forbidden to meddle with their country, (Deut. ii. 19.) He speaks therefore of that part of their country which Sihon had taken from them, (as he did part of the Moabites' country, Numb. xxi. 26.) and the Israelites, having vanquished Sihon, justly possessed, from Arnon to Jabbok; as Jephthah represents to the Ammonites, when they demanded this land as belonging to them; when the Israelites had enjoyed it near three hundred years, (Judg. xi. 13. 22, &c.)

Unto Aroer.] This was the bounds of that country taken from the Ammonites by Sihon, from Aroer unto Jabbok; for Aroer was seated upon Arnon beforementioned, (Judg. xi. 13.)

That is before Rabbah.] Over against Rabbah, the chief city of the Ammonites' country; which was in the north part of it, as Aroer in the south.

Ver. 26. And from Heshbon.] See ver. 17.

Unto Ramath-Mizpeh.] The same with Ramath-Gilead, of which we read xx. 8. and many other places. It seems to be the same place which is called Mizpeh of Gilead, where Jephthah the Gileadite lived, (Judg. xi. 29. 34.)

And Betonim.] We know no more of this place, than that it was, in all likelihood, a city in the north part of this tribe, as Ramath-Gilead was; and Heshbon in the south.

And from Mahanaim.] This was a city built in that place where Jacob saw the camps of angels, (Gen. xxxii. 1, 2.) It was not far from the river Jabbok, as appears from that chapter, ver. 22. This city was very considerable in aftertimes; Ish-bosheth, who reigned over Israel after Saul, having his residence here; and David making some stay here when he fled from Absalom, (2 Sam. ii. 8. 12. xvii. 27.) It was one of the Levitical cities, (xxi. 37.)

Unto Debir.] There was another city of this name in the tribe of Judah, (xv. 15. 49.) But this was (as St. Jerome and Eusebius tell us) a city of the Ammonites upon Jordan.

Ver. 27. And in the valley, Beth-Aram, and Beth-Nimrah.] Having mentioned the frontier places, he comes to speak of those cities which were in the midst of the country. And these two are mentioned, Numb. xxxii. 36. The latter of which, here called Beth-Nimrah (Domus Pardorum, as Bochart interprets it), is simply called Nimrah in the third verse of that chapter. And the waters of Nimrim (Isa. xv. 6.) seem to have been in the same place; which Moses and Joshua say belonged to the Gadites; but Isaiah and Jeremiah call it a city of the Moabites: who, in the days of those prophets, after the ten tribes were carried captive, recovered those places. (See Bochartus, in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. iii. cap. 7.)

And Succoth.] Which was the place where Jacob fixed, after he had passed over Jabbok, in his return from Padan-Aram, (Gen. xxxiii. 17.)

And Zaphon.] A place which St. Jerome saith lay upon the river Jordan.

The rest of the kingdom of Sihon king of Heshbon.] That is, all but that which was given to the Reubenites.

Jordan and his border.] For instance, the country bordering upon Jordan.

Even unto the edge of the sea of Cinnereth, on the other side Jordan eastward.] To the extreme part of the lake, in aftertimes called Gennesaret; where the river Jordan came out of it on the south-east.

Ver. 28. This is the inheritance of the children of Gad after their families, the cities, and their villages.] Which are not all named, but they were in the region here described.

Ver. 29. And Moses gave inheritance unto the half tribe of Manasseh, &c.] The country which they conquered on the other side Jordan, being too large for the Reubenites and Gadites alone, Moses bestowed what follows upon the half tribe of Manasseh; who did not desire it, as far as I can find, (see Numb. xxxii. 1, 2.) but were thought fit to be joined with the other two tribes, because they were very numerous, (Numb. xxvi. 34.) and, it is likely, had great store of cattle, as the other had.

Ver. 30. And their coast was from Mahanaim.] Mentioned before, ver. 26.

All Bashan, all the kingdom of Og king of Bashan.] This kingdom consisted of three parts, (Deut. iii. 13.) half of Gilead, Bashan, and the region of Argob: all which sometimes are comprehended under the name of Bashan, because it was the principal part of his kingdom.

And all the towns of Jair, which are in Bashan.] This is an explication of what went before; for these towns were in the forenamed kingdom of Bashan, and not distinct from it. Why they are called the towns of Jair, Moses gives an account, Numb. xxxii. 41.

Threescore cities.] Which were in the region of Argob, as we read Deut. iii. 4. 14.

Ver. 31. And half Gilead.] The other half that was not given to the Gadites, (ver. 25.) This is also but an explication of what he said at the first; for Gilead was not distinct from the kingdom of Og king of Bashan; but a part of it.

And Ashtaroth and Edrei, cities of the kingdom of Og in Bashan.] Royal cities, as is commonly thought, from xii. 4.

Were pertaining unto the children of Machir, the son of Manasseh.] All the posterity of Manasseh came from Machir; for he had no other son beside him, (Numb. xxxii. 29.) unto whose children, that is, to one half of them (as it is explained in the following words), he gave this part of that kingdom, (Deut. iii. 15.)

Even to the one half of the children of Machir by their families.] Among whom Jair and his posterity had the honour to be reckoned, though he was of the tribe of Judah; because he was his grandchild by his daughter, and so instrumental in conquering this country, that he had his inheritance given him here, (1 Chron. ii. 21, &c. Numb. xxxiv. 41, 42.)

Ver. 32. These are the countries which Moses did distribute for inheritance in the plains of Moab, on the other side Jordan, by Jericho, eastward.] Which countries, with their bounds and limits, are thus particularly described, that every tribe might rest satisfied with God's appointment, and not invade their brethren's territories.

Ver. 33. But unto the tribe of Levi Moses gave not any inheritance: the Lord God of Israel was their inheritance, as he said unto them.] This had been noted before in this very chapter, ver. 14. and is again noted, xiv. 3, 4. and again, xviii. 7. Which frequent repetition was for the honour of this tribe; and that the people might have the greater regard to them, and care of them.

CHAP. XIV.

Ver. 1. AND these are the countries.] viz. Those mentioned in the fifteenth, sixteenth, and following chapters; for this chapter is but a kind of preface to the division of the land.

Which the children of Israel inherited in the land of Canaan.] Which was now conquered by Joshua; as that of Sihon and Og had been by Moses.

Which Eleazar the priest, and Joshua the son of Nun, and the heads of the fathers of the tribes of the children of Israel, distributed for inheritance unto them.] According to the command given by God to Moses, Numb. xxxiv. 17, 18. where the names of the twelve heads of the tribes, or the princes (as they are there called), are set down, ver. 19, 20, &c.

Ver. 2. By lot was their inheritance.] To take away all occasion of controversy, the matter being determined by God.

As the Lord commanded by the hand of Moses.] Numb. xxvi. 55, 56. xxxiii. 54.

For the nine tribes, and for the half tribe.] Who were to be provided for in the land of Canaan; as the other, it here follows, had been on the other side Jordan.

Ver. 3. For Moses had given the inheritance of two tribes and a half on the other side Jordan.] This seems to argue a strong faith, which the nine tribes and a half had in the promise of God; that they were contented to see their brethren put in actual possession of their inheritance, when they were only in hope of their portion.

But unto the Levites gave he no inheritance among them.] Neither on this side Jordan, nor on the other; as was said before, xiii. 33. and mentioned here again for the reason following.

Ver. 4. For the children of Joseph were two tribes, Manasseh and Ephraim.] The privilege of the first-born was transferred from Reuben's to Joseph, (1 Chron. v. 1, 2.) from whose two sons sprung two tribes: so that there were still twelve tribes, without reckoning Levi for one, (Gen. xlviii. 5, 6.)

Therefore they gave no part to the Levites in the land.] Because the children of Joseph succeeded in their room, as the Vulgar Latin translates the foregoing words; that is, to make up the number of twelve tribes.

Save cities to dwell in.] Not for a possession, as Conrad. Pellicanus observes, but only for a habitation: for they could not sell them, as their brethren might their possessions.

With their suburbs for their cattle and for their substance.] See Numb. xxxv. 2, 3, &c.

Ver. 5. As the Lord commanded Moses, so the children of Israel did.] That is, assigned them cities and suburbs, (xxi. 1, 2, &c.)

And they divided the land.] That is, when Eleazar, Joshua, and the princes had divided it.

Ver. 6. Then the children of Judah.] Before they went to cast lots for the division of the land, some of the children of Judah interposed in the behalf of Caleb; coming along with him, I suppose, as witnesses to the truth of what he alleged.

Came unto Joshua in Gilgal.] Where the tabernacle as yet was; for Joshua had not removed his camp from thence; and, accordingly, here the division of the land began to be made; though it was finished at Shiloh, as we read ch. xviii.

And Caleb the son of Jephunneh the Kenezite said unto him.] This shews that he was the principal person concerned in this address to Joshua; though the rest, perhaps, who came along with him, were not only witnesses to the truth of his pretensions, but came to desire Joshua to begin the division of the land; the tribe of Judah, now that the Reubenites were provided for, being the eldest of those that wanted their portion. Among whom, Caleb was not only a considerable person, but one of those princes who were appointed by God to assist in the division of the land, (Numb. xxxiv. 19.) and therefore would not be a judge in his own case, but have it settled before by Joshua, the supreme governor of God's people. Why he is called the Kenezite, is not easy to resolve; nor is it certain, whether Caleb or Jephunneh be called the Kenezite. But it comes to the same, whether the one or the other be so called, and the Hebrew words will bear either construction; yet St. Jerome and the LXX. take it to belong to Caleb, some of whose ancestors were called Kenez; which was certainly a name very common in their family. (See xv. 17. and Judg. i. 13.) And there is no improbability in it, that Kenez was the father of Jephunneh, from whence both he and his son were called Kenezites.

Thou knowest the thing that the Lord said unto Moses, the man of God.] He gives him this title, that what he ordered might be thought of greater authority, i. e. a Divine command.

Concerning me and thee, in Kadesh-barnea.] Which he was confident Joshua could not but remember, being concerned in it as well as himself. (See Numb. xiv. 24. 30. 38.)

Ver. 7. Forty years old was I when Moses, the servant of the Lord, sent me from Kadesh-barnea to spy out the land.] He mentions this, partly to shew that Moses took care to send persons of some experience, able to make observations, and judge aright; as well as in their full strength of body, able to travel and take pains. Such, it is probable, were all the rest, as well as he; men grown up every way to maturity, both of judgment and bodily vigour.

And I brought him word again, as it was in my heart.] Delivered my true opinion freely and sincerely, without either fear or flattery, (Numb. xiii. 30.)

Ver. 8. Nevertheless, my brethren that went with me made the heart of the people melt.] Numb. xiii. 31, 32. xiv. 1, &c. which did not discourage him at all from speaking the truth.

But I wholly followed the Lord my God.] This testimony God himself gave him, (Numb. xiv. 24.) which he might therefore mention without any breach of modesty, it being the ground of his present petition.

Ver. 9. And Moses sware on that day, saying, Surely the land whereon thy feet have trodden shall be thine inheritance, and thy children's for ever, because thou hast wholly followed the Lord my God.] See Deut. i. 34—36. This was first pronounced by God himself, and that with an oath, Numb. xiv. 21. 24. (See my notes there.) Some think his treading on it with his feet was his taking possession, and being admitted the owner of that land; according to the present notion of civil lawyers, who will have possessio to be as much as pedis positio. But this is only a modern conceit.

Ver. 10. And now, behold, the Lord hath kept me alive, as he said, these forty and five years.] Thus far he had fulfilled his words, in preserving him alive till the country was conquered, wherein he promised him a certain portion; so that he wanted only actual possession of it.

Even since the Lord spake this word unto Moses, while the children of Israel wandered in the wilderness.] Which was thirty and eight years.

And now, lo, I am this day fourscore and five years old.] It seems then that seven years were passed since they came into Canaan, before they began to divide the land; which was not till a year after the war was ended. (See xi. 18.) As for the time that followed between the complete division of the land, and the death of Joshua, it is not set down in this book; nor have we words in it, from whence to make a probable conjecture about it, but only those xxiii. 1. where it is said, A long time after God had given them rest, Joshua waxed old, &c. Which shews it is not to be restrained to so short a time as seven, or ten years, but may rather be thought twenty, as Du Pin computes it.

Ver. 11. As yet I am as strong this day as I was in the day that Moses sent me.] As able, both in body and mind, to undertake, and to dispatch any business, as he was forty and five years ago: which was a wonderful blessing of God, and an argument his petition should be granted; because he wanted neither courage nor strength to assault and take the place he desired, if it were still in the Canaanites' hands; or to defend and preserve it, if it were already conquered.

As my strength was then, even so is my strength now, for war; both to go out, and to come in.] This is a repetition of what he affirmed; as is usual when a thing is certain and undoubted. Concerning this phrase, go out and come in, see Numb. xxvii. 17. And this shews the force and efficacy of God's promise, confirmed by an oath; which (as Dr. Jackson well observes) was as remarkable in preserving his life and strength, as in bringing mortality on others, who he sware should not enter into Canaan.

Ver. 12. Now therefore give me this mountain, whereof the Lord spake in that day.] The mountainous country where Hebron lay, (xi. 21.) which was the place promised to him, as I observed upon Numb. xiv. 24.

For thou heardest in that day.] The LXX. and the Vulgar Latin refer this to what goes before, and make the sense to be, as if he had said, in thy hearing, God promised this country to me.

How the Anakims were there, and that the cities were great and strong.] The Vulgar makes the sense to be, Where the Anakims are, &c. (See Numb. xiii. 28. 32, 33.) He mentions cities in the plural number; for we read of two other, beside Hebron, which they possessed, (xi. 21.)

If so be the Lord will be with me.] These are not words of doubting; but a pious acknowledgment that nothing could be successfully enterprised, without God's gracious assistance; of which, no question, he was very confident. The Targum hath it, If so be the Word of the Lord will be my helper: which is the constant language of that paraphrast in all this book upon such occasions. (See i. 9. 17. vi. 27. x. 42. and xxiii. 3. 10.)

Then I shall be able to drive them out, as the Lord said.] Which, whether it was done now or before, when Joshua conquered the country, is a dispute. (See x. 37.)

Ver. 13. And Joshua blessed him.] Acknowledged his deserts, and beseeched God to prosper him in his undertaking, and gave his consent that he should have this country: for then God is said to bless a man, when he bestows his benefits upon him; and we do not bless others to purpose, unless we do what they desire. Accordingly it here follows.

And gave unto Caleb the son of Jephunneh Hebron for an inheritance.] That is, the country about it: for Hebron itself was a city of the priests, xxi. 11. 13. where it is expressly said, ver. 12. the fields and the villages of it were given to Caleb.

Ver. 14. Hebron therefore became the inheritance of Caleb unto this day, because he wholly followed the Lord God of Israel.] God rewarded his fidelity by this singular gift, which he bestowed upon him before the land was divided by lot.

Ver. 15. And the name of Hebron before was Kirjath-arba.] See upon Gen. xxiii. 2.

Which Arba was a great man among the Anakims.] Of great authority, as well as strength. So the word gadol is used, Gen. xxiv. 35. and so we call men at this day, who are of great power, by the name of magnates. He was the father of Anak, (xv. 13. and xxi. 11.) who either built this city, or fortified it, or made it his royal seat (being a kind of prince among them), and perhaps was here buried; which made it be called his city. (See upon Numb. xiii. 33.)

And the land had rest from war.] Which gave them liberty to divide the land. This was said before, (xi. ult.) and now repeated, perhaps to shew that what is here reported concerning Caleb was done some time ago, at the end of the war; and now mentioned to shew, that he held this portion of land by a Divine donation, before the country was divided by lot.

CHAP. XV.

Ver. 1. THIS then was the lot of the tribe of the children of Judah.] The first lot that came up was for the tribe of Judah; in honour of it, and that the prophecy of Jacob might be fulfilled concerning his pre-eminence among his brethren. The manner of drawing these lots, see upon Numb. xxvi. 55, 56. which it is apparent could not be done without a precedent survey of the whole country. A description of which being laid before Joshua, he, and Eleazar, and the princes, divided it into nine shares and a half, as equal as they could; considering not merely the quantity of ground, but the quality also, and goodness of the soil. This survey is not mentioned here; but it is afterward, xviii. 4. and therefore is to be supposed when they began to divide the land.

By their families.] The lot was only of so much land (bound as follows) for the whole tribe. Unto every family of which a portion was assigned by Joshua, and the rest, who were appointed to see that none were neglected, and that they had every one a just proportion. Therefore the lot for each tribe was not so unalterably fixed and determined, but that it might be enlarged or diminished; by taking from that tribe which had too much, and giving it to that which had too little. (See xix. 9.)

Even to the border of Edom; the wilderness of Zin, southward, was the uttermost part of the south coast.] See Numb. xxxiv. 2. Edom lay upon the wilderness of Zin; and the lot of Judah extended as far as that, which was the south part of the land. And, indeed, the tribe of Judah (as Conr. Pellicanus observes) had half of the south part of the whole land of Canaan for their portion; as the tribes of Joseph (Ephraim and Manasseh) had the north part; with whom the rest of the tribes were intermixed, viz. Simeon, Benjamin, and Dan, with the tribe of Judah; and Issachar, Zebulun, Asher, and Naphtali, with the portion of Joseph.

Ver. 2. And their south border was from the shore of the salt sea.] The foregoing verse was a short description of the length of Judah's country: now he describes the bounds of it on all quarters; and here saith, that the salt, or dead, sea was the bounds of it on the south-east. For so it was, as here follows.

From the bay that looketh southward.] In the Hebrew, from the tongue; which signifies either a creek, or a promontory, as some understand it, pointing to the south-east. (See Numb. xxxiv. 3.)

Ver. 3. And it went out to the south side of Maleh-acrabbim.] There was a mountain so called, from the multitude of scorpions that were there. It lay at the end of this lake, (Numb. xxxiv. 4.) From whence the country of Acrabatene had its name, as Bochart thinks, (see Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. v. cap. 29.) which lay near the country of Edom, (1 Maccab. v. 3.)

And passed along to Zin, and ascended upon the south side unto Kadesh-barnea.] This is the very description of the southern bounds of the promised land, Numb. xxxiv. 4.

And passed along to Hezron.] There is nothing said of this place in the book of Numbers; but it appears to have been a city from the twenty-fifth verse of this chapter.

And went up to Adar.] This place is mentioned in the forenamed Numb. xxxiv. 4. and called Hazar-addar. So that Hezron lay between Kadesh-barnea and this town.

And fetched a compass to Karkaa.] This place is not mentioned in Numbers, or any where else; but lay beyond Adar, not in a right line, but bending towards the west.

Ver. 4. And from thence it passed towards Azmon.] This is mentioned in the forenamed place, Numb. xxxiv. 4.

And went out unto the river of Egypt; and the going out of that coast was at the sea.] That is, the Mediterranean Sea. (See Numb. xxxiv. 5.)

This shall be your south coast.] From the tongue of the salt sea to the Mediterranean.

Ver. 5. And the east border was the salt sea, even unto the end of Jordan.] Having described the southern limits, he sets down the eastern; which, beginning where the southern did, at the tongue of the salt sea, reached to the other end of it, where Jordan falls into this sea. So that the whole length of this sea, from one end of it to the other, was the eastern bounds of Judah's country.

And their border at the north quarter was from the bay of the sea, at the uppermost part of Jordan.] It had its beginning where the eastern border ended, viz. at the mouth of Jordan, where it runs into the salt sea.

Ver. 6. And the border went up to Beth-hoglah.] A city in the tribe of Benjamin, (xviii. 21.)

And passed along by the north of Beth-arabah.] Another city in the same tribe, (xviii. 21.) though there was one in this tribe of the same name (ver. 61. of this chapter), which some take to be the same city, which lay in the frontier of both tribes.

And the border.] That is, this northern border.

Went up to the stone of Bohan, the son of Reuben.] We find mention made of this stone again in xviii. 17. where he speaks of the bounds of the tribe of Benjamin. It was but lately laid here, since the Israelites came into this country; but by whom, or of what it was a monument, is not known. It is certain Bohan did not dwell here; for the Reubenites had their portion on the other side of Jordan: but perhaps he performed some famous exploit in this place, or died and was buried here; being one of those that came over Jordan to assist their brethren in the conquest of Canaan.

Ver. 7. And the border went up towards Debir.] Which is mentioned in no other place: for it is not the same with that Debir in ver. 15. which was in the south near Hebron, but this in the northern parts.

From the valley of Achor.] Mentioned vii. 24. 26.

And so northward looking towards Gilgal.] Having Gilgal on the north of it. Which is to be understood, not of that Gilgal near Jericho, but of that place called Geliloth, xviii. 17. which was distant from thence, as appears by what follows.

That is before the going up to Adummim.] A place which stood upon a rising ground, which some think was in the tribe of Judah, others of Benjamin.

Which was on the south side of the river.] Or of the brook, which some take to be the brook Cedron.

And the border passed towards the waters of En-shemesh, and the goings out thereof were at En-rogel.] This place, it is evident, (1 Kings i. 9.) was near Jerusalem; which shews that Gilgal beforementioned was not the place where they were now encamped.

Ver. 8. And the border went up.] For it was an ascent from the salt sea to this country; especially when they came nigh to this place.

By the valley of the son of Hinnom.] A famous place on the east side of Jerusalem; and so delightfully shady, that it invited them to idolatrous worship in this valley, whereby it became infamous, (2 Kings xxiii. 10. Jer. vii. 32.) Hinnom, in all probability, was some eminent person, in ancient times, who was the owner of this valley: for it is sometimes called the valley of the children of Hinnom, which shews his posterity were planted here. After it was polluted by idolatry, it became a place where they threw all their filth, and excrements, and dead carcasses, and where there was a continual fire, the Jews say, to burn bones, and such sordid things as were thrown here; from whence, they think, it became the name for hell-fire.

Unto the south side of the Jebusite.] i. e. The city of the Jebusites.

The same is Jerusalem.] Which is called Jebusi, in the last verse of the eighteenth chapter, and Jebus, Judg. xix. 10. Especially that part of it fortified by the Jebusites, which was called Mount Sion, and lay on the south of Jerusalem.

And the border went up to the top of the mountain.] Which is thought to be Mount Moriah.

That lieth before the valley of Hinnom westward.] It was westward to the valley of Hinnom; and so had that valley on the east of it.

Which is at the end of the valley of the giants northward.] Which mountain had on the north part the valley of Rephaim (as the word is in the Hebrew), which was in the tribe of Judah, extending itself from Mount Moriah as far as Bethlehem, as Josephus tells us.

Ver. 9. And the border was drawn from the top of the hill to the fountain of the water Nephtoah.] Where this fountain, or well of water was, cannot be known; for it is no where mentioned but here, and in xviii. 15.

And went out to the cities of Mount Ephron.] This place also is unknown; for it cannot be that in the tribe of Ephraim, mentioned 1 Chron. xiii. 19.

And the border was drawn to Baalah, which is Kirjath-Jearim.] Called ver. 60. and xviii. 14. Kirjath-Baal; there being, it is likely, a temple of Baal in this place, whose name the Israelites changed into Kirjath-Jearim; which signifies urbs sylvarum, because of the goodly trees hereabouts, which made it the fitter for idolatrous uses.

Ver. 10. And the border compassed from Baalah westward.] Not in a direct line, but bending towards the west.

Unto Mount Seir.] Not that mount belonging to the Edomites, but another of that name.

And passed along unto the side of Mount Jearim (which is Chesalon) on the north side.] This was a woody country, as appears from the name of this mountain, and from Mount Seir also; which signifies as much as hairy.

And went down to Beth-shemesh.] A known place in the tribe of Judah, and a city of the priests, (xxi. 16.)

And passed on to Timnah.] Another city in the same tribe, (ver. 17.) but afterward given to the tribe of Dan, (xix. 43.)

Ver. 11. And the border went out to the side of Ekron northward.] This city belonged to the Philistines; but fell to the lot of Judah, as did also Ashdod and Gaza, ver. 45—47. But afterward Ekron was given to the Danites, as the forenamed place tells us, xix. 43.

And the border was drawn to Shicron, and passed along to Mount Baalah, and went out unto Jabneel.] It cannot now be known where these three places were; only it appears by what follows, that they were not far from the coast of the Philistines.

And the goings out of the border were at the sea.] That is, the northern border ended at the Mediterranean Sea; where there was a city called Jamnia; which some think the same with Jabneel.

Ver. 12. And the west border was to the great sea, and the coast thereof.] All along that coast of the Mediterranean, unto the river of Egypt, where the west border met with the southern, (ver. 4.)

This is the coast of the children of Judah round about, according to their families.] That is, thus their lot was bounded on all sides, in the first draught of it. Which being afterward found too large, it was contracted into a narrower compass, that more room might be made for the tribe of Simeon, who had part of this lot given them; as some other places were added out of it, to the tribes of Benjamin and Dan; as will appear afterward.

Ver. 13. And unto Caleb the son of Jephunneh he gave a part among the children of Judah.] Or rather, he (that is, Joshua) had given him a part in this country, which by lot fell to the tribe of Judah. See the foregoing chapter, xiv. 6, 7, &c. where we read how Caleb petitioned for it, and founded his petition on a grant made to him of it, long ago, by God himself.

According to the commandment of the Lord to Joshua.] God promised it by Moses; and it appears from these words, that Joshua had an order from God to make it good.

Even the city of Arba the father of Anak, which is Hebron.] See xiv. 15. This is here again particularly remembered, and an addition made to it, for this reason; that Joshua having described the bounds of the country of Judah, and intending to set down the particular cities which were included in it, and distributed among them (as he had just before said, ver. 12.) according to their families; it might be remembered, that there were two cities, or rather the territories about them, given to two families, antecedent to this distribution made by him, Eleazar, and the princes. Which being a matter fit to remain for ever upon record, and to be known to all posterity, he inserts it here at large, in this description of the portion of Judah; of which, it is likely, every family of that tribe had a map in their houses; that they knowing their limits might both preserve them, and keep within them.

Ver. 14. And Caleb drove thence.] Not by his own power alone, but by the confederate army of the tribe of Judah and Simeon, (Judg. i. 3. 9, &c.) in which, it is probable, he had a principal command; and led on that party which assaulted this city. (See x. 36, 37. xi. 21.)

The three sons of Anak, Sheshai, and Ahiman, and Talmai, the children of Anak.] Whom he had seen five-and-forty years ago, and was not at all affrighted at them. (See Numb. xiii. 22. and Judg. i. 10, &c.)

Ver. 15. And he went up thence to the inhabitants of Debir.] See x. 38, 39.

And the name of Debir before was Kirjath-Sepher.] See Judg. i. 11, 12. It is called also Kirjath-Sanna, ver. 49. of this chapter; which hath the same signification: for sanna (as Bochart observes, lib. ii. Canaan, cap. 17.) in the Arabic language, is learning, or the law. The Chaldee there calls it Kirjath-arche; which he translates urbs archivorum, the city where the ancient records of these nations were kept. All which shews the conjecture of some very learned men is not improbable, who think this city in those times was the seat of learning, as Athens was among the Greeks in future ages: insomuch, that Grotius takes this city to be the same with that which Xenophon calls Φοινίκων γυμνάσιον, the school of the Phœnicians. But, as the word γυμνάσιον in Xenophon's days did not signify a school of learning, but a place designed for exercises of the body; so we do not read of any famous place in that country, to which men resorted in his time for study.

Ver. 16. And Caleb said.] Made proclamation, I suppose, throughout the army, which he led against Debir.

He that smiteth Kirjath-Sepher, and taketh it.] Assaults this fortress, and possesseth himself of it.

To him will I give Achsah my daughter to wife.] With this place, I suppose, for her dowry.

Ver. 17. And Othniel the son of Kenaz, the brother of Caleb, took it.] He was stirred up by the Spirit of God, it is probable, (as he was when he was made judge of Israel, Judg. iii. 9, 10.) to attack this place with an extraordinary courage; in which the providence of God appeared (as Caleb hoped it would) in bestowing his daughter upon a worthy person, and keeping the inheritance in his own tribe.

And he gave him Achsah his daughter to wife.] Some think this was not lawful, because he was her uncle: but this is a mistake, for Othniel was not Caleb's brother, but Kenaz, who was Othniel's father. For Caleb is constantly called the son of Jephunneh, and Othniel the son of Kenaz. Therefore they had not the same father, but were very near of kin; which is all the word brother signifies in many places.

Ver. 18. And it came to pass, as she came unto him.] As she was brought from her father's house to her husband's; according to the accustomed manner. (See Selden, in his Uxor. Hebr. lib. ii. cap. 11.)

That she moved him to ask of her father a field.] Desired her husband, unto whom she thought her father at this time would deny nothing, to bestow a field upon her. Or, perhaps, she moved him to give her leave to ask it of her father; as she did, either by his permission, or by his desire; who might tell her, it was more proper for her to ask it than himself.

And she lighted off her ass.] Upon which they rode then in those countries; having no horses, nor mules, till after-times. And her lighting down was in reverence to her father; unto whom she addressed herself in an humble posture.

And Caleb said to her, What wouldest thou?] He seems to have prevented her request; knowing, by her posture, she had something to desire of him. But Ludov. de Dieu takes it quite otherwise; that when she came to her husband's house, she did not alight from her ass, but continued still sitting upon it. Which her father observing, and asking her the reason, why she did not come down and go to her husband; she told him, she had first a thing to beg of him. And thus both the LXX. and the Vulgar translate it, as if she did not alight, but sighed and cried, ἐκ τοῦ ὄνου, from the ass on which he sat.

Ver. 19. Who answered, Give me a blessing.] Bestow a gift upon me, as the word blessing is used, Gen. xxxiii. 11. or, make my happiness complete.

For thou hast given me a south land.] A dry country; being both mountainous and towards the south; that is, towards the deserts of Arabia, from whence very hot and scorching winds were wont to blow.

Give me also springs of water.] A field hard by, wherein were springs of water: for it was not merely the springs she begged, but the ground in which they were; as appears from the foregoing verse, where she moved her husband to ask a field.

And he gave her the upper springs, and the nether springs.] Whereby that dry ground might be watered and made fruitful. He seems to have given her more than she desired; not only those springs that were in the mountain, but those which were below also. That so neither the rising ground, nor the plain, might want water; as Arius Montanus expounds it.

Ver. 20. This is the inheritance of the tribe of the children of Judah, according to their families.] Now follows an account of the cities within the lot of this tribe; which were assigned to their several families, after Hebron, which was the principal of them (for here David reigned over the tribe of Judah alone seven years), was given to Caleb. Which the Jews generally think he did not get into his possession till after the death of Joshua; as is related in the book of Judges. (See there, i. 11—13, &c.)

Ver. 21. And the uttermost cities of the tribe of the children of Judah.] Those that were in the confines; for he doth not seem to number all that were in the heart of the country. So the Jews think, though the truth is, as will appear in the following part of the chapter, he only begins with the outmost cities, but afterward proceeds to those that were in the midst of the country.

Towards the coast of Edom southward.] He begins with those that lay on the south side of the country; which was the border he first described, ver. 1, 2.

Kabzeel.] Where that valiant person Benajah was born, who smote two lion-like men of Moab, (1 Chron. xi. 22.)

And Eder.] Which Eusebius calls Ἐδραί. But he hath no more to say of it; nor of Jagur, and the rest that follow, but that they were in the tribe of Judah: nor shall I go about to inquire further after every particular city mentioned; the number of which is summed up ver. 32.

Ver. 32. All the cities are twenty and nine, with their villages.] If the foregoing places be told, there are no less than thirty and eight of them. But there were only twenty and nine of them (as some solve the difficulty), that could be called cities; the other being only villages. Or, the meaning is (as the Jews generally think) that twenty and nine only belonged to the tribe of Judah; the rest being afterward given to the tribe of Simeon, as we find in the nineteenth chapter; where nine of these very cities here mentioned are said to be in that tribe, viz. Beer-sheba, Moladah, Hazar-shual, Baalah, Azem, Hormah, Zigleg, Ain, and Rimmon: which nine, with the twenty and nine here set down as the sum total, make just thirty and eight. And this seems to be the truer account, because the villages of other cities are mentioned ver. 36. and 41. and yet none of them set down by name, as is supposed in the first interpretation of these words.

Ver. 33. And in the valley.] Or in the plain below the mountains: but which way I shall not examine; because the geography of this country will be done, I hope, by a better hand.

Ver. 36. Fourteen cities with their villages.] There are fifteen in all, if we take the two last for distinct cities. But in all probability there might be one, called indifferently Gederah, or (as we translate it in the margin) Gederothaim. Perhaps there might be a double city, the old and the new: or, Gederothaim was an appendix to Gederah, as the borough of Southwark is to the city of London.

Ver. 37. Zenan, and Hadashah, &c.] I suppose these cities, and all that follow to the forty-first verse, lay also in the valley, or plain.

Ver. 41. Sixteen cities with their villages.] There are exactly that number; among which Mizpeh, Lachish, Bethdagon, Eglon, and Makkedah, were the chief. They seem to have been in the western part of this country, near the tribe of Dan; for the two first in the former division (Eshtaol and Zoreah, ver. 33.) were afterward given to the Danites, (xix. 41.)

Ver. 42. Libnah and Ether, &c.] These two cities, and those that follow unto ver. 45. were in another division of the plain country: among which, Libnah, Keilah, Achzib, and Mareshah, were the most noble.

Ver. 44. Nine cities with their villages.] But Ether and Ashan were afterward given to the tribe of Simeon, (xix. 7.) which may seem a prejudice to the interpretation which the Jews give of ver. 32. Unless we suppose these two places to be different from them, though called by the same name: as here is mention made of Ashnah, (ver. 43.) and there is one of the same name in the former division, ver. 33.

Ver. 45. Ekron, with her towns and her villages.] The Hebrew word for towns signifies daughters; by which seem to be meant lesser cities, depending on Ekron, with their villages belonging to them. Gath and Askalon, perhaps, were such at this time; though, in future times, they grew up to be of more consideration, which may be the reason they are not here mentioned. For this, and the two following verses, describe the lot of Judah in the west, upon the Mediterranean Sea, which comprehended all from Ekron to the river of Egypt.

Ver. 48. And in the mountains.] From the plain he goes to the mountains, and distributes the cities there into five divisions.

Shamir and Jattir, &c.] In this division there were eleven cities, among which was Kirjath-Sanna, (ver. 49.) which had three names. (See ver. 15.)

Ver. 52. Arab and Dumah, &c.] In this division there were nine cities, (ver. 54.) which were in the mountainous country, in the middle of Judea; as those mentioned before and those that follow were. And therefore it is not true which the Jews say, that he reckons up only the cities in the skirts of the country, with which indeed he began. (See ver. 21.)

Ver. 55. Maon, Carmel, &c.] This, and the two following verses, contain an account of ten cities and their villages in another division, two of which were near together; for Nabal dwelt in Maon, and had great possessions in Carmel, (1 Sam. xxv. 2.) There was another Maon in the deserts of Jeshimon, (1 Sam. xxiii. 1.) as there was another among the Moabites called Beth-Maon, the house or dwelling of Maon. The people of which, called Maonites, and, as some think, Mehunims, (Judg. x. 10. 12. 2 Chron. xxvi. 7.) were very powerful, and some time oppressed the Israelites. And there was likewise another Carmel; for this is not the place where Elijah built an altar, and offered sacrifices when he slew the prophets of Baal, (1 Kings xviii.) but a place far distant from it, where Saul made himself a place when he returned from the conquest of the Amalekites; (1 Sam. xv. 12.) that is, encamped, as some will have it, and divided the spoil, or built a triumphant arch, as St. Jerome interprets: and where Nabal kept so many sheep, as are mentioned in the place forenamed; and is the place the prophets mean (as Bochart conjectures) when they speak of the pastures of Carmel, Jer. l. 19. Amos i. 2. Mic. vii. 14. (See Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 48.)

Ver. 57. Cain, Gibeah, and Timnah, &c.] The first of these cities, Conradus Pellicanus thinks, hath the same name with that called Kinah, (ver. 22.) though it be in a different place. And, indeed, in this division, consisting of ten cities, there are two whose names we had before, when he speaks of those in the skirts of the country, viz. Ziph and Zanoah. (See ver. 24. 34.) Which shews there were many cities in the same country of the same name.

Gibeah and Timnah] Are known places. (See Gen. xxxviii. 12.)

Ver. 58. Halhul, Beth-zur, &c.] In this and in the following verse is contained a small division of six cities; the most eminent of which was Beth-zur, which lay in the road from Jerusalem to Hebron, about twenty miles from it, as St. Jerome tells us.

Ver. 60. Kirjath-Baal, &c.] Here are only two cities in this division, the first of which was called Kirjath-Jearim, as we read xviii. 14. and Baala, and Baal-Judah, 2 Sam. vii. 2. 1 Chron. xiii. 6.

Ver. 61. In the wilderness.] So the Hebrews call those parts of the country which were but thinly inhabited; as this was, wherein there were but six cities. Of this wilderness of Judah, we read frequently in the following books of Scripture; several parts of which are mentioned in the history of David, when he fled for fear of Saul, and lurked in this country: particularly in the wilderness of Ziph, 1 Sam. xxiii. 14. and of Maon, ver. 24, 25. and of En-gedi, one of the places here mentioned, 1 Sam. xxiv. 1. and there was a part of the wilderness not far from Carmel, beforementioned, 1 Sam. xxv. 14.

Ver. 62. The city of salt.] Some take this to be Zoar, the little city unto which Lot was permitted to flee, at the destruction of Sodom: which is called the city of salt, either because it stood near the salt sea, or because Lot's wife was hereabouts turned into a pillar of salt.

Ver. 63. As for the Jebusites, the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the children of Judah could not drive them out.] This supposes that Jerusalem belonged to the children of Judah; and so it did in part, though not the whole; for some of it was in the tribe of Benjamin, as shall be observed in its proper place. The king of this city Joshua had vanquished, together with other four kings of the Amorites who joined in battle with him, (Josh. x. 5. 23.) and in the conclusion of that chapter, he is said (ver. 42.) to have taken all these kings and their land at one time. But if Jerusalem was then taken, as well as the land about it, the strong-hold of Zion remained still in the hands of the Jebusites. And the Israelites not being able presently to people all the cities they had taken, the Jebusites recovered the city of Jerusalem, and got possession of it again; from whence the children of Judah expelled them after the death of Joshua, (Judg. i. 8.) But still Mount Zion continued in their hands until the reign of David.

But the Jebusites dwell with the children of Judah at Jerusalem unto this day.] That is, in the fort of Zion, which was a part of it; where they were so considerable, that the city was called the city of the Jebusites, and its name Jebus, (Judg. xix. 10, 11.) There can be no doubt, I think, that these Jebusites were of the seed of Canaan, they being constantly numbered among the seven nations devoted to destruction. Yet some of the Jews have a conceit, that the people here mentioned were derived from Abimelech, king of the Philistines; with whom their forefather Isaac made a solemn league; and therefore the children of Judah did not expel them. So Kimchi. But this, it is evident, is a foolish imagination: for why did they expel them at the last, as they did, if they were to be kind to them upon this account?

CHAP. XVI.

Ver. 1. THE lot of the children of Joseph.] That is, of Ephraim, and that half of the tribe of Manasseh, which was not yet provided for. (See ver. 4.) One cannot but observe the providence of God, in bringing up their lot next to Judah's. For, as he had the prerogative of being made the chief of all Jacob's children, (Gen. xlix. 10.) so Joseph had the privilege of the first-born transferred to his family. And therefore they are considered before any of the other tribes, except Judah.

Fell from Jordan by Jericho.] In the Hebrew, went forth from Jordan by the city of Jericho. Which was in the tribe of Benjamin; which tribe lay between the tribe of Judah and the tribe of Ephraim.

Unto the water of Jericho on the east.] This is justly thought to be the water mentioned 2 Kings ii. 19—21. whose spring Elisha healed, by which the plain of Jericho was watered. (See Josephus, lib. v. de Bello Jud. cap. 4.)

To the wilderness that goeth up from Jericho throughout Mount Beth-el.] It appears from xviii. 12, 13. that this was the wilderness of Beth-aven.

Ver. 2. And goeth up from Beth-el to Luz.] Beth-el was a place so called, because Jacob there had the famous Divine vision, mentioned Gen. xviii. It was nigh to the city Luz, as appears from the nineteenth verse of that chapter; but was distinct from the city itself, being in the neighbouring fields, where Jacob lay all night; though being so near, it is likely afterward they became one city. But they who would hence infer, that this book could not be written by Joshua, because Luz was built after his death in the land of the Hittites, (Judg. i. 26.) do merely trifle: for it is plain he doth not speak here of that Luz, but of the old one: for the country of the Hittites belonged to Hebron and Beer-sheba, and the neighbouring places in the land of Judah; unto which the author of this book could have no respect here in the description of the land of Ephraim. Therefore, when Luz and Beth-el are said to be the same, (xviii. 13. and Judg. i. 23.) the meaning can be no more, but that in length of time they were united; the inhabitants of Luz going into Beth-el. And of such coalitions of two cities into one, there are six hundred examples, as Huetius speaks in his Demonstr. Evang. propos. iv. and therefore, I think Du Pin well translates this whole verse, in this manner, From Beth-el-Luz the border passeth along to Archi-Ataroth.

And passeth along unto the borders of Archi to Ataroth.] Or rather, the borders of Archi-Ataroth, as both the LXX. and the Vulgar translate it; and as the words are in the Hebrew; this being the same city which is afterward called Ataroth, ver. 7. it being usual to cut off the former part of the names of cities, as Bochartus observes in abundance of instances; and gives this for one, in Phaleg. lib. ii. cap. 24.

Ver. 3. And goeth down westward to the coast of Japhtali.] It is not known where this place was, being no where else mentioned; but it was in the western part of the land towards the Mediterranean.

Unto the coast of Beth-horon the nether.] See x. 10.

And to Gezer.] This was one of the Levitical cities in this tribe of Ephraim, (Josh. xxi. 21.) And, as Is. Casaubon hath proved at large, it was, in all probability, the city which Josephus and the author of the book of the Maccabees call Gazara; and is mentioned as a neighbouring city to Joppa, Azotus, and Jamnia. (See his annot. upon lib. xvi. Strabonis, p. 261, 262.)

And the goings out thereof are at the sea.] The Vulgar hath it, at the great sea: which is certainly here meant; this being a short description of the lot of this tribe from Jordan on the east to the Mediterranean on the west.

Ver. 4. So the children of Joseph, Manasseh, and Ephraim, took their inheritance.] According to the following measures. Which give a more particular account of what is before said in general.

Ver. 5. And the border of the children of Ephraim, according to their families.] And, first, he shews what was given to Ephraim, reserving the description of Manasseh's portion to the next chapter.

Even the border of their inheritance on the east side.] The north-east. For he describes, though grossly, only the breadth of this lot from south to north.

Was Ataroth-adar, unto Beth-horon the upper.] The first of those was in the south, and the latter in the north.

Ver. 6. And the border went out towards the sea.] From Beth-horon the upper this northern border went on one side westward, towards the Mediterranean.

To Michmethah on the north side.] And on the other side eastward towards Jordan. This is very obscurely expressed; but it appears, from what follows, it must be thus interpreted.

And the border went about eastward unto Taanath-Shiloh.] Still proceeded further eastward unto this place; the name of which only is now known.

And passed by it on the east to Janohah.] Another place easterly, of which we are now ignorant. For there are no records left to make us understand whereabouts in the east it was situated; which was perfectly understood when this country was inhabited by the Ephraimites.

Ver. 7. And it went down from Janohah to Ataroth, and Naarath, and came to Jericho.] Not to the very city, for that belonged to Benjamin; but to the country adjoining.

And went out at Jordan.] Which was the eastern bounds of this country.

Ver. 8. And the border went out from Tappuah westward unto the river Kanah.] He returns to describe the length of it from east to west; if the river or brook Kanah be the same with the brook Cherith, mentioned 1 Kings xvii. 3. And so not only Adricoinius understands it, but that great man Bochartus; who observes, it was called the brook Cherith, from the Hebrew word cara, which signifies to eat or feed, because here God commanded the ravens to feed Elijah; and it was called Kanah, from the multitude of reeds which grew there (and so the Vulgar here translates it, the valley of reeds), in which it may be supposed Elijah lay hid. (Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. ii. cap. 14.) But there is so much to be objected against this situation of the brook Kanah, that I must leave it in suspense whether it were in the east, or in the west; and confess, with Conradus Pellicanus, that as none of the Hebrews or Latins have given a satisfactory account of these four last verses, so I do not pretend to it.

And the goings out thereof were at the sea.] Where sea alone is mentioned, it is commonly understood to signify the Mediterranean; which quite overthrows the opinion, which makes Kanah the same with Cherith. But the Vulgar here took it for the salt sea (adding the word salsissimum), which favours the forenamed opinion.

This is the inheritance of the tribe of Ephraim by their families.] A gross description of it.

Ver. 9. And the separate cities for the children of Ephraim were among the inheritance of the children of Manasseh, &c.] What these separate cities were cannot now be known, because we have not a particular account given of all the cities of this tribe (as we had of Judah), but only of those which were the limits of their country. But they seem to have been some cities in the tribe of Manasseh, which were inhabited by the children of Ephraim, though the territories about them belonged to the Manassites, and were occupied by them. (See xvii. 8, 9.)

Ver. 10. And they drave not out the Canaanites that dwelt in Gezer; but the Canaanites dwell among the Ephraimites unto this day.] The inhabitants of Gezer were properly Canaanites; who dwelt upon the sea-coast, where Gezer was situated. (See ver. 3.) This is mentioned also Judg. i. 29.

And serve under tribute.] They so far subdued them, as to make them tributaries; and, some fancy, imposed on them the precepts of the sons of Noah. But they ought to have destroyed them, and were forbidden to make peace with them upon any conditions. (See Judg. ii. 1—3.) Unless Grotius's conjecture be true, that the inhabitants of Gezer submitted and accepted the terms of peace, which Joshua was bound to offer them, before he began the war; as the Girgashites, he thinks, also did; who remained even in our Saviour's time: for they delivered up themselves at the first summons to surrender; which is the reason, he imagines, that they are omitted in the enumeration of their enemies, both in xi. 1. and in Deut. xx. 17. (See his annot. on his thirteenth chapter of the second book de Jure Belli et Pacis, sect. 4.)

This city, and the people of it, were destroyed in Solomon's time by Pharaoh, king of Egypt; who made a present of it to his daughter, Solomon's wife; who thereupon rebuilt it, (1 Kings ix. 16, 17.) Till then the Canaanites lived in it; from whence Spinoza would have it concluded, that this book was not written by Joshua, because we find the same thing recorded in the book of Judges, (i. 29.) which is of a later date. But this is a very frivolous cavil; for, as Huetius well observes, if an historian should have said in the life of Tiberius the Germans were not destroyed, the same might, in like manner, have been said in the life of Vespasian; and just so, when Joshua saith the Gezerites were not cut off by the Ephraimites, it did not hinder him that wrote in the following age from saying the same; because they still remained in the possession of their ancient habitation.

CHAP. XVII.

Ver. 1. THERE was also a lot for the tribe of Manasseh.] That half of it which had no portion on the other side Jordan.

For he was the first-born of Joseph.] I cannot make any sense of this; and therefore think the particle ki should be translated though, not for. And then the meaning is plain enough, that the lot of Manasseh came up after that of Ephraim (not before it), though he was the first-born of Joseph; for Jacob had preferred Ephraim before him, (Gen. xlviii. 19, 20.)

For Machir, the first-born of Manasseh.] And his only son, from whom sprung such a multitude, that there was no room for them all on the other side Jordan; but part of them were to be disposed of here.

The father of Gilead.] Numb. xxvi. 29.

Because he was a man of war.] This is generally thought to relate to Machir; who had done some famous exploits in the skirmishes they had with some neighbouring people while they were in Egypt, (see 1 Chron. vii. 21, 22.) for he was not alive to fight when they came to Canaan.

Therefore he had Gilead and Bashan.] A share in this country; for some of it was given to the Reubenites and Gadites, xiii. 25. but the Gileadites were also planted here; (ver. 31.) for, inheriting the valour of their progenitor, they were fit to defend this frontier-country.

Ver. 2. And there was also a lot for the rest of the children of Manasseh by their families.] A great part of the Manassites being disposed of before they passed over Jordan, now follows the lot which fell to the rest, whose several families he names.

For the children of Abiezer, and for the children of Helek, and for the children of Asriel, and for the children of Shechem, and for the children of Hepher, and for the children of Shemida.] These six families descended from Gilead, as we read Numb. xxvi. 30, &c. Where the first of them, who is here called Abiezer, is there called Jeezer.

These are the male-children of Manasseh, the son of Joseph, by their families.] He uses the expression of male-children to introduce what follows concerning the females. And they are called the children of Manasseh, because they inherited in his right; being families descended from him. (See Selden, de Successionibus, cap. 22.)

Ver. 3. But Zelophehad the son of Hepher, the son of Gilead, the son of Machir, the son of Manasseh.] Here he recites their pedigree from the son of Joseph.

Had no sons, but daughters.] And so could not make a family in Manasseh; and consequently have no share in the land.

And these are the names of his daughters, Mahlah, and Noah, &c.] See Numb. xxvi. 33.

Ver. 4. And they came near before Eleazar the priest, and before Joshua the son of Nun, and before the princes.] To whom God had committed the care of dividing the several lots, (xiv. 1. Numb. xxxiv. 17, 18.)

Saying, The Lord commanded Moses to give us an inheritance among our brethren.] See Numb. xxvii. 6, 7.

Therefore, according to the commandment of the Lord, he gave the man inheritance among the brethren of their father.] Or, an inheritance was given them, according to this commandment of God to Moses, by Eleazar and Joshua, and the rest who were appointed to divide the land. For after the lot had determined what land every tribe should have, Eleazar, Joshua, and the princes, considered how many families there were in the tribe, and how large they were; and accordingly divided it among them. So Numb. xxvi. 55, 56. imports.

Ver. 5. And there fell ten portions to Manasseh.] For there were six portions given to six sons: but the portion of Hepher, the last of them, being divided into five parts among his five daughters, there were ten portions in all. (See Selden, de Succession. cap. 23.) Which ten portions being assigned to so many families, Eleazar, Joshua, and the princes, were not concerned any further in dividing these ten portions into lesser, among several households; but that, I suppose, they agreed among themselves.

Besides the land of Gilead and Bashan, which were on the other side Jordan.] Mentioned before, ver. 1.

Ver. 6. Because the daughters of Manasseh.] That is, of Zelophehad, descended from Manasseh.

Had an inheritance among his sons.] Being considered as heirs to their father.

And the rest of Manasseh's sons.] Which were not of the six families beforementioned.

Had the land of Gilead.] On the other side Jordan, as hath been often said; and is again repeated, to prevent all contentions that might arise about their portions.

Ver. 7. And the coast of Manasseh was from Asher to Michmethah, that lieth before Shechem.] This was the south border, which went from a city called Asher, to another called Michmethah; which was over against a city in the tribe of Ephraim, called Shechem.

And the border went along on the right hand unto the inhabitants of En-tappuah.] And so to those that lived in the land of Tappuah, leaving Tappuah itself on the right hand.

Ver. 8. Now Manasseh had the land of Tappuah.] All the territory adjoining to this city belonged to the tribe of Manasseh.

But Tappuah, on the border of Manasseh, belonged to the children of Ephraim.] But the city itself, which lay on the confines of their country, was one of those separated cities spoken of in the foregoing chapter, (ver. 9.) in which the children of Ephraim dwelt.

Ver. 9. And the coast descended unto the river Kanah, southward of the river.] Concerning this place, see ver. 8. of the foregoing chapter.

These cities of Ephraim are among the cities of Manasseh.] That is, the cities on the coast beforementioned were inhabited by the Ephraimites, as well as Tappuah; though they were in the tribe of Manasseh. For these two tribes were nearer of kin than any other; and so greater friendship was intended to be established between them.

The coast also of Manasseh was on the north side of the river.] By the coast of Manasseh, is meant the cities inhabited by the Manassites; which were all on the north side of this river. As all those on the south side of it, though belonging to the Manassites, were inhabited by the children of Ephraim.

And the goings out of it were at the sea.] The coast mentioned in the beginning of the verse, ended at the Mediterranean Sea.

Ver. 10. Southward it was Ephraim's, and northward it was Manasseh's, and the sea is his border.] These words express how these two tribes lay, with respect to each other: Ephraim on the south, and Manasseh on the north; and both bounded on the west by the Mediterranean.

And they met together in Asher on the north, and in Issachar on the east.] Though on the south the tribe of Manasseh was wholly joined to the tribe of Ephraim, yet on the north-west, towards the great sea, it had the tribe of Asher on the confines of it; and on the east (towards Jordan and the sea of Tiberias) the tribe of Issachar. So Conradus Pellicanus rightly explains these words. For both the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh could not touch these other tribes.

Ver. 11. And Manasseh had in Issachar, and in Asher.] As Ephraim had some towns in the tribe of Manasseh, so Manasseh had some in the tribes of Issachar and Asher, unto whom, in the north-west, and the east, they were near neighbours.

Beth-shean and her towns.] This was a place not far from the sea of Tiberias beforementioned, and near Jordan.

And Ibleam and her towns.] It appears by 2 Kings ix. 27. that it was not far from Megiddo, mentioned in the latter end of this verse.

The inhabitants of Dor and her towns.] Concerning Dor, see xi. 2. whose inhabitants (as also those of the other cities following) are here mentioned; because, it seems, they possessed the people (whom they ought to have destroyed), as well as their cities and towns, making them their slaves.

And the inhabitants of Endor and her towns.] The city whither Saul went to consult with the witch. It was not far from Mount Tabor; which was in the confines of the tribe of Issachar.

And the inhabitants of Taanach and her towns.] This city lay not far from the other; and was one of those given to the Levites, (xxi. 25.)

And the inhabitants of Megiddo and her towns.] This was near the former; not far from the brook Kishon, (Judg. v. 19.)

Even three countries.] Or rather, three parts of those countries beforementioned.

Ver. 12. Yet the children of Manasseh could not drive out the inhabitants of those cities.] Through want of faith in

Digitized by Microsoft ®

God, and of zeal to perform his commands; which made them slack in their attempts to expel the inhabitants of this country.

But the Canaanites would dwell in that land.] Finding themselves strong enough to maintain it, against [illegible] ble endeavours as they used to conquer it.

Ver. 13. Yet it came to pass, when the children of Israel were waxen strong, that they put the Canaanites to tribute.] When they were more numerous and expert in war, not only the Manassites, but they of other tribes also, brought the Canaanites to be tributaries to them.

But did not utterly drive them out.] In which they grievously offended against God's command, (Deut. xx. 16—18.)

Ver. 14. And the children of Joseph spake unto Joshua.] Both they of Ephraim, and they of Manasseh, (ver. 17.)

Saying, Why hast thou given me but one lot and one portion to inherit, seeing I am a great people.] They were discontented with their lot, which they thought too strait for them; because they were so very numerous, that the country which was assigned them was little enough for one of them.

Forasmuch as the Lord hath blessed me hitherto.] Multiplied them exceedingly, as appears from Numb. xxvi. 34. 37.

Ver. 15. And Joshua answered them, If thou be a great people.] Though he was their flesh and blood, yet Joshua would not humour them; but returns their argument upon them, that since they were so great a people, they should do as here follows.

Then get thee up to the whole country.] Which was in the highlands, (ver. 18.) which is full of trees; for Aba, as Bochart observes, signifies very thick woods, (lib. ii. Canaan, cap. 9.)

And cut down for thyself there.] Make it habitable.

In the land of the Perizzites.] Who were a rough uncivilized people, living in these mountainous forests, as Bochart gathers from this place; and thinks they had their name from thence. Because they did not live in cities and towns, but in those Pagi that were in the woods; which the Hebrews call Pherazoth; from whence the Pagani, the people who lived in those places, were called Pherazim: lib. iv. Phaleg. cap. 36.

And of the giants.] There were some of the Rephaim (as the Hebrew word is) still remaining here; or it was a place where they had been wont to dwell.

If Mount Ephraim be too narrow for thee.] If that noble mount which was given them for their portion, with the rest of the land beforementioned (which is included in the name of Mount Ephraim, the principal part being put for the whole) did not afford them room enough, he exhorts them to enlarge their bounds, by taking in those woodlands beforementioned.

Ver. 16. And the children of Joseph said, The hill is not enough for us.] They still insisted, that if they could get possession of the woody mountain, and destroy all the inhabitants, and cut down all the trees, it would not be sufficient to contain them.

And all the Canaanites that dwell in the land of the valley.] But if it would, they further allege, they had no hope to conquer it; because, before they could come at it, they must encounter those that lived in the valley below it, who were too strong for them.

Have chariots of iron.] Before which they were not able to stand: for he doth not mean chariots made of iron, but armed with iron; which the ancients called currus falcati, in Greek δρεπανοφόρου having a kind of scythes of two cubits fastened to long axle-trees on both wheels; which [illegible] swiftly through a body of men, made great slaughter, mowing them down like grass or corn. Xenophon gives a description of them in his Cyropædia, lib. vi. and Quintus Curtius, lib. iv. cap. 9. Vegetius also, de Re Militari, lib. iii. cap. 24. Bonfrerius hath heaped up abundance on this subject; and so hath Joh. Conradus Dietericus in his Antiq. Biblicæ, p. 329, &c. where he observes Xenophon imagined Cyrus to have been the inventor of these chariots; which had been in use among the Canaanites eight hundred years before.

Both they who are of Beth-shean and her towns, and they who are in the valley of Jezreel.] Which cities, it seems, lay near to this mountain, unto which Joshua directed them, and both of them possessed by the Canaanites.

Ver. 17. And Joshua spake unto the house of Joseph, even unto Ephraim and Manasseh.] He was not moved, by their objections, from his resolution; but told them,

Thou art a great people, and hast great power.] That, by their own confession, they were very numerous; and consequently of great power.

Thou shalt not have one lot only.] And therefore need not be straitened in their habitation; which they said was not sufficient for one tribe.

Ver. 18. But the mountain shall be thine.] For they should have the mountain added to their portion; which he could not enlarge any other way, it being settled by a Divine decree.

For it is a wood, and thou shalt cut it down.] Or, though it be a wood, yet they could cut it down, and grub it up; and then it would afford a commodious habitation.

And the goings out of it shall be thine.] They should have the product of it: or, all the country below in the valley (ver. 16.) should be theirs also.

And thou shalt drive out the Canaanites, though they have iron chariots, and though they be strong.] He answers all their objections (ver. 16.) with an assurance that they should be able, with God's help, to dispossess the present inhabitants, notwithstanding their great force and power: for so God had commanded them to believe, and not to be afraid of their chariots, which now seemed so terrible to them. (See Deut. xx. 1.)

CHAP. XVIII.

Ver. 1. AND the whole congregation of the children of Israel.] All their elders and heads of their tribes, who represented the people of Israel; and are sometimes meant by the whole congregation, as Corn. Bertram hath shewed in many instances, particularly in 1 Chron. xiii. 1, 2, &c. (See L. de Repub. Judaica, in the latter end of cap. 6. and cap. 11.) But here it may well signify the whole body of the people, who accompanied the ark to settle it in a new place.

Assembled together at Shiloh.] A place in the tribe of Ephraim, not far from Jerusalem; and, as the great primate of Ireland thinks, the same with Salem. But I do not find any ground for that opinion.

And set up the tabernacle of the congregation there.] Which had hitherto remained in Gilgal; but now, by God's order, no doubt, (for he was to choose the place of his own residence, Deut. xii. 5. 11. 14, &c.) was removed thither; together with the camp of Israel, which tarried so long in Gilgal, merely because the tabernacle was there. If it be inquired, what token God gave of his choice of this place [illegible] perhaps it was by giving some extraordinary token of his approbation, by accepting their sacrifices; or, it may be, they consulted him in this case by the oracle of urim and thummim. For when he made choice of Mount Sion, an angel bade the prophet Gad tell David he should set up an altar in the thrashing-floor of Ornan; and there God answered him by fire, &c. (See 1 Chron. xxi. 18. 26.) Now the reason of its being translated to Shiloh, it is likely, was because it would have been too far, after the division of the land, for all the tribes of Israel to go to Gilgal, to perform all that the law required to be done at the tabernacle. Which was now indispensably to be performed, though while they lived in the wilderness they did not live by these rules, (Deut. xii. 8—10.) and, perhaps, while they continued unsettled in Canaan could not exactly observe them. This place also was very convenient for all the tribes to resort unto; and likewise very safe, being guarded by the two powerful tribes of Judah and Ephraim. And it was, as I said, in the lot of the latter; for it was fit it should be where Joshua was; who, being of this tribe, lived among them. Here it is thought the tabernacle continued for the space of three hundred and fifty years, till the days of Samuel; but our primate beforementioned reckons no more than three hundred and twenty-eight years.

And the land was subdued before them.] Or rather, for the land was subdued, &c. that is, continued quiet, without any opposition from the old inhabitants, since the conquest mentioned xi. 23.

Ver. 2. And there remained among the children of Israel seven tribes, which had not yet received their inheritance.] For whom no lot had been drawn at Gilgal. The reason of which was, perhaps, because the last mentioned tribes, of the house of Joseph, were not satisfied with the division which was begun to be made there. And therefore Joshua stopped his proceedings till he had made a new survey of the whole country. In order to which, God commanded him to remove hither; from whence, being in the middle of the country, they might do it more easily; and also give the children of Joseph greater content, by settling God's house among them.

Ver. 3. And Joshua said unto the children of Israel.] Unto the congregation beforementioned, ver. 1.

How long are you slack to go to possess the land, which the Lord God of your fathers hath given you?] He doth not blame them for not taking possession of the land which was conquered, without God's direction, by a lot (for that was expressly commanded), but for their being so slow to consider of, and propound some means of making such an equal division, as they desired; that they might take possession of the land, where their lot should fall.

Ver. 4. Give out from among you three men for each tribe.] He therefore himself propounds a method for their satisfaction; and such a one as they could not dislike, viz. that they should choose three men (for he would not appoint them, but only give them orders what to do) out of each of the seven remaining tribes that were not provided for; or rather, out of the nine tribes and a half; that they who had already received their portion, might be willing to resign up some part of it, if they found, upon the survey, there was not sufficient left for their brethren.

And I will send them, and they shall rise, and go through the land.] Give them orders to go immediately through the whole country; both that which was divided, and that which was not.

And describe it.] Set down not only the dimensions of it, but its condition and quality; whether barren or fruitful, mountainous or plain, &c.

According to the inheritance of them.] Making so many parts in the description, as there remain tribes that want their inheritance. Thus the next verse teaches us to explain it.

And they shall come again to me.] Make their report to him, when they had done, that he might judge of it.

Ver. 5. And they shall divide it into seven parts.] Of equal extent, with a just respect, as Josephus observes, not merely to the quantity of ground, but the goodness of the soil. But there was no respect to the greater or lesser number of persons in each tribe; for then these men had given each tribe their portion, and there had been no need of a lot. Their business was to divide the country into seven equal portions, and leave God to appoint which portion should fall to each tribe: who would have no reason to complain, when the division was made by themselves.

Judah shall abide in their coast on the south, and the house of Joseph shall abide in their coasts on the north.] But the lot of Judah, which was southerly, and the lot of Ephraim and Manasseh, which, with respect to the former, was northerly, were not to be altered. But these tribes were to remain undisturbed in their possessions, unless it should be found that they had more than they needed, and others had less. For this was the very reason of making a new and more exact survey of the country, than had been made before the first division; that there might be an allotment made more to every one's satisfaction, when they had a more perfect account of all the land. Accordingly, it is evident, that the tribe of Judah (by common consent, no doubt) parted with some of their portion to the Simeonites, and the Danites, whose lot appeared to be too scanty, (xix. 29. 41.)

Ver. 6. Ye shall therefore describe the land into seven parts, and bring the description hither to me.] When the men, who were appointed to measure the country, had divided it into seven parts, he orders that the description thus divided should be laid before him.

That I may cast lots for you here before the Lord.] Whereby their possessions were settled and established by a Divine authority. For the lots being drawn before the sanctuary, God was desired to declare what portion every tribe should have. Accordingly, it was their duty to look upon it as a sacred appointment, and to be contented with it; for it was done at the very door of the tabernacle, as we read, xix. ult.

Ver. 7. But the Levites have no part among you, for the priesthood of the Lord is their inheritance.] He declared, what had been often said before, that in this division of the land, the priests and Levites were to have no share; God having otherwise provided for them. (See xiii. 14. 32. xiv. 3.)

And Gad, and Reuben, and half the tribe of Manasseh, have received their inheritance beyond Jordan, &c.] And, as for the rest, no care was to be taken of them in this division; because Moses had provided for them before they came over Jordan.

Ver. 8. And the men arose, and went away.] Being chosen by their brethren (as Joshua directed, ver. 4.) to act in their name.

And Joshua charged them that went to describe the land, saying, Go, and walk through the land, and describe it, &c.] Before they went, Joshua gave them a charge to do the business they went about with care and fidelity; using their best diligence to be truly and fully informed: and at their return, give him an account, that he might put an end to all disputes, by desiring God to assign every tribe their portion.

That I may here cast lots for you before the Lord in Shiloh.] These words sound as if he gave this charge to them in the presence of God, before the sanctuary, that they might be excited to execute his orders with greater diligence.

Ver. 9. And the men went and passed through the land.] Through the whole country which they had conquered.

And described it by cities.] Set down the name of every city, and its villages, and the territory about it, with its situation. For so, I suppose, Joshua charged them.

Into seven parts in a book.] In which were seven maps, as we now call them; which made a chorographical description of all the cities, towns, mountains, plains, woods, and all other conditions of the soil.

And came again to Joshua to the host at Shiloh.] For the tabernacle being removed hither, the camp followed it, as I observed, ver. 1. And here it remained till the land was divided among the seven tribes. Which could not be done in a short time; for Josephus saith they were seven months in taking this survey, and making the forenamed description.

Ver. 10. And Joshua.] With the assistance of Eleazar and the princes, (xiv. 1.)

Cast lots for them in Shiloh before the Lord.] As he told them he would, ver. 6. The manner of it, see upon Numb. xxvi. 55, 56.

And there Joshua divided the land unto the children of Israel, according to their divisions.] That is, according to the divisions made by the surveyors; which were so just and equal, that all consented the lot should determine what part should belong to them.

Ver. 11. And the lot of the tribe of Benjamin came up.] The providence of God so ordered it, that his children should have the first lot of these seven, next to the children of Joseph, they two being the only sons of Rachel, Jacob's beloved wife.

According to their families.] To be divided according to their families.

And the coast of their lot came forth between the children of Judah.] Who lay on the south of them.

And the children of Joseph.] For the Ephraimites lay on the north of them. And it is observable, that in the blessing of Moses, Benjamin is placed between Judah and Joseph (Levi having no inheritance among them), which prophecy of Moses by this lot was exactly fulfilled concerning him, (Deut. xxxiii. 12.)

Ver. 12. And their border on the north side was from Jordan; and the border went up to the side of Jericho on the north side.] Just thus the south border of Ephraim proceeded from Jordan by Jericho, which was in the tribe of Benjamin. (See xvi. 1. 7.)

And went up through the mountain westward.] Through the mountainous country, which lay on the north of Jericho, it went up to the western part of the country.

And the goings out thereof were at the wilderness of Beth-aven.] A place near Beth-el, which in aftertimes (when they committed foul idolatry there) was called Beth-aven, a house or place of iniquity, (Hosea iv. 15. x. 8.)

Ver. 13. And the border went out from thence towards Luz, to the side of Luz (which is Beth-el) southward.] On the south side of that city. (See xvi. 2.) The Jews think there were two Beth-els; one here named in the confines of Benjamin and Joseph, where Jacob had the vision of the ladder reaching up to heaven, and the other Beth-el near to Ai, (viii. 6. 17.)

And the border descended to Ataroth-adar.] Called in the place forenamed, (xvi. 2.) Archi-Ataroth.

Near the hill that lieth on the south side of the nether Beth-horon.] A city in the tribe of Ephraim, (xvi. 3.) called the nether, because there was a higher hard by it in the mountain adjoining. Though others will have the two Beth-horons to have been at a great distance; one in the mountains of Ephraim, the other in the valley near Jordan.

Ver. 14. And the border was drawn thence.] In a line bending westward, as appears by what follows in the end of the verse; which tells us the western border began from Beth-horon the nether.

And compasseth the corner of the sea southward, from the hill that lieth before Beth-horon.] I cannot give any account of this border, according to our translation: for, it is certain, it did not compass any corner of the Mediterranean (and no other sea can be here meant), nor came near unto it. Therefore, by peath, which we translate corner, must be understood the side of the sea. As if he had said, It ran along in a parallel line to the sea. So the Vulgar hath it, over against the sea; and the LXX. to the same purpose. And the word southward is joined by the Vulgar, not to the sea, but to the next words, southward from the hill that lieth before Beth-horon.

Southward.] That is, the hill was to the south of Beth-horon, as we read in the verse before.

And the goings out thereof were at Kirjath-Baal (which is Kirjath-Jearim), a city of Judah.] See xv. 60.

This was the west quarter.] Here the peath beforementioned (for it is the same word we before translate corner), the west side, or quarter, ended: for that is meant by its goings out.

Ver. 15. And the south quarter.] The same word again in the Hebrew, viz. peath.

Was from the end of Kirjath-Jearim, and the border went out on the west.] Did not go directly south, but bordered something towards the sea, till it came to the well of waters of Nephtoah, as this verse concludes. (See xv. 9.) By considering of which, and the foregoing and following verses, it will be unnecessary to say much of this south border of Benjamin, it being the same with the north border of Judah. For the very same places are named here that are there, and in the same order; with this difference only, that in describing this border, he proceeds from the west towards the east; but in describing that of Judah from the east towards the west. So that Kirjath-Jearim is there the north limits of Judah, as it is here the south limits of Benjamin.

Ver. 16. And the border came down to the end of the mountain that lieth before the valley of the son of Hinnom, &c.] See xv. 8.

And descended to En-rogel.] See xv. 7.

Ver. 17. And was drawn from the north, and went forth to En-shemesh, and went forth towards Geliloth.] See there; where this place is called Gilgal.

Which is over against the going up to Adummim, and descended to the stone of Bohan, the son of Reuben.] See there, and ver. 6.

Ver. 18. And passed along towards the side of Arabah northward; and went down unto Arabah.] Called Beth-Arabah, xv. 6. and so the LXX. have it here in this verse.

Ver. 19. And the border passed along to the side of Beth-hoglah northward.] Leaving Beth-hoglah on the north of it, (see xv. 6.)

And the outgoings of the border were at the north bay of the salt sea.] Its utmost progress was to the tongue or bay of the salt sea, which is on the north part of it.

At the south end of Jordan.] Where Jordan ends towards the south; being swallowed up by the salt sea.

This was the south coast.] That is, hither it reached, and here it ended.

Ver. 20. And Jordan was the border of it on the east side.] Till, near Jericho, it met with the bounds of the tribe of Ephraim and Manasseh.

This was the inheritance of the children of Benjamin, by the coasts thereof round about.] That is, a description of its bounds on all sides.

According to their families.] Which was divided among as many families as were in that tribe.

Ver. 21. Now the cities of the tribe of the children of Benjamin, according to their families, were Jericho.] Having given a description of the bounds of the country, he sets down the principal cities in it. The first of which was well known, viz. Jericho; the territory of which remained, though the city itself was destroyed. And perhaps there were some houses there, though without walls or gates; which seem to be the only things which Joshua commanded should not be built, (vi. 26.)

And Beth-hoglah.] A city nigh to Jericho; not far from the river Jordan.

And the valley of Keziz.] Rather, Emer-Keziz; for he speaks of a city, not of a valley. Or, it may be interpreted, Keziz in the valley; that is, in the plain of Jericho.

Ver. 22. And Beth-Arabah.] This city is reckoned to Judah, (xv. 61.) being, it seems, in the confines of both tribes. It stood also in the plain of Jericho, signifying as much as domus campestris, a habitation in the fields: for there were large fields about it, as Bochartus supposes; from whence a place in Assyria, for this reason, was called Oraba, as he shews, lib. iv. Phaleg. cap. 21.

And Zemaraim.] A city, it is probable, built by Zemari, the tenth son of Canaan, (Gen. x. 18.) There was a mountain also called by this name, from this city, it is likely. For though it is said to be in Mount Ephraim, 2 Chron. xiii. 14. it might also, in part, belong to Benjamin, as Betharaba and the next cities did belong to two tribes.

And Beth-el.] A city in the confines of the tribe of Ephraim and of Benjamin, which seems to have belonged to both.

Ver. 23. And Avim, and Parah, and Ophrah.] We know no more of these cities but their names.

Ver. 24. And Chephar-haammonai, and Ophni.] These also are unknown cities.

And Gaba.] This is often named in Scripture, and called Gibeah, being that place where the foul fact was committed which almost ruined this tribe, (Judg. xix.) And is called Gibeah of Saul, because it was his native country, where he made his residence after he was king, (1 Sam. x. 26.) And it was one of the cities of the priests, (Josh. xxi. 17.)

Twelve cities with their villages.] Which seem to have been in the eastern part of their country.

Ver. 25. Gibeon, and Ramah, and Beeroth.] The first of these is well-known from the story of its ancient inhabitants, related in the ninth chapter of this book. It was also a city of the priests, (xxi. 17.) and seated on a hill, as its very name imports. Ramah also was an eminent city on the north side of Jerusalem, as Bethlehem was on the south. So that Jerusalem was in the road from the one to the other; as appears from the man that went from Bethlehem-Judah to Ramah, (Judg. xix. 2. 11. 13.)

Beeroth also is notorious upon this account, that it was one of the cities which cunningly joined with Gibeon to deceive Joshua and procure a peace with them, (ix. 17.)

Ver. 26. And Mizpeh.] There were several cities of this name, as I have noted before, (xv. 38.) And this was in the confines of the tribe of Judah; so that it seems to have belonged both to them and to Benjamin, as several others did.

And Chephirah.] Another of the cities depending upon Gibeon, (ix. 17.)

And Mozah.] An unknown city.

Ver. 27. And Rekem.] This is a city mentioned both by Eusebius and St. Jerome; but they do not say where it was, nor so much as name the two next, Irpeel and Taralah.

Ver. 28. And Zelah, Eleph.] Two cities, of which no more than the names are remaining. Eusebius and St. Jerome mention the former as in the tribe of Benjamin, but say no more.

And Jebusi, which is Jerusalem.] See xv. 63. where it is reckoned to the tribe of Judah; for both that tribe and Benjamin had an interest in it. The old city belonged to the tribe of Benjamin; unto which an addition being made, it belonged to Judah (as some make account); that is, the north part, with Mount Moriah, was in the portion of Benjamin; but the south part, wherein Mount Sion was, belonged to Judah.

Gibeath.] This was a distinct city from Gaba, (ver. 24.) and I suppose near to Jerusalem.

And Kirjath.] The very name imports a city: which, Eusebius and St. Jerome say, was under the metropolis of Gibeath forementioned. Πόλις ὑπὸ Μητρόπολιν Γαβαθά.

Fourteen cities with their villages.] Which were in the western part of this tribe.

This is the inheritance of the children of Benjamin.] Which was one of the smallest, with respect to the quantity of ground which they possessed; but the soil was the richest of all other tribes, as Josephus informs us.

According to their families.] All the families of the Benjamites were disposed of into these great cities, and the territories belonging to them; in which, it is probable, there were lesser cities, not here named. For we find two cities of the priests in this tribe which are not among those here set down, viz. Anathoth and Almon, (xxi. 18.)

CHAP. XIX.

Ver. 1. AND the second lot came forth to Simeon, even for the tribe of the children of Simeon.] Both the LXX. and the Vulgar leave out the latter part of these words, as if they were superfluous; and only say, the second lot came forth to Simeon. But I suppose the words following in the Hebrew are intended to shew, that though their inheritance was within that of the tribe of Judah (as the next word tells us), yet those cities were not all that were given to this tribe, but they had another share by lot that fell to them: and God disposed it so, that the very next lot to Benjamin came up for them; Simeon being the eldest son of Jacob that was unprovided.

According to their families.] Which was divided by Eleazar, Joshua, and the princes, among their several families.

And their inheritance was within the inheritance of the tribe of Judah.] So we well translate it; for though the word in the Hebrew be betoch (in the midst) of the inheritance of Judah; yet it signifies no more than within. For the lot of Simeon did not lie in the very heart (as we speak), but in the skirts, of the country of Judah: from whose northern and western border some part was cut off, and given to the Simeonites; for the reason mentioned ver. 9.

Ver. 2. And they had in their inheritance Beer-sheba, and Sheba.] Or rather, Beer-sheba, which is Sheba: for they were one and the same place; sometimes called at length Beer-sheba, and sometimes contracted into Sheba: nothing being more common than to cut off the beginning of the names of towns and places, as Bochartus hath shewn in many instances, in his Phaleg. lib ii. cap. 24. which he repeats in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 15. And certainly it is so here; for otherwise it would not have been said, (ver. 6.) there were thirteen cities in all, but fourteen; for there are so many if Sheba be distinct from Beer-sheba. Which was the last city in the south belonging to the land of Israel. From whence the common saying, from Dan to Beer-sheba, to express the whole length of the country; from Dan in the north to Beer-sheba in the south.

And Moladah.] This is mentioned before, in the account we had of the lot of Judah, (xv. 26.)

Ver. 3. And Hazar-shual.] A place where there was abundance of foxes.

And Balah.] The same that is mentioned in the south of Judah, (xv. 29.)

And Azem.] It signifies, in Hebrew, great strength. We read of it no where else but in this place, and 1 Chron. iv. 29. where it is called Ezem.

Ver. 4. And El-tolad.] Called there Tolad; the first syllable being cut off, as I said ver. 2. it often is.

And Bethul.] Called there Bethuel. Which some will have to be the same with Bethulia, where Judith dwelt; because she was of the tribe of Simeon. But that is a mistake; for this was in the south of Judah, and that a city in Galilee.

And Hormah.] Which is mentioned in the same place, 1 Chron. iv. 30. and was one of the cities to whom David sent part of the spoil he took from the Amalekites, (1 Sam. xxx. 30.)

Ver. 5. And Ziklag.] A neighbouring city, as appears from both the forementioned places.

And Beth-marcaboth, and Hazar-susah.] It is a very probable conjecture of Bochartus, that these were two of the cities where Solomon kept his chariots and horses, (1 Kings x. 26.) For the former of these signifies the house of chariots; and the other, the village of horses. For it is called Hazar-susim, in the plural number, 1 Chron. iv. 31. (See Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. 2. cap. 9.)

Ver. 6. And Beth-lebaoth, and Sharuhen.] They seem to be the same cities, called in aftertimes Beth-birei, and Shaaraim, (1 Chron. iv. 31.)

Thirteen cities and their villages.] See ver. 1.

Ver. 7. Ain, Remmon, and Ether, and Ashan.] One of these towns is otherwise called in 1 Chron. iv. 32. viz. Etam, not Ether; and a fifth is added. Which shews all the cities and towns belonging to Simeon are not here mentioned, no more than all those belonging to Benjamin; as I observed on ver. 28. of the foregoing chapter. Ashan also is thought by Bochart (in the place beforenamed) to be the same with Chor-Ashan in 1 Sam. xxx. 30. by cutting off the first syllable.

Four cities and their villages.] Which are mentioned separate from the rest; either because they were in another part of the country, or because they were not properly cities, but only chatserim (large villages), as they are expressly called 1 Chron. iv. 32. that is, towns which were without walls. Here, indeed, they are called cities; but that must be understood largely, to make it agree with the Chronicles, for towns of more than ordinary bigness.

Ver. 8. And all the villages that were round about these cities.] Here the word chatserim (villages) is opposed to cities; and signifies all the towns, great and small, that lay about all the cities beforementioned.

To Baalath-beer Ramath.] This is the name but of one city, called simply Baal in 1 Chron. iv. 33. and is that city in the tribe of Judah, mentioned xv. ver. 24. or ver. 29. As far as which city the bounds of the tribe of Simeon reached. Some think this is the city which Solomon built, i. e. repaired, and made larger and stronger, (1 Kings ix. 18.)

On the south.] This doth not relate to the situation of the city beforementioned; but of the inheritance of this tribe, which was on the south of Judah.

Ver. 9. Out of the portion of the children of Judah was the inheritance of Simeon.] For which reason the bounds of this tribe on all sides are not described as of the foregoing; because that was sufficiently done in the description of the possession of Judah; out of which the inheritance of this tribe was taken.

For the part of the children of Judah was too much for them.] They who were sent to make a new survey of the whole land, found that the former surveyors had not measured it exactly; but left one division too big in proportion to the rest, which fell to the tribe of Judah: who had now, therefore, a large slice cut from them, because they had too much, and others too little.

Therefore the children of Simeon had their inheritance within the inheritance of them.] Within that lot, which was at first given to the tribe of Judah: yet not absolutely given, but so that if it appeared there was not sufficient for the rest of their brethren, and they had more than enough; that error should be corrected by taking something from them and giving it to another tribe, as it was now in this new allotment.

Ver. 10. And the third lot came up for Zebulun, according to their families.] He was not the next brother; for Issachar was born before him. But he is mentioned before Issachar, both in the blessing of Jacob, Gen. xlix. 13. and of Moses, Deut. xxxiii. 18.

And the border of their inheritance was to Sarid.] No more is said of this place by Eusebius, but that it was ὅριον Ζαβουλών, the bound or limit of Zebulun; and St. Jerome saith the same. And, by what follows, it seems to have been the south-west border.

Ver. 11. And their border went up towards the sea.] That is, the Mediterranean, which was in the west.

And Maralah, and reacheth to Dabbasheth.] These were cities in the western borders, as appears by the following words.

And reacheth to the river that is before Jokneam.] See xii. 22.

Ver. 12. And turned from Sarid eastward, towards the sun-rising.] This is a description of the south border; which went from Sarid in the west unto Jordan in the east.

Unto the border of Chisloth-Tabor.] A city near Mount Tabor in the tribe of Issachar, ver. 18. For as, on the west, the Zebulunites were contiguous to the tribe of Manasseh; so, towards the east, they were to the tribe of Issachar.

And then goeth out to Daberath.] A city also in the tribe of Issachar, (xxi. 28.)

And goeth up to Japhia.] It is uncertain where this city was, though some think it to be the strong city which Josephus calls Japha, (lib. ii. de Bello Jud. cap. 25.) and places it in Galilee near Jotapata.

Ver. 13. And from thence passeth on along on the east to Gittath-Hepher.] This seems to be a description of the eastern border. We read of the land of Hepher, 1 Kings iv. 10. which was near the sea of Galilee. There this city was, in which Jonah the prophet was born, (2 Kings xiv. 25.)

And Ittah-kazin.] This city, it is likely, was upon the same sea of Galilee, called Gennesaret; which the Vulgar calls Thacasin.

And goeth out to Remmon-methoar, to Neah.] Here the eastern border ended (for that is meant by the phrase goeth out), at the sea of Gennesaret. So Josephus expressly affirms. (See Gen. xlix. 13.)

Ver. 14. And the border compasseth it on the north side to Hannathon.] Here begins the description of the northern border; which, from the last-named place, went in a bending line towards Hannathon; a city, it is supposed, in this tribe.

And the out-goings thereof are in the valley of Jiphthah-el.] Here the northern border ended. But we know no more of this valley of Jiphthah-el, than that it was in the tribe of Asher, in the confines of this tribe, (ver. 27.)

Ver. 15. And Kattath, and Nahallal, and Shimron, and Idalah, and Beth-lehem.] It is not certain whether these cities belonged to Zebulun, or are set down as places upon which this tribe bordered. Of the two first I can give no account; but we read of Shimron as a principal city, which had a king in it conquered by Joshua. (See xii. 20.) And Idalah is mentioned by St. Jerome (de locis Hebraicis,) and called Jadela; as if it were compounded of jad (which signifies a place, Deut. xxv. 12.) and ela (a goddess), being the place where Venus was worshipped, as Bochartus conjectures, lib. i. Canaan, cap. 3. As for Beth-lehem, we are not to take it for the place where our Saviour was born; which is called Bethlehem-Judah, to distinguish it from this, which was far from it.

Twelve cities with their villages.] Here are more cities than twelve; therefore some of them are mentioned only as the boundaries of this country. There is no doubt but those mentioned ver. 13. were in this tribe; and many think those five here mentioned in this were so also. Jokneam likewise belonged to it; but which were the rest to make up the number twelve cannot be determined.

Ver. 16. This is the inheritance of the children of Zebulun, according to their families, these cities with their villages.] That is, these were the bounds of it; but all the cities belonging to it are not here set down: for we read of two, Kartah and Dimnah, (xxi. 34, 35.) which are not here named. And, indeed, twelve cities do not seem sufficient for sixty thousand men; (Numb. xxvi. 27.) therefore they were only the principal; and all, perhaps, that the measurers of the land had noted in their book.

Ver. 17. And the fourth lot came out for Issachar, for the children of Issachar, according to their families.] Thus far there is some kind of order observed in these lots: Issachar being brother to Zebulun by the same mother.

Ver. 18. And their border was towards Jezreel.] This was one of the royal seats of the kings of Israel in aftertimes, (1 Kings xxi. 1.) which Eusebius and St Jerome place in the tribe of Manasseh; but ought to be accounted belonging to this tribe, as the next place is agreed to be. There was another in the tribe of Judah, (xv. 56.)

And Chesulloth.] Mentioned ver. 12. which both the forementioned authors place in the tribe of Issachar, under the name of Acheseloth.

And Shunem.] Where that noble lady lived who entertained Elisha at her house, (2 Kings iv. 8. 12.) And where Abishag, the wife of David, in his old age, was born, (1 Kings i. 3.)

Ver. 19. Haphraim, and Shihon, and Anaharath.] He doth not describe the borders on all sides of this tribe; but only sets down some principal cities; for it lying between Manasseh and Zebulun, the situation of it was sufficiently known. And they do but guess, who say these six cities named in the foregoing verse and in this were in the southern border.

Ver. 20. And Rabbith, and Kishion, and Abez.] These three cities, and the two next that follow, ver. 21. they will have to constitute the western border.

Ver. 21. And Remeth and En-gannim.] Here, as I said, they imagine the western border ended.

En-haddah, and Beth-pazzez.] These two, and the three next, ver. 22. they will have to be the northern border.

Ver. 22. And the coast reacheth to Tabor.] That is, this northern border; for Mount Tabor was in the north; and this city was hard by it, and received its name from the mount, or gave its name to it.

And Shahazimah, and Beth-shemesh.] Here ended the northern border. There was another Beth-shemesh in the tribe of Naphtali, (ver. 38.) and another in the tribe of Judah, (xxi. 16.)

And the out-goings of their border were at Jordan.] This makes it probable the former account of its other borders is not true; because it leaves no city for the eastern border near Jordan, nor any for the middle of the country.

Sixteen cities with their villages.] This shews that Tabor was a city; otherwise there would be but fifteen.

Ver. 23. This is the inheritance of the tribe of the children of Issachar, according to their families, the cities and villages.] These were their principal cities; but it is likely there were others: for we read of two not here mentioned, xxi. 28, 29. Dabareh and Jarmuth; yet there are those who think Jarmuth is but another name for Remeth, here mentioned ver. 21. which to me doth not seem probable.

Ver. 24. And the fifth lot came out for the tribe of the children of Asher, according to their families.] No reason can be given for this order; unless it be, that God was pleased to place this tribe, being descended from the handmaid of Leah, not far from Zebulun, one of Leah's sons. As for Gad, the elder brother of Asher, he was provided for before, on the other side of Jordan.

Ver. 25. And their border was Helkath, and Hali, and Beten, and Achshaph.] We know no more of the three first of these cities than their names. But the last of them was very considerable; mention being made of the king of Achshaph, xi. 1. xii. 20. The first of them also we find was a Levitical city, (xxi. 31.) called Hukok, in 1 Chron. vi. 75. It appears, likewise, by the mention of Carmel in the next verse, unto which this border reached, that these cities lay in the west near the Mediterranean Sea.

Ver. 26. And Alammalech, and Amad, and Mishael, and reacheth to Carmel westward.] Or, by the sea, not far from Ptolemais; to distinguish it from the other Carmel, in the tribe of Judah, near Hebron. (See xv. 55.) Here the great prophet Elijah sometimes dwelt, and confuted the Baalites by a stupendous miracle. But we are as ignorant of the three cities mentioned in this verse, as we are of the other in the foregoing.

And to Shihor-libnath.] Whether this was a city (some fancy Ptolemais), or a promontory, or a muddy river (for there are those different opinions about it), I cannot determine.

Ver. 27. And turneth towards the sun-rising.] It turned from the sea towards the east; and so northward, bending towards the west again. For there are no borders or sides of this tribe described: but from the south part of the sea it turned eastward, and then northward, in the form of a bow, towards the north part of the same sea, where Zidon was, (ver. 28.)

To Beth-Dagon.] There was a place of this name mentioned before in the tribe of Judah, xv. 41. where it is thought there was a famous temple of Dagon, the god of the Philistines.

And reacheth to Zebulun, and to the valley Jiphthah-el.] And so touched upon the north border of the tribe of Zebulun; in which the valley of Jiphthah-el lay. (See ver. 14.)

Towards the north side of Beth-emek, and Neiel.] Where these were, is not known. Only Eusebius and St. Jerome say, Beth-emek lay in a valley, or low place in this tribe; as the word seems to import.

And goeth out to Cabul on the left hand.] On the north side (called the left hand) of this city, which lay in the tribe of Asher, this border ended. Some have been so frivolous as from hence to argue, that this book was written long after Joshua's time; because the land of Cabul (1 Kings ix. 13.) was not known till the days of Solomon, when Hiram gave this name to the land, which Solomon presented him withal. As if there were no difference between the land and the city of Cabul: when one of them was a little region, containing twenty towns, and the other a small place in the confines of Ptolemais; both of them in the tribe of Asher. They are plainly distinguished by Josephus, who calls one of them γῆν Χαβαλὼν, the land of Cabul; and the other κώμην, the village of Cabul; as Huetius hath observed, propos. iv. Demonstr. Evang. p. 186.

Ver. 28. And Hebron.] Called Elbon by the LXX. and by the Vulgar Abran; to distinguish it, I suppose, from that Hebron in the land of Judah.

And Rehob.] There were two cities of this name in this tribe. (See ver. 30.) One of them was a Levitical city, (xxi. 31.) and the Canaanites kept possession either of that or the other, (Judg. i. 31.)

And Hammon.] There was a Levitical city of this name in the tribe of Naphtali, (1 Chron. vi. 76.) called Hammothdor in xxi. 32. of this book.

And Kanah.] There were two cities of this name; one in the upper Galilee, which was Kanah the greater; and the other in the lower Galilee, called Kanah the less. He speaks here of the greater, which was near to Sidon. The lesser was that wherein our Saviour turned water into wine, and of which Nathanael and the Syrophœnician woman were.

Even unto great Sidon.] See before concerning this city, xi. 8.

Ver. 29. And then the coast turneth to Ramah.] Another city on the northern part of the Mediterranean Sea.

And to the strong city Tyre.] This translation is questionable: for we never read one word of the city Tyre (unless it be here) until the days of David; though we often read of Sidon in the books of Moses; even in the prophecy of Jacob. And, as Bochartus observes, Homer himself, who speaks frequently of Sidon and the Sidonians, never names Tyre, (lib. iv. Phaleg. cap. 35.) Therefore, it is highly probable, some other place is meant by Tzor (as our margin notes the word is in the Hebrew), which was a fenced city, as we render the word here translated strong, (ver. 35.) And there were several cities, perhaps, called by this name of Tzor or Tyre, besides that famous one in future times; particularly Palætyrus; as much as to say Old Tyre. And it is no improbable conjecture of Campegius Vitringa, that into these two places, Sidon and Tzor, many of the people of Canaan fled, to secure themselves when Joshua invaded them: for Tzor signifies not only a rock, but any strong fortified place; from whence it is possible the Latin word turris, and then our English tower, is derived. Certain it is, that these two were famous cities, ἔνδοξοι λαμπροὶ, as Strabo calls them, lib. xvi. where he saith they were so anciently, and not only in his time; insomuch, that it was uncertain which was the metropolis of the Phœnicians. But it is certain he speaks of the New Tyre, which was built in an island; but the old one was on the continent. (See his Observationes Sacræ, lib. i. cap. 1.)

And the coast turneth to Hosah.] Declined a little towards a city of this name.

And the out-goings of it are at the sea, from the coast of Achzib.] It ended at the country which belonged to Achzib; for so hebel (which we here translate coast) signifies. In proper speaking it signifies a cord, whereby ground was measured; and thence was used to signify the portion of ground itself, which was measured by that cord or line. Thus we read of Hebel Argob, the region of Argob, Deut. iii. 13. and Hebel Hajam, the region of the sea, Zeph. ii. 5. Achzib, according to St. Jerome, is that place, which, by Pliny and others, was called in aftertimes Ecdippa.

Ver. 30. Ummah also, and Aphek, and Rehob.] It is probable these were three cities in the heart of the country of Asher.

Twenty-two cities with their villages.] There are more than this number here mentioned, though we do not reckon Carmel nor Jiphthah-el, one of which was a mountain, the other a valley. Therefore some of them were only the boundaries of this tribe, but did not belong to their possession.

Ver. 31. This is the inheritance of the tribe of the children of Asher, according to their families, these cities with their villages.] That is, these were the most eminent cities, though it be probable there were some other. For we read of one called Abdon, xxi. 30. not here mentioned.

Ver. 32. And the sixth lot came out for the children of Naphtali, even for the children of Naphtali, according to their families.] Here the younger son of Bilhah, the handmaid of Rachel, is preferred before the elder, who was Dan, (Gen. xxx. 6. 8.) as Zebulun was before Issachar. Such was the method of Divine Providence in that nation, to shew them that they ought not to value themselves too highly, as they were prone to do, upon their external privileges.

Ver. 33. And their coast was from Heleph, from Allon to Zaanannim, and Adami, Nekeb, and Jabneel, unto Lakum.] He doth not say what coast this was; but by what follows, it appears to be the northern border where these cities were situated, near Lebanon and Sidon, and the rest of the northern part of Asher's country: for Naphtali comprehended the upper Galilee.

And the out-goings thereof were at Jordan.] This border ended at this river; and at the very fountain of it, which was at the foot of Libanus.

Ver. 34. And then the coast turneth westward to Aznoth-Tabor, and goeth out from thence to Hukkok.] The southern border began at the former of these cities; and ended at the latter.

And reacheth to Zebulun on the south side.] Touched on the confines of the tribe of Zebulun; so that the north side of Zebulun was the south side of Naphtali.

And reacheth to Asher on the west side.] This is a short account of their western border, which went as far as to the borders of the tribe of Asher.

And to Judah upon Jordan towards the sun-rising.] It was not near Judah, there being several tribes between them. Therefore the meaning is, this tribe had communication with that of Judah by the river Jordan. So the word upon in our translation must be interpreted (though there be no preposition at all in the Hebrew before Jordan), which river afforded them convenience of carrying merchandises to Judah, or bringing them from thence. And thus some think the prophecy of Moses was fulfilled, (Deut. xxxiii. 23.) Possess thou the west and the south. Which doth not signify that they had any land in the south; but that they trafficked with it, by the means of Jordan.

Ver. 35. And the fenced cities are Ziddim, Zer, and Hammath, Rakkath, and Cinnereth.] These were northern cities, it appears by that mentioned in the midst, Hammath, or Hamath, which was the utmost bounds of the land of Israel northward. (See Numb. xiii. 21. xxxiv. 8. 1 Kings viii. 65.) It seems to have had its name from the youngest son of Canaan, who, it is likely, built it, as his eldest son did Sidon, (Gen. x. 18.) It continued a famous city a long time; for in the days of David, we read how the king of it cunningly made his peace with him by a great present, (2 Sam. viii. 9, &c.)

Rakkath,] Which follows that, is, in the opinion of some of the Jews, the same with Tiberias. So the author of the book De Cippis Hebraicis, set forth by Hottinger. Whence the Talmudists, as he observes, say, Rakath is Zipporia; which was called Rakath, because it was seated upon the bank of a river. It was also called Mœsia, and at last Tiberias; though other Jewish authors make Rakkath different from that city.

Cinnereth.] A place upon this sea of Tiberias; in which there were fine gardens, and a kind of paradise. Whence it was called Geneser; as much as to say, the gardens of princes (Gannoth-Sarim). And it had the name of Cinnereth, from its sweetness and pleasures, as the Jews say; (Cod. Megill.) "Kinnereth is Ginser. And why is it called Cinnereth? because its fruits are as sweet to the taste, as the sound of a harp is to the ear." (See Hottinger in his annot. on the forenamed book, p. 36.)

As for the two first cities, Ziddim and Zer, I can say nothing of them.

Ver. 36. And Adamah, and Ramah, and Hazor.] We may guess where these cities were by the last of them, Hazor, to which they were neighbours. (See concerning it, xi. 1.)

Ver. 37. And Kedesh, and Edrei, and En-hazor.] The first of these was a Levitical city, (xxi. 32.) in which that famous captain, Barak, was born, Judg. iv. 6. where it is called Kedesh-Naphtali, to distinguish it from those of that name in other tribes. Of the other two cities we know nothing.

Ver. 38. And Iron, and Migdal-el, and Horem, and Beth-anath, and Beth-shemesh.] Every one knows there was another Beth-shemesh in the tribe of Judah; and that this city and Beth-anath the children of Naphtali could not conquer, (Judg. i. 33.) But we know no more of them, nor of the rest; save only that Eusebius says, there was a large village, called Magdal-el, between Dora and Ptolemais.

Nineteen cities with their villages.] Six of which were fenced cities, certainly belonging to this tribe; and there are as many more mentioned as make up twenty-three. Some of which therefore must be accounted as bordering cities; or only large villages, and not properly cities.

Ver. 39. This is the inheritance of the tribe of the children of Naphtali, according to their families, the cities and their villages.] This must be understood (as in the account of the forementioned tribes) of the principal cities; for there were more besides these, as appears from xxi. 32. where Hammoth-dor and Kartan are numbered among the Levitical cities in this tribe, which are not mentioned here.

Ver. 40. And the seventh lot came out for the tribe of the children of Dan, according to their families.] They were the only remaining tribe that was to be provided for.

Ver. 41. And the coast of their inheritance was Zorah, and Eshtaol, and Ir-shemesh.] He doth not describe their lot by its borders; but mentions the cities that were in it. Some of which at first were given to Judah; out of whose share, it being too large, some cities were taken for the Danites, as others were for the Simeonites. And it is certain the two first of these fell to Judah, in the first division of the land, (xv. 33.) Both very eminent places, for the birth, and burial, and mighty motions of Samson: for at Zorah he was born, (Judg. xiii. 2.) between Zorah and Eshtaol he was buried, (Judg. xvi. ult.) and here the Spirit of God began to move him, at certain times, (xiii. 25.) It is probable, also, that Ir-shemesh was in the tribe of Judah at the first; it being of the same signification with Beth-shemesh: for one signifies the city of the sun; the other, the house, or place of the sun.

Ver. 42. And Shaalabbin.] Which the Amorites kept in their possession, Judg. i. 35. where, by a small change of letters, it is called Shaalbim; and in some copies of the LXX. translated ἐν ᾧ καὶ αἱ ἀλώπεκες, and in others ἐν Θελαβιν. And in our present LXX, both these are retained. For a fox in the Arabian language is called thalab, and in the Phœnician (which is half Arabic) saalab; as Bochartus observes in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. iii. cap. 13. and in his Canaan, lib. i. cap. 34. p. 684.

And Ajalon.] Another city which the Amorites kept from them, as we find in the same place, Judg. i. 35. And was one of the Levitical cities, (xxi. 23.) and that famous place mentioned x. 13.

And Jethlah.] We know no more of it than that it was a city in this tribe.

Ver. 43. And Elon, and Thimnathath, and Ekron.] It is certain that the last of these three cities was at first given to Judah, (xv. 45.) But Thimnathath was not the same with Timnath in the same tribe, (xv. 10. 57.) but quite different from it; as Gibeath, I observed in the foregoing chapter, was from Geba. For Samson went down to this city Timnath, (Judg. xiv. 5.) which shews it was in a valley; whereas Judah went up to Timnath to shear his sheep, (Gen. xxxviii. 11. 13.) which shews it was upon a hill. Concerning Elon I can say nothing, unless it be the same with Holon in the tribe of Judah, (xv. 51.)

Ver. 44. And Eltekeh, and Gibbethon, and Baalath.] Some think that the first of these is the same with that city in the tribe of Judah, called El-tekon, xv. 59. and the last the same with that called there Baalah, ver. 29. As for Gibbethon, the Danites seem not to have got possession of it, or to have lost it again; for it was in the hands of the Philistines after the days of David, (1 Kings xv. 27. xvi. 15.) and yet appointed one of the Levitical cities, (Josh. xvi. 21. 23.)

Ver. 45. And Jehud, and Bene-berak, and Gath-rimmon.] Where Jehud was I find not; but Βαρακαὶ is mentioned by Eusebius as a village near Azotus (or Ashdod), and St. Jerome saith in his time was called Bernea. Which may incline us to his opinion, that Geth-rimmon was no other than the city of Gath, so often mentioned in Scripture as one of the principal cities of the Philistines. It is reckoned among the Levitical cities xxi. 24. as Gibbethon was ver. 44. though in the hands of the Philistines.

Ver. 46. And Me-jarkon, and Rakkon.] It is not certain where these places were, but very likely near to the place next mentioned.

With the border before Japho.] This place was afterward called Joppa, being the principal port-town in all Judea (mentioned by Pompon. Mela, Strabo, and Pliny), and continues so to this day, retaining the name of Japha, which in Hebrew signifies fair or beautiful. It is not certain that it was a part of the tribe of Dan, though Eusebius calls it a sea-town of the lot of Dan; for these words may signify no more, but that their portion comprehended the border which lay before this place.

Ver. 47. And the coast of the children of Dan went out too little for them.] These words, too little, are not in the Hebrew, where there is nothing answering to them. But the words run thus, the coast of the children of Dan went out from them; that is, they were dispossessed of it in some parts by their powerful neighbours, the Amorites, who forced them into the mountains, and would not let them dwell in the valley, (Judg. i. 34.) This put them to such straits, that they were constrained to enlarge their border some other way, which they did by the means following. I shall only further note, that this is no strange phrase; for in the year of jubilee lands are said to go out, when they returned to their first owners, from the present possessors, (Lev. xxv. 28. 30, 31. 33.)

Therefore the children of Dan went up to fight against Leshem.] A city not far from Jordan, called Laish, in the book of Judges, before it was taken by the Danites. In aftertimes, when it fell into the hands of the Romans, it was called Paneas; and made the metropolis of Iturea and Trachonitis. And from Philip, also, son of Herod the Great, who very much enlarged and adorned it, it was called Cæsarea Philippi, in honour of Tiberius Cæsar.

And took it, and smote it with the edge of the sword, and possessed it, and dwelt therein.] Were not disturbed in their possession.

And called Leshem-Dan, after the name of Dan their father.] Thus conquerors were wont to change the names of places which they subdued. This was done after Joshua's death; and is related more largely in the book of Judges, chap. xviii. where there is an account of the whole expedition. From whence some argue this book was not written by Joshua; whereas no more can be inferred from it than this, that, in aftertimes, Ezra, or some other, thought good to put in this verse here, to complete the account of the Danites' possessions. But any one may see, as Huetius observes, that if this verse were taken away, all that is said of this tribe coheres perfectly; and there is no breach at all in the context of the foregoing with the following verse after this. Which is an argument, that this short account of their taking Leshem were not the words of the writer of this book, but inserted afterward by some other person. For if they were taken away, this relation of the Danites' lot would be more like the account of the lot of all the rest.

Ver. 48. This is the inheritance of the tribe of the children of Dan according to their families, these cities with their villages.] The number of them is not set down, as in the foregoing tribes; of which it is to no purpose to inquire the reason.

Ver. 49. When they had made an end of dividing the land for inheritance by their coasts.] That is, after every tribe had their portion assigned to them.

The children of Israel gave an inheritance to Joshua the son of Nun among them.] We cannot but observe the wonderful modesty of this great man, who received his portion last of all; and then, not by lot, but by their gift; who were already possessed of the whole land.

Ver. 50. According to the word of the Lord, they gave him the city which he asked.] God, indeed, had ordered that he should have a portion, and that he should choose it; but he was content to stay for it till every body else was served. We do not expressly read of this command; but many things were said and done which are not recorded. And he being as faithful and upright as Caleb, (and, besides, chosen to be the captain of God's people), we cannot but think, that when God ordered what Caleb should have, he gave the same direction about Joshua. And so much is implied in those words of Caleb himself, when he demanded his portion of Joshua, (xiv. 6.) "Thou knowest the thing the Lord said unto Moses the man of God concerning me and thee in Kadesh-barnea."

Even in Timnath-serah, in Mount Ephraim.] He did not choose the best place in all the country, but a convenient place in his own tribe; which was seated on the north side of a hill called Gaash; as we read in the latter end of this book.

And he built the city, and dwelt therein.] Repaired it, I suppose (for in all likelihood there was a city there before), and made a convenient habitation for his family and kindred. But we read nothing of them; for as he did not affect to make himself king of Canaan, so he contented himself with a little, and made no large provision for his posterity. We have no mention made of his sons or daughters; but (as Conrad. Pellicanus speaks) all the Israelites were his children.

Ver. 51. These are the inheritances, which Eleazar the priest, and Joshua the son of Nun, and the heads of the fathers of the tribes of the children of Israel, divided for an inheritance by lot in Shiloh before the Lord, at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.] It is usual, after so long an account, to recapitulate in what they had done, and by what authority; which he doth in this verse.

So they made an end of dividing the country.] Every tribe had the place of their settlement appointed to their satisfaction; so that there was no further division made of the land.

CHAP. XX.

Ver. 1. AND the Lord spake unto Joshua, saying.] From the tabernacle, at the door of which he, and Eleazar, and the princes had been making a division of the land; as the last verse of the foregoing chapter tells us.

Ver. 2. Speak unto the children of Israel, saying, Appoint out for you cities of refuge.] This was the proper time for it; when they were all met together to receive their several portions of land, after an exact survey of the country.

Whereof I spake to you by my servant Moses.] In Numb. xxxv. 9—11, &c. where he treats of them at large; and repeats it again, Deut. xix. 1, 2, &c.

Ver. 3. That the slayer that killeth any person unawares, and unwittingly, may flee thither.] Such places, every body knows, there were among the heathen; but commonly they were their temples, and their altars, as many have observed; particularly Joh. Gentius lately, in his book De Victimis Humanis, par. iii. cap. 21. p. 483, &c. But there were also some cities that had this privilege, as Dilherrus (who thinks herein the gentiles imitated the Jews) observes out of Tacitus, lib. iii. Annal. where he saith the principal cities of Greece contended before Tiberius about this matter, De Jure Asylorum. (See Dissert. de Cacozelia Gentilium, cap. 3.)

And they shall be your refuge from the avenger of blood.] Protect such persons from him who studied to avenge the blood of the slain. Concerning whom, see Numb. xxxv. 12.

Ver. 4. And when he that doth flee unto one of those cities shall stand at the entrance of the gate of the city.] Desiring to be admitted and protected there.

And shall declare his cause in the ears of the elders of that city.] That is, the judges, who sat in the gate beforementioned, (Deut. xvi. 18.)

They shall take him into the city unto them.] Being satisfied he was such a person as he pretended.

And give him a place that he may dwell among them.] Assign a convenient habitation for him; these cities being appointed by God for that purpose, and given unto those who inhabited them, on this condition, that they should entertain such persons when they fled to them.

Ver. 5. And if the avenger of blood pursue after him.] Desiring he might be delivered up into his hands.

Then they shall not deliver the slayer up into his hands.] But defend him from his assaults.

Because he smote his neighbour unwittingly, and hated him not beforetime.] It was a casual slaughter, without any design of doing him hurt, as far as appeared to them. If the avenger pursued the slayer so closely, that they had not time to examine the matter at the gate of the city, they were not to let him stand there; but take him in (and afterward hear his cause, and judge it), lest the avenger should kill him before he was admitted into their city.

Ver. 6. And he shall dwell in that city, until he stand before the congregation for judgment.] The avenger might bring him before another tribunal, to be tried whether he killed the man by chance or not. (See Numb. xxxv. 24, 25.)

And until the death of the high-priest, that shall be in those days.] If that court found him not guilty of wilful murder, he was restored to the city of refuge; but confined to live there till the death of the high-priest. (See in the same place.)

Then shall the slayer return, and come unto his own city, and his own house, &c.] See Numb. xxxv. 28.

Ver. 7. And they appointed Kedesh in Galilee in Mount Naphtali; and Shechem in Mount Ephraim, and Kirjath-Arba (which is Hebron) in the mountain of Judah.] It is commonly observed, that as these three cities were seated on high and eminent places, that they might be seen afar off; so they were at such a distance from each other, that all the country might more easily have the benefit of one or other of them. For Kedesh was in the north; and Hebron in the south; and Shechem between both. Thus they fulfilled the command of God, Deut. xix. 8.

Ver. 8. And on the other side Jordan by Jericho eastward.] On the east of Jericho, in the land of the two tribes and half; which was almost as long as the land of Canaan, though not so broad.

They assigned Bezer in the wilderness, upon the plain, out of the tribe of Reuben; and Ramoth Gilead out of the tribe of Gad; and Golan in Bashan out of the tribe of Manasseh.] These cities were assigned by Moses before he died, (Deut. iv. 43.) but had not the privilege till now. And it is observable, that if Bezer stood in a flat country, the other two, Ramoth and Golan, were in the high.

Ver. 9. These were the cities that were appointed for all the children of Israel, and for the stranger that sojourneth among them.] For the safety of all sorts of persons, as is manifest from Numb. xxxv. 15.

That whosoever killeth any person at unawares might flee thither, and not die by the hand of the avenger of blood, until he stood before the congregation.] It is observable, that all these cities belonged to the Levites; who, by their authority, might defend the man from unjust usage; and by their wisdom, direct the elders to judge aright concerning his cause; and also give him good instructions while he lived among them, until the death of the high-priest.

CHAP. XXI.

Ver. 1. THEN came near.] After the cities of refuge were settled.

The heads of the fathers of the Levites.] So the princes of the several tribes (who divided the land, together with Joshua and Eleazar) are called, xiv. 1. and in the conclusion of this verse. And, therefore, the chief persons descended from Kohath, Gershon, and Merari (who were the fathers of the Levites), are here meant by the heads of the fathers of that tribe.

Unto Eleazar, and unto Joshua, and unto the heads of the fathers of the tribes of the children of Israel.] Appointed by God to see the land divided, called the princes of the tribes, Numb. xxxiv. 18.

Ver. 2. And they spake unto them at Shiloh in the land of Canaan, saying, The Lord commanded by the hand of Moses, to give us cities to dwell in, with the suburbs thereof, for our cattle.] This command is registered in Numb. xxxv. 2, &c. and is set down before the mention of cities of refuge (which are commanded in the following part of the chapter), though, it seems, that command was executed before this.

Ver. 3. And the children of Israel gave unto the Levites out of their inheritance, at the commandment of the Lord, these cities and their suburbs.] Not only Joshua, Eleazar, and the princes, but all the people of Israel acknowledged this obligation, which God had laid upon them; and accordingly these words import, that the people separated so many cities as he commanded by Moses (which were to be forty and eight, Numb. xxxv. 7.) for the habitation of the Levites. Which cities are here named, and distributed among them in this chapter.

Ver. 4. And the lot came out for the family of the Kohathites.] After the cities were set out, which should belong to them, then they were divided by lot among the several families of the Levites; as the whole land was among the tribes. And the first lot came out for the noblest family in the tribe of Levi; for Moses and Aaron were descended from Kohath.

And the children of Aaron the priest, which were of the Levites.] The family of Aaron being priests, were the principal among the Levites; and therefore were first and very honourably provided for.

Had by lot out of the tribe of Judah, and out of the tribe of Simeon, and out of the tribe of Benjamin, thirteen cities.] It was by a special providence, that the share which fell to the priests was in those tribes that were nearest to the city; which God intended should be the fixed place of his worship and service in future times; that the priests might be ready to give their attendance there, without much trouble.

Ver. 5. And the rest of the children of Kohath.] All his descendants were not priests, but Aaron and his family alone; the rest were bare Levites.

Had by lot, out of the families of the tribe of Ephraim, and out of the tribe of Dan, and out of the half tribe of Manasseh, ten cities.] These three tribes were nearest to the three forementioned; so that the Kohathites were not far separated one from another.

Ver. 6. And the children of Gershon had by lot, out of the families of the tribe of Issachar, and out of the tribe of Asher, and out of the tribe of Naphtali, and out of the half tribe of Manasseh in Bashan, thirteen cities.] Among the sons of Levi, Gershon is mentioned as the eldest, Exod. vi. 16. Numb. iii. 17. but the lot came up first to the children of Kohath, the priests being descended from him.

Ver. 7. And the children of Merari, by their families, had out of the tribe of Reuben, and out of the tribe of Gad, and out of the tribe of Zebulun, twelve cities.] This is only a general account of the tribes in which their several lots fell, and of the number of cities bestowed on their several families.

Ver. 8. And the children of Israel gave by lot unto the Levites these cities with their suburbs.] The children of Israel, as I said before, gave them; and the lot divided them.

As the Lord commanded by the hand of Moses.] Who ordered both how many cities they should have, and how large the suburbs of them should be. (See Numb. xxxiv. 3, 4.)

Ver. 9. And they gave out of the tribe of the children of Judah, and out of the tribe of the children of Simeon, these cities which are mentioned by name.] Here now follows a particular account of the names of those cities, which were said before in general to have been given out of these two tribes. Which are put together, because the lot of Simeon was taken out of the lot of Judah.

Ver. 10. Which the children of Aaron, being of the family of the Kohathites, &c.] One of the families of the Kohathites, and the eldest of them; for they descended from Amram, the eldest son of Kohath. (Exod. vi. 18. Numb. iii. 19.)

For theirs was the first lot.] They had the honour to be first provided for, as was said before, ver. 4.

Ver. 11. And they.] That is, Eleazar, Joshua, and the princes.

Gave them the city of Arba, the father of Anak, which is Hebron, in the hill-country of Judah, &c.] See of this city, xiv. 15. xv. 13.

Ver. 12. But the fields of the city, and the villages thereof, gave they to Caleb, the son of Jephunneh, for his possession.] The priests had only the city and suburbs, which were their possession, as much as the fields and villages were Caleb's, on whom they were bestowed before, (xiv. 13, &c.)

Ver. 13. Thus they gave to the children of Aaron the priest, Hebron with her suburbs, to be a city of refuge for the slayer.] It was given them with this condition, that they who slew a man unawares should be entertained here, and have a place given them to live securely among them, (xx. 4.)

And Libnah with her suburbs.] This is to be understood to belong to them no otherwise than Hebron did, unto which they had no right beyond the city and suburbs: and, therefore, the fields and the villages of Libnah they had nothing to do withal; and the same is to be noted of all the following cities of the priests.

Ver. 14. And Jattir with her suburbs, and Eshtemoa with her suburbs.] These are mentioned as belonging to Judah, xv. 48. 50.

Ver. 15. And Holon with her suburbs.] Called Helin, 1 Chron. vi. 56.

And Debir with her suburbs.] See xv. 15.

Ver. 16. And Ain with her suburbs.] A city in the tribe of Simeon, (xix. 17.) but taken out of Judah, (xv. 32.)

And Juttah with her suburbs.] See xv. 55.

And Beth-shemesh with her suburbs.] Unto which city the providence of God directed the kine, which drew the cart wherein the Philistines put the ark when they sent it home, there being a great many priests in it, to receive it with due care and reverence, (1 Sam. vi. 12, 13.)

Nine cities out of these two tribes.] For the tribe of Judah was very large; and the command of God was, that from them which had many cities they should give many, (Numb. xxxv. 8.)

Ver. 17. And out of the tribe of Benjamin, Gibeon with her suburbs, Geba with her suburbs.] See xviii. 24, 25.

Ver. 18. Anathoth with her suburbs.] The city of the prophet Jeremiah, who was a priest, (Jer. i. 1.)

And Almon with her suburbs.] Called Alemeth, in 1 Chron. vi. 60. For there were greater alterations than this made, by length of time, in the names of places.

Four cities.] Which were a great many out of so small a tribe; but the soil of it, as I observed before, was very rich.

Ver. 19. All the cities of the children of Aaron the priests, were thirteen cities with their suburbs.] As was said, ver. 4.

Ver. 20. And the families of the children of Kohath, the Levites which remained of the children of Kohath.] Who were mere Levites and not priests.

Even they had the cities of their lot out of the tribe of Ephraim.] Part of them were planted there, and part of them in two other tribes, as it follows, ver. 23, &c.

Ver. 21. For they gave them Shechem with her suburbs, in Mount Ephraim, to be a city of refuge for the slayer.] See xx. 7.

And Gezer with her suburbs.] See xvi. 3. 10.

Ver. 22. And Kibzaim with her suburbs.] Which is called Jokmeam in 1 Chron. vi. 68.

And Beth-horon with her suburbs.] We read of both the Beth-horons in the description of this tribe, the upper and the nether, xvi. 3. 5. the first of which seems to be here meant.

Ver. 23. And out of the tribe of Dan, Eltekeh with her suburbs; Gibbethon with her suburbs.

Ver. 24. Ajalon with her suburbs, Gath-rimmon with her suburbs: four cities.] The four cities mentioned in these two verses we find before in this tribe, xix. 42. 44, 45.

Ver. 25. And out of half of the tribe of Manasseh.] That half of it which was settled in Canaan.

Taanach with her suburbs.] See xvii. 11.

And Gath-rimmon with her suburbs.] In 1 Chron. vi. 70. these two cities are called Aner and Bileam; so much were names changed in a long tract of time. Or, they being dispossessed of the two cities here mentioned, by the invasions of their enemies (who perhaps demolished them), these two others were given in lieu of them.

Two cities.] Which was a just proportion to the other whole tribes, who gave four.

Ver. 26. All the cities were ten, with their suburbs, for the families of the children of Kohath that remained.] Who were not of the children of Aaron, the priests, (ver. 5.)

Ver. 27. And unto the children of Gershon, of the families of the Levites, out of the other half tribe of Manasseh.] Which had their inheritance on the other side of Jordan.

Golan in Bashan with her suburbs, to be a city of refuge for the slayer.] See xx. 8. From whence the neighbouring country was called Gaulonitis.

And Beeshterah with her suburbs.] Called Ashtaroth in 1 Chron. vi. 71. by a very light change, only leaving out the first letter.

Two cities.] The same number that was given out of the other half of this tribe, (ver. 25.)

Ver. 28. Out of the tribe of Issachar, Kishon with her suburbs.] See xix. 20. Called Kedesh, 1 Chron. vi. 72.

And Dabareh with her suburbs.] Not mentioned before in this book, but in 1 Chron. vi. 72.

Ver. 29. And Jarmuth.] Called Ramoth, 1 Chron. vi. 73.

And En-gannim.] See chap. xix. 21. called Anem, 1 Chron. vi. 73.

Ver. 30. And out of the tribe of Asher, Mishal with her suburbs.] Called Misheal, xix. 26. and Mashal, 1 Chron. vi. 74.

And Abdon.] Mentioned in that place in the Chronicles; but not in the nineteenth chapter of this book. (See ver. 31. of that chapter.)

Ver. 31. Helkath with her suburbs.] See xix. 25. Called Hukok, 1 Chron. vi. 75.

And Rehob.] Mentioned there, and Josh. xix. 28.

Ver. 32. And out of the tribe of Naphtali, Kedesh in Galilee, to be a city of refuge for the slayer.] See xx. 7.

And Hammoth-dor with her suburbs.] Called simply Hammath, xix. 35. and Hammon, 1 Chron. vi. 76.

And Kartan with her suburbs.] Called Kirjathaim in 1 Chron. vi. 76.

Three cities.] This being a smaller territory, it seems, than the rest of the tribes forementioned, who gave four.

Ver. 33. All the cities of the Gershonites, according to their families, were thirteen cities with their suburbs.] As was said before, ver. 6.

Ver. 34. And unto the families of the children of Merari, the rest of the Levites.] The remaining families of the Levites; for there were three heads of them; Gershon, Kohath, and Merari.

Out of the tribe of Zebulun, Jokneam with her suburbs, and Kartah with her suburbs.] Of the former, see xix. 11. and of the latter, ver. 16.

Ver. 35. Dimnah with her suburbs, Nahallal with her suburbs.] See xix. 15, 16.

Four cities.] There are but two mentioned, 1 Chron. vi. 77. with quite different names; the other two, it seems, being lost before that time.

Ver. 36. And out of the tribe of Reuben, Bezer with her suburbs.] Which was one of the cities of refuge, (xx. 8.) though not here mentioned, as the rest are in the foregoing part of this chapter; and in ver. 38.

And Jahazah with her suburbs.] These, and the two cities in the following verse, Kedemoth and Mephaath, are mentioned as cities in this tribe, xiii. 18. And so they are in 1 Chron. vi. 78, 79, as Levitical cities.

Ver. 37. Kedemoth with her suburbs, &c.] Some have urged against the integrity of the Hebrew text, that this and the foregoing verse are not to be found in some ancient copies of the Bible; and, indeed, the Masorites acknowledge as much. But it is evident that they are found in copies of very great antiquity; and the context shews, that they ought to be here; as Bishop Walton observes in his Considerator Considered, chap. 6. sect. 14. And Hottinger also (who answers this cavil more largely) observes, that they are in a most accurate MS. of the Duke of Rohan's, written 1495. (See his Thesaurus Philolog. lib. i. cap. 2. quæst. 4. p. 181, &c.) The Masorites, who take notice of this omission, acknowledge, in the margin of this verse, that it was to be found in several copies.

Ver. 38. And out of the tribe of Gad, Ramoth in Gilead with her suburbs, to be a city of refuge for the slayer.] See xx. 8.

And Mahanaim with her suburbs.] This city was made by Abner the royal seat for Ish-bosheth, Βασίλειον ἐποίησε, as Josephus speaks, lib. vii. Antiq. cap. 1.

Ver. 39. Heshbon with her suburbs, Jazer with her suburbs: four cities in all.] These, with the foregoing, are mentioned 1 Chron. vi. 80, 81.

Ver. 40. So all the cities for the children of Merari, &c. were by their lot twelve cities.] As was said in general before, ver. 7.

Ver. 41. All the cities of the Levites, within the possession of the children of Israel, were forty and eight cities with their suburbs.] So God ordered by Moses, Numb. xxxv. 7. And it is a demonstration that Moses was divinely inspired to make such an appointment; before they knew whether, without straitening the other tribes, they could afford so many cities to the Levites. For when Joshua and Caleb went up to search the land (with the rest, mentioned Numb. xiii.) they could have no opportunity to take the dimensions of the country; whereby Moses might know there would be room enough to allow the Levites so large a proportion as this; but he was directed to it by a Divine foreknowledge.

Ver. 42. These cities were every one of them with their suburbs round about them.] viz. Two thousand cubits on every side, round the city, as is ordered Numb. xxxv. 5. Which must be owned to be a great proportion for this tribe; which was the smallest of them all. But God would have an ample provision made for his ministers; and they had none of the land belonging to these cities, as was before observed, but only room for themselves, and for their cattle.

Thus were all these cities.] Disposed and settled according to the Divine commandment. Six of which were cities of refuge; and the other forty-two had the same privileges, if the inhabitants pleased, and at the cost of those that fled thither for safety. (See upon Numb. xxxv. 6.)

Ver. 43. And God gave unto Israel all the land which he sware to give unto their fathers.] He gave them a right to the whole country (which was distributed among them, as he appointed, by a lot which he ordered and directed), and he gave them the actual possession and enjoyment of the greatest part of it; and he gave them power to subdue the rest (if they continued obedient to him) as soon as it was convenient. Which was exactly according to his promise and oath made to them; for they not being numerous enough to people the whole country, at their first coming into it, he never intended to expel all the old inhabitants at once, but by degrees; as we read expressly, Exod. xxiii. 29, 30.

And they possessed it, and dwelt therein.] Went every man to his lot, and peopled the country, as far as at present they were able.

Ver. 44. And the Lord gave them rest round about, according to all that he sware unto their fathers.] None molested them in their possessions; but they ploughed, and sowed, and reaped, &c. without any disturbance.

And there stood not a man of all their enemies before them.] For whosoever had opposed them, were overthrown and destroyed by them; and, as it follows,

The Lord delivered all their enemies into their hand.] Which is not to be understood, as if all the people of Canaan were absolutely under their power; but that, as long as Joshua lived, not a man appeared to fight with them, but was delivered up unto them.

Ver. 45. There failed not aught of any good thing which the Lord had spoken unto the house of Israel; all came to pass.] Which they themselves (he tells them afterward, xxiii. 14.) knew very well, and could not but confess. But it must be understood according to the explication of ver. 43. For the time of fulfilling some part of his promise was not come; and the completing of what was begun depended upon their obedience to him. "But (as Conradus Pellicanus here admonishes) we are taught by this the truth of the Divine promises; and it ought to establish the belief of the faithful, that it do not fluctuate; though the promises of God seem to us to be fulfilled very slowly."

CHAP. XXII.

Ver. 1. AND Joshua called the Reubenites, and Gadites, and the half tribe of Manasseh.] Who came as auxiliaries to their brethren when they passed over Jordan; as they had engaged to do, when they received their inheritance on the other side of it, (i. 12—14, &c.)

Ver. 2. And said unto them, Ye have kept all that Moses, the servant of the Lord, commanded you; and have obeyed my voice in all that I commanded you.] Numb. xxxii. 20, &c. Deut. iii. 18, &c. In this and the following verses, he commends them for their obedience unto God and unto him; and for their fidelity to their promises; and their constancy and patience in their piety to God, and love to their brethren.

Ver. 3. Ye have not left your brethren these many days

unto this day.] Seven years (some think as many more) they had continued in their service; as long as the war lasted with the Canaanites; yea, till they had seen their brethren settled in the lots fallen to them.

But have kept the charge of the commandment of the Lord your God.] During which time they never refused what was expected from them for the help of their brethren. (See xi. 18. xiv. 10.) This was a great proof of their patient obedience, in staying so long from their wives and children.

Ver. 4. And now the Lord your God hath given rest unto your brethren, as he promised them.] Which he had done for them before, i. 13.

Now therefore return to your tents.] So he calls their houses, because this was the common word used for a long time in the wilderness, to signify a habitation.

And unto the land of your possession, which Moses, the servant of the Lord, gave you on the other side Jordan.] It was but reasonable and just that they should go and enjoy what God had given them, now their brethren were in a quiet possession of their portion; and that their fidelity in performing their promise, should be rewarded with the like, in dismissing them, when they had done their business. For they engaged to serve no longer, than till they had driven the Canaanites out of their country, (Numb. xxxii. 21.)

Ver. 5. But take diligent heed to do the commandment of the law, which Moses the servant of the Lord charged you.] That is, to observe all his precepts (as they had done this of aiding their brethren), and for that end, preserve in mind all that God had done for them. (See Deut. iv. 9.)

To love the Lord your God, and to walk in all his ways, and to keep his commandments, and to cleave unto him, and to serve him with all your heart, and with all your soul.] Especially to worship the Lord alone with sincere affection; which Moses inculcated above all things, before he left them, (Deut. vi. 5. 13, 14. x. 12. xi. 13. 22. xx. 9. xxx. 6. 20.)

Ver. 6. So Joshua blessed them, and sent them away.] He not only praised and commended them; but dismissed them with a solemn prayer to God for his blessing upon them. And he seems first to have dismissed with his blessing the Reubenites and Gadites; and then to have blessed the Manassites by themselves.

And they went unto their tent.] In order to pack up their goods, and make themselves ready for their departure.

Ver. 7. Now, to the one half of the tribe of Manasseh, Moses had given possession in Bashan; but unto the other half thereof gave Joshua among their brethren on this side Jordan westward.] This is repeated to shew why he mentioned only half the tribe of Manasseh, ver. 1. and to introduce what follows.

And when Joshua had sent them away also unto their tents.] As he had done the Reubenites and Gadites.

Then he blessed them.] This seems to signify that he gave a peculiar blessing to the Manassites; that is, rewarded their services, by some present which he made them: for so the word blessing (I observed before) sometimes signifies, (2 Kings v. 15.) And he did this the rather, because the Manassites were near of kin to the children of Ephraim (of which tribe he himself was), and were now to be separated from the rest of their brethren in Canaan.

Ver. 8. And he spake unto them, saying.] This speech seems to be directed to the Reubenites and Gadites, as well as to the Manassites; though they had a peculiar concern in it.

Return with much riches unto your tents, and with very much cattle, and with silver, and with gold, &c.] As much as to say, Part with your brethren contentedly and well-pleased; laden with the spoils which you have got in the wars against the people of Canaan. For they had their share in the prey, as well as the other seven tribes and half; and carried it away to their own country.

Divide the spoil of your enemies with your brethren.] He orders them, when they came home, to let those that stayed on the other side Jordan, to defend their wives, children, and cattle, to have a share in the spoil which they had gotten. For this was thought an equal thing by God himself in the war they had with the Midianites, before they came over Jordan; when twelve thousand went out to fight; who had one half of the spoil; the other half being divided among all the congregation that stayed at home, (Numb. xxxi. 27.) And it is very reasonable to think, that now the same proportion was observed; the forty thousand who went to help their brethren in the war, having one half of the spoil; and their brethren who stayed to guard their possession, the other half: so that the warriors had the far greater share, as there was reason; because they had hazarded their lives in the enterprise. But in David's time it was made a law, that they who went to fight, and they that stayed to guard the stuff, should have an equal share in the prey, (1 Sam. xxx. 24, 25. see Gen xiv. ult.)

Ver. 9. And the children of Reuben, and the children of Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh, returned, and departed from the children of Israel out of Shiloh, which is in the land of Canaan, to go into the country of Gilead, &c.] This shews that he gave them all his blessing in Shiloh, where the sanctuary was; and sent them from thence, under the Divine protection, to their own country: which is here called the country of Gilead, because that was an eminent part of their country, divided between the children of Gad and Manasseh; and here comprehends all the rest of the land where the Reubenites lived.

Ver. 10. And when they came to the borders of Jordan.] Or, they came (for the word when is not in the Hebrew) unto the banks of that river.

Which are in the land of Canaan.] This seems to import that they built the altar, mentioned in the end of the verse, before they went over Jordan, in the land of Canaan. Which is not at all likely; for it would not have answered their intention: which was to shew, that Jordan did not make such a separation between them and their brethren, but that they were one people with those in Canaan; where the altar of God was in Shiloh. Therefore I take this to be a short manner of speech; signifying, that they came to the borders of Jordan in the land of Canaan; and passed over into their own country on the other side of the river. And so the Hebrew word Gelilath (which we translate borders) seems to signify, a certain place near Jordan, to which they came. The Vulgar Latin translates it heaps; the LXX. in the Vatican copy, retains the word Γαλααδ (or Γαλιλωθ, as other copies more truly have it), taking it for some noted place, which was near to their passage over Jordan.

The children of Reuben, and the children of Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh, built there an altar by Jordan.] The word there hath made it thought that they built this altar in the land of Canaan beforementioned; but the particle sham rela tes to time as well as place, and may be translated then as well as there. Examples of which there are in Judg. v. 21. Prov. viii. 27. compared with ver. 30. Eccles. iii. 17. and most plainly, Isa. xlviii. 16. And thus it is to be here interpreted, that, before they went any farther, they stayed by Jordan till they had built this altar on the borders of their own country: for so the next verse teaches us to expound it, and will admit of no other sense; where it is said, they had "built an altar over against the land of Canaan."

A great altar to see to.] Which made a great show, being very high and conspicuous, that it might be seen afar off. For being built, not by a private person, but by the whole body of a great people, they thought they could not make it too stately and magnificent. And herein it differed so much from the altar made by Moses, that they thought, perhaps, it would administer the less occasion to their brethren to suspect it was intended for sacrifice.

Ver. 11. And the children of Israel.] That were in the land of Canaan. This is an instance of such a short manner of speech as I take that in the foregoing verse to be; which must be made out by some such supplement as is there mentioned. For the Reubenites, Gadites, &c. were the children of Israel, as well as those settled in the land of Canaan.

Heard say.] This is an argument the altar was not built on their side of Jordan; for then they would have seen what they were doing, and hindered the building; whereas they heard nothing of it till it was built.

Behold, the children of Reuben, and the children of Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh, have built an altar.] By a common consent.

Over against the land of Canaan, in the borders of Jordan, at the passage of the children of Israel.] Either there where they now passed over Jordan, or where they all passed over when they entered Canaan, or at the usual place where every body was wont to pass over, that they might take the more notice of it. And here also were the Geliloth beforementioned, like those on the other side, which seem to have been great banks cast up to keep Jordan from overflowing too far.

Ver. 12. And when the children of Israel heard of it, the whole congregation of the children of Israel.] Not all the people of the land, but their elders and heads of their tribes, who, in the foregoing books, are often called by the name of colledath (all the congregation). See Numb. xxvii. 2. xxxii. 2. and chap. xviii. of this book, ver. 1.

Gathered themselves together at Shiloh.] It seems they had been separated, being gone to settle in their several cities.

To go to war against them.] To consult about it. For they imagined them to be apostates from their religion, which, as it required them to worship the Lord alone, and no other god, so at no other place but that which he himself had chosen. Where he allowed but one altar, as there was but one God. (See Deut. xii. 5, 6. 11. 13. 18. 26, 27. xiii. 12, &c.) That altar, also, where he commanded sacrifices to be offered, was to be but three cubits high, (Exod. xxvii. 1.) so that they went not up to it by steps; (Exod. xx. 26.) whereas this was a high altar, like those among the heathens, who loved to sacrifice on high places (i. e. mountains), and also upon high and lofty altars, which advanced their sacrifices nearer heaven. And this, perhaps, was one thing that incensed the congregation now assembled, and made them think their brethren were lapsed to idolatry; either intending to worship other gods, or the God of Israel in an unlawful place and manner.

Ver. 13. And the children of Israel sent unto the children of Reuben, and to the children of Gad, and to the half tribe of Manasseh, into the land of Gilead.] Their zeal did not so transport them, but that they prudently considered it was fit to be rightly informed of the matter of fact; and, if any thing was amiss, to endeavour to set it right by counsel and arguments, before they betook themselves to arms: in order to which they sent the embassy here mentioned.

Phinehas the son of Eleazar the priest.] A person of very eminent authority among them, and more likely to be received with due regard, (Numb. xxxi. 6.)

Ver. 14. And with him ten princes, of each chief house a prince, throughout all the tribes of Israel.] Which were nine and a half; so that a prince was chosen out of the half tribe of Manasseh, as well as out of the other nine.

And each one was a head of the house of their fathers among the thousands of Israel.] That is, they were chiliarchs, as the LXX. call them, and the chief among such rulers of thousands in the several tribes, (Exod. xviii. 21.)

Ver. 15. And they came unto the children of Reuben, and to the children of Gad, and to the half tribe of Manasseh.] Who, hearing of their coming, held a congregation, it is likely, of the chief persons among them, to receive their message.

Into the land of Gilead.] So he calls here, and ver. 13. the country of the two tribes and half; by the name of an eminent part of it, which is put for the whole, as I observed upon ver. 9.

And they spake unto them, saying.] Made the following speech in the assembly of the two tribes and half, by the mouth of Phinehas.

Ver. 16. Thus saith the whole congregation of the Lord.] The representatives of the whole people of Israel, in whose name this embassy was sent.

What trespass is this that you have committed against the Lord God of Israel.] They were not able to express the heinousness of it.

To turn away this day from following the Lord.] So soon after they had seen his wonderful works, and received such a charge from Joshua, as he gave them at their departure from Canaan, (ver. 5.)

In that you have built you an altar.] Which they supposed was for a sacrifice.

That you might rebel this day against the Lord?] Which was direct opposition to his express command, immediately after he gave them the law from Mount Sinai, (Exod. xx. 24. And see the places beforenamed upon ver. 12.)

Ver. 17. Is the iniquity of Peor too little for us, from which we are not cleansed to this day.] He instances in this, being himself an actor in the punishment of it, though it deserved still greater punishment. For that is the meaning of we are not cleansed; have not sufficiently suffered for that sin; there being some remaining (he feared) that were infected with those idolatrous inclinations, whom God might justly cut off.

Although there was a plague in the congregation of the Lord.] Which destroyed twenty and four thousand, (see Numb. xxv. 9.)

Ver. 18. But that you must turn away this day from following the Lord?] Commit more sins of that nature. For, whether they intended to worship other gods, or to worship the God of Israel in a manner he did not allow, it was, in his esteem, idolatry.

And it will be, seeing you rebel to-day against the Lord.] It must be acknowledged, that they were a little too hasty in concluding their brethren to be rebels, before they had asked them for what purpose they had erected this altar, which should properly have been the first question; but their pious fear, lest God should be offended, made them immediately fall into this vehement expostulation.

That to-morrow.] That is, quickly, or speedily.

He will be wroth with the whole congregation of Israel.] With you for committing this sin, and with us for not punishing it.

Ver. 19. Notwithstanding.] Or rather, and now, as the LXX. translate the Hebrew particle veac.

If the land of your possession be unclean.] They imagined the Reubenites, and Gadites, and Manassites, might take their land to be less holy for want of an altar, and such a token of the Divine presence, as there was in the tabernacle. This appears to be the sense by what follows: which our Mr. Mede carries something further, in his observations concerning the appropriation of some place for the worship of God: which so universally prevailed, from the beginning, that it was believed, in those elder times, that those countries and territories, wherein no place was set apart for God's worship, were unhallowed and unclean. This, he thinks, may be rightly gathered from these words. (See book ii. upon Eccles. v. 1. p. 433.)

Then pass ye over to the land of the possession of the Lord, wherein the Lord's tabernacle dwelleth, and take possession among us.] This expresses a wonderful zeal for God and the common good, wherewith they were at present possessed; which made them desire rather to give up some of their own land to them, than have them fall from their religion.

But rebel not against the Lord, nor rebel against us.] They desire them not to break the common bond that tied them to each other, as well as unto God, which was the same religion.

In building an altar, beside the altar of the Lord our God.] Which was, in effect, to forsake the Lord.

Ver. 20. Did not Achan the son of Zerah.] Descended from Zerah, (vii. 17, 18.)

Commit a trespass in an accursed thing.] This was a fresher instance than that of Baal-Peor, (ver. 17.)

And wrath fell upon all the congregation of Israel? and that man perished not alone in his iniquity.] See vii. 1, 2, &c. In this he explains what he said, ver. 18. that the whole congregation was in danger to fall under the Divine displeasure by their apostacy.

Ver. 21. Then the children of Reuben, and the children of Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh, answered and said unto the heads of the thousands of Israel.] Some of the heads of their tribes made the following reply, in the name of all the rest.

Ver. 22. The Lord God of gods, the Lord God of gods.] In the Hebrew, the God of gods, the Lord; the God of gods, the Lord. Where there are three names of God, Elohim, and Jehovah; signifying, that they owned no other God but him whom their forefathers worshipped, by what name soever he was called; that God, who is infinitely above all creatures, the fountain of all other beings: and they double the expression of their devotion to him, that they might signify their earnestness and vehemency to purge themselves from the crime objected to them.

Some of the ancient Jews thought a great mystery is contained in these words: for the Midrasch Tillim upon the fiftieth Psalm (quoted by Mart. à Raymund, in his Pugio Fidei, par. iii. distinct. i. cap. 4.) thus discourses: "What did they see that they mention these words twice, El, Elohim, Jehovah; El, Elohim, Jehovah? They said, God, God, Jehovah, the first time, because by these the world was created; and they said, God, God, Jehovah, the second time, because by these the law was given." Where he plainly insinuates a plurality of persons, saying, behen (by these) the world was created, &c. and refers to the first words of Genesis, where it is said Elohim created in the beginning the heaven and the earth. No wonder then that Christians have been of the same opinion, and thought these three names denoted the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost: as the author of the old Nitzacon (three hundred years before that of R. Lipman's) acknowledges, p. 59. Unto which he gives no answer, but only this, That these three belong to one God; which we also acknowledge.

He knoweth.] They appeal to Him who searcheth the hearts of men, and their most secret designs.

And Israel they shall know.] By seeing their constancy in the religion of their ancestors.

If it be in rebellion, or if in transgression against the Lord (save us not this day).] They turn their speech on a sudden (as is usual in great passion) unto God himself; desiring they may not live, but be immediately destroyed by him, if they intended either to throw off his worship and service, or to worship him any other way than according to his appointment.

Ver. 23. That we have built us an altar to turn from following the Lord, or if to offer burnt-offerings thereon, or meat-offerings, or if to offer peace-offerings thereon, let the Lord himself requite it.] That is, they desire God to punish it, (for so that phrase requite it signifies, Deut. xviii. 19.) if they intended to offer any sort of sacrifice whatsoever upon this altar; which they acknowledge had been to turn from their religion.

Ver. 24. And if we have not rather done it for fear of this thing.] The Hebrew word deaga (which we translate fear) signifies such anxiety in their mind, as gave them much trouble; till they thought of this way to give themselves ease.

Saying, In time to come your children might speak unto our children, saying, What have you to do with the Lord God of Israel?] They were afraid a time might come when they should be looked upon as aliens, who had no right to come to the tabernacle, and the altar, to offer sacrifice there. The Targum hath it, What have you to do with the Word of the Lord God of Israel?

Ver. 25. For the Lord hath made Jordan a border between us and you, ye children of Reuben, &c.] Divided us from you by the river Jordan.

Ye have no part in the Lord: so shall your children make our children cease from fearing the Lord.] Make them lose their religion (which is called the fear of God), by pretending they are none of the Lord's people. It was not likely, one would think, such a thing should happen; but they did not know what length of time, and their distance from them, might do, to make them forget their relation unto them, and unto God; their country being no part of the land of promise, as Canaan was. Here again the Targum hath it; Ye have no part in the Word of the Lord.

Ver. 26. Therefore we said, Let us now prepare to build us an altar, not for burnt-offering, or for sacrifice.] They again disclaim that, before they give the true reason of what they had done.

Ver. 27. But that it may be a witness between us and you, and our generations after us.] For it had been an ancient way of preserving the remembrance of things, by raising such structures to testify to them, Gen. xxx. 48. and used afterward by Joshua himself, xxxiv. 27.

That we might do the service of the Lord before him with our burnt-offerings, &c.] Have the privilege to come and worship God at the tabernacle, by offering such sacrifices as the rest of the Israelites did.

That your children may not say unto our children, in time to come, Ye have no part in the Lord.] That they might not be thrust away from the altar when they brought their sacrifices, under a pretence that they were none of God's people, because they did not live in the land which he promised to their fathers. Here the Targum uses the same language again, No part in the Word of the Lord.

Ver. 28. Therefore said we, that it shall be, when they shall so say to us, or to our generations in time to come, that we may say again.] Have a reply ready, if such a thing as we fear should happen.

Behold, the pattern of the altar of the Lord which our fathers made.] Which they could not have exactly imitated, if they had not been acquainted with it, and worshipped God there with their brethren.

Not for burnt-offering, nor for sacrifice.] They thought this could not be too often repeated, that they might not be misunderstood.

But it is a witness between us and you.] A public testimony that we ought not to be excluded from the worship of God among you, being of the same communion with you.

Ver. 29. God forbid that we should rebel against the Lord, and turn this day from following the Lord, to build an altar for burnt-offerings, &c.] They utterly renounce all such intentions as they were suspected to have; protesting again most solemnly they meant not to rebel against the Word of the Lord, as the Targum again expresses it.

Ver. 30. And when Phinehas the priest, and the princes of the congregation, and heads of the thousands of Israel which were with him, heard the words that the children of Reuben, &c. spake, it pleased them.] They not only acquiesced in their answer, but were very glad to hear it.

Ver. 31. And Phinehas the son of Eleazar the priest said unto the children of Reuben, &c.] He spake to them in the name of all his company.

This day we perceive that the Lord is among us, because ye have not committed this trespass against the Lord.] He thankfully acknowledges the gracious presence of God with them, in preserving the Reubenites, &c. from so great a sin, as they feared they had committed; and all the people of Israel from such heavy judgments as it would have deserved.

Now you have delivered the children of Israel out of the hand of the Lord.] Who would have punished them for this schism, if they had been guilty of it, and not censured for it. This whole verse runs thus in the Targum: "This day we perceive that the Schechinah (or Divine Majesty) is among us, because ye have not committed this trespass against the Word of the Lord; whereby you have delivered the children of Israel out of the hand of the Word of the Lord."

Ver. 32. And Phinehas the son of Eleazar the priest, and the princes, returned from the children of Reuben, and from the children of Gad, out of the land of Gilead, &c.] Under Reuben and Gad the half tribe of Manasseh is included, both here and ver. 25. 32, 33. as under the land of Gilead is included the whole country of these tribes. The LXX. thought good to add here (and in all those verses) expressly, and the half tribe of Manasseh; though not in the Hebrew.

And brought them word again.] Informed them how they found things among their brethren.

Ver. 33. And the thing pleased the children of Israel.] They were satisfied in the account they gave them; and approved of what their brethren had done.

And they blessed God.] As Phinehas had done, that their brethren had not offended the Divine Majesty as they suspected.

And did not intend to go up against them in battle.] Laid aside that intention (which was in their mind, ver. 12.) and pursued it no further.

To destroy the land wherein the children of Reuben and the children of Gad dwelt.] For so they thought they were bound to do by the command, Deut. xiii. 12, &c. which extended to a whole country, as well as a city.

Ver. 34. And the children of Reuben, and the children of Gad, called the altar Ed.] That is, a witness; for the reason following.

For it shall be a witness between us, that the Lord is God.] That we own no other God but Jehovah, and him only will we worship, as he hath commanded. So the LXX. ὅτι Κύριος ὁ Θεὸς αὐτῶν ἐστι, that the Lord is their God.

In all this whole relation from ver. 10. to the end of the chapter, there being no mention of Joshua, who is not once named, either as sending these ambassadors, or receiving the report which they brought back, some have thence entertained a conceit, that Joshua was dead before this happened; and consequently, that he could not be the author of this book. But it is manifest such persons have a great desire to weaken the authority of these holy books, or else they would not draw such consequences from such frivolous observations. For it is evident, that all this came to pass not long after Joshua had dismissed these tribes, with good counsel, and with his blessing: for they returning immediately after this to their own country, went no further than Jordan before they erected this altar; upon which those great persons went to expostulate with them, and heard their apology, and came back and reported it. All this is told in one continued and coherent history (as it were with one breath), without the least signification of any considerable time that passed between one part of it and the other. And the LXX. were so well satisfied of this, that they took the answer of the Reubenites, Gadites, and Manassites to have been brought to Joshua; for they say he imposed the name of Ed upon the altar. So their words are in the Vatican edition, which is most common among us, Καὶ ἐπωνόμασεν ὁ Ιησοὺς τὸν βωμὸν, &c.

CHAP. XXIII.

Ver. 1. AND it came to pass, a long time after, that the Lord had given rest to Israel from all their enemies round about.] Some take it to have been fourteen years after their conquest of the country, (xi. 23.) and seven years after the division of it. (See xiv. 10.)

That Joshua waxed old and stricken in age.] This was said of him before the land was divided, (xiii. 1.) and a portion thereof given unto him: where he built a city; which took up so much time, that probably he was now in the last year of his life.

Ver. 2. And Joshua called for all Israel.] Sent out a summons to them to come to him at Timnath-serah, where he lived, as the Jews will have it; but rather to Shiloh, where they might appear before God, as well as before him, and have the greater regard to his words.

And for their elders, &c.] The word and is not in the Hebrew text, and therefore these words are an explication of what he means by all Israel: not all the people (who could not, without great inconvenience, come thither, and could not all hear him if they did), but their elders; that is, the great Sanhedrin, as they were called in future times; and for their heads, that is of their tribes and families; and for their judges, who were settled in all the lesser cities; and for their officers, who attended upon the judges to execute their sentence.

And said unto them, I am old and stricken in age.] He would make them sensible that this might be the last time he should be able to speak to them, which might move them to give greater attention unto what he said.

Ver. 3. And ye have seen.] Or rather, behold, ye have seen; for so the particle ve (which we translate and) sometimes signifies: Gen. xxiv. 31. "Behold, I have prepared the house," &c.

All that the Lord hath done unto all these nations, because of you.] For your sake; that he might make room for you in their country, by expelling them out of it.

For the Lord your God is he that hath fought for you.] See chap. i. 9. xi. 8. 10. 42. xi. 6. The Targum here saith, (as in x. 42.) The Lord your God, his Word fought for you. (See xiv. 12.)

Ver. 4. Behold, I have divided unto you by lot these nations that remain, to be an inheritance for your tribes from Jordan, with all the nations that I have cut off, even unto the great sea westward.] The meaning is, he had divided among them the whole land of Canaan, from Jordan in the east to the Mediterranean in the west; as well that part of the land which remained still unconquered, as that out of which they had expelled the ancient inhabitants.

Ver. 5. And the Lord your God he shall expel them from before you, and drive them from out of your sight, &c.] This relates unto those who remained unsubdued (mentioned in the beginning of the foregoing verse), whom they should undoubtedly conquer and possess their country, if they adhered to God in faithful obedience, as he exhorts them in the following part of this chapter.

Ver. 6. Be ye therefore very courageous to keep and to do.] Or (as it may be translated), by observing and doing.

All that is written in the book of the law of Moses.] Which was the condition upon which God promised to continue them in the possession of this land. By this it is evident, that the book of the law of Moses was extant in those days, and that the people read it.

That ye turn not aside therefrom to the right hand or to the left.] See upon Deut. v. 32.

Ver. 7. That ye come not among these nations, these that remain amongst you.] Have no familiarity with them, especially by marriage.

Neither make mention of the name of their gods.] With any sort of respect to them. (See Exod. xxiii. 13. and Deut. xii. 3.)

Nor cause to swear by them.] Not make a gentile swear by the name of his god; which was utterly unlawful, as Selden observes out of Maimonides in Avoda Zara. (See lib. ii. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 13.) For this was to suppose they had knowledge of men's thoughts, and power to punish those that forsware themselves. And the forbidding this was also to secure them from making leagues and covenants with the gentiles, which they would not look upon as binding without an oath.

Neither serve them.] By offering sacrifices, or praying, or making vows to them, though never so secretly.

Nor bow yourselves to them.] As all inward reverence, so all outward respect likewise was forbidden to be paid to them, especially open and public acts of worship. Interpreters here observe a gradation, from familiarity with them to the most gross idolatry, in which their friendship with these people concluded.

Ver. 8. But cleave unto the Lord your God, as you have done unto this day.] A remarkable instance of which they had all lately given, when the nine tribes and half were so unanimously resolved to punish idolatry, with the extirpation of those that were guilty of it, (xxii. 33.) and the other also most zealously disclaimed all inclinations to it, (ver. 22. 29.)

Ver. 9. For the Lord hath driven out from before you great nations, and strong.] The seven nations of Canaan, who dwelt in strong cities, and brought mighty armies against them, with horses and chariots, and were some of them gigantic persons, (xi. 4. 22.)

But as for you, no man hath been able to stand before you unto this day.] None that gave them battle; though from some of their strong cities they had not yet driven them. (See xxi. 44.)

Ver. 10. One man of you shall chase a thousand.] He gives them hope of a good success for the future, as they had hitherto. (Lev. xxvi. 8.)

For the Lord your God is he that fighteth for you, as he hath promised you.] But he would not have them ascribe it to their own courage, but to the Divine power, (Deut. xxxii. 30.) Here again the Targum hath it, the Word of the Lord, &c. as ver. 3.

Ver. 11. Take good heed therefore unto yourselves, that ye love the Lord your God.] It highly, therefore, concerned them to keep close to the worship and service of God alone, with sincere love to him; since all their happiness depended upon his favour to them; for that this is meant by loving God, appears from the following verse; and from Deut. vi. 4, 5. x. 12. xi. 22.

Ver. 12. Else if you do in any wise go back.] From God, and fall to idolatry.

And cleave unto the remnant of these nations, even these that remain among you.] Embrace their errors, as the Vulgar translates it; which they might easily do by making friendship with them, as the phrase properly signifies.

And shall make marriages with them.] Which was the effect of their familiarity with them.

And go in unto them, and they to you.] The same thing that was said before in other words, which only signify the consummation of marriage; which was strictly forbidden them, Exod. xxiii. 32. xxxiv. 12. 15, 16. Deut. vii. 3.

Ver. 13. Know for a certainty that the Lord your God will no more drive out any of these nations from before you.] As he had hitherto done, and promised still to do, if they would be obedient, (ver. 8, 9.) The Targum saith, The Word of the Lord will no more drive, &c.

But they shall be snares and traps unto you.] Remain in the land to inveigle and seduce them into further impiety. (See Exod. xxxiv. 12. Deut. vii. 4. 16.)

And scourges in your sides.] Bring sore chastisements upon them; for this alludes to the lashes that were given offenders upon their sides, (Ecclus. xxx. 12. xlii. 5.)

And thorns in your eyes.] Most grievously afflict them. (See Numb. xxxiii. 55.)

Until ye perish from off this good land, which the Lord your God hath given you.] For, with the love and favour of God, they forfeited also their inheritance which he had bestowed on them.

Ver. 14. Behold, this day I am going the way of all the earth.] Shall die shortly, as all men must one time or other; therefore hearken to the words of a dying man.

And ye know in all your hearts, and in all your souls.] Are all fully convinced.

That not one thing hath failed, of all the good things which the Lord your God spake concerning you, &c.] See upon xxi. 45. And God was as good as his word ever after, as Solomon acknowledges, 1 Kings viii. 56.

Ver. 15. Therefore it shall come to pass, that as all good things are come upon you which the Lord your God promised you, so shall the Lord.] When he ceased to be their God.

Bring upon you all evil things, &c.] According to what Moses had predicted at large, Lev. xxvi. and Deut. xxviii. In my annotations upon which last chapter, I have demonstrated, that not one thing hath failed of all the threatenings there mentioned, but all literally fulfilled to a tittle: for God's faithfulness is no less visible in fulfilling his threatenings than his promises.

Ver. 16. When ye have transgressed the covenant of the Lord your God which he commanded you, and have gone and served other gods, &c.] This was the principal thing in the covenant, that they should have no other gods but him alone; as I have observed from a great number of places in the book of Deuteronomy.

Then shall the anger of the Lord be kindled against you; and ye shall perish quickly from off the good land which he hath given unto you.] See Deut. xxviii. 20.

CHAP. XXIV.

Ver. 1. AND Joshua gathered all the tribes of Israel.] It is likely that Joshua, living longer than he expected when he made the foregoing speech to them, called the people together once more, to give them good advice before he died; as Moses made a great many speeches to them (I observed upon the book of Deuteronomy) before his departure from them: or, perhaps, it was the usual custom of Joshua to take occasion often to call them together, and put them in mind of their duty. And these two exhortations, which he made to them in the latter end of his life, he thought fit to record.

To Shechem.] Some will have this place to be the same with Shiloh, called here Shechem, because it was in the country of Shechem, and not far from it. The LXX. also call it Σηλώ, both here and ver. 25. It is plain also, by the latter end of the verse, that they assembled there where God dwelt, which was in Shiloh: yet all this is not sufficient to make us think they were not summoned to the city called Shechem: for there is no good reason for calling Shiloh by this name, it being (as St. Jerome saith) ten miles from Shechem: and all other copies of the LXX. but the Vatican, having Συχὲμ, not Σηλώ. And as for their appearing before God at this place, I shall give an account of it in the end of this verse; and now only say, that it is likely Joshua, who was the supreme governor of God's people, being old and infirm, caused the ark, for this time, to be brought to Shechem, being near to him, that he might renew the covenant with the people in that place where Abraham first settled, when he came into the land of Canaan, and where he built an altar, and God established his covenant with him, (Gen. xii. 6, 7.) and where the patriarchs were buried, (Acts vii. 15, 16.) and where he was about to lay the bones of Joseph (ver. 32. of this chapter), and where the Israelites, at their first entrance into Canaan, renewed their covenant with God, (Josh. viii. 30, &c.) For Ebal and Gerzim were hard by Shechem.

And called for the elders of Israel, and for their heads, and for their judges, and for their officers.] The same persons mentioned xxiii. 2. Which places give us a distinct account of the persons concerned in the government of the Israelites; as Const. L'Empereur observes, in his annotations upon Bertram de Repub. Judaica, p. 362. 395, 396.

And they presented themselves before God.] At his tabernacle; which was, as I said, for the present brought hither. For it is plain, as Cornel. Bertram observes, (L. de Republ. Judaica, cap. 15. p. 249.) the kings or chief rulers of Israel had a power to carry the ark from the place of its constant residence when there was a great occasion for it, (1 Sam. iv. 3, 4. 2 Sam. xv. 24.) And now, at this great assembly of the whole nation by their representatives, there was a just reason for its being brought hither (seeing Joshua could not conveniently, by reason of his great old age, go to Shiloh), that it might be a more solemn meeting, being held in the presence of God. Mr. Mede hath another notion of this matter; for he thinks that there was a proseucha, or praying-place, erected by the Israelites (at least by the Ephraimites, in whose lot Shechem was) after they had subdued the country, that they might resort hither to call upon God, when they were not able to go as far as the tabernacle. Many such places he makes account there were; of which see more on ver. 26.

Ver. 2. And Joshua said unto all the people.] That were there present, viz. the elders, heads, judges, and officers, mentioned in the foregoing verse, who were to report his words to all the people.

Thus saith the Lord God of Israel.] This is an argument that Joshua spake all that follows by a Divine impulse; for he begins his speech in the solemn form used by the prophets (thus saith the Lord) and introduces God himself speaking in his own person. From whence it may be inferred he was a prophet, as well as the ruler of God's people.

Your fathers dwelt on the other side of the flood.] That is, of the river Euphrates.

In old time.] A long time before they came from Ur of the Chaldees into Haran, (Gen. xi. 28. 31.)

Even Terah, the father of Abraham, and the father of Nahor.] These were Terah's two eldest sons, (Gen. xi. 26.)

And they served other gods.] All agree that Terah was an idolater living in that country, from whence, as many think, idolatry first came, (Gen. xxxi. 19.) The Jews, in Schalsch. Hakkabala, say he was a priest: see Hottinger in his Smegma Orientale, cap. 8. p. 290. Others of them say, he was a statuary, who made images of several materials, λέγων τούτους εἶναι θεούς, saying, These were gods; as Suidas speaks, who, together with Epiphanius, is of this opinion. (See Bochartus, in his Phaleg. lib. ii. cap. 5.) Abraham himself also, most agree, was bred up in the same idolatry; though some few deny it; as Hottinger observes in the same place; where he alleges the words of Maimonides, who saith, He was converted to the worship of the Creator of all, in the forty-eighth year of his age; and that his father Terah also repented, and worshipped the true and only God. (See upon Gen. xi. 31.)

Ver. 3. And I took your father Abraham from the other side of the flood.] From that idolatrous country where he was born and educated. Which is mentioned as a singular obligation upon the Israelites to adhere unto God, who singled out the father of their families, so many ages ago, to be his worshipper. This Maimonides, having occasion to mention these words of Joshua, represents in very pathetical expressions: "How great is the benefit (saith he) that we receive by these precepts, which have freed us from such a grand error in which our father was educated, and converted us to the true belief of God? by teaching us that he created all things, and that he is to be worshipped, and loved, and feared, and he only; and that there is no great labour required to do his will, but only the love and fear of him, in which two all his worship is perfected," &c. (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 29.)

And led him.] From Charran, after his father's death.

Throughout all the land of Canaan.] Till he came to Shechem (where the Israelites now were assembled), and so to Beth-el; and so on still towards the south of the land of Canaan, (Gen. xii. 6. 8, 9.)

And multiplied his seed, and gave him Isaac.] In order to the fulfilling of his promise, (Gen. xv. 5.) he bestowed a son upon him, when he was a hundred years old, (Gen. xxi. 1, 2, &c.)

Ver. 4. And I gave unto Isaac, Jacob and Esau.] Who had a very numerous issue, (Gen. xxv. 24, &c.)

And I gave unto Esau, Mount Seir to possess it.] He and his brother being grown so rich, and their cattle so increased, that there was not room for them both in the land of Canaan, where they sojourned, (Gen. xxxvi. 6—8.)

And Jacob and his children went down into Egypt.] Though Esau left the land of Canaan entirely to him, yet the time was not come when God intended to plant his posterity in it; but they were forced to go down into Egypt, where they suffered a cruel bondage, (Gen. xlvi. 6. Exod. i. 11, &c.) So the LXX. explain it.

Ver. 5. I sent Moses also, and Aaron.] And when they were multiplied exceedingly, (Exod. i. 7. 14. 20.) these two great persons were sent to deliver them from that bondage, (Exod. iii. 10. iv. 14.)

And I plagued Egypt, according to that I did amongst them.] Smote it with those signs (as the LXX. explain it) which are related in that book of Exodus.

And afterward I brought you out.] By those wonderful plagues they were, at last, constrained to let the Israelites depart, as they desired, (Exod. xii. 31, &c.)

Ver. 6. And I brought your fathers out of Egypt, and you came unto the sea.] When he had brought them out (as is related Exod. xii. 40.) they were led by God through the way of the wilderness of the Red Sea, (Exod. xiii. 18.) by which they encamped, and were in very great straits, (xiv. 9.)

And the Egyptians pursued after your fathers with chariots and horsemen into the Red Sea.] Imagining them to be in such difficulties, that they could not escape out of their hand, (Exod. xiv. 3.)

Ver. 7. And when they cried unto the Lord, he put darkness between you and the Egyptians.] So that when they had overtaken them, they could not see where they were, (Exod. xiv. 10. 19, 20.)

And brought the sea upon them, and covered them.] Insomuch, that they marched after them into the sea, where they were overwhelmed, (Exod. xiv. 27, 28.)

And your eyes have seen what I have done in Egypt.] Or, upon the Egyptians. He appeals to them for the truth of this, who had seen them lie dead upon the sea-shore, (Exod. xiv. 30, 31.) For their elders, to whom he now speaks, (ver. 1.) were all then there: and now not only men of great dignity, but (many of them at least) of great age.

And ye dwelt in the wilderness a long season.] Forty years, Numb. xiv. 33. where he gave them a law, and fed them miraculously, &c.

Ver. 8. And I brought you into the land of the Amorites, which dwelt on the other side Jordan.] Towards the latter end of that time, (Numb. xxi. 20, 21.)

And they fought with you, and I gave them into your hand, &c.] See there, ver. 23, 24. 33, &c.

Ver. 9. Then Balak, the son of Zippor, king of Moab, arose, and warred against Israel.] He did not actually draw out his forces, and fall upon them, but he prepared them and made them ready, with an intention to drive them from his coast, if Balaam could have disabled them by his curses; which sufficiently appears from Numb. xxii. 11. David Camius therefore notes pertinently, "the design or contrivance is reputed the work itself."

And sent and called Balaam the son of Beor to curse you.] See Numb. xxii. 5, 6, &c.

Ver. 10. But the Lord would not hearken unto Balaam.]

Who had a great inclination to do what Balak desired; and one would think by this, begged of God to give him leave to use his arts to do the Israelites mischief: and when this was denied him, yet obtaining licence to go to the king of Moab, he went with these intentions, and with hope he might prevail with God to suffer him to prosecute his design, (Numb. xxii. 32.)

Therefore he blessed you still: so I delivered you out of his hand.] He all along pronounced nothing but blessings on them, instead of curses, notwithstanding all the attempts that were made to the contrary, Numb. xxiii. and xxiv. Which was to be ascribed to the overruling power of God, who hindered him from hurting them.

Ver. 11. And ye went over Jordan.] Having vanquished the two kings of the Amorites on the other side of it, and got quit of all other enemies (the Moabites and Midianites), God in a wonderful manner brought them into Canaan, by drying up the river Jordan to give them a passage over it.

And came unto Jericho.] Which was the first place they besieged, being the nearest city to Jordan.

And the men of Jericho fought against you.] We do not read of any sallies they made upon the Israelites; but they shutting their gates, to defend the city against them, it is likely, flung stones from their wall upon them.

The Amorites, and the Perizzites, and the Canaanites, and the Hittites, and the Girgashites, and the Hivites, and the Jebusites.] After which, it appears by this book, that they fought with all the seven nations of Canaan; who engaged them in several bodies, and at several times: which was done so lately, that there was no need he should repeat all the particulars mentioned in the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth chapters. But by the division of their land among the Israelites, it was very well known to them, that (as this verse concludes) God had delivered them into their hands. It is observable, that the Girgashites are here particularly mentioned, as fighting against Israel with the rest of the seven nations; which makes Grotius's observation doubtful, of their surrender at Joshua's first summons; (see xvi. 10.) but if that be not true, it is manifest some of them remained unsubdued, and had a settlement in Canaan in our Saviour's days: when we read of the country of the Gergesens, the inhabitants of which were not Jews, as appears by their breeding swine. (See Constant. L'Empereur in his annotations on Bava-kama, p. 180.)

Ver. 12. And I sent the hornet before you, which drove them out from before you.] This may signify, either that before the Israelites came into those parts, God sent hornets, which so infested them, that many of them were forced to leave their country, and flee into other places; or, that when they came to give them battle, these hornets made such assaults upon them, as facilitated the victory. This God promised in Exod. xxiii. 27, 28. Deut. vii. 20. and here Joshua remembers how true he was to his word. The Book of Wisdom calls them προδρόμους, the forerunners of God's host; and Kimchi saith, they flew in the eyes of the Canaanites, and made them so blind, that they could not see to fight.

Even the two kings of the Amorites.] Sihon and Og, whose country was first infested with them; and afterward the kings of Canaan, and their people, felt their fury: for this is a short expression, like that which I observed xxii. 10.

But not with thy sword, or with thy bow.] These swarms of hornets, it seems, did greater execution than the armies of the Israelites. We do not read of their assaulting the Canaanites in any of the battles that Joshua fought with them; for he did not think fit to mention it particularly in the foregoing account of his victory, but now in general, when he was to sum up all the mercies of God to them.

Ver. 13. And I have given you a land for which you did not labour, and cities which ye built not, and ye dwell in them.] As Joshua had observed before, (xi. 13.)

Of the vineyards and olive-yards which ye planted not do ye eat.] According to his promise, Deut. vi. 10, 11.

Ver. 14. Now therefore fear the Lord.] The fear of God commonly signifies his worship and service, unto which he exhorts them in the following words: which seem to relate to all outward acts of worship; as this to the inward reverence they owed to him in their minds, as the only God.

And serve him in sincerity and truth.] Worship no other God together with him, nor mix any idolatrous rites with those prescribed by him; but serve him constantly and purely according to his law, which is the truth, (Psal. cxix. 142.)

And put away the gods which your fathers served on the other side of the flood.] See ver. 2. This intimates, that there were now some idolaters among them, though secretly in private, and not openly; for they had lately expressed so unanimously such a zeal against any appearance of idolatry, that one cannot think there was any known worshipper of other gods now in the nation.

And in Egypt.] Where they began to be corrupted in their religion, as is often suggested by the prophet Ezekiel, xx. 6—8. 18. xxiii. 3. 8. 19. 21. 27.

And serve ye the Lord.] He repeats it again, as a thing of the greatest moment, that they should worship the Lord alone.

Ver. 15. And if it seem evil unto you to serve the Lord, choose you this day whom you will serve.] He could not think they would turn atheists, and have no God at all; and he was unwilling to suppose that they would prefer any other god to him, who had obliged them by such benefits as are beforementioned: which he expresses in this rhetorical form of speech; which is as much as if he had said, If you like not the Lord's service, tell me whom ye will serve? Where do you hope to find a God comparable to him?

Whether the gods that your fathers served, that were on the other side of the flood.] That had some colour for it, because of its antiquity; but was condemned by Abraham their father, who forsook that religion, and was blessed for it by God with the inheritance he had now given them in the land of Canaan.

Or the gods of the Amorites, in whose land ye dwell.] That was so absurd, as to need no confutation; for those gods could not defend their servants that worshipped them.

But as for me, I and my house, we will serve the Lord.] He declares his firm resolution (let them take what course they pleased), together with his whole family (as far as he could oblige them), to worship the Lord alone.

Ver. 16. And the people answered and said.] All the elders and others there present, and all those to whom they reported what Joshua had said, made this answer.

God forbid that we should forsake the Lord.] The Hebrew word Chalila (which we translate God forbid) imports a great abhorrence and abomination of that which is mentioned with it.

To serve other gods.] Which they now looked upon as the greatest madness.

Ver. 17. For the Lord our God, he it is that brought us up and our fathers out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage, and which did those great signs in our sight, &c.] They gave such powerful reasons why they should serve none but the Lord alone; that if they had always preserved them as fresh in their minds as they were now, they could never have gone after other gods.

Ver. 18. And the Lord drave out from before us all the people.] That is, of Canaan.

Even the Amorites which dwelt in the land.] In the Hebrew, and the Amorites; that is, together with the two kings of the Amorites, whom they had driven before out of the land on the other side of Jordan.

Therefore will we also serve the Lord.] Follow the example of Joshua, their leader, (ver. 15.)

For he is our God.] As they were convinced by their wonderful deliverance out of Egypt; all the great signs he wrought there, and after they came from thence; and the care he took of them in the wilderness, and all other places; and now by their late victories over most potent enemies, whom he had driven out of their country, and put the Israelites in possession of it.

Ver. 19. And Joshua said unto the people, Ye cannot serve the Lord.] This is far from signifying an utter impossibility of it; (for that would have contradicted his exhortation, ver. 14.) but that they were so very prone to idolatry, that they would not be able to persevere steadfast in their resolution, unless they took care constantly to reflect upon, and lay to heart, what they had now acknowledged, (ver. 17, 18.) which he was afraid they would not do.

For he is a holy God, he is a jealous God.] Who, having no equal (that is meant by holy), will endure no rival; and therefore they who communicated the worship proper to him, unto any other besides him, or with him, were deemed to deny his incomparable sanctity, and said in Scripture to profane his holy name, as Mr. Mede observes, (see book i. disc. 2.) It is a just remark which Mr. Alix here makes, in his excellent book of the Judgment of the Jewish Church against the Unitarians, chap. ix. that here is a plain idea of a plurality of persons in the Godhead, the words in the Hebrew being, he is the holy Gods; like that Eccles. xii. 1, Remember thy Creators. And, indeed, this is a place anciently noted by the Christian doctors (whom the Jews call heretics), who asked R. Samlai, as the Jews themselves tell us, what he had to answer unto these words, Ye cannot serve the Lord, Ki Elohim Kedoshim Hu, because he is the holy Gods? Who had nothing to reply, but that Joshua doth not say, They are the holy Gods, but He is the holy Gods. Which is the very same that we affirm, that he is Three in One. This is in Bereschith Rabba, mentioned by Raymond in his Pugio Fidei, and by J. Wagenseil, in his confutation of Lipman's Carmen Memoriale, p. 129.

He will not forgive your transgressions nor your sins.] But make those who assume any other deity into fellowship with him in worship, feel how he resents such dishonour done to his Divine Majesty.

Ver. 20. If you forsake the Lord, and serve strange gods.] Either the gods of the Amorites, beforementioned, or those that their fathers anciently served.

Then he will turn and do you hurt, and consume you, after that he hath done you good.] Alter the course of his providence towards you, and send as many curses upon you as he hath done blessings; according to the prediction of Moses in Deut. xxviii. 63.

Ver. 21. And the people said unto Joshua, Nay, but we will serve the Lord.] They desire him to entertain a better opinion of them; for they persist in their well-grounded resolution, (ver. 16—18.)

Ver. 22. And Joshua said unto the people, Ye are witnesses against yourselves, that ye have chosen the Lord to serve him.] This solemn profession, which they had thus deliberately and publicly made, he tells them, would testify against them, and condemn them, if they proved false to God.

And they said, We are witnesses.] Here they renew that choice of God for their king, which their forefathers made when they came out of Egypt (in the nineteenth and twenty-fourth chapters of Exodus), and acknowledged they should be self-condemned if they did not make it good.

Ver. 23. Now therefore put away (said he) the strange gods that are among you.] See ver. 14. This is an argument that he was a prophet, as I said upon ver. 2. that he saw their inward disposition, and the secret affection they had to idols. For though there was no public idol worshipped, yet he knew, by the spirit of propheey, that they had their penates (as the Romans called them), household gods; or, rather, gods which they worshipped secretly in their closets, as our Dr. Spencer observes, lib. iii. dissert. 1. cap. 3. These being the very same words which Jacob used to his household, when he suspected them of the same crime, though there was no open idolatry practised among them, (Gen. xxxv. 2.)

And incline your heart unto the Lord God of Israel.] Settle your affection upon the Lord alone, who you profess is your sovereign, to whom the whole nation hath infinite obligations, (ver. 16—18.)

Ver. 24. And the people said unto Joshua, The Lord our God will we serve, and his voice we will obey.] They repeat their professed resolution a third time, which made it more binding; and a stronger witness against them, if they forsook the Lord.

Ver. 25. So Joshua made a covenant with the people that day.] Engaged them to make good this solemn profession, by renewing the covenant they had formerly entered into, both in the time of Moses, and in his time: wherein they promised to worship him alone, and be obedient to him; and he promised to do for them as he had formerly done; that is, be their constant protector and benefactor. There are those who think this covenant was now established by sacrifice, as it was when they came out of Egypt, (Exod. xxiv. 4, 5.) and when they came into Canaan, (Josh. viii. 31.) But, as there is no mention of an altar, or any offering, so it is not likely that Joshua would offer any sacrifice but in the place which God had chosen, which was Shiloh: for though we suppose the sanctuary to have been brought hither for a little time, yet it was not the settled place of the Divine residence.

And set them a statute and an ordinance.] It is commonly interpreted, that he propounded to them in brief the precepts of the law; which are the conditions of the covenant: but it may be expounded, that he enacted this covenant to have the force of a statute and ordinance, or judgment, as it is in the Hebrew.

In Shechem.] So that it was called hereafter the covenant or statute in Shechem, where they all made repeated professions of love to God.

Ver. 26. And Joshua wrote these words.] From whence, as I observed in the preface, the Talmudists gather Joshua to have been the author of this book. As if these words signified, that he, after the example of Moses, committed to writing all that we read in this book, and added it at the end of the five books written by Moses, as it is now annexed to them. But it must be confessed, that one cannot certainly infer more from these words than that he wrote the words of the foregoing covenant; and this he did, as it here follows, in the very book of the law of God, that it might be preserved in everlasting remembrance.

In the book of the law of God.] Which was laid up by Moses's order, in the side of the ark, (Deut. xxxi. 24—26.) From whence he took it, and wrote in it all that had passed between him and the people, that they might look upon this as a sacred transaction, as indeed it was, and most carefully observe it: and perhaps he wrote it also in that copy of the law of God, which the princes had for the use of every tribe. (See upon Deut. xxxi. 9.)

And took a great stone, and set it up there.] As a monument of the covenant now made. Which was an ancient way of preserving the memory of things past, as appears by what Jacob did, Gen. xxviii. 18. and they themselves had lately done, iv. 3. 20, 21, &c. Upon this stone, it is probable, there was an inscription, signifying what it meant.

Under an oak that was by the sanctuary of the Lord.] This is one argument Mr. Mede uses (in the place I mentioned upon ver. 1.) to prove that the sanctuary, properly so called, cannot be here meant, because it was unlawful to plant any trees near it, (Deut. xvi. 21, 22.) and therefore he understands hereby a proseucha, or praying-place, which, in memory of Jacob, was here at Shechem. And he doth plainly shew, there were both such places, and also synagogues, in several parts of the country; the former being in the fields, open on the top; the latter in cities, covered as our houses are. And I may add, that we do read of sanctuaries, in the plural number, that were among them in aftertimes, (Amos vii. 9.) Yet it must be acknowledged, that the argument he uses from the place I mentioned in Deuteronomy is not cogent: for though they be prohibited there to plant a grove of any trees near God's altar, after the manner of the gentiles, this did not make it unlawful to set up the sanctuary under a tree that had been planted before; especially when it was done only for a short time, and not to make it the settled place for its constant abode.

But there are those who avoid this seeming difficulty, by referring these words, in the sanctuary of the Lord (as they may be translated), not to the oak, but to the words going before, the book of the law of God; which was in the sanctuary. And thus, it is certain, words are sometimes to be connected, not with those immediately preceding, but with those which are more remote. A notable instance of which we have in Gen. xiii. 10. where those words in the end of the verse, As thou comest unto Zoar, cannot be joined to the land of Egypt, just beforementioned, but to the plain of Jordan, in the very beginning of the verse.

Ver. 27. And Joshua said unto all the people, This stone shall be a witness unto us.] As Laban said concerning the heap of stones which he and Jacob raised, (Gen. xxxi. 48. 51, 52.)

For it hath heard all the words of the Lord which he spake unto us.] All those speeches which had been delivered by Joshua in the name of God, (ver. 2, 3, &c.) and all that the Israelites had answered to him: that is, the covenant between God and them; which being renewed before this stone, it is said, by an elegant figure, to have heard what was spoken; because it would remain to testify and declare to all posterity the engagements that lay upon them. Thus the prophet calls to all creatures, Hear, O heaven, &c.

It shall be therefore a witness unto you, lest ye deny your God.] To accuse them; as much as if it had heard what they said, and could speak against them.

Ver. 28. And so Joshua let the people depart, every one unto his inheritance.] And the sanctuary of the Lord returned to its settled place, which was in Shiloh.

Ver. 29. And it came to pass, that after these things.] Not long after, in all probability.

Joshua the son of Nun, the servant of the Lord, died.] Leaving this honourable character behind him, which Moses also had, that he had served the Lord faithfully.

Being a hundred and ten years old.] Of the same age with Joseph. How many of these years he spent in Canaan, as the chief ruler of God's people, men's opinions are very widely different: for some say he lived twenty and eight years after they came over Jordan (which is the opinion of the Jews in Seder Olam); though others will not allow so much as the odd eight years, but say it was only seven. There is a middle opinion maintained by others, that he was their governor seventeen years. (See Bonfrerius.)

Ver. 30. And they buried him in the border of his inheritance in Timnath-serah.] Called in Judg. ii. 9. Timneth-heres; because of the image of the sun engraven on his sepulchre, in memory of that famous day, when the sun stood still till he had completed his victory. (Chap. x.) So several of the Jewish authors say, particularly he who wrote the book put out by Hottinger, under the title of Cippi Hebraici, p. 32. where he saith, his father Nun was buried here, and Caleb the son of Jephunneh. (See also his Smegma Orientale, cap. 8. p. 523.) And thus Tully saith, a sphere and a cylinder were put upon the tomb of Archimedes.

On the north side of the hill Gaash.] So called, as the Jews fable, because it trembled and quaked, at the burial of Joshua, whose death the people did not enough bewail. Which fancy, it is likely, came into their head, because there is no mention here of any days of mourning for him, as there were for Aaron and Moses. In which St. Jerome and other of the fathers think there is a mystery; viz. that under the law, when the kingdom of heaven was not yet opened, they had reason to mourn and weep for the death of their friends; but under the gospel, wherein is revealed by the Lord Jesus (of whom Joshua was a figure) the wonderful love of God to men, &c. there is no reason for mourning and lamentation, but rather for rejoicing.

Of this hill, see Const. L'Empereur upon Benjamin's Itinerarium, who calls Montpelier by this name of Har-Gaash, the trembling hill, p. 142, 143.

Ver. 31. And Israel served the Lord all the days of Joshua.] No idolatry appeared among them publicly while he lived, (whatsoever private superstition might be practised, ver. 14. 23.) for all that wicked generation which came out of Egypt (except the younger sort) were consumed in the wilderness, before Joshua took the conduct of them. And God kept them there so many years, as wasted them also, for this reason, among others, that they might forget the idolatrous custom of Egypt, unto which it early appeared, by their making the golden calf, they were strongly inclined. Thus St. Chrysostom discourses: (lib. i. advers. Vitæ Monast. vituper.) God, saith he, that the children of Israel might unlearn the evil customs of Egypt, brought them καταμόνας ἐπὶ τῆς ἐρημίας, to lead a solitary life in the wilderness, forming their minds, as in a monastery, far from those who had corrupted them. And he destroyed there all the elder sort, that none might enter into Palestine, but they who had not seen the superstitious impieties of the Egyptians, καὶ μηδένα διδάσκαλον ἔχειν τῆς τοσαύτης πονηρίας, and that they might have no master left among them to teach them such kind of wickedness.

And all the days of the elders that outlived Joshua, and which had seen all the works of the Lord, that he had done for Israel.] These elders had been chosen by Moses, who knew them to be men of great piety; that had not only seen, but observed and kept in mind all God's wonderful works; and would put others in mind of them, and teach them to serve and obey the Lord.

From this place the Jews labour to establish all their oral traditions; which Moses, say they, delivered to Joshua, and he to these elders, and they to the prophets, and they to others, (see Maimonides in Seder Zeraim, set forth by our most learned Dr. Pocock, p. 34.) for which there is no foundation.

Ver. 32. And the bones of Joseph, which the children of Israel brought out of Egypt.] It is a needless pains which the Jews bestow in reconciling this place with Exod. xiii. 19. where it is said, Moses took the bones of Joseph with him. For there is no contradiction between these two places, the children of Israel doing what Moses required them to do; who could not carry them away himself, but saw them brought out of Egypt. Yet thus they gravely discourse about this matter in the Talmud: (tit. Sota, cap. 1. sect. 47.) "When any one begins a thing, but doth not bring it to perfection, and another comes and finishes it, the Scripture speaks of him who completes it, as if he alone had done it."

Buried they in Shechem.] Which was one reason, perhaps, for gathering the great assembly abovementioned, that they might the more solemnly deposit the bones of this great man, in that portion of land which his father Jacob had given him; see Gen. xlviii. 22. where it seems they thought it most agreeable to lay him, rather than in the cave of Machpelah. It may be reasonably thought, also, that the bodies of the rest of the sons of Jacob, from whom the twelve tribes descended, were brought into Canaan, to be there interred, as Josephus relates from ancient tradition, lib. ii. Antiq. cap. 4. And St. Stephen confirms it, Acts vii. 16. For though Joseph excelled them all in dignity, and gave this special charge about his body, yet, no doubt, every tribe had as great a regard to the head of it, and would be inclined to do the same for their fathers that Joseph desired for himself. But whether they buried them in the sepulchre at Machpelah, or in some eminent place in their own tribe, as Joseph was, there is none that gives us any account.

In a parcel of ground which Jacob bought of the sons of Hamor, the father of Shechem, for a hundred pieces of silver.] See Gen. xxxiii. 18, 19. This shews they did not bury him in the city of Shechem, but in a field near it, which was his own ground: for so the ancient manner was, not to bury in cities and towns, but in the adjacent fields or gardens.

And it became the inheritance of the children of Joseph.] Of the Ephraimites, who gave Shechem to the Levites for a city of refuge, (xxi. 20, 21.)

Ver. 33. And Eleazar the son of Aaron died.] Who imitated Joshua (if we may believe the Samaritan Chronicle), in calling all the elders and princes of the tribes to him before he died, charging them strictly to obey all the commands of God. After which he put off his sacred garments, and clothed his son Phinehas with them. This is so far from being improbable, that it is likely all the elders did the same, as far as their authority could reach; being very desirous their posterity might continue firm and steadfast in the worship of God alone.

And they buried him in a hill that pertained to Phinehas his son.] In the Hebrew the words are, in the hill of Phinehas; that is, a hill called by his name. It being the manner, as I have noted elsewhere, to call places by the name of their eldest son.

Which was given him in Mount Ephraim.] It is a question to whom this hill was given: most probable to Eleazar, who, being the high-priest at the time of the division of the land, they thought fit to give him a peculiar portion, distinct from all the cities of the priests; none of which were in the tribe of Ephraim, but all in the tribes of Judah, Benjamin, and Simeon, as we read xxi. 9. 17. 19. And they gave it Eleazar in this country, that he might be near to the tabernacle (which was in Shiloh), and near to Joshua, to be ready on all occasions to advise him, and consult the oracle for him. But against this there lies a great objection, that no Levite or priest was to have any portion in the division of the land: and therefore it is the most received opinion among the Jews, that either Eleazar or Phinehas had this inheritance in the right of his wife. So the Gemara Babylonica on Bava Bathra, and a great many others, mentioned by Mr. Selden, in his book de Successionibus ad Leges Hebr. cap. 18. where he observes another example of this marital succession, as he calls it; that is, the husband succeeding his wife in her estate after her death, in 1 Chron. ii. 21. where the twenty-three cities which Jair possessed, Kimchi saith he had by his wife.

These five last verses, it is evident, were not written by Joshua: but this is no argument he did not write this book; no more than that Moses did not write the Pentateuch, because there is the like account given of his death and burial in the conclusion of it, by some other author. (See Deut. xxxiv. 1.) The Talmudists, I observed, say, in Bava Bathra, that Joshua wrote his own book, and the eight last verses of the Pentateuch. And they say in the same place, (cap. 1.) as to what is written here, ver. 29. it was done by Eleazar; and what is said, ver. 33. it was wrote by Phinehas: or rather, these five verses, from 29. to the end, were written by Samuel; who, being a prophet, was moved and directed by God to continue the history of this people from the death of Joshua to his own time.

THE BOOK OF JUDGES.

THIS book is called by the name of SHOPHETIM, or JUDGES, because it treats principally of the great things done by those illustrious persons, who were raised up by God, upon special occasions, after the death of Joshua, till the time of making a king, to judge, that is, to rule the people of Israel, and to deliver them from their oppressions. It consists of two parts; the one containing the history of the Judges, from Othniel to Samson, which ends with the sixteenth chapter (the history of the two last judges, Eli and Samuel, being not recorded here, but in the following book); the other containing several memorable actions, which were performed in or about the time of the Judges; with which the holy writer would not interrupt their history, but reserved them to be related by themselves in the conclusion, viz. in the seventeenth, and the following chapters, unto the end of the book.

It is but conjectured who was the writer of it. Some think Ezra; but it is more probable the prophet Samuel, who was the last of the judges; and, by the direction of God, brought down their history unto his own days, when they desired a king to be set over them. The Talmudists, in Bava Bathra, (cap. 1.) are of this opinion; which Kimchi, Abarbinel, and other great authors follow. And, indeed, there is reason to think, that he who wrote the conclusion of the book of Joshua was the writer of this book also; in the second chapter of which he inserts part of that which is written there. And it is manifest it was written before the second book of Samuel, where mention is made of a passage in this book; which would not have been so commonly known, if it had not been published here, 2 Sam. xi. 21. out of Judg. ix. 53. David, also, in Psal. lxviii. 7, 8, seems to allude unto what we read in the song of Deborah, v. 4. (See Du Pin.) Certain it is, it was written before David's reign; for the Jebusites were possessed of Jerusalem when this author lived (ver. 21. of the first chapter), who were driven out of it by David, (2 Sam. v. 6.) and therefore this book was written before that; and is of wonderful use, as Procopius Gazæus observes, to represent unto us the mighty power of true religion to make a nation happy, and the dismal calamities which impiety brings upon it. And therefore, saith he, St. Paul thought fit to propound a great many examples to us out of this very book; such as Gideon, and Barak, and Samson, and Jephthah, who did marvellous things by the power of faith.

CHAP. I.

Ver. 1. NOW after the death of Joshua.] And of Eleazar, it is probable (for this book gives an account of what followed after those things that are mentioned in the foregoing), but how long after cannot be certainly determined: but we have reason to think it was not till they were multiplied so much, as to be able to people more of the country than they had yet in possession.

It came to pass, that the children of Israel.] There was no person appointed by Joshua to succeed him in the government, as he was appointed by Moses to be his successor; but the government was left in the hand of the elders. For it is a mere fiction which we meet withal in the Samaritan Chronicle, that at the last assembly (mentioned Joshua xxiv.) he chose twelve of the chief of the tribes, and cast lots which of them should hold his place when he died; and that the lot fell upon one whose name was Abel, and his nephew; to whom he assigned his authority, and set a crown upon his head. (See Hottinger, in his Smegma Orientale, cap. 8. p. 522.)

Asked the Lord, saying.] Inquired of him by urim and thummim, as the manner was in all cases that concerned the whole congregation of Israel. For which end, it is to be supposed, that some who represented the body of the people (their elders, perhaps, or heads of their tribes) were sent to Shiloh, where the sanctuary was, and desired Phinehas the high-priest to represent their case to God, and beseech his directions. Here the Jews raise a question, why we never read that Joshua, in all his wars, consulted God by the oracle, but the elders immediately after his death did. To this they give several answers. (See Numb. xxvii. 21.)

Who shall go up for us against the Canaanites first, to fight against them?] They being increased, as I said, to such a number, that they were able to people more of the country; and beginning to be straitened for want of room, thought of enlarging their possessions; but would not adventure without God's approbation and direction to do any thing: and therefore desired he would tell them who should make the first attempt; that the rest, being encouraged by their success (of which they did not doubt, if they had his warrant for what they did), might make the like. For it is evident by these words, go up for us, that all the tribes on this side Jordan were concerned in this matter.

Ver. 2. And the Lord said, Judah.] i. e. The tribe of Judah, who were very populous, and no less valiant.

Shall go up.] And assault the mountainous country, which was the lot of this tribe. According to the prophecy of Jacob, Gen. xlix. 9. where, comparing Judah to a lion's whelp, he saith, "From the prey, my son, thou art gone up."

Behold, I have delivered the land into his hand.] That is, all the land belonging to their lot. By this it seems plain, that the answer by urim and thummim was given by a voice which uttered these words. Here Abarbinel endeavours to give satisfaction to the question beforementioned, why Joshua did not inquire in this manner, though it be expressly said, (Numb. xxvii. 21.) that "he shall stand before Eleazar the priest, and ask counsel of the Lord, after the judgment of urim." He thinks he did so all the time after that, till Moses's death, to shew he was made the leader of God's people, for none but such could inquire by urim: but, after his death, he was endued with the spirit of prophecy, as Moses was, and so had no need to inquire in that manner, being immediately directed by God in his proceedings. But, after his death, there being none endued with the prophetical spirit, the children of Israel were constrained to have resort to this oracle. Which is an account very much below the judgment of so great a man; for Moses, being a prophet, did frequently ask counsel of God at the sanctuary, which was the same as if he had inquired by urim. Therefore the true answer is, that Joshua did thus inquire of the Lord in the case of Achan: and it is highly probable he did the same in the management of his war, and other great occasions, though it be not expressly mentioned in so many words.

Ver. 3. And Judah said to Simeon his brother.] They were brethren by the same father and mother; and also nearly joined in their situation, the lot of the tribe of Simeon being taken out of that of Judah, (Josh. xix. 9.)

Come up with me into my lot, that we may fight against the Canaanites.] Which people, with the Perizzites (as is further declared in the next verse), still possessed a considerable part of the lot which fell to Judah.

And I likewise will go with thee into thy lot.] To drive them out of that part of the country which was the portion of Simeon.

So Simeon went with him.] They joined their forces together in this expedition, under the conduct, no doubt, of some eminent leader. And who so fit as Caleb? who, though an old man, was full of vigour, and fit for war, (as he himself declared not long ago, Josh. xiv. 10, 11.) and had not yet got possession (as appears by the sequel) of the portion which, by God's commandment, was assigned him.

Ver. 4. And Judah went up.] They were the principal persons concerned in this expedition, and therefore only mentioned, though the children of Simeon also went up with them.

And the Lord delivered.] We meet with no such religious expression (which occurs often here in these holy books) in any heathen writer.

The Canaanites and Perizzites into their hand.] Though most of the people properly called Canaanites dwelt by the Mediterranean Sea, yet many of them were scattered up and down in other parts of the country, (as I observed upon Numb. xiv. ult.) and particularly in these mountains and woody places, where the Perizzites dwelt. (See Josh. xvii. 15, 16.)

And they slew of them in Bezek ten thousand men.] In the country near to Bezek, which was a city in the tribe of Judah, not far, some think, from Bethlehem. Here they chose to make their rendezvous (as we now speak) of their forces, and wait to receive the children of Judah, that, if they were worsted, they might easily find a strong place of retreat.

Ver. 5. And they found Adoni-bezek in Bezek.] He was the king, or lord of this place, as his name imports, whom they surprised, as the word found signifies, (see Bochart. Hieroz. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 21.) by a sudden assault upon this city, whither he seems to have fled when he had lost the field. Theodoret makes this king the same with Adonizedek, (mentioned in Josh. x.) but as their names are different, so he was king of Jerusalem, and this of Bezek, where he was overcome; but the former in Gibeon, who was killed also with the sword, and then hanged on a tree; but this had only his thumbs and toes cut off, and so brought to Jerusalem, where he died.

And they fought against him.] Took the city wherein he thought to have defended himself, and the remainder of his army, which escaped hither.

And they slew the Canaanites and Perizzites.] Put all the people of those two nations, whom they found there, to the sword.

Ver. 6. But Adoni-bezek fled.] He made his escape.

And they pursued him, and caught him.] They found which way he went, and pursued him so close, that they overtook him before he could get to the strong fortress of the Jebusites; where, it is likely, he hoped to secure himself.

And cut off his thumbs and his great toes.] That he might be made incapable of war hereafter, being unable to handle arms, by reason of the loss of his thumbs; or to run swiftly (which was a noble quality in a warrior), by the loss of his great toes. This had been his own practice, it appears by his confession in the next verse, which made them think it reasonable to serve him in his kind.

Ver. 7. And Adoni-bezek said, Threescore and ten kings.] In those days the chief person in every city had a kingly power; as we learn from the history of Joshua, who found many kings in Canaan when he conquered it. And seventy such petty princes Adoni-bezek had subdued; who were not kings of so many several cities, but some of them, it is likely, kings of the same place, who successively opposed him, and were dethroned by him.

Having their thumbs and great toes cut off, gathered their meat under my table.] He was proud and insolent, as well as cruel, treating those kings whom he conquered as if they had been dogs.

As I have done, so hath God requited me.] Justice was defined by the Pythagoreans to be τὸ ἀντιπεπονθὸς, to make others feel the hurt they had done, by their suffering the like punishment. Which Harmenopulus calls ταυτοπάθεια, suffering the very same; as Grotius notes, lib. ii. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 20. n. 32. Now, Adoni-bezek's acknowledgment of God's justice in this punishment, hath made some think he was a penitent, and became a convert to the true religion: for he speaks of God in the singular number, and not of the gods, as the heathen manner was; which might possibly be the reason why they spared his life, and did not kill him. Certain it is, his pride and arrogance was very much humbled by his punishment, which extorted this confession from him. For it carried in it (as Mr. Mede observes on these words) the very stamp and print of the sin for which it was inflicted.

And they brought him to Jerusalem.] Which, as it follows in the next verse, was now in the possession of the children of Judah: though the Jews think they had not yet taken the city; but having begirt it, they brought him prisoner thither, and he died in the time of the siege.

And there he died.] After he had lived some time, perhaps, to perfect his repentance.

Ver. 8. Now the children of Judah had fought against Jerusalem, and taken it.] We do not read of its being taken by Joshua, though it seems to me highly probable, that when he took the king of Jerusalem he also took his city, and did to it as he did to the rest of the cities of those kings, mentioned Josh. x. 3. 23. But when he was gone to conquer other parts of the country, it is likely the old inhabitants returned again and took possession of it; for the land was not then divided among the Israelites: after which, this city falling in part to the share of Judah, they dispossessed the Jebusites that dwelt there of all but the strong fortress on the top of Mount Sion, which held out till the days of David. (See upon Josh. x. 1. and xv. 63.)

And burnt it with fire.] As Joshua had done to Jericho, Ai, and Hazor: this being a city, it is probable, deeply infected with idolatry; from which they thought fit entirely to purge it before they rebuilt it.

Ver. 9. Afterward the children of Judah went down.] From Jerusalem (I suppose) which stood high.

To fight against the Canaanites that dwelt in the mountain.] There were several mountains round about Jerusalem, (Psal. cxxv. 2.) and we often read of the mountains of Judah, which were possessed, it seems, by the old inhabitants till after the death of Joshua.

And the south.] Towards the wilderness of Paran.

And the valley.] Or the flat country about those mountains, some of which are mentioned in the following verses.

Ver. 10. And Judah went up against the Canaanites that dwelt in Hebron.] This shews the old inhabitants of the country had returned to this place after it had been destroyed by Joshua, as we read it was, Josh. x. 36, 37. Who were now again expelled by the children of Judah after his death, this city being in their lot.

Now the name of Hebron before-time was Kirjath-Arba.] As much as to say, the city of Arba, who was the father of Anak. (See Josh. xiv. ult. xv. 13.)

And they slew Sheshai, Ahiman, and Talmai.] These were the three sons of Anak, as we read there, Josh. xv. 14. where it is said that Caleb drove them out from thence: for he was the conductor of the children of Israel in this expedition, (as I observed upon ver. 3.) and had great reason to go up against this city, because this part of the country was given to him by a particular direction of God, (Josh. xiv. 13, 14. xv. 13.) But he did not conquer it till after the death of Joshua, as this place shews us.

Ver. 11. And from thence he went against the inhabitants of Debir, &c.] Another city which had been taken by Joshua in the beginning of the war; (Josh. x. 38, 39.) but, while he was gone to bring under other parts of the country, was reinhabited by the Canaanites, who were not expelled till after Joshua's death: when Caleb (to whom it was given, together with Hebron, for his portion, Josh. xv. 15.) drove them out again and possessed himself of it.

Ver. 12. And Caleb said.] Hence it still appears that the children of Judah fought under the conduct of Caleb as their general.

He that smiteth Kirjath-sepher, and taketh it, to him will I give Achsah my daughter to wife.] This, and the three following verses, 13—15. have been explained upon Josh. xv. 16, &c. where the portion of Judah being described, there is a particular mention of what was given to Caleb, and how he disposed of it. Which relation seems to have been taken out of this book, and inserted there by the authority of Ezra, for the fuller illustration of all that belonged to that tribe, whether by lot or peculiar donation before the division of the land. For any one may see that the description of Judah's lot is entirely coherent (as Huetius truly observes), if all between the twelfth and the twentieth verses were left out. And that all things here mentioned were not done till after the death of Joshua, is so evident, by the narration which is here made of all that fell out after that time, as to leave no doubt of it.

Ver. 16. And the children of the Kenite, Moses's father-in-law.] See Numb. x. 29. where Hobab, the son of Jethro, was invited by Moses to accompany him into the land of Canaan, and in all probability accepted the invitation, as I there observed.

Went up out of the city of palm-trees.] That is, Jericho, which was in a flat country. (See Deut. xxxiv. 3.) Here it seems they were pleased to settle themselves at their first coming into Canaan, where Moses promised, that whatsoever goodness God should shew to the Israelites, they should have their share in it: and there was no sweeter place in that country than this about Jericho, in the territory of which they dwelt, for the city itself was destroyed.

With the children of Judah.] Admiring the courage and success of this tribe, they seem to have contracted a particular friendship with them, and to have accompanied them in this expedition into the high country.

Into the wilderness of Judah, which lieth in the south of Arad.] In the southern part of the land of Canaan, where Arad was, (Numb. xxi. 1.) which, as Procopius Gazæus here observes, was a city of the Amorites, near to the wilderness of Kadesh, which is Paran: in his time it was a village four miles from Malaathon; but twenty from Hebron.

And dwelt among the people.] They removed from the city of palm-trees, which was in the tribe of Benjamin, and settled themselves among the people of Judah. Yet not all of them; for some went into the northern parts among the tribe of Naphtali, as appears from iv. 10, 11. What should be the reason of their forsaking so pleasant a place, as that where they were first settled, is but conjectured. Some think it was the love of solitariness and retirement; which they gather from Jer. xxxv. 6, &c. Or, as I said, out of their great affection to the children of Judah; under whose protection they hoped for greater safety than in other places.

Ver. 17. And Judah went with Simeon his brother.] Having finished, as far as they were able, the conquest of what belonged to the tribe of Judah, they went to assist the Simeonites, according to their mutual engagement, (ver. 3.)

And they slew the Canaanites that inhabited Zephath, and utterly destroyed it.] Some think this was the name both of a city and of a small region; but whereabouts it was situated is not known.

And the name of the city was called Hormah.] From the utter destruction beforementioned. Some think this was the same place with that mentioned Numb. xxi. 2, 3. But there he speaks of more cities that were laid waste; here but of one.

Ver. 18. And Judah took Gaza with the coast thereof, and Askelon with the coast thereof, and Ekron with the coast thereof.] These three cities were in the land of the Philistines, upon the sea-coast; which the Israelites did not hold long, before the Philistines recovered them again. For the Israelites contenting themselves with taking these cities, without destroying the people (as they did in other places, and ought to have done here), and only making them tributaries, it was not hard for them to regain their liberty.

Ver. 19. And the Lord was with Judah.] The Targum here uses the same language, which we find all along in the book of Joshua, when he speaks of God's presence with him: (see Josh. xiv. 12.) And the Word of the Lord helped the house of Judah.

And they drave out the inhabitants of the mountain.] God gave them such success wheresoever they went, that it ought to have encouraged them to go on with their enterprise; which they did not, as the following words tell us. This mountain, it is very likely, was Mons Casius, which was near to Gaza.

But could not drive out the inhabitants of the valley, because they had chariots of iron.] Here now the fountain of all the ensuing evils which befel the Israelites begins to be opened. In that, either through sloth, or covetousness, or distrust of God's power, or more lenity than the law of Moses allowed, they did not attempt those people that were stronger than ordinary; or, being unfaithful to God, failed in their attempt; or, having some success, only brought them under tribute. And it is most likely, they were so affrighted at the iron chariots (which were in use in the plain country, though not in the mountains), that they were quite disheartened; and did not remember what God had promised them (ver. 2. of this chapter), and how undauntedly Joshua set upon those that came thus dreadfully appointed, (Josh. xi. 4. 6.) Concerning these chariots, see Josh. xvii. 16. 18. where I have observed they are frequently mentioned in profane authors. And see Dilherrus, tom. i. Disput. Academ. p. 129.

Ver. 20. And they gave Hebron unto Caleb, as Moses said, and he expelled thence the three sons of Anak.] Thus ends the account of the wars of the tribe of Judah: which concludes with a repetition of what part in their country was given to Caleb; because he was their leader (as I have often said), and this was his reward, viz. the country about Hebron; the city itself belonging to the Levites.

Ver. 21. And the children of Benjamin did not drive out the Jebusites that inhabited Jerusalem.] This tribe, and that of Judah, had an interest in Jerusalem: but though both of them joined together, they could not drive the Jebusites out of the south part of it, where they had a strong fortress upon Mount Sion. (See Josh. xv. 63.) Nay, of that part of the city which belonged to Judah, they were not dispossessed till the forenamed expedition.

But the Jebusites dwell with the children of Benjamin to this day.] That is, they kept possession of that fortress, from which they were not able to drive them; but they dwelt there in the days when Samuel wrote this book, being not expelled till the reign of David. And they seem also to have dwelt with the Benjamites in that part of the city belonging to them; which though conquered, yet the inhabitants were not destroyed, but only brought under tribute. For this was very agreeable to the lazy and covetous humour which now began to prevail in Israel.

Ver. 22. And the house of Joseph.] viz. The tribe of Ephraim, (Josh. xvi. 1.)

They also went up against Beth-el.] They, following the example of Judah, Simeon, and Benjamin, endeavoured to enlarge their border by taking Beth-el.

And the Lord was with them.] As the success demonstrated. The Targum hath it, (as before, ver. 19.) The Word of the Lord was their helper.

Ver. 23. And the house of Joseph sent to descry Beth-el.] They proceeded very cautiously; sending spies (as we read in the next verse) to view the strength of the place, and to discover how it might be best approached.

Now the name of the city before was Luz.] See Gen. xxviii. 19. Josh. xvi. 2.

Ver. 24. And the spies saw a man come forth out of the city.] Whom they apprehended, as he passed by the place where they lay to make their observations, and get intelligence.

And they said unto him, Shew us, we pray thee, the entrance into the city.] Where it may be most easily entered. For they did not inquire the way to the gate, which was common and plain enough; but for the weakest part, where the walls were lowest, or most out of repair, or had the least guard. Or, they desired him, perhaps, to shew them some private way to get into it, which none knew but the inhabitants.

And we will shew thee mercy.] As they spake civilly and gently to him when they apprehended him, so they make him a promise of kind usage, when they got into the city, by sparing his life, and all belonging to him, as they did Rahab and her family: which, it is highly probable, he begged of them, being fallen into their hands; and it was not unlawful for them to grant, if he changed his religion, or left the country, as we find he afterward did.

Ver. 25. And when he shewed them the entrance into the city.] Notice, I suppose, was immediately sent to the army, which lay not far off.

They smote the city with the edge of the sword.] Came upon them on a sudden, and assaulted them where they least expected it; so that they found little resistance.

But they let go the man, and all his family.] Did them no harm; but gave them their liberty, as well as lives, to go whither they pleased.

Ver. 26. And the man went into the land of the Hittites.] A colony of this nation, I suppose, had planted themselves heretofore in some of the neighbouring countries, Syria, or Arabia, or some of those that fled upon Joshua's invading the land, settled themselves there. To whom this man thought good to go with his family, being, perhaps, of the same nation.

And built a city.] Which is an argument, that the children of Ephraim were so kind as to dismiss him and his family, with all their goods and estate.

And called the name of it Luz.] To preserve the memory of the place from whence he came. The founders of cities are mentioned with honour by all authors; and this seems to be so intended.

Which is the name thereof unto this day.] It kept this name to the time of the writing of this book, and long after. For it seems to be the same city mentioned by Josephus in Arabia (not far from Judea), which he calls Λούσσα, (lib. xiv. Antiq. cap. 2.) And Bochartus observes, that this place had its name originally from the great plenty of almonds growing there; from whence also it may be Lusitania had its name, (lib. i. Canaan, cap. 35.)

Ver. 27. Neither did Manasseh.] He speaks of that part of this tribe which was seated on this side Jordan.

Drive out the inhabitants of Beth-shean and her towns, &c.] Hitherto several of the Israelites had shewed some valour, and expelled some of the Canaanites. But now he begins to shew how cowardly others of them were; for these do not seem to have attempted any thing against the places here mentioned, or any where else. Beth-shean was a city not far from Jordan. See Josh. xvii. 11. where the rest of the cities here named in this verse are mentioned.

But the Canaanites would dwell in that land.] Not only in the cities, where they might have been straitened and kept under, but in the towns and villages, where they had the same liberties with the Israelites, and perhaps held some of the ground belonging to them. For so some think the word dwell signifies; that they enjoyed all the benefits that any others had. And this they demanded as their right; which the Hebrew word jaal imports; a settled resolution not to quit that land. (See Josh. xvii. 12.)

Ver. 28. And it came to pass, when the Israelites were strong, that they put the Canaanites to tribute, and did not utterly drive them out.] Herein they acted contrary to the law, whereby they were enjoined to destroy them, when they were able. And being strong enough to make them tributaries, they might, no doubt, have utterly expelled them out of the land. But they found more profit in making them pay tribute; and it cost them less pains to bring them into some subjection, than to destroy them. And this seems to be here noted, as the common fault of all the children of Israel, that, when they grew strong, they did not use their power to destroy or expel the Canaanites: but let them live quietly under them, upon payment of tribute.

Ver. 29. Neither did Ephraim drive out the Canaanites that dwelt in Gezer.] See Josh. xvi. 10. It is very probable, they did not so much as exact a tribute from them (which is not here mentioned), but made a covenant of friendship with them; which was still a higher crime. And this the next words seem to import.

But the Canaanites dwelt in Gezer among them.] Which is a form of speech not used in the foregoing exceptions. And to dwell among a people, signifies a quiet settlement, with the enjoyment of all their rights. As in 2 Kings iv. 13. when Elisha offered the Shunamite to do her any kindness at court, she expresses herself satisfied with her condition, in these words, I dwell among my own people.

Ver. 30. Neither did Zebulun drive out the inhabitants of Kitron, nor the inhabitants of Nahalol.] Which was the greater crime, because this last city was ἀφωρισμένη Λευίταις, one of those that were separated for the Levites, as Eusebius speaks. (See Josh. xxi. 35.) Yet they did more than the Ephraimites; for though they let them dwell among them, they made them pay tribute.

But the Canaanites dwelt among them, and became tributaries.] They troubled themselves no further than to make them pay a tribute to them; when they might, with a little more pains, have expelled them. This laziness, or covetousness, or whatsoever it was that made them act in this manner, brought them into a dangerous snare.

Ver. 31. Neither did Asher drive out the inhabitants of Accho.] A city near the Mediterranean Sea, called by Strabo and others Ace; and afterward Ptolemais, as Eusebius saith, who observes, that the Asherites did not drive out the Ἀλλοφύλους from hence. Procopius saith the same.

Nor the inhabitants of Sidon.] Which every one knows was another great city upon the same sea.

Nor of Ahlah, nor of Achzib.] We find no mention of the former of these elsewhere; but the latter is in Josh. xix. 29. and was called in aftertimes Ecdippa, as Eusebius relates.

Nor Helbath, nor Aphik, nor of Rehob.] The two latter of these we read of in Josh. xix. 28. 30. but nothing of the former, unless it be the same with Helkath, mentioned there, ver 25.

Ver. 32. But the Asherites dwelt among the Canaanites, the inhabitants of the land; for they did not drive them out.] They seem to have entered into a league of friendship with the Canaanites; so that they were mixed with them as if they had been the same nation, which was most strictly forbidden by the law of Moses: for they did not so much as make them tributaries; but the Asherites seem to have submitted to the basest condition of all the other tribes: for it is not said, as of the other tribes, that the people dwelt among the Asherites; but that the Asherites dwelt among them. As if the Canaanites remained still the lords of that country, and the Asherites were only permitted to live among them.

Ver. 33. Neither did Naphtali drive out the inhabitants of Beth-shemesh, nor the inhabitants of Beth-anath.] Both these cities are mentioned as in the lot of Naphtali, Josh. xix. 38.

But they dwelt among the Canaanites, the inhabitants of the land.] Imitating the Asherites, in letting the old inhabitants live promiscuously with them; or rather contenting themselves with the liberty to live quietly among the Canaanites.

Nevertheless, the inhabitants of Beth-shemesh and Beth-anath became tributaries to them.] In this they were more valiant than the Asherites, that they brought these two cities under contribution, and made them acknowledge them for their lords.

Ver. 34. And the Amorites forced the children of Dan into the mountain.] The condition of the Danites was the worst of all the tribes: for they could neither expel the old inhabitants of their country, nor make them tributaries, nor so much as possess it together with them; but the Amorites distressed them sorely, by penning them up in the cities that were in the mountainous parts of their country, not suffering them to dwell below in the plain.

For they would not suffer them to come down into the valley.] Being very strong, it is likely, in chariots of iron (which were of use, I observed, in the flat country, though they could do no service in the mountains), which the Danites so dreaded, that they durst not venture to encounter them.

Ver. 35. But the Amorites would dwell in Mount Heres, in Aijalon, and Shaalbim.] And, to add to their affliction, would not let them enjoy all the mountainous country, but possessed these three cities there: which constrained the Danites to seek for larger quarters in other parts; and seems to have been the occasion of that expedition mentioned Josh. xix. 47. where, ver. 41. we read of the two last-mentioned cities. (See my notes there.)

Yet the hand of the house of Joseph.] That is, the Ephraimites, who were next neighbours to the Danites, in one part of their country.

Prevailed.] Against the Amorites, as the LXX. expound it, Ἐβαρύνθη ἡ χεὶρ οἴκου Ἰωσὴφ ἐπὶ τὸν Ἀμορῥαῖον, The hand of the house of Joseph was heavy upon the Amorites; for they came to the assistance of their brethren, when they were grievously distressed.

So that they became tributaries.] They brought the Amorites so much under, that they made those three cities beforementioned pay tribute to the Danites, if not all the low countries which they inhabited; for he saith, in general, They became tributaries, speaking of all the Amorites thereabouts.

Ver. 36. And the coast of the Amorites was from the going up to Akrabbim, from the rock, and upward.] We find mention of the going up to Akrabbim in Josh. xv. 3. (See my notes there.) And the Vulgar by the rock (in Hebrew, selah) understands the city called Petra, which was upon the borders of Edom, and by Amaziah called Joktheel, in 2 Kings xiv. 7. Some take these words to signify the large extent of the country which the Amorites inhabited; but I take them rather to denote, that the children of Ephraim gave such a check to their insolence, that they were confined to this country, which reached from Akrabbim and Selah, to the mountains here mentioned. By this it appears, the Israelites let so many of the old inhabitants remain in Canaan, that they settled themselves among them; insomuch, that, in the days of Solomon, we read of a remnant of the Amorites, Hittites, Perizzites, Hivites, and Jebusites, (1 Kings ix. 20, 21.) and in far later ages, as I have often observed, the Gergesenes remained in the days of our Saviour, (Matt. viii. 28.) though it is likely they were all become proselytes so far as to worship the God of Israel, though not entirely of their religion.

CHAP. II.

Ver. 1. AND an angel of the Lord.] The Jews by an angel here understand a prophet, who was sent by God as his messenger; which the word angel imports: and they commonly take it to have been Phinehas, who was employed on this message. But I see no reason to depart from the natural signification of the word, when there is no absurdity in it, and it is not usual to speak in this metaphorical style: for there can no instance be given, that I remember, of a prophet called an angel of the Lord; which I take to signify more than an angel, which appeared from heaven on this occasion; that is, the angel of the covenant.

Came up from Gilgal.] Angels are not commonly said to come up, but to come down; which is one reason, I suppose, why this angel hath been taken for a prophet. But if we consider whence he was seen to come, and why from Gilgal, this phrase will appear to be most proper; of which I shall give an account presently.

To Bochim.] This was not the name of the place before, but was given it on this occasion, (ver. 5.) In all probability it was Shiloh; for there was no other place where all the people of Israel were wont to assemble, as they were now when this angel appeared to them, (ver. 4.)

And said, I made you to go out of Egypt.] These words evidently shew, this was not a created angel, but an uncreated; even that very person who appeared to Joshua hard by Jericho, Josh. v. 13, 14. which I have shewn there was God himself: for who but God could speak in this style, I made you to go out of Egypt? No prophet, nor any created angel, durst have been so bold; but would have prefaced to this speech in some such words as these, Thus saith the Lord, I have made you to go, &c. Supposing, then, this angel to be the same with him that then appeared, it was fit for him to appear now as coming from Gilgal, to put them in mind of that illustrious appearance of God near that place, and the assurance he then gave them of his presence with them in the conquest of the land, and the solemn covenant they made with him, by the renewing of circumcision in that place: which upbraided them with their base ingratitude to God, and their sloth in not endeavouring to expel the Canaanites.

And have brought you into the land which I sware to your fathers.] Of which he had given them possession.

And I said, I will never break my covenant with you.] If they proved not false to him, he assured them they should always find him present with them, to make good his promises to them. This Joshua told them they knew very well, that not one good thing had failed which he promised; and bade them be confident he would still continue the same faithful God. (See Josh. xxi. 45. xxiii. 14.)

Ver. 2. And ye shall make no league with the inhabitants of this land.] Or rather, But ye shall make no league, &c. For this was the condition of the covenant on their part, Deut. vii. 2. and long before that, Exod. xxiii. 32. xxxiv. 12. and again more lately, Josh. xxiii. 12.

Ye shall throw down their altars.] See Exod. xxxiv. 13. Deut. vii. 5. xii. 3.

But ye have not obeyed my voice; why have you done this?] That is, you can give no account of your disobedience to such plain, and express, and repeated commands.

Ver. 3. Wherefore I also said, I will not drive them out from before you.] God, therefore, resolved to make good the threatenings pronounced in his covenant; as hitherto he had performed his promise. (See Josh. xxiii. 13.)

But they shall be thorns in your sides.] To vex and gall them, as Joshua there told them.

And their gods shall be a snare unto you.] As Moses had foretold them, (Exod. xxiii. 33. xxxiv. 12.) For they were taken, by their conversation with idolaters, as beasts are in a toil, and drawn to the worship of their gods, which was their ruin.

Ver. 4. And it came to pass, when the angel of the Lord

spake all these words unto all the children of Israel.] By this it appears they were all met at some solemn festival, as they were bound to do three times every year (for otherwise it cannot be conceived what should occasion such an assembly of the whole congregation), and, consequently, the place where these words were spoken to them was Shiloh.

That the people lift up their voice, and wept.] They made doleful lamentations; some, it is likely, when they reflected on their sin; others, when they thought of their danger.

Ver. 5. And they called the name of that place Bochim.] Which signifies weepers. It is possible the place where the angel, or where they stood, was called by this name, in memory of this great goodness of God; which, for the present, mightily wrought upon their hearts, as appears by what follows.

And they sacrificed there unto the Lord.] This shews it was the place of public worship where they now were; and offered upon this occasion whole burnt-offerings unto God, by way of supplication and prayer to him, with thanksgiving for his goodness in calling them to repentance. Some think, indeed, that they offered expiatory sacrifices to make atonement for their sin: but they would not have been called simply sacrifices, which commonly are meant of whole burnt-offerings, or peace-offerings, by which they acknowledged him to be the Lord, and promised to serve no other god.

Ver. 6. And when Joshua had let the people go.] Or, Now when Joshua had broke up that last great assembly which he held before his death; (xxiv. 28.) so some expound it. But the next words seem to direct us rather to understand it of his dismission of them, after he had cast lots, and divided the land among them, (Josh. xix. 51. xxi. 43.)

The children of Israel went every man unto his inheritance to possess the land.] To take possession of that land which fell to their share, and settle themselves in it. And they went with a resolution, no doubt, to serve the Lord only; as, we cannot but think, he exhorted them before they parted: for the lots were cast in Shiloh before the Lord, as we are often told in the book of Joshua, xviii. 6. 8. 10. xix. 51. From whence they going to take possession of their lot, it is reasonable to think he did not dismiss them without his blessing, and with a solemn charge to observe the laws of God, such as he gave to the two tribes and half, (xxii. 5, &c.) And this is the reason why the author of this book repeats this out of the book of Joshua, to shew when their apostacy began, and how it came about: for though they went to their possessions well-disposed, yet their love of the world, and study of their own private advantages, so increased, that they made them forget the public good, and take little care of their religion.

Ver. 7. And the people served the Lord all the days of Joshua.] According to his exhortation, and their solemn promises, a little before he died, (Josh. xxiv. 14—16, &c.)

And all the days of the elders that out-lived Joshua.] Such as Eleazar, and the rest mentioned Josh. xix. 51. who were men of great authority, as well as piety; and often, no doubt, admonished them of their duty, and put them in mind of their promises made to Joshua in Shechem, where he made a covenant between God and them, and wrote it in the book of the law of God, (xxiv. 25, 26, &c.)

Who had seen all the great works of the Lord that he did for Israel.] Both among the Egyptians, and in the wilderness, and in Canaan; which Joshua had represented to them as a motive to fear the Lord, and serve him in sincerity, (Josh. xxiv. 5, 6, &c. 14, 15.) Of these things the elders, we may reasonably suppose, frequently reminded them, and thereby kept them steadfast in their religion. (See Josh. xxiv. 21.) For whatsoever bad inclinations they had in them, they were restrained, by the reverence they bare to these great men, from breaking loose from God while they lived.

Ver. 8. And Joshua the son of Nun, the servant of the Lord, died, &c.] After he had made that excellent speech to them beforementioned, and engaged them in a solemn covenant to be God's people. (See Josh. xxiv. 29.)

Ver. 9. And they buried him in the border of his inheritance in Timnath-heres, &c.] This is mentioned only to shew that they honoured him after his death, by attending his funeral, as they had done in his life. (See Josh. xxiv. 30.)

Ver. 10. And also all that generation were gathered unto their fathers.] I suppose he means, not only all those who had seen the works of God in Egypt and the wilderness, but those also who had seen Jordan dried up, the walls of Jericho fall down, and the sun stand still at Joshua's word, and their enemies smitten down with hailstones, &c. Which had made such impressions on their hearts, that they generally continued in the service of God while they lived; and kept others in obedience to him.

And there arose another generation after them, which knew not the Lord.] But the next generation did not regard the Lord, nor mind their religion; but only studied to settle themselves, on any terms, in their possessions, by making peace with the Canaanites, whom they should have driven out.

Nor yet the works which he had done for Israel.] Which they did not keep in mind, as they ought to have done; being wholly intent to their earthly concerns, in building houses, planting vineyards, and improving their lands. Unto which they were invited by the peace they enjoyed; by which men's minds are wont to be corrupted; as the Greeks and Romans were in future ages. According to those known words of the Roman satirist:

"Nunc patimur longæ pacis mala."——

Ver. 11. And the children of Israel did evil in the sight of the Lord.] By this forgetfulness of God and of his works, and by their familiarity with the people of Canaan, they soon learned to do as they did, and that openly and publicly, not fearing the dreadful sentence of God against such evil-doers, who were most odious to him, whatsoever excuses men make for them. So that phrase, in the sight of the Lord, may be interpreted.

And served Baalim.] The gods of the nations whose land they possessed, who were called by this general name, which signifies lords. For among the heathen, as St. Paul observes, there were gods many, and lords many. In Hebrew he would have said many Baalim, who were their deified great men, as Mr. Mede hath shewn, (p. 776. of his works.) For Baal (in Chaldee, Bel) the king of Babel next after Nimrod, was the first that was deified, and reputed a god after his death, from whence they called all other demons by the name of Baalim; as from the first Roman emperor who was called Cæsar, all that followed him were styled Cæsars. Baalim, therefore, being the general name of the gods of Syria, Palestine, and the neighbouring countries, there were as many Baals as there were nations: for example, Baal of the Sidonians, and Baal of the Amorites, of the Moabites, and Ammonites, and the rest of the people thereabouts, who had their Baalim. (See also Selden, de Diis Syris, Syntagm. ii. cap. 1.)

Ver. 12. And they forsook the Lord God of their fathers, which brought them out of the land of Egypt, and followed other gods of the people that were round about them.] By other gods may be meant the gods of the people of Canaan; which did not content them, but they worshipped also the gods of other neighbouring nations, none of which had bestowed any benefit upon them. This was a very high aggravation of their sin; that when all other nations made to themselves such gods as they thought had done them good, or could be helpful to them, they forsook the greatest Benefactor to their nation, who had made them a free people, and worshipped such gods as had done nothing for them, nor had been able to preserve those that worshipped them from destruction.

And bowed themselves unto them.] They did not only own them for gods, but publicly adored them.

And provoked the Lord to anger.] Who had told them he was a jealous God, and could not bear any rival, (Exod. xx. 1, 2.) It is not easy to give an account what moved them to forsake their God after such wonderful things as he had done for them, and their most solemn engagements to him. It is not unlikely that one reason was, the unusual rites prescribed in his Divine service, much different from all other nations; and several laws that made them unlike all the rest of the world, who hated them upon this account. This they could not bear, desiring to be conformable to other people and to gain their friendship. For Hosea saith, viii. 12. they looked upon the great things of the law as a strange thing.

Ver. 13. And they forsook the Lord, and served Baal and Ashtaroth.] Especially they worshipped the sun, and the moon, or Venus; which some understand by Astarte. In the next chapter it is said they worshipped Baalim and the groves, iii. 7. For in those groves several goddesses, under the name of Ashtaroth, were worshipped, as Mr. Selden conjectures in his Syntag. ii. de Diis Syris, cap. 2. where he shews there were many Astartes among the heathen, as there were Baals; and therefore the Scripture speaks of them in the plural number (as the LXX. here doth, ταῖς Ἀστάρταις), because of the multitude of images representing Juno, or Venus, or Diana, which had the name of Ashtaroth, signifying (as some think) as much as Beatas, blessed.

Ver. 14. And the anger of the Lord was hot against Israel.] Brake out in very dreadful effects upon them.

And he delivered them into the hands of the spoilers that spoiled them.] Carried away their cattle and their goods.

And he sold them into the hands of their enemies round about.] Who carried away their persons, as well as their goods, and made them slaves. For that seems to be the meaning of selling them, which is a phrase often used in this book, (iii. 8. iv. 2.) and in other places, (Deut. xxxii. 30. Psal. xliv. 12, &c.) This was a just punishment of God upon them, that, as they served the gods of the people round about them, (ver. 12.) so they should be slaves to all those nations round about them.

So that they could not any longer stand before their enemies.] Being so far from being able to make any further conquests, that they could not defend themselves.

Ver. 15. Whithersoever they went out, the hand of the Lord was against them for evil.] They had ill success in all their affairs, whether private or public business.

As the Lord had said, and as the Lord had sworn unto them.] See Deut. xxviii. xxx. 17, 18. xxxi. 16, 17. and many other places.

And they were greatly distressed.] As soon as they slackened their endeavours to drive out the Canaanites, and made leagues with them (as we read in the foregoing part of this chapter), God began to withdraw himself from them, and would not drive out their enemies from before them, (ver. 3.) But when by this means they were ensnared to worship their gods, (as he foresaw they would, ver. 4.) then he gave them up into the hands of those enemies, with whom they had made friendship, and suffered them to tyrannize over them, and use them cruelly.

Ver. 16. Nevertheless, the Lord raised up judges, &c.] Extraordinary rulers and governors, whose authority, I take to have been chiefly in time of war; they being raised up (by a particular inspiration and excitation from God), as it here follows, to deliver them out of the hands of those that spoiled them. So that commonly, when they had wrought deliverance for the people, and their army was dismissed, they became private men again; as appears by the story of Jephthah, who would not undertake to lead them against the Ammonites, unless he might be their governor when the war was done; (Judg. xi. 9.) and of Gideon, who refused to rule over them, when they offered the government to him, after the conquest of the Midianites, (viii. 22, 23.) Their business, therefore, principally was to preserve the people's liberties, to restore them, together with God's true religion, and to prescribe what was to be done in such cases; being a kind of dictators, whose power continued as long as there was occasion for it. Yet it must be acknowledged, that some of them had an established authority for their life over those whom they had rescued from slavery (not over the whole commonwealth of Israel, part of which was some time in peace, when another part was oppressed), and managed political matters, when they were too hard for the ordinary judges to divide them. (See Deut. xvii. 9.) Thus we read that Deborah, a prophetess, judged Israel, and that the people came to her for judgment, before she excited Barak to vindicate their liberties: but commonly they seem to have contented themselves with this, not minding judgment; as Samuel, the last of them, chiefly exercised his authority in matters of justice, 1 Sam. vii. 15, &c. where he is said in his house at Ramah to have judged Israel, and ended their controversies, and done right to every man: and when, by reason of age, he could do this no longer, he committed it to his sons. (See Corn. Bertram. de Repub. Judaica, cap. 9. p. 109, &c.)

Ver. 17. And yet they would not hearken to their judges.] Not constantly; but revolted again, (ver. 18, 19.)

But they went a whoring after other gods, and bowed themselves unto them.] Worshipped them publicly; which is commonly called going a whoring from God, who had espoused them to himself.

They turned quickly out of the way.] As soon as the judge was dead, who had wrought deliverance for them.

Which their fathers walked in, obeying the commandments of the Lord.] In the days of Joshua, and the elders which survived him, (ver. 7.)

But they did not so.] Whom the next generation would not imitate.

Ver. 18. And when the Lord raised them up judges.] This is the constant phrase wherein he speaks of these great men, whose spirit was stirred up by an extraordinary motion from God, to undertake things beyond the reach of human wisdom or power.

Then the Lord was with the judge.] Endued him with heroical courage, and gave him wonderful success. Here the Targum continues the same language, The Word of the Lord was the helper of the judge. (See chap. i. 19. 22.)

And delivered them out of the hand of their enemies all the days of the judge.] As long as he ruled over them, and kept them in obedience to him. This signifies, that if they did not exercise their authority, yet the effects of it remained all the days of their life.

For it repented the Lord because of their groanings, by reason of them that oppressed and vexed them.] He altered the course of his providence, when they not only sighed and groaned under their oppressions, but cried unto him for help, and promised amendment, as we find they did, iii. 9. 15. vi. 7, 8, &c.

Ver. 19. And it came to pass, when the judge was dead, they returned.] To their former idolatry.

And corrupted themselves more than their fathers.] Who lived in the former judge's time, and had sorely smarted for this sin, till God, upon their repentance, sent them deliverance.

In following other gods, to serve them, and bow down to them.] They either multiplied more strange gods, or devised still new rites of worship contrary to God's law. The common service they paid to every one of them was building temples to their honour, setting up altars, planting groves, burning incense, and sacrificing beasts.

They ceased not from their evil doings.] In the Hebrew, Would not let fall their own inventions; but retained them, notwithstanding all that God had done to bring them off from their idolatry.

Nor from their stubborn way.] But obstinately persisted in their evil courses, as if nothing had been done to reclaim them.

Ver. 20. And the anger of the Lord was hot against Israel.] This highly incensed the Divine displeasure, and provoked him to punish them more grievously.

And he said, Because the people hath transgressed my covenant which I commanded their fathers, &c.] By making leagues with the Canaanites, and not throwing down their altars, &c. Arius Montanus very well observes, that this verse expresses what great reason there was for God's being exceeding angry with them. First, because they had forsaken him, to whom they owed their being a nation. Secondly, because they had violated that covenant, which was not a new or obscure thing, but made long ago with their fathers, who, it was very well known, had reaped the benefit thereof. And, thirdly, because (as this verse concludes) they had not hearkened unto God's voice; i. e. though he had often admonished them, by his prophets, of their duty, and chidden and threatened them; yet they would not mind what he said, but in a most rebellious manner gave themselves up to the impieties of other nations.

Ver. 21. I also will not henceforth drive out any from before them.] That is, not presently, or so soon as he intended, if they had pleased him. (See ver. 23.)

Of the nations which Joshua left when he died.] For God never intended they should be all rooted out at once, as hath been often noted from Exod. xxiii. 29, 30. yet their expulsion had been more speedy, if they had obeyed him, than now he resolved it should be. Nor could it well be otherwise; for, by being delivered into their enemies' hands, to spoil and to enslave them, their increase was thereby hindered; so that they were not able to people all the land so soon as they might have done if they had been obedient: for then God promised to multiply them exceedingly, (Deut. vii. 13, 14, &c.)

Ver. 22. That by them I may prove Israel, whether they will keep the way of the Lord to walk therein, as their fathers did keep it, or not.] That it might appear, whether they would continue firm, as their fathers resolved, in the service of God, (Josh. xxiv. 16. 24.) or revolt from him to serve other gods.

Ver. 23. Therefore the Lord left these nations, without driving them out hastily; neither delivered he them into the hand of Joshua.] This was one reason they were not all cast out at once, by the victorious hand of Joshua; for if none of them had been left remaining, there would have been no temptation to worship their gods; which would have been all abolished with them. Another reason is given of this, in the place beforementioned, Exod. xxiii. 29, 30. and Deut. vii. 22.

CHAP. III.

Ver. 1. NOW these are the nations which the Lord left, to prove Israel by them.] Having said in general, that God thought fit not to drive out all the Canaanites, that he might try the care and fidelity of his people in his service, (ii. 22.) he now names the particular nations that remained unsubdued.

Even as many of Israel as had not known all the wars of Canaan.] Such as were born since the war was ended; and had seen none of the wonderful works of God in the conquest of the land; God intended to prove them, whether they would worship him, when they saw what they must expect if they did not; viz. that he would let the Canaanites, their mortal enemies, loose upon them.

Ver. 2. Only that the generations of the children of Israel might know to teach them war.] There was another reason why they were left remaining, as was observed before in the last verse of the foregoing chapter: but this had been sufficient, if there had been no other; that the Israelites might not grow sluggish for want of some to awaken and exercise their courage, and to keep up martial discipline among them; and that they might, by having powerful enemies so near them, betake themselves to God constantly, and depend upon his help and succour, by whose power their fathers had brought them under.

At the least such as before knew nothing thereof.] If this was not needful for all, it was at least for such as had never handled arms; that they might be trained up to be ready upon occasion to fight with their enemies. For they being wholly bred to husbandry, and feeding of cattle, would have had no military discipline among them, if they had not had the Canaanites so near to them.

Or this may be the meaning of this verse, They shall know what it is to be left to themselves: for their fathers fought by a Divine power, but now they shall learn what it is to fight like other men, without God to go along with them.

Ver. 3. Namely, the five lords of the Philistines.] See upon Josh. xiii. 2, 3. and Judg. i. 18. where it appears, that three of them had been, in some measure, conquered; but it seems had recovered their country again, by the sloth of the Israelites.

And all the Canaanites.] These were a particular people of that country (as hath been often said), near to the midland sea, many of which still remained scattered up and down the land.

And the Sidonians.] Who lived in the territory belonging to the famous city of Sidon; who was one of the sons of Canaan, (Gen. x. 15.)

And the Hivites that dwelt in Mount Lebanon.] A famous mountain in the north part of Canaan.

From Baal-Hermon unto the entering in of Hamath.] See in Josh. xi. 3. xiii. 5.

Ver. 4. And they were to prove Israel by them, to know whether they would hearken to the commandments of the Lord, &c.] That their virtue might appear, if they did not imitate these people; or their baseness, if they did.

Ver. 5. And the children of Israel dwelt among the Canaanites, Hittites, and Amorites, and Perizzites, and Hivites, and Jebusites.] The Israelites soon discovered their bad disposition, in suffering all sorts of the wicked people of this land to remain and dwell with them; as if they were still the possessors of this country, and the children of Israel but intruders among them.

Ver. 6. And they took their daughters to be their wives, and gave their daughters to their sons.] Which was not only directly contrary to the law of God, (Deut. vii. 3.) but a higher breach of their covenant with him, than the mere making leagues with them.

And served their gods.] As Moses, in the same place, foretold they would, (Deut. vii. 4.) if they contracted such marriages with them.

Ver. 7. And the children of Israel did evil in the sight of the Lord, and forgat the Lord their God.] They grew in time so very wicked, that they not only worshipped other gods, together with the Lord; but quite forgot him, and worshipped them alone.

And served Baalim and the groves.] Some here take groves, literally, for the trees themselves that composed those shady places, which were anciently consecrated to heroes; being, some time, the place of their sepulchre; where their manes were supposed to haunt. For Baalim were the same with heroes; and trees were accounted sacred things, by the ancient heathen, who consecrated them to this or that deity, and trimmed them up with ribands, and adorned them with lights, and made vows to them, and hung the spoils of their enemies upon them. Insomuch, that travellers were wont to stop when they were to pass by them, as if they had been the habitation of some god. But Mr. Selden thinks, that by groves are to be here understood the images of their gods in the groves; as it is certain they must signify in some places. (See upon chap. vi. 25.) And he probably conjectures, that there were several goddesses, under the name of Ashtaroth, worshipped in them. (See the place mentioned above, in his De Diis Syris, Syntag. ii. cap. 2.)

And it is evident, that these deities, whatsoever they were, were different from Baalim; for the prophets of Baal, and the prophets of the groves, were distinct persons, in 1 Kings xviii. 19.

Ver. 8. Therefore the anger of the Lord was hot against Israel.] This expression we had twice before. (See chap. ii. 14. 20.)

And he sold them.] See in the same place.

Into the hand of Chushan-rishathaim king of Mesopotamia.] Of that country which lay between the two great rivers of Euphrates and Tigris. So the first enemy that oppressed them were the Syrians; who, either out of hatred, or desire to enlarge their dominions, came over Euphrates and invaded them.

And the children of Israel served Chushan-rishathaim eight years.] He forced them to buy their peace upon hard terms, and brought them under tribute to him; but did not impose garrisons upon them; so that they more easily recovered their liberty, when one appeared to head them. When these eight years began (that is, how long after the death of Joshua), is variously disputed; but it is certain it was in the next age (which in Scripture signifies about three-and-thirty years) after Joshua and the elders that survived him (during whose time they served God and lived in freedom). For Caleb's younger brother, as it here follows, was the first judge whom God raised up to them.

Ver. 9. And when the children of Israel cried unto the Lord.] Returned to him, and acknowledged him to be their only God, of whom they earnestly begged pardon, and implored help with fervent prayer; beseeching him to deliver them from this cruel servitude; as he did Jacob their forefather, from the bondage of Laban the Syrian.

He raised a deliverer to the children of Israel, who delivered them.] All the judges are called by the name of saviours, or deliverers, in Nehemiah ix. 27. because they rescued them from the oppression of their enemies, when they could not help themselves.

Even Othniel the son of Kenaz, Caleb's younger brother.] So he is called, i. 13. concerning which, see Josh. xv. 17.

Ver. 10. And the Spirit of the Lord came upon him.] He had an extraordinary motion from God to take upon him the government of the people; which none durst presume to do, but such as were appointed by God, who was their king. Josephus thinks that God appeared to them, or some way revealed his will to them, in these matters; so that they were sure they acted by his authority. The Chaldee paraphrast seems to favour the latter opinion, who calls this spirit, the Spirit of prophecy. Certain it is, that they had not only an inward incitement to undertake the deliverance of God's people, but were endowed with extraordinary courage and conduct; and it is likely with a singular gift of Divine eloquence, to persuade the people to forsake their idolatry, and vindicate their liberty.

And he judged Israel, and went out to war.] This was the first part of the office of a judge, to plead their cause, and avenge them of their oppressors; as this phrase of judging is used, Deut. xxxii. 35, 36. and other places. Though here being set before going to war, it may be thought that he first rectified what was amiss among them, and especially reduced them to the worship of the Lord alone; and then went to fight against their enemies.

And the Lord delivered Chushan-rishathaim king of Mesopotamia into his hand.] They overthrew and entirely routed all his forces, and, as the words seem to import, took or slew the king himself.

And his hand prevailed against Chushan-rishathaim.] So that he could not recover his strength to oppress them any more.

Ver. 11. And the land had rest forty years.] It doth not suit with my design to enter into chronological disputes; and therefore I remit the learned reader to the Canon Chronicus of Sir J. Marsham, lib. ii. where he supposes the idolatrous generation to have risen in the thirty-fourth year after the death of Joshua; who lost their liberty, and fell under the oppression of Chushan, for the space of eight years, and after their deliverance from it, lived happily forty years. Which will appear in the sequel to be more reasonable, than to interpret these words as if they signified, The land rested in the fortieth year after Joshua first settled them in peace and quiet. So our great primate of Ireland: (vide A. M. 2599.)

And Othniel the son of Kenaz died.] It is not certain in what part of these forty years of rest he died; nor is it material whether in the beginning, middle, or end of it.

Ver. 12. And the children of Israel did evil again in the sight of the Lord.] Fell into the sin of idolatry after Othniel was dead.

And the Lord strengthened Eglon the king of Moab against them, because they had done evil in the sight of the Lord.] As he raised up deliverers to Israel when they were penitent; so he stirred up enemies to them, and gave them power also to oppress them, when they revolted from him. And the next enemy to the Syrians were the Moabites; for since they worshipped the gods of the people round about them, (chap. ii. 12.) it was fit they should be punished by those very people.

Ver. 13. And he gathered unto him the children of Ammon and Amalek.] Persuaded these two nations, who were his near neighbours (Moab lying between them), to associate themselves with him in this war. Unto which they were easily inclined; especially Amalek, who had an old grudge to the Israelites.

And went and smote Israel.] Either by a sudden invasion, or in a pitched battle.

And possessed themselves of the city of palm-trees.] That is, Jericho, as appears from Deut. xxxiv. 3. Judg. i. 16. Which, though it was destroyed by Joshua, yet the place where it stood remaining, it is likely they made fortifications, and placed a strong garrison there, that they might the better keep the whole country in subjection. For, as the country thereabouts was very fertile (of which they deprived the Israelites, and sent the riches of it to their own country, which was not far off), so they hindered all communications between those on this side Jordan, and those on the other side, but what they pleased to allow; and maintained a correspondence with their own people, from whom they could receive more forces, if there were need, by having the command of the passages over Jordan. By which means also they thought to secure their retreat, if there should be occasion, to their own country.

Ver. 14. So the children of Israel served Eglon the king of Moab eighteen years.] He ruled all this time as an absolute master over them, and imposed what burdens he pleased upon them; of which, it is likely, the Ammonites and Amalekites had a share, as a reward of their help and assistance.

Ver. 15. But when the children of Israel cried unto the Lord.] Humbled themselves before him, acknowledged their offence, begged his pardon, and beseeched his help; as before, ver. 9.

The Lord raised them up a deliverer.] As he had done before. (See ver. 9.)

Ehud the son of Gera, a Benjamite.] Which tribe was the most immediately oppressed (the country of Jericho being in it), and therefore one of them was very proper to be their deliverer.

A man left-handed.] The Hebrew words itter jad jemini are very obscure, being used no where else but here, and xx. 16. In both places the LXX. translate them ἀμφοτεροδέξιος, whom the Vulgar follows, "qui utraque manu pro dextra utebatur," who could use both hands, as we do our right. This the Hebrew phrase will bear, which literally signifies, as we translate it in the margin, shut of his right hand; i. e. who did nothing with it, but used his left, though he could use both alike: or, as Josephus will have it, τῶν χειρῶν τὴν ἀριστερὰν ἀμείνων, who of the two could use his left hand best.

And by him the children of Israel sent a present unto Eglon king of Moab.] Some understand by this the tribute that was laid upon them; but it rather signifies a voluntary present, above their ordinary payments; whereby they hoped to mollify him, and make him favourable to his loving subjects: for mincha is used for such offerings as were presented to God to obtain his favours.

Ver. 16. But Ehud made him a dagger.] Privately prepared this weapon, intending to make use of this opportunity for their deliverance.

Which had two edges, of a cubit length.] Therefore Josephus calls it ξιφίδιον, a little sword; which was long enough to do execution, but so short as to be easily concealed.

And he did gird it under his raiment.] Which the LXX. and the Vulgar take to have been a military garment; but the Hebrew word mad signifies any sort of raiment.

Upon his right thigh.] To avoid all suspicion (for men use to wear their swords on their left side), and that he might more readily draw it out, and use it with his left hand, when he should find occasion.

Ver. 17. And he brought the present to Eglon king of Moab.] Was admitted into his presence, and delivered the present with his right hand, as men usually do; which he could use, I suppose, as well as his left, though not, perhaps, with so much strength.

And Eglon was a very fat man.] Which made him unwieldy, and less able and ready to rise up, and avoid or defend himself from a sudden stroke. The LXX. translate it ἀνὴρ ἀστεῖος σφόδρα, an exceeding civil or courteous man; which made it the more easy for Ehud to give the blow, when he embraced him, perhaps, or stooped, when he rose out of his seat to receive his message, in an obliging manner.

Ver. 18. And when he had made an end to offer the present.] Which was done (as appears by this) with such ceremony as was in use in those days.

He sent away the people that bare the present.] It was brought by some of his retinue (consisting, it is likely, of several things), who being all withdrawn, and gone some part of their way homeward with him, he bade them go forward, and leave him to dispatch some private business which he pretended: for such designs, as he had in his mind, seldom succeed where many are engaged in them.

Ver. 19. And he himself turned again.] As if he had forgotten something, or had met with some new instructions by the way.

From the quarries that were by Gilgal.] Some understand by the word we translate quarries, a place where they digged or hewed stones; others, the twelve stones which Joshua placed in Gilgal. But the LXX. and the Vulgar take it for graven images; for so, indeed, the word pesil commonly signifies in Scripture, and so we translate it in the margin of our Bible: which when Ehud beheld, his spirit was mightily stirred within him (as Conradus Pellicanus explains this passage), and he proceeded no further in his return home, but went back, with a resolution to revenge this affront to God, as well as the oppression of his people. For it is to be supposed, the Moabites had set up these graven images in this place, rather than any other; which had been famous for the presence of God for a long time in it.

And said, I have a secret errand unto thee, O king.] Being admitted again into the king's presence, he desired a private audience of him.

Who said, Keep silence.] He bade Ehud say no more till all his attendants were withdrawn, whom he would not have to hear the message.

And all that stood by him went out from him.] It may seem strange, that a prince should trust himself alone with one of that nation, who he knew groaned under his yoke; but his mind was blinded by the present, and by the compliments wherewith it was delivered; and God deprived him, at this time, of his wonted prudence. For, as Solomon observes, "There is no wisdom, nor understanding, nor counsel against the Lord:" who intended he should be destroyed, (Prov. xxi. 30.)

Ver. 20. And Ehud came unto him.] Approached nearer to his person.

And he was sitting in a summer parlour.] In a cool room (as the Hebrew word imports), where he was defended from the heat of the sun, and enjoyed the fresh air.

Which he had made for himself alone.] Where he was wont to retire from all company, when he had a mind to sleep, perhaps in the heat of the day, or to dispatch business with which he entrusted nobody.

And Ehud said, I have a message from God unto thee.] Which in some sense was true, but not in that wherein the king understood it; who thought he had met with some Divine apparition in the way, or been at some oracle; for he doth not say he had a message from Jehovah the God of Israel (whom he would have despised, perhaps, as Pharaoh did), but from Elohim, which was a common name to all gods, (xxiv. 2. 15.)

And he rose out of his seat.] Out of reverence as to God, whose words, he supposed, he was to hear. A remarkable instance of the ancient veneration men paid to whatsoever carried the name and authority of God in it, and reproaches those who now behave themselves irreverently, even in his worship and service. (See Numb. xxiii. 18. 2 Kings xxiii. 3.)

Ver. 21. And Ehud put forth his left hand, and took the dagger from his right thigh.] If the king had his eye upon his hands, it was upon the right, and not the left, so that he might more unobservedly employ it as he designed.

And thrust it into his belly.] So that it pierced his heart (as Josephus understands it), or some other vital part; upon which he immediately died, without speaking a word, or making a noise to alarm his servants who were without. Nothing can justify this fact but an order from the Lord, which he not only pretended, but really had. (See ver. 26.)

Ver. 22. And the haft also went in after the blade.] The thrust he made was so violent, that not only the blade of the dagger, but the handle also, went into his bowels.

And the fat closed up the blade.] And the haft, so that they could not be seen.

So that he could not draw the dagger out of his belly.] But left it there, because he could take no hold of it.

And the dirt came out.] All agree that the word parschedona, which is no where found but here, signifies the dung or excrements; which came not out at the wound (for that was closed), but at the usual place; it being common for bodies to purge after they are dead, especially such corpulent ones as his was, in whose bowels, no doubt, there were violent convulsions made by this sudden stroke.

Ver. 23. And Ehud went forth through the porch.] It is very uncertain what the Hebrew word misredona signifies, which we translate porch. Some take it for the guard-chamber (as the LXX. seem to understand it), or a place where the king's servants sat; through which he passed boldly, that he might give no suspicion of any mischief he had done: or, as Kimchi explains it, the place where the people sat, who waited for audience.

And shut the doors of the parlour upon him, and locked them.] As he came out of the parlour, he not only shut the doors after him, and locked them; but, it is likely, took the key away with him. There seem to have been double doors, an inward and an outward, as is usual.

Ver. 24. And when he was gone out, his servants came.] Seeing Ehud was gone from the king, his attendants came into the antechamber (as we speak), to be ready at the king's call, to wait his pleasure.

And when they saw, that, behold, the doors of the parlour were locked, they said, Surely he covereth his feet in the summer parlour.] They concluded he was easing nature, as this phrase is commonly understood here, and in 1 Sam. xxiv. 3. for when they were about that business, the long garments which they wore in those countries were so disposed as to cover their feet. (See Gataker in his Cinnus, lib. ii. cap. 3.) But it may be understood, I think, of laying himself down to sleep, which they were wont to do in those countries in the heat of the day; (2 Sam. iv. 5.) and then, lying down in their clothes, it was necessary to cover their feet for decency's sake, to keep their garments from slipping up, and exposing those parts which should not be seen. And this suits better with the story than the other; for they thought fit to wait a great while before they entered the chamber, that they might not disturb his rest; whereas the other business being soon dispatched, would not have occasioned their waiting so long. (See the Arabic and Syriac version, both here and upon 1 Sam. xxiv. 3.)

Ver. 25. And they tarried.] Waiting in the antechamber.

Till they were ashamed.] Till they were in a great confusion, not knowing what to think should be the cause that he slept longer than ordinary.

And, behold, he opened not the door of the parlour.] At which it is likely, after tedious expectation, they knocked, and had no answer.

Therefore they took a key and opened them.] For in kings' courts, there were more than one who had keys to the same room.

And, behold, their lord was fallen down dead on the earth.] Perhaps they did not at first perceive that he was killed; which might something retard their pursuit of Ehud.

Ver. 26. And Ehud escaped while they tarried.] Their long expectance of the king's awaking out of sleep, gave him the advantage of making his escape.

And passed beyond the quarries.] From whence he returned to do this exploit, (ver. 19.) which had been murder, if he had not had a Divine warrant for what he did: unto which none can pretend now, without blaspheming God as the author of sin; but then was evident, by the wonderful gifts of wisdom, and courage, and might, wherewith such men were divinely inspired. (See Grotius, de Jure Belli et Pacis, lib. i. cap. 4. sect. 19. n. 4.)

And escaped unto Seirath.] Gilgal was so near to the garrison which the Moabites had in those territories, that he did not think himself safe till he was got out of the tribe of Benjamin into the mountainous country of Ephraim, where this town was, upon the confines of the tribe of Benjamin.

Ver. 27. And it came to pass, when he was come.] To Seirath.

That he blew a trumpet in the mountain of Ephraim.] To summon those who were disposed to recover their liberties, to take arms and follow him.

And the children of Israel went down with him from the mount.] A considerable body of men, no doubt, presently met together (being before prepared, it is likely, by his emissaries), and marched after him into the country of Benjamin, where the Moabites were settled.

And he before them.] He led them on as their captain; and had many more, in all probability, joined him as he marched further into the country.

Ver. 28. And he said unto them, Follow after me.] Be not afraid to venture your lives, as I will do, for the liberty of your country.

For the Lord hath delivered your enemies the Moabites into your hand.] He was assured that God, who had succeeded his enterprise, and deprived the Moabites of their supreme head (whereby, no doubt, they were in great confusion), would accomplish what he had begun, and give them a perfect deliverance: with this belief he endeavoured to possess their souls, as if the thing was already done, which he knew would inspire them with such courage as could not be withstood.

And they went down after him, and took the fords of Jordan.] He proceeded prudently, as well as courageously; and therefore led them directly to the fords of Jordan, of which they possessed themselves; that the Moabites who had settled themselves in that part of Judea, (ver. 13.) might not be able to save themselves by retreating into their own country, nor they in Moab be able to come to their assistance.

And suffered not a man to pass over.] To carry or bring any intelligence.

Ver. 29. And they slew of the Moabites at that time about ten thousand men.] Who had taken possession of the city of palm-trees, (ver. 13.) and posted themselves thereabouts, to keep the Israelites in subjection.

All lusty men.] In the Hebrew it is, all fat men; that is (as some understand it), men of estates, or very wealthy persons: men of quality, or of the better sort (as others expound it), who chose to transplant themselves hither, because of the richness and deliciousness of this country; but it may be interpreted strong men, as our translation imports, who were culled out from among the Moabites, to keep the Israelites in greater awe.

And all men of valour.] Who had given proof of their undaunted spirit in war.

And there escaped not a man.] But they were all cut off, either by those that guarded the fords, and intercepted their passage into their own country, or by the other part of the army of Israel who fell upon them, and drove them thither.

Ver. 30. So Moab was subdued that day under the hand of Israel.] This doth not signify that they brought the country of Moab under their subjection, as the Moabites had brought theirs, but that they freed themselves from the yoke they had laid upon them, and served them no longer. (See ver. 14.)

And the land had rest fourscore years.] Which the same great man, mentioned in the foregoing chapter, thus interprets: ad A. M. 2679. "Et quievit terra anno octuagesimo, post quietem priorem ab Othniele restitutam." And the land had rest in the eightieth year, after the former restored to it by Othniel: but there is another way which some learned writers among the Jews suggest, of bringing the years of servitude and of peace, mentioned in this book, into such a compass, as may agree with what is said in 1 Kings vi. 2. concerning the number of years that passed from the deliverance out of Egypt to the building of Solomon's temple: for they suppose that there was scarce any of the judges who ruled over the whole country of Israel, but some in one part, and some in another; so that at the same time there were several judges in several parts of the land; and peace in one part, when there was war in another. Accordingly our learned chronologer Sir J. Marsham (who follows this opinion) understands here by the land which had rest fourscore years, not the whole land of Israel, but the eastern part of it, which had shaken off the yoke of Moab; but in the meantime the Philistines invaded the western parts, as it here follows, and were repulsed by Shamgar, while the eastern countries enjoyed perfect peace. This I take to be the clearest account of these words, the land had rest fourscore years; that is, the eastern part of the country, which had shaken off the yoke of Moab, not the whole land of Israel: for, as the Philistines invaded the western parts, so Jabin afflicted the northern (as it follows in the next chapter), while the oriental tribes remained in peace.

Ver. 31. And after him was Shamgar the son of Anath.] It is not said of what tribe he was, and it is in vain to inquire about it; but it is probable he was one of those tribes that bordered upon the Philistines, because what he did was against them, and those were Judah, Dan, and Ephraim: nor is there the least signification how long he judged them; but he succeeding Ehud, his government was in some part of the fourscore years beforementioned: and, perhaps, it was not long before that time wherein Jabin oppressed Israel in the northern parts, as may be probably gathered from ver. 6.

Which slew of the Philistines six hundred men.] Now some of the people of Canaan made an attempt upon the Israelites, in the western parts, to bring them under their power. And these words sound as if Shamgar alone made opposition to them, and slew the number mentioned; being excited by the mighty power of God, which gave him unwonted courage and strength; for he was raised up, as the two foregoing great men had been, by a Divine inspiration, to be their judge, as appears by the last words of this verse.

With an ox-goad.] The Vulgar takes the Hebrew word malmud for a plough-share, and the LXX. favour this interpretation: but if we may judge by the derivation of the word, our translation is more probable; wherein we follow Kimchi and other learned Jews, who take it for the instrument whereby oxen are provoked (and, as it were, put in mind of their duty) when they draw the plough lazily. And thus Lycurgus is said to have overthrown the forces of Bacchus, without any other arms but βουπλῆγι, an ox-goad. So Homer describes the Bacchæ as put to flight ἀνδροφόνοιο Λυκούργου βουπλῆγι. (See Bochartus, lib. i. Canaan, cap. 18.)

And he also delivered Israel.] From hence it appears that he was a judge as well as the two former, though some both ancient and modern have questioned it; for this is the very phrase whereby they are described, ii. 9. 15. And the first words of this verse signify as much; which say, that after him (i. e. Ehud) was Shamgar, who succeeded him; that is, in the office of a judge, as the words naturally signify: and the great slaughter he made of the Philistines argues the same; for it manifestly was an heroical act, like that of Samson, who slew a thousand with the jaw-bone of an ass: neither of which could have been performed but by a Divine power wherewith they were possessed. It is not said here, indeed, how long he continued to judge them, nor from what oppressions he delivered them; but he is a deliverer who preserves a nation from being oppressed, as well as he who rescues them from oppression when they groan under it: and that it is likely was the case of Shamgar, who, when the Philistines came to invade his country, gave them a repulse with the loss of six hundred of their men; which, it is probable, discouraged them from further attempts. And this being done without any weapon but an ox-goad, it is likely he was at plough when the Philistines made this inroad to plunder and spoil the country; feeling a strong impulse upon him to oppose them, though he had no other arms, nor any to assist him, but such of his servants as were, perhaps, at plough with him. Thus some great men among the ancient Romans were called from the plough to be their dictators. But I will only add a strange passage out of the Midrash upon Lev. xvii. 3. who, mentioning these words, and he also delivered Israel, saith, "Thus he saved them by the hand of other judges, who being but flesh and blood, yet fell into slavery again; but in the age to come (i. e. of the Messiah) I in my own substance will redeem you, and ye shall not be reduced into servitude any more. According to what Isaiah saith, xlv. 17. But Israel shall be saved by the Lord with an everlasting salvation," &c. (See Raymund in his Pugio Fidei, p. 510.)

CHAP. IV.

Ver. 1. AND the children of Israel again did evil in the sight of the Lord.] See iii. 12.

After the death of Ehud.] And of Shamgar. Concerning whom there is no further mention made, because he did nothing more than this one memorable act; religion being reformed by Ehud, who left it so at the time of his death; when, it is likely, the Philistines, seeing their chieftain gone, made the forenamed inroad upon the Israelites; but they being not yet openly fallen into idolatry, God was pleased to raise up Shamgar to give them a repulse, before they could possess themselves of any part of the country, as the Moabites had done. After which blow, given them by this single champion, it was a long time before we read of any disturbance they gave them; though Shamgar, it is probable, lived but a short time after this noble achievement. And then, when Ehud and he had been some time dead, the Israelites forgot the wonderful works of God, and returned to their old sin: for so the words in the Hebrew are to be understood, which run thus, and Ehud was dead: for that particle ve, which we translate and, oft-times signifies because; and here makes these words the reason of their relapse, because Ehud was dead, who had been the great instrument of bringing them back to God, and keeping them, while he lived, in his service.

Ver. 2. And the Lord sold them.] Delivered them up to be made slaves. (See iii. 8.)

Into the hands of Jabin king of Canaan.] Of that part of the country where the people, properly called Canaanites, now dwelt under his government.

Who reigned in Hazor.] In the region belonging unto Hazor; for the city itself was burnt by Joshua, (Josh. xi. 10.) and the king of it also slain, as we read there, xii. 9. whose name also was Jabin, (Josh. xi. 1.) of whose posterity it is probable this Jabin was; whose name was common to all the kings of that country, as Pharaoh was to the kings of Egypt. It is possible, indeed, that Hazor might be rebuilt, as some other cities were, and possessed by the ancient inhabitants; but there is no need to suppose that; for he might reign in Hazor, just as the Moabites possessed Jericho; that is, the region appertaining to it. And according to the opinion I mentioned in the foregoing chapter, ver. 30. Jabin is supposed to have invaded and brought under only the northern tribes; those in the east remaining at the same time in peace, after the expulsion of the Moabites; twenty years after which (Sir John Marsham makes account) Jabin's dominion over the northern tribes began. The text, indeed, makes no such distinction, the children of Israel in general being represented as sold under Jabin for their sins; yet it is said, ver. 10. that Barak gathered his army out of the tribes of Zebulun and Naphtali, which are the tribes supposed to be alone oppressed by Jabin. Other tribes, indeed, joined with them, and they that did not, are very much blamed for it by Deborah in her song, even the Reubenites, and they beyond Jordan, (v. 14—16.) for it might very well be expected, that they who lived in peace and ease should be ready to assist their brethren who were heavily oppressed.

The captain of whose host was Sisera, who dwelt in Harosheth of the gentiles.] If we suppose that Hazor lay in its ruins, then Harosheth was the royal city, wherein Jabin dwelt, as well as Sisera. Which is called Harosheth of the gentiles, because people of several nations fled hither to be under his protection, when they heard that he had possessed himself of that country, and kept the Israelites out of it.

Ver. 3. And the children of Israel cried unto the Lord, for he had nine hundred chariots of iron.] His power was so increased, that they had no hope to redeem their liberty but by the help of the Lord. It may seem strange, that in this petty kingdom they should be so strong in chariots, when Mithridates had but a hundred in his army, and Darius no more than two hundred, as good authors inform us. (See Bochartus, in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 9. p. 156.) I suppose they placed their chiefest strength in these, being not able to set out a great number of horsemen.

And twenty years they mightily oppressed the children of Israel.] Who groaned under a long servitude; during which time Jabin squeezed them, I suppose, by heavy exactions, which enabled him to raise greater forces than he had at first, when he brought them under his power. For God's anger increased by their frequent revolts from him; and he punished them more severely than he had done before by the Moabites; the Canaanites being the old inhabitants of the land, who hated them mortally, and kept them under a sorer as well as a longer oppression, than the Moabites had done.

Ver. 4. And Deborah the prophetess.] Such a one as Miriam, endued with Divine gifts of wisdom to instruct, direct, and govern others. For she was not only instructed with the knowledge of Divine things, but also was excited by the Holy Spirit (as Kimchi here notes) to declare the will of God to the people (which was the proper office of a prophet), as appears by the following part of this history. Her name in Hebrew signifies a bee; which hath been given (as learned men have observed) by other nations, to illustrious women. As among the Greeks, the nymph, said to be the nurse of Jove, is called Melissa; and the wife of Periander king of Corinth had the same name.

The wife of Lapidoth.] Or, as others translate it, a woman of Lapidoth; taking this word to signify a place, not a person. But our translation seems the most natural, and is to be preferred to that of R. Solomon and others, who translate it a woman of splendours; that is, an illustrious woman.

She judged Israel at that time.] Had the supreme authority over them; being so well known to be divinely inspired, that it procured her universal reverence, and submission to her judgment.

Ver. 5. And she dwelt under the palm-tree of Deborah.] Or, as the LXX. and the Vulgar understand it, she sat under the palm-tree, when she administered judgment. Whence the tree was called by her name; because it was the place where all resorted to her.

Between Ramah and Beth-el.] That is, in the confines of the tribes of Benjamin and Ephraim. For Ramah was a city in the tribe of Benjamin, and Beth-el in the tribe of Ephraim.

In Mount Ephraim.] In one of the mountains in the borders of that country; for though the tree was near both tribes, yet it stood in the tribe of Ephraim. The Jews (as appears by the Chaldee paraphrase) from hence conclude she was a very great woman, who had noble plantations in Jericho, Ramah, Beth-el, and other places; that is, of palms, saith R. Solomon, in Jericho, of vineyards in Ramah, and of olive-yards in the plain of Beth-el. And from her dwelling in a mountain, and being a prophetess, and a governess, and other things, some learned men imagine the story of the Theban sphinx was invented by the Greeks. (See Bochartus, lib. i. Canaan, cap. 6.)

And the children of Israel came up to her for judgment.] For direction and the ending of differences, by deciding causes; which none could do with such satisfaction as she did. By which it appears, that though Jabin oppressed them sorely, yet it was rather by rigorous taxations, than infringing all their laws; the course of which he did not stop, but suffered to be administered by their own officers. And he took the less notice of it, perhaps, because the supreme judicature was exercised by a woman; from whose power and authority he thought there was no reason to apprehend any danger. It may be probably hence gathered, that there was no such Sanhedrin in these days, as the Jews conceive there always was in the most early times: for why should they go to her for judgment, if there were a court of seventy eminent persons, then sitting at Shiloh?

Ver. 6. And she sent and called.] A plain act of authority, which was owned by the whole nation.

Barak the son of Abinoam.] Concerning whom we know no more (for, that he was Deborah's husband, or, as others say, her son, are ungrounded conceits of some of the Jews), but that he was born or dwelt in a famous city in the tribe of Naphtali, as it follows in the next words.

Out of Kedesh-Naphtali.] There were several cities of this name. One in the tribe of Issachar, (1 Chron. vi. 72.) another in the tribe of Judah, (Josh. xv. 23.) and therefore, for distinction's sake, this is called Kedesh-Naphtali; which was a city of great note, in the upper Galilee, belonging to the Levites, and a city of refuge.

And said unto him, Hath not the Lord God of Israel commanded, saying.] She could not think he doubted of the commission she now gave him from God; which he received as an oracle.

Go, and draw.] The Vulgar takes the word draw to signify gathering forces together: but the LXX. take it to be of the same import with the foregoing word; signifying that he should go till he drew near to Mount Tabor.

Towards Mount Tabor.] A noble mountain in Galilee, not far from Kedesh, in the tribe of Zebulun, and in the confines of Issachar and Manasseh; which had a very large plain at the top of it, as Josephus tells us, who calls it Staburium, lib. iv. de Bello Jud. cap. 2. where he might draw up an army, and exercise them very conveniently.

And take with thee ten thousand men.] Who were moved to list themselves under him, by the proclamation of this commission, which he brought with him from God.

Of the children of Naphtali, and of the children of Zebulun.] She thought he need go no further than these two tribes, which were nearest to him; but others also offered their service out of Manasseh and Issachar, as appears from ver. 14, 15.

Ver. 7. And I will draw unto thee.] These are the words of God (which Deborah pronounced in his name), signifying, as Arius Montanus understands the word draw, that he would, by his secret providence, incline Sisera to come within his power to destroy him; as hunters (unto whom warriors are compared) entice wild beasts to fall into their toils.

To the river Kishon.] Which was near Mount Tabor; having its beginning at the foot of it.

Sisera, the captain of Jabin's army, with his chariots and his multitude.] Wherewith he intended to encompass this mountain; and block up Barak till he forced him to yield up himself unto him.

And I will deliver him into thine hand.] This shews Deborah to have been endued with the highest gift of prophecy; which was to foretell certainly things to come.

Ver. 8. And Barak said unto her, If thou wilt go with me, then will I go; but if thou wilt not go with me, then I will not go.] He is commended for his faith in God by the apostle, Heb. xi. 32. as well as other great worthies in ancient time; though it was so weak and imperfect, that he made conditions with God's messenger, and absolutely refused to obey unless they were granted. He had great reason, he thought, for it; because he might want her advice in doubtful matters, and her authority also, both to gather soldiers, and to keep them together in good order, and to inspire them with courage. The LXX. here add a great many words, which make this the reason of his backwardness; that without her he should not be able to know the best time of giving Sisera battle.

Ver. 9. And she said, I will surely go with thee.] She saw he had faith enough to undertake the enterprise, and therefore consented to his proposal.

Notwithstanding the journey that thou takest.] In the Hebrew it is, the way that thou takest. Which may signify the course which he had resolved upon, not to go without her.

Shall not be for thine honour.] Though his faith was accepted, yet the weakness of it something eclipsed his glory.

For the Lord shall sell Sisera into the hand of a woman.] It is a great part of the glory of a conqueror to take the general of the enemy's army, or to kill him with his own hand; which she tells him should be denied him, as a small punishment of his backwardness to do as he was bidden; and as he would not go without a woman, so a woman should take away this honour from him.

And Deborah arose, and went with Barak to Kedesh.] She made no delay, but immediately accompanied him to his own city; where he began, I suppose, his levy of men.

Ver. 10. And Barak called Zebulun and Naphtali to Kedesh.] He caused proclamation to be made of God's command, and his own intentions, in these two tribes; who resorted to him in great numbers.

And went up with ten thousand men.] He picked, I suppose, ten thousand men out of those who flocked to him; and went up with them to Mount Tabor.

At his feet.] That is, they followed him as their leader. Though it may signify that they were all footmen; there being no horses in Judea, which they brought out of other countries. This made the victory the more glorious, by the overthrow of a great many chariots and horses in the opposite army.

And Deborah went up with him.] To encourage him and his forces, now they were gathered.

Ver. 11. Now Heber the Kenite, who was of the children of Hobab, the father-in-law of Moses.] See Numb. x. 29. This is interposed to explain what follows concerning Jael, who was Heber's wife.

Had severed himself from the Kenites.] Who went along with the children of Judah, to settle among them, (Judg. i. 16.) What the reason was of Heber's leaving them, as they all left the plain of Jericho, is not known; but there was a special providence of God in it.

And pitched his tent.] The Kenites lived after the manner of the Midianites (from whom they descended), in tents, not in houses.

Unto the plain of Zaanaim.] A place in the tribe of Naphtali, (Josh. xix. 33.) where there was a plain, or (as the LXX. expound the Hebrew word alon) a grove of oaks, under the shadow of which their tents were pitched.

Which was by Kedesh.] Though they loved to live in the open fields, yet not far from a city.

Ver. 12. And they shewed Sisera that Barak the son of Abinoam was gone up to Mount Tabor.] They could not want intelligence of a thing done so publicly as this was; and the words seem to import, that Sisera had many who informed him of all that passed.

Ver. 13. And Sisera gathered together all his chariots, even nine hundred chariots of iron.] In which (as I said ver. 3.) their main strength consisted. But they being unfit for service in mountainous countries, as I have often observed, it is probable they placed them so below the mountain as to coop up Barak there; by seizing all the avenues, and hindering all provisions from being brought to him.

And all the people that were with him.] As great a number of footmen, as came to him upon the summons he sent forth, to require them to appear on this occasion. For so the word gathered together signifies in the Hebrew (as we observe in the margin of our Bibles), gathered by cry or proclamation.

From Harosheth of the gentiles, unto the river Kishon.] With whom he marched from that city to this river; which descended, as I said, from the foot of Mount Tabor.

Ver. 14. And Deborah said unto Barak, Up.] Make no delay.

For this is the day in which the Lord hath delivered Sisera into thine hand.] She speaks of the victory as already gained, that she might work in him a full assurance thereof. This doth not contradict what was said ver. 9. that God would sell Sisera into the hand of a woman: for both were true; he and his army were delivered into the hand of Barak, to be routed by him; but he, in his flight, fell into Jael's hands to be killed. How long this was after Sisera encamped at the river Kishon, we have no means to know; but it was upon some day when Deborah knew the army of Sisera lay secure in their quarters, or were about fortifying the passages more strongly; or were to be joined with greater forces; or some other way might be taken at advantage.

Is not the Lord gone out before thee?] As a general doth before his army; to animate, and raise their courage.

So Barak went down from Mount Tabor, and ten thousand men after him.] It is not said that Deborah went with him any farther than to Mount Tabor: where, it is likely, his faith was grown so strong, that he durst undertake any thing without her presence with him.

Ver. 15. And the Lord.] Who conducted Barak, as he did his army, (ver. 14.)

Discomfited Sisera, and all his chariots, and all his host.] They did not expect such a bold sally as this, which struck a sudden terror into them; for he fell upon them, it is likely, before they were aware, which put them into the greater confusion. The Lord also struck a terror into them (as the word hamam imports) by a noise of thunder and lightning; as the word is used 1 Sam. vii. 10. and also in Josh. x. 10. where we read the Canaanites were discomfited by great hailstones falling down upon them: or he made a terrible sound of horses and chariots rattling in their ears, by the ministry of his angels, in the clouds; as he did in the days of Elisha, (2 Kings vii. 6.) which seems to be acknowledged by Deborah, in her song in the next chapter, (ver. 20.)

With the edge of the sword.] This terror and confusion wherein they were, exposed them to be slain easily.

So that Sisera lighted down off his chariot.] Which he thought did not make haste enough to carry him out of danger; and, besides, made it known where he was.

And fled away on his feet.] As a common soldier, that he might not be discovered; and that he might likewise secure himself, by his speedy running: for anciently valiant men were wonderful swift of foot, as it is noted of Asahel, 2 Sam. ii. 18. and every one knows it was the character of the famous Achilles among the Greeks.

Ver. 16. But Barak pursued after the chariots, and after the host, unto Harosheth of the gentiles.] He resolved to follow his blow to the very gates of their own city.

And all the host of Sisera fell upon the edge of the sword.] In the pursuit, he and his men cut off all they overtook.

And there was not one of them left.] Which was their whole army; not one escaping to carry the news of their defeat to Jabin. Or, there was not one man to be seen in the way to Harosheth; but they were all scattered to shift where they could for themselves.

Ver. 17. Howbeit Sisera fled away on his feet to the tent of Jael wife of Heber the Kenite.] Only Sisera, by his swift running, got, as he thought, into a place of safety, in the tent of Jael; her husband, perhaps, being abroad in the field, and she only at home. Women also had their apartment by themselves, in a tent of their own, as appears by Gen. xxiv. 67. see there, and Gen. xxxi. 33. where he imagined no search would be made for him.

And there was peace between Jabin king of Hazor and the house of Heber the Kenite.] It seems Heber was a considerable person, who had a great family, and many dependants; like that of Abraham, Gen. xiv. 14. How he came to escape the sore oppression under which the Israelites groaned (being incorporated into their nation and religion), and to live at ease in a time of great distress, we can but conjecture. Perhaps their manner of life, retired from towns and company, made Jabin not fear any danger from them; and if they still kept close to their religion, when the Israelites were apostates, God inclined the heart of Jabin to be favourable to them, and give no molestation to his harmless neighbours; who, perhaps, purchased their freedom from vexation, by their frequent incursions.

Ver. 18. And Jael went out to meet Sisera.] She watched, it is likely, to hear the event of Sisera's expedition; and seeing him come with great speed towards her house, went out, to invite him there to repose himself.

And said unto him, Turn in, my lord, turn in; fear not.] She assured him there was nobody in the tent to do him any hurt. Which was true; and it is not certain that she now intended to do, what afterward she did.

And when he had turned in unto her into the tent, she covered him with a mantle.] Being weary, he desired to take some rest; when it was proper to throw a covering over him, to preserve him, being very hot, from taking cold. What kind of covering this was, which the Hebrews call semicha (and we translate mantle), is not very material. They say it was a thick covering, which hath flocks of wool on both sides; such as our double rugs. (See Bochart, lib. i. Canaan, cap. 42.)

Ver. 19. And he said unto her, Give me, I pray thee, a little water to drink, for I am thirsty.] By the heat of the fight, and his long running.

And she opened a bottle of milk.] Out of respect to him, she brought him the best liquor she had, and of the best sort; for it appears by ver. 25. of the next chapter, that the cream was not taken off from it. It is possible also she might design, by this draught, to throw him into a sounder sleep; for milk, when largely drank, flies up into the head, and causes drowsiness. But however that be, it is certain milk was anciently accounted the most agreeable nourishment, which Hippocrates calls ἀδελφὸν καὶ συγγενὲς to human bodies. And therefore the most warlike nations lived upon it, more than any other food; as Hermannus Conringius hath shewn at large in his book de Habitus Germanorum Corporum causis.

And gave him drink, and covered him.] He rose up to drink; and then lying down again, she covered him as before.

Ver. 20. Again he said unto her, Stand in the door of the tent.] Because he doth not say, Stand I pray thee (as he did before when he asked for drink), some fancy (particularly Arius Montanus) that he spake this imperiously; laying his commands upon her, as a confederate of his master: but I see no ground to think, that, when he was in such need of her friendship, he would take upon him so much as to give her a charge to do any thing, but rather entreat it of her.

And it shall be, when any man doth come and inquire of thee, and say, Is there any man here?] Who was not of their own family.

That thou shalt say, No.] They imagined there was no harm in telling an officious lie to deceive an enemy; that they might preserve a friend or ally, as he was.

Ver. 21. Then Jael Heber's wife took a nail of the tent.]

Or one of the great pins wherewith the tent was fastened to the ground. For she had no better instrument at hand (sword, or such-like weapon, being not usually kept in women's tents), and this she knew how to use more readily than any other; being accustomed, it is likely, when they removed from one place to another, to take up her tent, and to fasten it again by striking such nails into the earth.

And took a hammer in her hand, and went softly unto him, and smote the nail into his temples.] Where it would most easily enter (being the thinnest part of the skull), and most speedily dispatch him.

And fastened it into the ground.] Upon which he lay (not on a bed), with a carpet, or some such thing under him; as the manner was in those countries.

For he was fast asleep and weary.] His weariness made him sleep soundly.

So he died.] She might as well have let him lie in his profound sleep, till Barak came, and took him; if she had not felt a Divine power moving her to this, that the prophecy of Deborah might be fulfilled. Nothing but this authority from God, of which she was certain, could warrant such a fact as this. Which seemed a breach of hospitality, and to be attended with several other crimes; but was not so, when God, the Lord of all men's lives, ordered her to execute his sentence upon him.

Ver. 22. And, behold, as Barak pursued Sisera, Jael came out to meet him.] As she had done Sisera, (ver. 18.).

And said unto him, Come, and I will shew thee the man whom thou seekest.] Before he made any inquiry, she knew he was desirous, above all men, to take Sisera; and, perhaps, she knew, by an inspiration, that he was in quest of him.

And when he came into the tent, behold, Sisera lay dead, and the nail was in his temples.] He lay in the place and posture wherein he was killed, that Barak might see the prophecy of Deborah made good.

Ver. 23. So God subdued on that day Jabin the king of Canaan before the children of Israel.] So that he was not able to oppress them any longer, but they were restored to perfect liberty.

Ver. 24. And the hand of the children of Israel prospered and prevailed against Jabin king of Canaan.] They prosecuted this day's victory with new successes; wherein his forces were overthrown in other battles, and his cities taken.

Until they had destroyed Jabin king of Canaan.] To the utter ruin of this kingdom of the Canaanites in Hazor: for Jabin himself, as Arius Montanus thinks, was slain at the brook Kishon, Psal. lxxxiii. 9. (though, it must be confessed, that may be meant only of his forces), so that we hear of none of his name in future times. And herein the Israelites seem to me to have begun to be sensible of their duty; which was to extirpate the people of Canaan, and not merely to bring them under tribute, (Deut. vii. 2—4.)

CHAP. V.

Ver. 1. THEN sang Deborah, and Barak the son of Abinoam, in that day, this song.] It was composed by Deborah, (ver. 7.) being a prophetess, one of whose special gifts was to sing God's praises, (1 Chron. xxv. 1—3.) and commanded to be sung by the authority of Barak; who was now, I suppose, become a judge, upon this great deliverance God had wrought by him. For it is not to be thought that these two persons alone sang this song; but all the elders of the people were called together in one assembly to sing it with them; and they afterward delivered it to the people. It was likely it was composed and sung after they had completed their victory by the destruction of Jabin's kingdom. For the prophets were taught such sublimity of thought and speech, as is used in these songs, by their admiration of such wonderful events as they observed.

Ver. 2. Praise the Lord for the avenging of Israel, when the people willingly offered themselves.] It is evident to all, that this hymn is expressed in another kind of language, than the historical part of this book; and in a language so majestic, in such variety of elegant figures, and such native expressions of those affections which the occasion required, that none of the ancient Greek or Latin poets have equalled; at least it appears, there was a most excellent spirit of poetry among the Hebrews, especially such of them as were divinely moved, when the Greeks lay in dark ignorance.

And first she excites all the people to give thanks unto God, and acknowledge his wisdom and power, in taking vengeance of their oppressors, and in moving the hearts of so many especially in Naphtali and Zebulun, voluntarily to list themselves to fight against the Lord's enemies: where it is to be noted, that she very wisely excites them so to ascribe the victory unto God, as not to forget the instruments he used to obtain it; for that she knew would be a great encouragement to others in time to come, to engage themselves in such enterprises, when they saw these men so highly praised, and looked upon as employed by God in his service.

Ver. 3. Hear, O ye kings; give ear, O ye princes.] Next, she calls upon all the neighbouring potentates to give attentive heed unto her song; whereby they might understand what God had done for Israel, and learn from thence not to oppress them, when it was in their power; for fear of the same vengeance which God had taken upon Jabin.

I, even I, will sing unto the Lord; I will sing praises to the Lord God of Israel.] Who she would have the world know was superior to all in power, and would defend his people, while they depended on him alone.

Ver. 4. Lord, when thou wentest out of Seir, when thou marchedst out of Edom.] This is but a repetition of the same thing; Edom and Seir signifying the country where the posterity of Esau dwelt, who refused to give Israel a passage through their land, as the Lord led them into Canaan; and therefore he conducted them from thence another way, and made them encompass that land: (Numb. xxi. 4. Deut. ii. 1.) and when they had left it behind them (which is here called marching out of Edom), then he wrought for them astonishing things, as it follows in the next words.

The earth trembled, and the heavens dropped, the clouds also dropped water.] These are poetical phrases, to express the great consternation in which all those countries were, when they saw Sihon king of the Amorites, and Og the king of Bashan, overthrown on a sudden by the Israelites, and utterly destroyed. (See Numb. xxi. 21, &c.)

Ver. 5. The mountains melted from before the Lord.] All the inhabitants of those mountains.

Even that Sinai, from before the Lord God of Israel.] Just as Sinai trembled and quaked at the giving of the law.

In these two verses she turns her speech unto God, and commemorates his wonderful acts in former times, with which she compares the glorious deliverance he had given them now: as much as to say, his power was not at all decayed, but he was as terrible to his enemies in her days, as he had been in former times.

Ver. 6. In the day of Shamgar the son of Anath, in the days of Jael.] The sense of this verse will be very plain, if we translate these words, as I think the Hebrew will bear, from the days of Shamgar, &c. After his death they fell into sin and great misery. And Jael is here mentioned, not as a judge (as Rasi and Ralbag fancy), but as a great woman of a masculine and valiant spirit, who yet could do nothing to hinder those spoils that were committed.

The highways were unoccupied.] The people being corrupted in their religion, broke out into all manner of violence, and turned highway-robbers; so that men durst not travel in the common road upon their occasions, but were fain to seek for by-paths, because the highways were infested by thieves: or this may be meant of robberies which Jabin's soldiers committed, after he had brought them in subjection to him; who took no care to protect the Israelites, but suffered their country to be ravaged by his troops.

The travellers walked through by-ways.] In the Hebrew (as in the margin of our Bibles is observed) the words are, the walkers of paths: by which we may understand men accustomed to travel, who, though they went in great companies together, yet durst not venture in the direct road, but went about through crooked ways (as the Hebrew word signifies, which we translate by-ways), by which means commerce was very much obstructed.

Ver. 7. The inhabitants of the villages ceased, they ceased in Israel.] Men were not safe in their own houses; which were broken open, if they lived in villages, and therefore they forsook them, and fled to walled towns, and fortified places.

Until that I Deborah arose.] This some of the Jews take to be a proud and arrogant expression, for which the Holy Spirit was taken from her: but Rasi (who reports this conceit) soberly acknowledges, that they are not words of boasting, but of joy and gladness.

That I arose a mother in Israel.] A judge or ruler of God's people. For, as men that governed were called fathers of their country, so it was proper for her, being a woman, to call herself a mother in Israel; among whom she did such great things, and governed with so much prudence, that it made her famous in other countries. For very learned men think, as I noted above, that the story of Sphinx among the Greeks was made out of the history of Deborah, she being a judge among the Bœotians, as Deborah was in Israel. (See Bochart in the book beforenamed; and Hermannus Witsius more lately, in his Miscellanea Sacra, lib. i. cap. 23.)

Ver. 8. They chose new gods.] That is, the Israelites, after the death of Ehud, forsook the Lord, and served Baalim and Ashtaroth, (as they had done formerly, ii. 13. iii. 7.) or perhaps they introduced the worship of some other gods, whom they had not served before, fancying they might be more powerful than their former had proved.

Then was war in the gates.] This was the fountain of all their calamities; for God immediately delivered them into the hand of some enemy or other, who possessed themselves of their cities and strong holds; for that is the meaning of war in the gates. Their enemies seized on their cities and fortresses; for their strength was in their gates; where sat also the courts of justice.

Was there spear or shield seen among forty thousand in Israel?] They were generally disarmed, for the securing their subjection to the Canaanites; as afterward the Philistines took the same course with them, (1 Sam. xiii. 19.) Here the Targum makes a strange excursion in mustering up the many thousand commanders, and sword-men, and spear-men, and archers, &c. that were in the army of Sisera.

Ver. 9. My heart is towards the governors of Israel, that offered themselves willingly among the people.] It seems there were some of the greatest men in the tribes of Naphtali and Zebulun, who, of their own accord, hazarded their lives, among the common people, in this service: towards whom she expresses a singular affection; and, with the praises of God, mixes the commendation of those who were his instruments in this deliverance.

Bless ye the Lord.] This is added, like a prophetess, who, when she commends the most deserving men, carries their thoughts up to God, who gave them that courage and good success. Abarbinel had a conceit came into his head, as he tells us, when he was commenting on these words, that by chokkee Israel (which Kimchi interprets as we do, the great men of Israel), are meant the scribes, whose office it was to register all notable passages, particularly the causes of wars, and their events; whom Deborah exhorts to bless the Lord, and when they wrote the history of this war, to ascribe the success to the Divine favour. But it is not likely they had such scribes in these ages, as it is likely they had in future times; much less such plenty of them now in these confused days, that Deborah should make a particular address to them to do their duty.

Ver. 10. Speak.] i. e. Give thanks to God.

Ye that ride on white asses.] She calls upon such men, as the governors beforementioned, to proclaim aloud the praises of God. There were no horses in Judea, but what were brought out of other countries, so that the greatest persons rode on asses, as appears by the Scripture story; but in this country they were commonly of a red colour, (whence an ass hath the name of chamor, as Bochart observes, lib. ii. Hieroz. cap. 12.) and therefore white asses (or, as he translates this word, whitish, or that were of a colour inclining to white) were highly esteemed for their rarity, and used only by honourable persons; who could not appear in any splendour during their servitude under Jabin, but now were restored to their dignity; for which she would have them praise the Lord.

Ye that sit in judgment.] With whom she exhorts the judges to join, who now sat in the gates, as they were wont to do, which were not possessed by their enemies, (ver. 8.) Or perhaps this belongs to the foregoing clause, it being probable that these judges rode about the country on white asses to do justice. (See upon x. 4.)

And walked by the way.] All the merchants who now travelled safely about their business, which they durst not do before this deliverance; (ver. 6.) for which, therefore, they were bound to praise the Lord.

Ver. 11. They that are delivered from the noise of archers in the places of drawing water.] Together with the princes, judges, and merchants, she would have the shepherds praise the Lord every time they came to water their flocks; remembering how they were disturbed formerly by the archers, that lurked in woods or thickets, and shot whole quivers of arrows at them and at their cattle, which now they brought safely to the springs of water.

There shall they rehearse the righteous acts of the Lord.] Who had taken a just vengeance on their oppressors, and most graciously delivered them from their tyranny; for righteousness frequently signifies the great goodness of God.

Even the righteous acts towards the inhabitants of his villages in Israel.] She would have the meanest peasants (as we speak) bear them company in the praises of God; for now they lived as quietly in their open villages, as if they had been in the strongest cities.

Then shall the people of the Lord go down to the gates.] She sums up all in these words; that the whole country was bound to praise the Lord, who had given the law its free course; every man having liberty to go down safely to the gate of his own city, where judgment was administered.

Ver. 12. Awake, awake, Deborah; awake, awake; utter a song.] Having called upon all others to praise the Lord, she now excites herself, with the most earnest and zealous affection (expressed by the repetition of the same thing four times), to celebrate his wonderful works, by composing a song in his praise.

Arise, Barak, and lead thy captivity captive, thou son of Abinoam.] She calls upon Barak to go in triumph, carrying (as the manner was in ancient times) his principal captives and spoils along with him unto the house of God: for one cannot think she meant merely a secular pompous show; since the Romans themselves in their triumphs marched to the capitol, and there offered sacrifice to Jupiter. Some ask, what captives he had to lead, when the whole army of Sisera was cut off? (iv. 16.) To which the answer is easy, That when Barak, after he had routed their army, pursued his victory as far as Harosheth, he brought several persons, and perhaps of the best quality, captive with him, out of that country.

Ver. 13. Then he made him that remaineth have dominion over the nobles among the people.] Or, then he shall make him that remaineth, &c. that is, when Barak triumphed, that small remnant of Israel (as the best of the Jews interpret him that remaineth) who were not utterly dispirited by the oppression of Jabin, but had some courage left in them, triumphed together with him over the nobles of Canaan.

The Lord made me have dominion over the mighty.] She, who was but a weak woman, triumphed also over the most powerful enemies.

Ver. 14. Out of Ephraim was there a root of them against Amalek.] Now she makes a catalogue of those who any way assisted in this war, as Homer doth of those people who equipped ships for the war against Troy: and I find no sense of these words so plain as this, that the Amalekites coming to assist Sisera, as they had done the Moabites, (iii. 13.) a small party of the Ephraimites (called here a root) opposed their passage, and hindered them from joining their forces with the Canaanites. Peter Martyr by a root understands a great captain among them, as in Isa. xi. 10. the word is thought to be used. But a most learned friend of mine (Dr. Alix) admonishes me, that Amalek doth not only signify the people descended from Amalek, but a mountain in the tribe of Ephraim, mentioned xii. 15. And, if we understand it so in this place, it makes this clear sense far easier and more natural than the other, out of Ephraim was their beginning (so the word root may be interpreted) about Amalek. That is, the Ephraimites, who came to the assistance of Barak, began their listing of men near to this mountain. And so the particle beth (I observed upon Josh. x. 10.) signifies as well near or about, as in or against.

After thee, Benjamin, among thy people.] Following the example of the tribe of Benjamin; who seem to have all of them engaged in this quarrel, with whom a few of the Ephraimites joined.

Out of Machir.] An eminent family in Manasseh; which is put here for all that tribe on the other side Jordan, where Machir was settled, (Numb. xxxii. 39. Josh. xiii. 31.) Which made their zeal the more remarkable, in coming so far to the aid of their brethren; when they heard they were engaged in this enterprise.

Came down governors.] Some of the principal persons of that country; who, no doubt, had their followers, that accompanied them in this expedition.

And out of Zebulun they that handle the pen of the ready writer.] They were nearer to Mount Tabor than any of the forenamed; but are therefore highly commended, that though they were better skilled in books than in arms, yet offered their service to Barak on this occasion: for scribes in Scripture signify men of letters, that studied the law, and expounded it.

Ver. 15. And the princes of Issachar were with Deborah.] Came and offered their service, when they heard that Barak, by her order, had summoned their neighbours Zebulun and Naphtali to come to him, (iv. 10.)

Even Issachar.] And the people of that tribe followed the example of their princes.

And also Barak.] The Hebrew chen (translated here and also) signifies as, or like unto; that is, they were as forward as Barak to march into the field, though they had no summons.

He was sent on foot into the valley.] That is, when he was sent down from Mount Tabor, by the order of Deborah, (iv. 14.) to fall upon Sisera in the valley; whither he went on foot, against his chariots and horsemen: or, he went with his footmen (as the LXX. translate it), and engaged that vast number of chariots, which were of greatest use in the valley.

For the divisions of Reuben there were great thoughts of heart.] But the Reubenites were so divided in their counsels, that they stayed at home (as if they were separated from their brethren in their affections, as they were in their situation, beyond Jordan), which begat many sad thoughts in the hearts of the rest of the Israelites; who could not understand the reason of it.

Ver. 16. Why abodest thou among the sheepfolds, to hear the bleatings of the flocks?] It was a shameful and an unaccountable thing, that they should wholly mind their private business (which was feeding cattle, Numb. xxxii. 1.) and neglect the public good.

For the divisions of Reuben there were great searchings of hearts.] And therefore she could not sufficiently bewail it; which she doth, by repeating what a great trouble it was to all their brethren; who were not able to discover the reason, and give any account of their being no more concerned than their beasts, for their common religion and liberties.

Ver. 17. Gilead abode beyond Jordan.] She complains also of the Gileadites, who were men of valour; and notwithstanding sat still, and would not step over Jordan to help their brethren. Under the name of Gilead, are comprehended the Gadites, who had half of Gilead, (Josh. xiii.) as the other half was given to the children of Machir. Who did come to the aid of their brethren; at least their governors engaged with them, (ver. 14.) Which hath moved some to read these words interrogatively, Did Gilead abide beyond Jordan? as if she still upbraided the Reubenites; who had not this to allege for themselves, that they were far off, beyond Jordan; for so were the Gileadites (that is, those descended from Machir), who they suppose comprehended the rest; and yet the best and most worthy of them came to join with their brethren, in the common cause of the nation.

And why did Dan remain in ships?] She reproves this tribe, which was near the sea (the famous port of Joppa belonging to it), that they minded nothing but their merchandise; while their brethren hazarded their lives in the field.

Asher continued on the sea-shore.] This tribe also bordered upon the Mediterranean; Tyre and Sidon being part of their portion. Which they did not possess; yet, no doubt, they held several other lesser places upon that sea; from which they would not stir in this common danger.

And abode in his breaches.] Or, in his creeks, as it is in the margin; and as the LXX. take it, who expound the Hebrew word miphratsim (fractures) by διεξόδους, outlets, or small havens; where vessels lay, to go out to sea. Some take the words to signify, that they were busy in repairing the breaches made in their walled towns, by length of time, or other ways.

Ver. 18. Zebulun and Naphtali were a people that jeoparded their lives unto the death.] They were the only people (which was much for their honour) who unanimously despised life, in comparison with the liberty of their country and religion. For the Hebrew word charaph doth not signify merely to expose one's self to danger; but to expose one's self to reproach, as we observe in the margin of our Bibles: and here denotes that they made no account of their lives, &c.

In the high places of the field.] They went down from Mount Tabor (where they were drawn up in a large plain, as I observed on iv. 6.) with a resolution to conquer or die.

It is observable, that, in this narration, there is not a word said of Judah, or Simeon, or Gad (unless comprehended under Gilead, as I said before); and that as Reuben, Dan, and Asher are taxed for their cowardly carelessness in this case, so Ephraim, Benjamin, part of Manasseh, and Issachar did afford some assistance; but nothing comparable to what Zebulun and Naphtali did; who, as one man, engaged to hazard their lives and fortunes (as we now speak) for the regaining of their liberty; which was the more highly commendable, because they were but a handful of men, when they first engaged, in comparison with the vast army which they undertook to assault.

Ver. 19. The kings came and fought.] When the Israelites conquered Canaan, Hazor had several kingdoms subject to it, or depending on it, (Josh. xi. 10.) And now, it is likely, there were divers kings, who were, at least, Jabin's confederates; and came to join their forces with his, to reduce the Israelites to his obedience.

Then fought the kings of Canaan in Taanach by the waters of Megiddo.] These were two cities belonging to the Manassites, but in the tribe of Issachar; (Josh. xvii. 11.) between which, as Rasi understands it, the army of Sisera lay; reaching from Taanach to Megiddo, by which the river Kishon ran.

They took no gain of money.] The simple sense seems to be, that they were kings of such bravery, as fought not for money, but for glory and dominion; so Rasi and Ralbag among the Jews understand it; They fought not for pay, but came gratis (as we speak) to the assistance of Jabin. But the Vulgar takes it otherwise; They got nothing but blows, no spoil or prey at all, as they expected. And Kimchi still much differently (which the words will bear), They came so enraged against the Israelites, that they would have spared no man's life, though he offered great sums of money for his redemption; because they thirsted only after their blood.

Ver. 20. They fought from heaven.] But, on the other side, God fought for the Israelites, by sending thunder, and lightning, and hailstones from heaven upon the Canaanites (as he did in the days of Joshua); and, perhaps, as P. Martyr conjectures, raising a great dust, which a stormy wind blew so violently into their eyes, that they could not see. As Livy saith it fell out to the Romans, in the great battle at Cannæ.

The stars in their courses fought against Sisera.] Some take these words literally, and render the words, not in their courses, but in their exaltations, i. e. with all their power and strongest influences: whence the saying of Rasi, on this place, The head, or beginning of the stars is in heaven; but the feet, or the end of them, is upon the earth. That is, hither they send their influences. But others think these words signify, that all this was done by the ministry of angels, who are here called stars, (as in the book of Job, xxxvii. 7.) because he is speaking of heaven; from whence they came to raise this terrible tempest, and, by other means which we are ignorant of, to trouble the host of Jabin, as they did that of Pharaoh in the Red Sea: and this they did in such rank and order, as is observed in that heavenly host.

It may be also thought, that, this fight lasting till night, the stars may be said to fight against Sisera, because they shone brightly to give light to the Israelites to pursue their victory.

Ver. 21. The river Kishon swept them away.] It so swelled at this time, that, though otherwise it was very shallow, many of them were drowned in it; being carried away with a rapid stream: for so the word jerapham signifies, which we translate swept them away. It is no where else found; but frequent among the Arabic authors, among whom it is commonly used in this sense; as Bochart shews, lib. i. Canaan, cap. 16. and 42. It is likely there was a great flood, which was made by that sudden violent rain, which fell in the forenamed tempest.

That ancient river, the river Kishon.] It is an elegancy used by orators themselves (as we find in Cicero) to repeat the same words, when there is great occasion. And here she makes an addition to the same word; by calling Kishon that ancient river; because of some other great exploit performed there in ancient time; the memory of which is now lost. But Kedumim some take to be a proper name, and another name of the same river Kishon.

O my soul, thou hast trodden down strength.] This is an elegant apostrophe (or turning of her speech) to herself; whose happiness she applauds, in beholding the most powerful enemies quite vanquished, by her commission which she gave from God, and by her prayers to him: for none can doubt that she implored help from heaven, while Barak fought with Sisera.

Ver. 22. Then were the horse-hoofs broken.] They could not save themselves by flight, their horse-hoofs being broken in stony places, when they ran away as fast as they were able.

By the means of their prancings.] The more haste they made the worse speed (as the common saying is), for they running full gallop (so the Jews interpret the Hebrew word dahar [prancings] to signify the swiftest course), they trod the harder on the ground, and were in the more danger to break their hoofs.

The prancings.] The Hebrews wanting a superlative degree in their language, are wont to double a word (as Peter Martyr here observes); and therefore prancings, prancings, he thinks, are not here an ornament of speech, but signify the most vehement motion, when a horse is in his full speed.

Of their mighty ones.] Of their best and strongest horses: for the word abbirim in Hebrew, as Bochart observes, signifies not only strong bulls, but horses also. (See Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 6.)

Ver. 23. Curse ye Meroz.] Most interpreters, both Jewish and Christian, understand by Meroz a city not far from the place where the fight was. Which seems to be proved by the following words, where he speaks of the inhabitants thereof. But R. Sol. Jarchi thinks Meroz signifies a potent person in those parts, who being able to give great assistance to Barak, and living near Mount Tabor, refused to do any thing. And this is the opinion of the Talmudists (whom Jarchi is wont to follow), as Mr. Selden shews out of the Gemara Babylon, lib. i. de Synedriis, cap. 6. p. 123, &c. where they fancy that this great man was excommunicated by Deborah, with all his adherents; and hence they fetch the ground and original of the excommunication in use among them: which is an idle conceit; there being no such thing as excommunication practised among them, till they had quite lost their civil government, and it was in the hands of the heathen.

Saith the angel of the Lord.] She would not have it thought that this curse proceeded from her anger, but from the authority of God, who, by his angel, which spake to her, denounced it against Meroz. And who should this angel be, but the Captain of the Lord's host, mentioned Josh. v. 14.? (See there.)

Curse ye bitterly the inhabitants thereof.] They that take Meroz for a person, by inhabitants understand those that dwelt near him, and were his dependants or associates; which is very forced.

Because they came not to the help of the Lord.] The battle was the Lord's, as the Scripture elsewhere speaks, and therefore they that refused to engage in it, refused to maintain his cause: and the people of this place are so heavily cursed, when all others that came not in to help their brethren are only discommended, because they lived so near, that they might easily have joined their forces with them, whereas some others lived a great way off, which might something excuse them.

To the help of the Lord against the mighty.] According to this translation of the last word, she means their most powerful enemies; but the Hebrew may as well be translated with the mighty; that is, with other valiant men, who freely offered their service in this enterprise. This aggravated their guilt, that when they had such noble examples of zeal from others, who were less able to help, they would afford no assistance.

Ver. 24. Blessed above women shall Jael the wife of Heber the Kenite be.] On the other side, she desires Jael may be ever praised; or rather foretells she shall always continue famous, and her husband too, in future generations.

Blessed shall she be above women in the tent.] This is thought to be a wishing, or promising her all happiness in her domestic affairs. But P. Martyr thinks it may be interpreted, Blessed shall she be for what she did in her tent. Which was no less glorious, than what others did in the field.

Ver. 25. He asked water, and she brought him milk.] Her prudence is first commended, in treating him with great respect, that he might entertain no suspicion of danger.

She brought forth butter.] Milk from which the cream (of which butter is made) was not separated.

In a lordly dish.] The Hebrew word sephel (which we translate dish) is no where else found, but in the story of Gideon in the next chapter, vi. 38. where we translate it a bowl. From whence Bochart rightly concludes, it signifies a large and wide vessel, (par. i. Hieroz. lib. ii. cap. 49.) which explains the word lordly or princely; which doth not signify that she had any gold or silver vessel in her tent (which was not agreeable to their manner of living), but that she brought him milk in the best vessel she had, and that very capacious: for out of such great men were wont to drink, as Pet. Martyr observes out of Cicero against M. Antony.

Ver. 26. She put her hand to the nail.] Next her courage and fortitude is celebrated: and by hand is to be understood her left, wherewith she held the nail, as with her right hand the hammer.

And her right hand to the workmen's hammer.] A lively description how she went about this work; just as if she had been fastening her tent.

And with her hammer she smote Sisera.] The Hebrew word halam, which we translate smote, signifies such a blow as makes a contusion.

She smote off his head.] The word machak, which is commonly translated cut off, cannot have that signification here; because there is not the least indication in this story of her cutting off his head from the body, but only of striking it through, as here it must be understood.

When she had pierced and stricken through his temples.] Here are two words more, machatz and chalaph, signifying penetrating and boring quite through. And the place is specified where his head was perforated, which was in his temples, the softest part of it, which gave the easiest entrance to the nail.

Ver. 27. At her feet he bowed, he fell, he lay down.] In the Hebrew, between her feet, &c. which some of the Talmudists have abused to a lewd sense; justly censured by Kimchi: who observes, that this is according to the style of the Hebrew language, which reduplicates words, that they may more strongly affirm what is said; and these words, he bowed, he fell, signify (he thinks) such a fall that he never rose up again. But taking all these expressions together [he bowed, he fell, he lay down], they seem to me to import, that, at the first stroke, he started and lifted up his body; but being very much stunned, he soon laid down again.

At her feet he bowed, he fell.] Then I suppose she repeated her stroke, which perfectly disabled him to move.

Where he bowed, there he fell down dead.] And at the third stroke, it is likely, she fastened his head to the ground. But this repetition doth not certainly argue that she gave so many blows (though it may pass for a probable conjecture); for it is an usual elegancy in such composures, wherein she intended to set out this fact of Jael's with the highest encomiums. Some may fancy, indeed, that it deserved reprehension, rather than commendation, upon many accounts; being a breach of the laws of hospitality, and of the peace which was between her family and Jabin, &c. But this fact is not to be measured by the common rules which are to govern us, it being an extraordinary, heroic, and Divine work, unto which she was excited by God; whose people Jabin oppressed with a cruel servitude, from which God ordered Barak to be their deliverer; who, having defeated all his forces in a miraculous manner, Jael understood there was a Divine hand in this victory, and was moved by the same spirit which stirred up Deborah and Barak, to help, by this act, to complete their shameful overthrow. For nothing could be more dishonourable, than for a great captain to fall thus by the hand of a woman.

Ver. 28. The mother of Sisera looked out at a window.] Was in earnest longings and expectations to see him return victorious.

And cried through the lattice.] Either fear of some miscarriage, or impatient desire, made her cry out with a lamentable voice; as the word jabab in the Hebrew signifies.

Why is his chariot so long in coming? Why tarry the wheels of his chariot?] Having such numerous forces, they promised themselves an easy and speedy victory over a handful of the Israelites; and therefore wondered what retarded his coming back, with all his chariots, in triumph.

Ver. 29. Her wise ladies answered her.] The Vulgar takes the Hebrew words to signify, one of the wisest of his wives (who was not so apt to despair as his mother) replied to her. For it is well observed by Terence, in his Adelphi (as Pet. Martyr here notes), "Multo satius est, ea evenire nobis quæ de absentibus suspicantur uxores quam ea quæ parentes." It is much better that those things should happen to their absent husbands, which their wives suspect, than those which their parents fear. But I see no reason to depart from our translation, which is the same with the LXX. αἱ σοφαὶ ἄρχουσαι, the prudent noble women that attended her, &c.

Yea, she returned answer to herself.] Upon better consideration, her hopes exceeded her fears.

Ver. 30. Have they not sped?] She did not think it possible they should miscarry.

Have they not divided the prey?] She was willing to be confident they had got the victory; and therefore imputed their stay to the time that must needs be taken up in making an equal division of the spoil. For those days were not like to ours, wherein every man keeps to himself what he can lay his hands upon; but after the battle, they were obliged to bring all that they had gotten to the general of the army; who considered every man's quality and desert, and accordingly distributed the prey among them.

To every man a damsel or two.] Young virgins are by all historians and poets reckoned as a principal part of the soldiers' prey. And she puts here an unusual word for a damsel, which is racham; for it properly signifies a womb, and seems here to be spoken by way of contempt, as if they were good for nothing but to serve their filthy appetites.

To Sisera a prey of divers colours, a prey of divers colours of needle-work, of divers colours of needle-work on both sides.] These were the richest part of the spoil, being highly esteemed by all people, as Pliny observes, lib. viii. cap. 48. where he mentions great variety of them, both in his own and in ancient time: for he takes notice, that Homer mentions pictas vestes, as he calls them, painted garments, which shined with flowers and trees in beautiful colours; which the Phrygians afterward wrought with needles; and Attalus invented the interweaving gold in them: but for divers-coloured garments, Babylon was above all places famous; from whence they had the name of Babylonish garments, which were much valued even in those early times, as appears by the story of Achan, Josh. vii. 21. and they were of such account in aftertimes, that every one was not permitted to wear them, but only the greater sort of persons (as Pet. Martyr observes out of the Roman laws), which may be the reason that here they are appropriated to Sisera as his part of the spoil.

Meet for the necks of them that take the spoil?] That is, of the chief commanders, to whom the spoil, as I said, was brought to be divided. In the Hebrew the words are, for the necks of the spoil; which Kimchi expounds, the head of the prey. As if she had said, These are to be put in the head of the prey; and therefore fit to be given only to the general of the army.

Ver. 31. So let all thy enemies perish, O Lord.] From hence she takes occasion to convert her speech to God, beseeching him, that all his enemies may be thus disappointed of their vain hopes.

But let all them that love him be as the sun when he goeth forth in his might.] Increase in power and force, as the sun doth from the time of its rising till it comes to its meridian height.

And the land had rest forty years.] These forty years are to be computed from the time of Ehud, as our great primate thinks, who thus translates these words, The land rested in the fortieth year, after the former rest which was restored to it by Ehud. (See him ad A. M. 2719.) But it is far more reasonable to compute them from the conquest of Jabin by the northern tribes; after which, the whole country lived in peace for the space of forty years, till the Midianites, as it follows, sorely oppressed them.

I conclude this chapter as Conradus Pellicanus doth; "Let some Homer or Virgil go now, and compare his poetry, if he be able, with the song of this woman. And if there be any one that excels in eloquence and learning, and hath more leisure than I, celebrate the praises and learning of this panegyric more copiously."

CHAP. VI.

Ver. 1. AND the children of Israel did evil in the sight of the Lord.] After the death of Deborah and Barak (who kept them, I suppose, in the true religion), they relapsed to idolatry.

And the Lord delivered them into the hand of Midian seven years.] Because it is not said, that the anger of the Lord was hot against Israel, (as in chap. ii. 14. iii. 8, &c.) nor that he sold them into the hand of Midian (which is the expression, iv. 2. and other places), Pet. Martyr thinks they were not altogether so bad as they had been formerly; and therefore God was pleased to shorten the tyranny of the Midianites over them; who, being their old enemies, as they came through the wilderness, and having been, in a manner, utterly destroyed by the Israelites, (Numb. xxxi.) were very much disposed to take a sharp revenge: for that those Midianites who were neighbours to Moab are here meant, is evident from their situation, which was beyond Jordan, (vii. 24, 25. viii. 4.) and by the people that joined with them, who were the children of the east, (ver. 3.) whereas the other Midianites, where Jethro lived, were in the south, near the Red Sea. Some fancy, indeed, that the Midianites, neighbours to Moab, being cut off by Moses, there was no such nation. But it must be considered, that some of them saved themselves by flight into other countries, and, after the Israelites were settled in Canaan, returned again; and, in near two hundred years' time, may well be thought to have repeopled their country, especially by the help of other people, who came, it is likely, and planted among them; and being seated in the same country, are all called Midianites.

Ver. 2. And the hand of Midian prevailed against Israel.] They brought the Israelites in subjection to them, and were the fourth nation that oppressed them, after the Mesopotamians, Moabites, and Canaanites.

And because of the Midianites, the children of Israel made them the dens that are in the mountains, and caves, and strong holds.] They betook themselves to these places for safety; for, I suppose, they did not now make them, but made them their retreat. And by the first word minhareth, is meant those hollow places in the rocks upon the mountains, where men might hide themselves, and make them their habitation; there being cracks and holes in them here and there, to let in light, as the Hebrew word signifies. And the second word maharoth denotes such caves as were in the fields, made either by nature, or by art and labour; which being dark, were fit only to hide their goods and provision in them. And the third word mitzaroth signifies such fortresses, as secured themselves, and families, and cattle, and all they could carry thither. But this shews their condition was very lamentable, in that they were driven from their houses in the villages, and cities too; at least the richest of them durst not trust themselves there, but fled to strong holds for safety.

Ver. 3. And so it was, that when Israel had sown.] They did not disturb them in seed-time, but let them be quiet till they had ploughed and sowed their land.

Then the Midianites came up, and the Amalekites, and the children of the east.] This shews, that some of the same people joined with the Midianites, that did formerly with the Moabites, when they oppressed Israel, (iii. 13.) For by the children of the east, are meant some of the people of Arabia, as Procopius notes, who observes Josephus to be of the same mind: for Arabia lay east of Egypt, where the Israelites learnt to speak in this manner.

Even they came up against them.] Entered the land of Israel with such armies as might destroy the fruits of the earth; as it follows in the next verse.

Ver. 4. And they encamped against them.] The Vulgar translate it, They pitched their tents among them; which signifies them to have been an Arabian people, or such as lived after their manner.

And destroyed the increase of the earth.] Having formed a camp, they sent out parties from thence well armed to destroy all the corn, and the rest of the fruits of the earth.

Until thou come unto Gaza.] That is, they made an universal devastation from one end of the country to the other; for they came from the east, and destroyed all till they came to the western coast, where Gaza was.

And left no sustenance for Israel.] Whom they intended to famish.

Neither sheep, nor ox, nor ass.] Their camels and other cattle, which they brought along with them, having eaten up all; for they were so numerous, as we are told in the following verse, that they overspread the whole country.

Ver. 5. For they came up with their cattle.] Not merely an army of men, but of cattle of all sorts, came on purpose to make this destruction.

And their tents.] With their whole families, that they might be able to consume the more.

And they came up as grasshoppers for multitude.] Or, as locusts (as the word arba is commonly translated), which have their very name from the vast numbers wherein they were wont to come, and were most devouring creatures.

For both they and their camels were without number.] No country more abounded with camels than Midian; (as I observed before out of Bochart's Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 2.) and they are only peculiarly mentioned, because the Midianites were more famous for them than for horses or other beasts.

And they entered into the land to destroy it.] Their very design was to depopulate the country by this means.

Ver. 6. And Israel was greatly impoverished because of the Midianites.] For the fruits of their land being thus destroyed, their money was drained from them to purchase corn from other countries.

And the children of Israel cried unto the Lord.] Who never failed to help them, when they truly turned to him.

Ver. 7. And it came to pass, when the children of Israel cried unto the Lord, because of the Midianites.] Though the poverty which pinched them was that which moved them to cry unto God for relief, yet he was so gracious as to send one to make them sensible of their sin.

Ver. 8. That the Lord sent a prophet unto the children of Israel.] Whom the Jews fancy to have been Phinehas, which is not probable, men not commonly then living to the age of two hundred years, which he must be of, and more, if he were the prophet now sent to them. It is far more likely, that God still continued other prophets among them, beside the high-priest, to put them in mind of their duty, and to call them to repentance when they forsook him. And it appears by the foregoing story, that there was a woman who had the spirit of prophecy; which shews that, at least, upon special occasions, he raised up such persons among them.

Which said unto them.] At some great festival, it is likely, when they were all assembled.

Thus saith the Lord God of Israel.] This is the style in which the prophets commonly spake.

I brought you up from Egypt, and brought you forth out of the house of bondage.] All the prophets put them in mind of this, as the greatest obligation upon them, to be entirely devoted to God's service. See Exod. xix. 4—6. where God himself tells them for what purpose he had delivered them from that bondage. And see Josh. xxiv. 5, 6.

Ver. 9. And I delivered you out of the hand of the Egyptians.] Who, when they pursued them to bring them back into slavery, were all drowned in the Red Sea.

And out of the hand of all that oppressed you.] That endeavoured to oppress them; such as the Amalekites, Sihon, and Og, who opposed their passage to Canaan.

And drave them out from before you, and gave you their land.] By the hand of Joshua, who settled them in the land which God promised to them. All this is said to put them in mind how faithfully God had performed his covenant with them, and to upbraid them with their own infidelity.

Ver. 10. And I said unto you, I am the Lord your God.] See Exod. xx. 1. Deut. v. 6. vi. 4.

Fear not the gods of the Amorites, in whose land ye dwell.] Do not worship them, nor imagine they can do you any harm, (Deut. vii. 12—14. Josh. xxiv. 14, 15.)

But ye have not obeyed my voice.] Which was the cause of all the evil that had befallen them, and would still continue, if they did not now hearken unto him, as they desired him to hear their cry. This, no doubt, the prophet pressed upon them, in more words than are here set down, these being only the heads of his speech.

Ver. 11. And there came an angel of the Lord.] The Israelites laid the application of the prophet's speech to their heart (it is to be supposed), and began to reform their ways, which moved him to send an angel to appoint them a deliverer; for he is called an angel of the Lord, both here and ver. 12. 20—22.

And sat under an oak.] In a grove of trees (as Arius Montanus understands it), where there was one great well-spread oak, in which there was a seat.

Which was in Ophrah.] The city where Gideon was born and lived, (viii. 27.)

That pertaineth unto Joash the Abi-ezrite.] This is added to shew what Ophrah he means; for there was another in the tribe of Benjamin, (Josh. xviii. 23.) whereas the family of Abiezer belonged to the tribe of Manasseh, (Josh. xvii. 2.)

And his son Gideon thrashed wheat.] The Hebrew chabat, in this place, signifies to thrash out with a stick or rock, as Kimchi here observes. And so the LXX. ῥαβδίζων. But the common way of thrashing corn out of the ear was by treading it with oxen, which they called dash, 1 Chron. xxi. 20. This Gideon did not use, partly for privacy, but chiefly because he had but a little to beat out.

By the wine-press.] Where none would suspect his thrashing of corn.

To hide it from the Midianites.] Who watched narrowly all the thrashing-floors of the Israelites, who might have bought sheaves of their neighbours, or, perhaps, sown and reaped a little corn, in some private fenced places, where the cattle of the Midianites did not come to eat it up.

Ver. 12. And the angel of the Lord appeared unto him.] Gideon, I suppose, turning his face that way, beheld him sitting under the oak.

And said unto him, The Lord is with thee.] He did not take him to be one of the Midianites by his posture, and manner of appearance, and was made more certain of it by this salutation. Wherein he doth not pray God to be with him, but declares him to be with him (as appears by Gideon's answer), that is, to assist him to be the deliverance of his people. The Targum here translates it, The Word of the Lord is thy help. Whereby it appears, the ancient Jews did not look upon this angel merely as a heavenly messenger sent from God, but as the Lord himself, as he is called, ver. 14. 16. 23—25. 27. Which is confirmed by the following verse, as the same Targum translates it.

Thou mighty man of valour.] He was naturally courageous, but made more so by a Divine inspiration, and yet did not disdain to mind husbandry, as the greatest persons did in ancient time. Insomuch that Pliny saith, The earth brought forth its fruit more happily and abundantly, "cum imperatorum clarissimorum manibus tractaretur," when it was cultivated by the hands of the most famous commanders: for they had more skill and industry in their management, than the ordinary people.

Ver. 13. And Gideon said unto him, Oh, my Lord.] The Hebrew word bi (which we translate O, or I beseech thee) may literally be translated, with me; by way of interrogation: as much as to say, How can that be? It appears by the word Adonai (Lord) which is used to all great men, that he did not yet think him to be an angel, but some person of extraordinary quality, who wished well to the Israelites.

If the Lord be with us, why then is all this befallen us? And where are all the miracles which our fathers told us of, saying, Did not the Lord bring us up from Egypt, &c.] He thought their present condition sufficiently shewed that their whole nation was forsaken by God; who had thrown them into that slavery, out of which he delivered their fathers, and did not appear, by any miraculous works, to be present among them as he was in Egypt, but left them to be devoured by the Midianites.

Here the Targum makes Gideon's answer to have been this, Is the Schechinah of the Lord our help? Whence then hath all this happened unto us? Which paraphrase shews that they took the Word of the Lord to be the same with the Schechinah of the Lord, who had most gloriously appeared for their help. (See ver. 16. and Josh. xiv. 12.)

Ver. 14. And the Lord looked upon him.] This shews it was not a mere angel, but the same Jehovah, who appeared to Joshua (v. 13, 14.) in the likeness of an angel, and now cast a gracious aspect upon him: for to have respect unto a man, or unto his sacrifice, is graciously to accept him, and to be favourable to him; as the Lord now declared he was, by his very countenance, which had great kindness in it.

And said, Go in this thy might.] This seems to intimate that Gideon was immediately inspired with a great courage, by that gracious aspect of the Lord upon him.

And thou shalt save Israel from the hand of the Midianites.] See those wonders renewed, which appeared in the deliverance of their fathers out of Egypt, of which Gideon said there was no token, (ver. 13.)

Have not I sent thee?] Is not this a sufficient authority, that thou hast a commission from God? great care is taken throughout all this book, to shew that the judges all acted by a Divine warrant.

Ver. 15. And he said unto him, Oh, my Lord.] Still he took him to be only some extraordinary man.

Wherewith shall I save Israel?] He doth not reject the commission, but modestly declines it (as Theodoret observes), considering his own meanness, in comparison with many others.

Behold, my family is poor in Manasseh.] And consequently of little power to raise forces, to oppose so potent an enemy: the word we translate my family, is in Hebrew my thousand: for the Israelites were distributed, by Jethro's advice, into hundreds and thousands; and the thousand to which Gideon belonged, was the meanest of all the rest in that tribe. The Jews will have it, that Gideon was the chiliarch, or chief commander of this thousand; others say, his father Joash, who, it appears by the story, was a considerable person; but it is uncertain whether he had such a government.

And I am the least in my father's house.] This shews that Gideon had no such command as the Jews imagine.

Ver. 16. And the Lord said unto him, Surely I will be with thee.] Do not consider thy poverty, but the power of God, which shall accompany thee: here the Targum thus paraphrases, My Word shall be thy help; who was the same that appeared to Joshua, with a sword in his hand.

And thou shalt smite the Midianites as one man.] Defeat them as easily, as if he had but one man to deal withal.

Ver. 17. And he said, If now I have found grace in thy sight.] Am so highly favoured as to have this honour.

Then shew me a sign.] He doth not so much make a doubt, as desire to be confirmed in his belief.

That thou talkest with me.] That thou hast brought this commission from God, and that I shall be able to destroy the Midianites. He said this (as Conr. Pellicanus thinks) not because his faith wanted confirmation, but that he might make others believe, who would require a sign before they joined with him.

Ver. 18. Depart not hence, I pray thee, until I come unto thee.] Stay here till I go home, and return.

And bring forth my present.] So we rightly interpret the Hebrew word mincha; which, though it signify a meat-offering (as we observe in the margin), yet there was nothing of a sacrifice intended here, nor was Gideon a priest, or this a place of sacrifice.

And set it before thee.] He intended to entertain him, by making a feast for him.

And he said, I will tarry till thou come again.] It was a great thing he was to undertake, and so God graciously condescended to give him all manner of satisfaction about it.

Ver. 19. And Gideon went in, and made ready a kid, and unleavened cakes of an ephah of flour.] For expedition's sake he made such cakes, they being soonest prepared: for it is a mere fancy of the Jews, that this was done about the Passover in the days of unleavened bread.

The flesh he put in a basket, and he put the broth in a pot, and brought it unto him under the oak, and presented it.] Set it before him on a table, and desired he would be pleased to eat: in which he followed the example of Abraham and Lot, and seems to have entertained him nobly, according to the way of feasting in those days; for a whole kid (part of which was boiled, and the other part, perhaps, otherwise prepared), and so many cakes, as an ephah of flour would make, was enough for several guests; and therefore so much set before one man, was to shew his great respect to him.

Ver. 20. And the angel of the Lord said unto him, Take the flesh and the unleavened cakes.] He did not taste of them, intending to turn them into a sacrifice unto God.

And lay them upon this rock.] Which was near the grove of oaks, in the higher part of the city of Ophrah, as Bertram conjectures, in his book de Repub. Judaica, cap. 15.

And pour out the broth.] As Elijah, in aftertimes, bade them pour water upon his sacrifice.

And he did so.] He obeyed him; though, it is likely, he thought it strange he should command him thus to dispose of the good cheer he had prepared for him.

Ver. 21. Then the angel of the Lord put forth the end of the staff that was in his hand.] For he appeared, I suppose, in the form of a traveller, who were wont to walk with a staff in their hand.

And touched the flesh and the unleavened cakes; and there rose up fire out of the rock.] He did not smite the rock with his staff (by which stroke the fire might have been thought to be stirred up), but only gently touched the flesh and the cakes with it.

And consumed the flesh and the unleavened cakes.] Together with the broth, that was poured on them; which was as great a miracle (if not greater) as if fire had come down from heaven, as in the sacrifices which Moses, and Elijah, and others, offered: by which the faith of Gideon was mightily strengthened, that the miracles done in ancient times (which he inquired after, ver. 13.) were not ceased, and that God would be as good as his word to him, for this was a token of God's acceptance of him.

And the angel of the Lord departed out of his sight.] Went up into heaven, as the Chaldee paraphrase interprets it.

Ver. 22. And when Gideon perceived that he was an angel of the Lord.] He was convinced, by this wonder, that he was not a mere prophet that appeared to him.

Alas, O Lord God! for because I have seen an angel of the Lord face to face.] He speaks as a man in a fright, and cuts off part of his words; for his meaning was, I shall die: such was the opinion of good men in those days, that if they saw apparently an inhabitant of the other world, he came to call them away from this: as appears more fully in the story of Manoah and his wife, in the thirteenth chapter of this book: and this opinion was very ancient, as may be gathered from the words of Jacob, Gen. xxxii. 30. and they were confirmed in it, perhaps, by the words of God to Moses, Exod. xxxiii. 20.

Ver. 23. And the Lord said unto him.] Though the angel disappeared, and nothing was to be seen, yet the Lord, who appeared in that form to him, made him know he was still present with him, by speaking the following words in an audible voice.

Peace be unto thee; fear not: thou shalt not die.] He bids him fear no harm, but quite contrary, expect all manner of good (which is comprehended in the word peace), and that in this world, where he should still continue, to work that deliverance which he promised by him: from such places as this the ancient Christians rightly gathered, that the Son of God appeared, upon some great occasions, in old time; which is not incredible, but a matter of easy belief, if we be persuaded that he did really appear in our flesh, which he took of the Virgin Mary, and dwelt among us for a long time, and then ascended in it to heaven, where he lives for ever: for why should we think it strange, if, for a short time, he appeared some time in human shape, as a prelude to what he intended in the fulness of time? "Fuit sane id majus quod nobis præstitit," &c. (as Peter Martyr speaks.) It was indeed a greater thing which he did for us at last; but he that did the greater, may well be granted to have done the less, and there is no reason to doubt of it.

Ver. 24. And Gideon built an altar there unto the Lord.] Not for sacrifice (which had been directly contrary to the law of God), but as a monument of that heavenly vision, and of the mercy promised to him, in that place where he built the altar; viz. where the angel stood and touched the flesh and unleavened cakes, and consumed them: such an altar the Reubenites made, Josh. xxii. 10, &c.

And called it Jehovah-shalom.] That is, the Lord here pronounced peace to me, (ver. 23.) or (as we understand it in the margin), the Lord grant peace: which he had the greatest reason to expect, when God had declared it, at that very time when he looked for death.

Until this day it is yet in Ophrah of the Abi-ezrites.] It was remaining when Samuel wrote this book.

Ver. 25. And it came to pass the same night.] After the angel's appearance.

That the Lord said unto him.] In a dream, it is most likely, because it was in the night.

Take thy father's young bullock.] In the Hebrew the words are two, par, shor, signifying a bullock full-grown; which his father, it is probable, had fatted up for a sacrifice to Baal.

Even the second bullock.] Our translation supposes there was but one bullock, which he was ordered to take (because we read in the next verse, that this alone was sacrificed); but in the Hebrew, and the LXX. and the Vulgar (and our margin also), the words are, and the second bullock; which was next to the first in age.

Of seven years old.] Which was calved, as Arius Montanus observes, when their oppression under the Midianites began; and was now ordered to be sacrificed, in token that it should end with this bullock's death.

And throw down the altar of Baal that thy father hath.] Which was in his ground, and built, perhaps, at his charge; but was for public use, as appears from ver. 28.

And cut down the grove that is by it.] Or rather, upon it; for so the Hebrew word alau signifies; and so the LXX. translate it ἐπ' αὐτῷ, upon the altar beforementioned. And therefore by ashereh, which we translate grove, must be meant the image in the grove, which stood upon the altar. And so the word is used in other places, (1 Kings xxiii. 6.) Which Mr. Selden probably conjectures was the image of Ashtaroth, or Astarte; for she was worshipped together with Baal, ii. 13. where they are said to have worshipped Baal and Ashtaroth (for there was more than one Astarte), which is the same with iii. 7. where it is said they worshipped Baalim and the groves. (See Syntag. ii. de Diis Syris, cap. 2.) There could be no hope of deliverance till religion was reformed; with which therefore God orders him to begin.

Ver. 26. And build an altar unto the Lord thy God upon the top of this rock.] Where the angel appeared to him; from whence Bertram thinks the Israelites learnt to sacrifice in high places; if it were not rather a custom derived from the gentiles.

On the top of this rock there was a fortress, as I take it; which, it is likely, had been built to secure them from the Midianites. For the word for rock is not the ordinary one, viz. tzor, or sela, but mahoz; which signifies a strong hold.

In the ordered place.] Which St. Jerome took to be the place where the flesh and unleavened cakes were laid in order upon the rock; (ver. 20.) but it may signify, as we translate it in the margin, in an orderly manner.

And take the second bullock, and offer a burnt-sacrifice.] If there were two bullocks which he took, it is hard to say what became of the first. Arius Montanus supposes it was offered for himself, and for his family; but this second is only mentioned, because it was the sacrifice that was offered for the whole nation, to implore God's mercy to them; for sacrifices were a kind of prayer and supplication. Gideon was no priest, but by God's special order was required to do this; which otherwise would have been a presumptuous sin.

With the wood of the grove which thou shalt cut down.] This was also an extraordinary command, whereby things employed to idolatry were converted to a sacred use: otherwise, God had ordered them all to be utterly destroyed, (Deut. vii. 5. xii. 3.)

Ver. 27. Then Gideon took ten men of his servants.] In whom he could confide; and this number was as many as was necessary to make a congregation for public worship; and was sufficient also to execute what God had commanded.

And did as the Lord had said unto him.] Broke down the altar of Baal, cut down the grove, and built an altar unto the Lord, and offered the burnt-sacrifice.

And so it was, because he feared his father's household, and the men of the city, that he could not do it by day.] Without endangering a tumult, which might have ended in a fray.

That he did it by night.] When he was likely to meet with no opposition. In this he gave an early proof of his faith in God, for it was a bold undertaking: but prudence is not excluded in the execution of the Divine commands: yet the greater speed men make, the more acceptable it is; and some think his zeal moved him to do this the very same night wherein God appeared to him.

Ver. 28. And when the men of the city rose early in the morning.] And came to worship Baal, before they went about their business.

Behold, the altar of Baal was cast down, and the grove cut down that was by it.] They were very much surprised to see such an alteration.

And the second bullock was offered.] Which they knew was designed for a sacrifice to Baal.

Upon the altar that was built.] Not upon the altar of Baal which was thrown down, but on a new one which was built in another place; upon which the flesh of the second bullock was still flaming, being not quite consumed, when they came thither.

Ver. 29. And they said one to another, Who hath done this thing?] Their superstition made them very solicitous to find out the author of this impiety, as they accounted it.

And when they inquired and asked.] Here are two words in the Hebrew, importing that they made a diligent inquisition; examining many persons what they knew of it.

They said, Gideon the son of Joash hath done this thing.] Who gave this information, we are not told; nor how the discovery was made: perhaps some had seen him that morning stand by the sacrifice; which it is likely he would not forsake, as long as he durst attend it. Or some of his servants might let fall such words as gave suspicion: or, the altar and image standing in Joash's ground, and his bullock being offered, they thought that none, without the knowledge of his family, could come to attempt it: and, besides, it is probable that Gideon was known to be no zealous servant of Baal; and when all were so very much concerned for the demolishing of his altar, he expressing no concern at all, they confidently charged him with the fact.

Ver. 30. Then the men of the city said to Joash, Bring out thy son, that he may die; because he, &c.] It seems they were all zealous idolaters; and thought him worthy of death who dishonoured those who were accounted gods.

Ver. 31. And Joash said unto all that stood against him.] That is, against his son; demanding to have him produced and punished.

Will ye plead for Baal? Will ye save him?] i. e. Will you take upon you to avenge his quarrel, and to be his patrons? Doth it belong to you to be his defenders and deliverers? It seems to have been a popular tumult, which he endeavours to repress; by representing to them, that such crimes were not to be punished by them, but by the magistrates of the city; and that they would bring themselves in danger of what they intended to do to Gideon, if they did not desist; as it follows in the next words.

He that will plead for him, let him be put to death.] That is, Let me tell you, he that thus moves sedition in this cause, by my consent, should be put to death himself. And, it is likely, Joash was a magistrate in the city; who terrified them by declaring what his opinion would be, if they came to be tried for this riot.

While it is yet morning.] That is, immediately. For it was early in the morning (ver. 28.) when they came in this manner to Joash.

If he be a god, let him plead for himself, because one hath cast down his altar.] If the magistrates neglected to punish the pretended crime, Baal, he tells them, in case he were a real god, would take care to do himself right; and therefore they need not be so much concerned about it: and so some understand the latter part of this verse, He deserves to die presently, who is an adversary to Baal: but let the execution be done then by Baal himself. For if he be a god, he will take care of his own honour; and you need not trouble yourselves about it. It is likely Joash had been convinced by his son, that God had given him a commission to deliver his people; and to begin it with this reformation: which made him appear thus boldly in his son's cause; because he knew it was the cause of God.

Ver. 32. Therefore on that day he called him Jerubbaal.] In 2 Sam. xi. 21. he is called Jerubbesheth; for so some called Baal, in contempt, by the name of Besheth, that is, shame and confusion; which well expresses the nature of such idols.

Saying, Let Baal plead against him, because he hath thrown down his altar.] This is the reason why he gave him this name; which is as much as to say, the adversary of Baal; or, him whom Baal hath a quarrel withal; upon the account of the affront put upon him, in throwing down his altar. The Phœnicians called him Jerombalus, as appears by Sanchoniathon, whom Eusebius often quotes, as he is translated by Philo-Byblius into Greek: and Porphyry saith, he received certain commentaries from Jerombalus, the priest of the god Jevo. Which can be nothing but the books of Moses, which contain the laws delivered by Jehovah; as Huetius justly observes in his Demonstr. Evangel. propos. iv. cap. 2. for the remains which we have of his writings plainly taste of the doctrine of Moses.

Ver. 33. Then all the Midianites, and the Amalekites, and the children of the east, were gathered together.] As they were wont to do every year, to waste the country, (ver. 3—5.)

And went over.] The river Jordan.

And pitched in the valley of Jezreel.] Which alarmed Gideon, and gave him occasion to execute his commission; it being not far from Ophrah; for Jezreel in the tribe of Judah is not here meant, (mentioned Josh. xv. 36.) but Jezreel in the tribe of Manasseh, or Issachar, which is frequently spoken of in the book of the Kings, being one of the royal seats of the kings of Israel; where there was a noble valley, running from the east to the west, mentioned Josh. xvii. 16. Hosea i. 5.

Ver. 34. But the Spirit of the Lord came upon Gideon.] Or (as the words are in the Hebrew, and as the LXX. translate it), clothed Gideon: which is a phrase St. Paul uses to signify a man is replenished with that wherewith he is said to be clothed; or that he is fully possessed of it. So was Gideon with courage, and all other qualities necessary in a great commander.

And he blew a trumpet, and Abi-ezer was gathered unto him.] Came and offered their service to fight under his banner. This was a wonderful change, if the city of Ophrah, who were lately so incensed against him, that they would have killed him for destroying their idol, now not only submitted to him, but were ready to join with him against all his enemies: but though this be not incredible, that they were converted from the idolatrous worship of Baal, when they saw no hurt befal Gideon for throwing down his altar, &c. yet this may be meant only of the rest of the Abi-ezrites, and especially those of his own kindred and family.

Ver. 35. And he sent messengers throughout all Manasseh, who also were gathered after him.] That is, the rest of his tribe; whose hearts God moved to resort unto him.

And he sent messengers unto Asher, and unto Zebulun, and unto Naphtali.] After his own tribe was come in, he invited these three who bordered upon the tribe of Manasseh northward to come to his assistance: but he did not send unto the tribe of Ephraim, who were neighbours to the Manassites on the south; which afterward begat a quarrel, as we read chap. viii.

And they came to meet them.] One of the copies of the LXX. refers this to Gideon, that he went up to meet those of the three tribes beforementioned; but others refer it to them who came up to meet Gideon; and so the Hebrew words seem to import. But which way soever we take it, they all joined their forces together; and from hence Sir J. Marsham infers, that the oppression fell only on this part of the country; though the whole story represents all the Israelites as in a miserable condition, and as submitting to his government, after he had delivered them.

Ver. 36. And Gideon said unto God.] In a prayer, which, I suppose, he made unto him.

If thou wilt save Israel by my hand, as thou hast said.] He did not doubt of God's intentions, who had promised to be with him: for in pursuit of his commands he had done one great thing already, in throwing down Baal's altar; and had also blown a trumpet and listed soldiers; and had likewise seen wonderful effects of God's power, in consuming the flesh and the cakes that were laid upon the rock, by fire coming out of it: therefore he desired only a confirmation of his faith; and that, perhaps, for the sake of those who were to go with him, who might possibly be timorous: or he might desire by some sign to know, whether at this time he would make him victorious over the Midianites, or he was to wait for some other opportunity.

Ver. 37. Behold, I will put a fleece of wool in the floor.] Where they were wont to thrash corn; which was done in the open air, not in barns, as we do now.

And if the dew be on the fleece only, and it be dry upon all the earth beside, then shall I know that thou wilt save Israel by my hand, as thou hast said.] He supposed that the dew which distilled from heaven was a Divine gift, (as the Scripture often testifies, particularly Gen. xxviii. 28.) which he desires might be so governed by God, that though it commonly fall every where, it might now, by his extraordinary providence, water only his fleece.

Ver. 38. And it was so: for he rose up early in the morning, and thrust the fleece together, and wringed the dew out of the fleece, a bowl-full of water.] When there was not a drop upon the earth round about it. The word sephel, which here we translate bowl, was used in the foregoing chapter, ver. 25. Which see.

Ver. 39. And Gideon said unto God, Let not thine anger be hot against me, and I will speak but this once.] Though God did not chide him for his former desire, nor charge him with any distrust of his power and will to do what he promised; yet Gideon was afraid lest he should be very angry at his renewing the same request, because it looked like a diffidence in God's word. But if we consider, that it was for the farther and fuller satisfaction of those that were to go with him, it may be excused; and as he promises that he will ask no more signs, so we do not find the Lord took it ill of him that he asked this.

Let me prove thee, I pray thee, with the fleece.] This is a bad word, when it denotes men's infidelity, that no sign will be given them; but a good one, when it signifies an humble desire to have such a sign granted them, as here it doth.

Let it be dry now only upon the fleece, and upon all the ground let there be dew.] Upon these words Ralbag hath this observation, "The former miracle was not sufficient for his conviction, because it is in the very nature of wool to draw moisture to it; and therefore he desires this second miracle, which is contrary to the first."

Ver. 40. And God did so that night.] For some dewdrops in the morning, other in the night. And here God was pleased, not in the morning, but in that very night when he asked this sign, to sprinkle all the floor with dew, and let none fall upon the fleece. So ready (saith Bochartus) is God to hear our prayers; which his benefits do not so much follow, as go before them, or immediately accompany them.

For it was dry upon the fleece only, and there was dew on all the ground.] Not upon all the country of Israel, but upon all the floor, or the land thereabout. By these quite contrary signs his faith was fully confirmed; and perhaps there was some need of it, when he saw the number of his followers reduced to a small handful of three hundred men, (vii. 10.) There are those who think he chose a fleece of wool for that purpose, not only because it was ready at hand, but the better to express how the earth was shorn by the Midianites, as the sheep had been by him; and when he begged the dew (a sign of the Divine favour) might fall upon the fleece, it was to represent the kindness of God to him; and when he begged it might fall upon the whole ground, it represented his favour to all the people: and, lastly, that these two miracles, opposite one to the other, do notably set forth the state of that nation, who were moistened with the dew of heaven (the knowledge of God) when the rest of the world were dry; and now are dry, when the rest of the earth are filled with the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea.

CHAP. VII.

Ver. 1. THEN Jerubbaal (who is Gideon), and all the people that were with him, rose up early.] The very next morning, I suppose, after the last miracle.

And pitched beside the well of Harod.] It is but conjectured where this well was; viz. not far from Mount Gilboa.

So that the host of the Midianites were on the north side of them, by the hill of Moreh.] The Vulgar takes the word Moreh to signify high; and then this high hill can be no other than the forenamed Gilboa. Here Pellicanus observes, that prudence and diligent forecast is to be used, even when we are under the Divine conduct; for he thinks Gideon acted like a skilful commander, when he quartered his army so, as to have the enemy on the north of him, rather than the east or the south.

In the valley.] Of Jezreel, as was said before, vi. 33.

which had Hermon on the north, and Gilboa on the south of it.

Ver. 2. And the Lord said unto Gideon, The people that are with thee are too many for me to give the Midianites into their hand.] They were but thirty-two thousand, against an innumerable army of the enemies, (ver. 3. 12.) which was a vast disproportion; and yet God would not use the service of such a company, lest it should obscure his glory; as it follows in the next words.

Lest Israel vaunt themselves against me, saying, Mine own hand hath saved me.] He knew their humour, and foresaw they might be so vain as to ascribe the victory to their own power and prowess, and not to him who intended to shew to all the world it was his miraculous work.

Ver. 3. Now therefore go to, proclaim in the ears of the people.] According to the command of Moses, Deut. xx. 8.

Whosoever is fearful and afraid.] The word which we translate afraid, is in the Hebrew harod: from whence some have conjectured the well where they pitched (ver. 1.) was called by the name of Harod, because here a great fear came upon most of Gideon's army.

Let him return and depart early.] As soon as he can: or, as a great many understand it, make what haste he can to his home; it being a metaphor, they think, from the flying of a bird.

From Mount Gilead.] Not that mountain which is so often mentioned in Scripture; for that was on the other side of Jordan, and in the most eastern part of their country (as appears from the story of Jacob, when he returned from Padan-Aram), but another mountain on this west side of Jordan, in the tribe of Manasseh: the name of whose grandson Gilead (from whom all the tribe descended) was given, it is probable, in memory of him, to some mountain in this country; which was called Mount Gilead, just as another mountain in the tribe of Ephraim was called Mount Ephraim. This seems to me a far more rational account of these words, than theirs who translate them towards Mount Gilead, or about it; or devise some other such-like explication of the particle min (which we rightly translate from), as may consist with their opinion, that the mount on the other side Jordan is here intended. Gataker hath collected many interpretations of this kind in his Cinnus, lib. ii. cap. 18.

And there returned of the people twenty and two thousand.] As God thought there were too many, so they thought there were too few, to fight with such a host as came against them: and therefore, though they were at the first forward to list themselves under Gideon, yet, when they saw no greater number come in, as they expected, their hearts failed them; for they trusted not in God, but in their own strength.

And there remained ten thousand.] Who had more courage, and were resolved to venture their lives in the cause. Ralbag thinks the greater number that went away were men of bad lives, whose consciences made them afraid; and that these who remained were better men, which made them valiant and undaunted. And they were just the same number that went down with Barak from Mount Tabor, in their last deliverance, (iv. 10.)

Ver. 4. And the Lord said unto Gideon, The people are yet too many.] The more valiant they were, the more they might be apt to ascribe to themselves.

Bring them down unto the water.] Which, it is likely, ran from the well or fountain of Harod, and made a brook.

And I will try them for thee there.] Give thee a proof who are fit for the service. The Hebrew word tzaraph signifies to scour, purge, and purify; as fullers do cloth from its filthiness, or as refiners do gold and silver from their dross. So God intended to purge Gideon's army, from all such persons as he judged unmeet for the undertaking.

And it shall be, that of whom I say unto thee, This shall go with thee, the same shall go with thee; and of whomsoever I say unto thee, This shall not go with thee, the same shall not go.] He intended by such a voice as now spake unto him, to declare who should go with him, and who should not.

Ver. 5. So he brought down the people unto the water.] Where it was proper to purge them.

And the Lord said unto Gideon, Every one that lappeth of the water with his tongue, as a dog lappeth, him shalt thou set by himself; likewise every one that boweth down upon his knees to drink.] They were thirsty, we may well suppose, by the heat of the weather, and by their march, which made them greedily betake themselves to the water: where he bid Gideon observe the different postures which they used in quenching of their thirst. The LXX. here translate it πᾶς ὃς ἂν λάψῃ τῇ γλώσσῃ αὐτοῦ, Whosoever licketh up the water with his tongue. Which is the very word the great philosopher uses in his History of Animals, lib. viii. cap. 6. where he saith, those creatures whose teeth are continued close together, sup up water as horses and oxen do; but such as he calls καρχαρόδοντα, that have teeth like a saw, do λάπτειν, which is of the same signification with our English word lap, and the French laper, as Bochart observes.

Ver. 6. And the number of them that lapped, putting their hand to their mouth, were three hundred men; but all the rest of the people bowed down upon their knees to drink water.] Some ascribe it to the sloth and laziness of these three hundred men, that they would not stoop down to drink as the rest did; others to their timorousness, and the great fear they were in of being suddenly surprised by their enemies, which is the opinion of Josephus and Theodoret; both which great authors think, that God chose these three hundred men, on purpose because they were poor-spirited, that the victory might be acknowledged to be entirely owing to himself: and Grotius is of this mind, who thinks they lapped, just as the dogs do of the river Nile, as they run, for fear of the crocodiles. (See Sixtiri Amama's Antibarbarus, lib. iii. p. 385.) But it is evident that all the fearful persons were dismissed before; and it is not likely that courageous men were lazy; therefore I take it, as others do (particularly Procopius Gazæus), to be a token of their temperance, and of the nobleness of their spirit, which made them so desirous to engage the enemy, that they would not stay to drink; but though they were very thirsty, contented themselves to moisten their mouth with a little water; whereas the rest indulged themselves so far, as to drink their belly-full. And it is the opinion of Ralbag, among the Jews, that their lapping standing, was a sign of their alacrity and fortitude. R. Solomon, and Kimchi, also think, that the rest had been worshippers of Baal, and, by bowing their knees to drink, were discovered, which is a far-fetched conceit.

Ver. 7. And the Lord said unto Gideon, By the three hundred men that lapped will I save you, and deliver the Midianites into thine hand.] It was sufficient to let all the world see God saved them and not men, that he employed only three hundred persons in this service, yet it was necessary these three hundred should be men of extraordinary faith and courage (such as Gideon had) to embolden them to this enterprise.

And let all the other people go every man unto his place.] He had sent away above two-thirds of his army before, and now of that third part he keeps only the thirtieth.

Ver. 8. And the people took victuals in their hands.] They that returned home left so much provision as would serve to maintain three hundred men for some time.

And their trumpets.] If we suppose every thousand men to have ten trumpeters belonging to them, it was easy to furnish three hundred men with every one a trumpet, which we read (ver. 16.) they had, that they might, when they sounded, make a noise, as if they were a greater number than really they were. It is hard to say, how Josephus came to say, that they carried in their hand κριοῦ κέρας, a ram's horn, which they used ἀντὶ σάλπιγγος, instead of a trumpet, (lib. v. Antiq. cap. 8.) for rams' horns are not hollow: and the LXX. only call them κερατίνας, not saying of what they were made. It may be supposed, indeed, that rams' horns were made hollow for this use, as the Jews make them at this day.

And he sent all the rest of Israel, every man, unto his tent.] Who, it is probable, did not go so far, but that they were ready to join with those who pursued the Midianites after their defeat, (ver. 23, 24.)

And retained those three hundred men.] Kept no more with him than this number whom God had chosen to accomplish his promise.

And the host of Midian was beneath him in the valley.] It seems his small handful of men lay encamped upon a hill, where the Midianites thought it not safe to assault them, not knowing what number they were, nor how entrenched, and therefore they lay still in the valley of Jezreel.

Ver. 9. And it came to pass the same night.] After he had reduced his forces to this small number.

That the Lord said unto him, Arise, get thee down unto the host of the Midianites.] Who lay in the valley below him.

For I have delivered it into thy hand.] There, he means, he should understand, and be fully satisfied by what he should hear, that his victory over them was as sure as if he had already obtained it.

Ver. 10. But if thou fear to go down.] As he had some reason, having now such a slender company with him.

Go thou with Phurah thy servant down to the host.] Every man is more afraid alone, than when he hath a trusty companion with him; yet it was not fit to carry more than one, whose fidelity was known to him; for secret designs are not to be committed to many.

Ver. 11. And thou shalt hear what they say.] Hear the discourse that some of them would have with another.

And afterward shall thine hand be strengthened to go down unto the host.] Whereby he should be encouraged to attack that great army, with so small a number as he had remaining with him. This shews how exceeding acceptable his faith and obedience was to God, in sending away as many of his army as he bade him dismiss; for now he gives him a further confirmation of his faith without asking.

Then went he down with Phurah his servant.] Faith had quite expelled all his fear.

Unto the outside of the armed men that were in the host.] To the out-guards, as we now speak, who seem to have consisted of fifty men, as the LXX. think the Hebrew word chamuschim signifies; for they translate it τῶν πεντήκοντα.

Ver. 12. And the Midianites, and Amalekites, and all the children of the earth.] Who joined with them in this invasion.

Lay along in the valley.] Of Jezreel beforementioned, into which Gideon now went down.

Like grasshoppers for multitude.] See vi. 5.

And their camels were without number.] Both Midian and Amalek, and the countries about them, abounded with camels, which were serviceable to them in their wars, as well as in carrying burdens. (See Bochart, in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 2.) And in them they placed their principal riches, as he observes out of Leo Africanus, who saith, that when the Arabians would express the great wealth of their prince, they do not say, he hath so many thousand pounds of gold or silver, but so many thousand camels.

As the sand by the sea-side for multitude.] So the Hebrews are wont to express a vastly great number. The certain knowledge of their number, it is likely, never came to the knowledge of the Israelites; but we read of a hundred and twenty thousand men that were slain, and fifteen thousand that escaped, with their two princes, viii. 10. And how many were taken captive, is not recorded.

Ver. 13. And when Gideon was come, behold, there was a man that told a dream unto his fellow.] Which troubled his thoughts, I suppose, when he was awake, as the dream of Pharaoh, and his butler, and baker, and of Nebuchadnezzar, in aftertimes, disturbed them.

And said, Behold, I dreamed a dream, and, lo, a cake of barley-bread.] Or, as the Vulgar translates it, A loaf baked in the ashes, which was the meanest of all other bread, and hastily prepared.

Tumbled.] Came tumbling down like a bowl from the mountain.

Into the host of Midian.] Through all the guards, into the very middle of the army, which was a sign that Gideon should break through all opposition.

And came unto a tent.] The principal tent, which was pitched for their kings, or their general, in the midst of the host.

And smote it, that it fell.] This seemed strange to the man, that so small a thing as a cake, or a loaf of bread, should throw down a tent, which was not shaken by a strong wind.

And overturned it, that the tent lay along.] It not only fell, but was so shattered that it could not be reared up again; which was a lively emblem of the utter overthrow of the Midianites, and their numerous host, by Gideon, and his small company, as his fellow-soldier interpreted it.

Ver. 14. And his fellow answered and said.] It appears by the example beforementioned, that God sometimes sent dreams into the minds of pagan people, who were much concerned to find an interpreter of them: but here, by a single providence, one of his comrades was inspired to tell the meaning immediately.

This is nothing else save the sword of Gideon the son of Joash.] The barley-cake was a fit emblem of Gideon and his soldiers, who were a small number, as a cake is made of a little flour kneaded together; and was mean also, and contemptible, in comparison with the Midianites, as a barley-cake is in comparison with wheaten bread: but the man could not have understood this, unless God had suggested it to him, for the confirmation of Gideon's faith and resolution.

A man of Israel.] i. e. A great commander; for so the Hebrews truly interpret the word isch, who (as L'Empereur observes out of R. Schamaja) called the governor, or chief commander of those who guarded the temple, isch har habeth, the man of the mountain of the temple. (Cod. Middoth, cap. 1.)

For into his hand hath God delivered Midian, and all the host.] All their confederates. Nothing is more vain than our common dreams, yet God hath sometimes admonished men that way of future things, as many of the heathen themselves acknowledge (and those, the wisest of them, such as Hippocrates). But that a common soldier should give such an exact interpretation of another soldier's dream, and that against themselves, and their own nation, is very extraordinary.

Ver. 15. And it was so, when Gideon heard the telling of the dream, and the interpretation thereof.] He understood the Midianitish language, it is likely, having been long a subject to that nation; or, perhaps, it did not differ much from the Hebrew.

That he worshipped.] Gave humble thanks to God for his goodness, in giving him new encouragement to proceed in his undertaking.

And returned to the host of Israel.] So he calls it (though it scarce deserved that name), because God intended to do the same by this small number, as if they had been a great host.

And said, Arise, for the Lord hath delivered into your hand the host of Midian.] He bids them make no doubt nor delay, for God had given fresh assurance of success.

Ver. 16. And he divided the three hundred men into three companies.] Under three commanders-in-chief, as the Hebrew raschim imports, which signifies heads.

And he put a trumpet into every man's hand.] That they might make a sound of a great army.

With empty pitchers.] Earthen pitchers, which had no water in them; wherein they hid their lamps till they should think fit to light them.

And lamps within their pitchers.] Or, rather, torches; for, no doubt, they were made of pitch, or wax, and rosin, and such-like things as would burn long, and not be blown out by the wind, as lamps made of oil only are apt to be.

Ver. 17. And he said unto them, Look on me and do likewise.] Follow my example.

And, behold, when I come to the outside of the camp.] Where he began the assault.

It shall be, that as I do, so shall ye do.] I suppose he told them what he would do, viz. after they heard him blow the trumpet (as it follows in the next verse), they should do the same, and then break their pitchers and light their torches, &c.

Ver. 18. When I blow with a trumpet, I, and all that are with me.] It is likely he commanded one of the three troops with whom he began the attack, as the next verse imports.

Then blow ye the trumpet also on every side of all the camp.] By this it appears that they did not fall upon them all in one place, but some on one part of their camp, some on another, that they might strike the greater terror into them, and put them into confusion.

And say, The sword of the Lord, and of Gideon.] The word sword is not here in the Hebrew, where these words run thus, for the Lord, and for Gideon: but there being mention of the sword, ver. 20. it moved our translators to add it here also: and it is not to be thought contrary to the design of God, (who would have the victory ascribed to himself, ver. 2.) that Gideon here joins his own name with God's when they went to fight; for, as he puts God in the first place, and names himself only as his minister, so it is likely he had directions from God for it, who knew the name of Gideon, of whose extraordinary courage, no doubt, the Midianites had heard, would be very formidable to them.

Ver. 19. So Gideon and the hundred men that were with him.] The Vulgar took a hundred to be put for the whole host of Gideon, and therefore saith, The three hundred men that were with him: but the LXX. expressly follow the Hebrew; and it is most probable that he led only a hundred men himself, the rest being commanded by some other valiant captains.

Came to the outside of the camp.] It is not said on what quarter; but it is probable on the east part of their camp, as the second troop set upon them on the north-east part, and the third on the south-east: for this way they knew they would bend their flight when they were routed, and endeavoured to escape; their own country, and the fords of Jordan, lying on the east: and if they ran westward, there were Israelites enough to pursue them, and cut them off.

In the beginning of the middle watch; and they had but newly set the watch.] That is, a little after midnight: for there were three watches among the Hebrews and the rest of the eastern nations, as Bochart observes out of Kimchi, R. Solomon, and others; the night being divided into three parts: and when the first third part was ended, they that had watched went to sleep, and another company succeeded them, till the morning watch. The Romans afterward divided the night into four parts, from whence we read, in the gospel, of the fourth watch.

And they blew the trumpets, and brake the pitchers that were in their hands.] Though Gideon placed his hope in God alone, yet he did not neglect such prudent stratagems as are used in war, but made an appearance of a greater number of men than he had with him: for, hearing three hundred trumpets sound, the Midianites could not but apprehend a great army was come to assault them: the breaking of the pitchers also made a clattering noise, and the torches then, on a sudden, flaring in their eyes, was very amazing, especially when they heard them shout, for the Lord, and for Gideon: he chose also to make his attack at midnight, when they were in a dead sleep, and expected no disturbance.

Ver. 20. And the three companies.] The former words were concerning Gideon and his men, who began the attack; whose example the rest of the three companies followed, as he required, ver. 17, 18.

Blew the trumpets, and brake the pitchers, and held the lamps in their left hand, and the trumpets in their right hand to blow withal.] So that they made no use of their swords, in the first onset; both hands being full of something else.

And they cried, The sword of the Lord, and of Gideon.] But this stratagem had been of no efficacy, if God had not struck such a terror into them, when they heard these words, as quite confounded them: and yet these words do not import, as I said before, that the victory was divided between the Lord and Gideon; for it is most likely (as Pet. Martyr observes) that God suggested even this stratagem to Gideon, and made it successful.

Ver. 21. And they stood every man in his place round about the camp.] Not one of the three hundred men stirred a foot from his place, but stood there without striking a stroke; as if they had been only torch-bearers, to give light to their army, to see their way to the camp, and to do execution.

And all the host ran, and cried, and fled.] They did not stand in their ranks to repel the Israelites; but brake up their camp (as the Hebrew word jaratz may be translated), and cried out with a lamentable voice, fleeing as fast as they could to their own country.

Ver. 22. And the three hundred men blew the trumpets.] That is, continued to blow them without ceasing.

And the Lord set every man's sword against his fellow, even throughout all the host.] Being suddenly awaked out of their sleep in the middle of the night, and hearing such a noise, as if a vast multitude were falling upon them, they were in such disorder (which was increased by the clattering of the pitchers, and the blaze of the torches), that they could not distinguish their friends from their enemies, but killed one another; every man falling upon him that was next to him, whom he fancied to be one of Gideon's army. Thus the Philistines were defeated by Jonathan, (1 Sam. xiv. 16. 20.) and the Ammonites, Moabites, and Edomites, in the days of Jehoshaphat, (2 Chron. xx. 22, 23.)

And the host fled to Beth-shittah in Zererath, and to the border of Abel-meholah, unto Tabbath.] We find none of these places mentioned elsewhere in Scripture, but only Abel-meholah, in 1 Kings iv. 12. xix. 16. which being in the tribe of Manasseh, not far from the river Jordan, may support a conjecture, that the rest of the places were in the way thither.

Ver. 23. And the men of Israel gathered themselves together out of Naphtali, and out of Asher.] He had sent to these tribes at the first raising of his army, and also to Zebulun, who, being neighbours, came to join him, (vi. 35.)

And out of all Manasseh.] Who were the forwardest in this enterprise, being his own tribe.

And pursued after the Midianites.] Though they had been lately disbanded by God's order, yet it is likely they lay ready, if there should be occasion, to help to complete the victory.

Ver. 24. And Gideon sent messengers throughout all Mount Ephraim.] He was desirous that others should have some share with him, in finishing this work; though he alone, with some few began it, and were exposed to all the danger. Would to God (saith P. Martyr on this occasion) that we were of this spirit in the church of Christ, that when any noble work is begun, we would call in all to help to perfect it: but, alas! such are our sins, we oft-times do all we are able to hinder one another.

Saying, Come down against the Midianites.] He invites them to come to his assistance against the common enemy; which his small handful of men were not sufficient to destroy, though they had entirely routed them.

And take before them the waters.] He would have them make such haste, as to possess themselves of the fords, before the Midianites could get to them.

Unto Beth-barah and Jordan.] It is very probable, that Beth-barah is the same place with Beth-abara in St. John's gospel, (i. 28.) being the place where the Israelites passed over Jordan, when they first entered Canaan: and then by Jordan must be meant all the fords upon this river, from Beth-barah to the lake of Gennesaret.

Then all the men of Ephraim gathered themselves together, and took the waters unto Beth-barah and Jordan.] Posted themselves all along the river, from the lake beforementioned unto Beth-barah.

Ver. 25. And they took two princes of the Midianites.] Two great commanders, as the word sarim signifies, which we translate princes.

Oreb and Zeeb.] From hence some gather that the Midianitish language did not much differ from the Hebrew: in which Oreb signifies a crow, and Zeeb a wolf; from which creatures, and such-like, it seems very anciently great men thought fit to take the names of their families: as the Romans did afterward, (among whom we read of the Corvini, and Gracchi, and Aquilini, &c.) either as omens, or as monuments of their undaunted courage and dexterity in military achievements.

And they slew Oreb upon the rock Oreb.] It is likely that there he was taken hidden in some hole, and from his slaughter there the rock had its name in future times.

And Zeeb they slew at the wine-press of Zeeb.] Where he also, in like manner, being taken and slain, gave name to this place.

And pursued Midian.] Did not content themselves with this, but pursued them to the other side of Jordan; whither some of them had escaped, before they would obey Gideon's summons.

And brought the heads of Oreb and Zeeb to Gideon.] As the manner was in aftertimes, when they would gratify a great conqueror with a welcome spectacle: for thus Pompey's head was offered to Cæsar, and Cicero's to Mark Antony.

On the other side Jordan.] Over which we read (viii. 4.) Gideon passed, in the pursuit of the enemy.

CHAP. VIII.

Ver. 1. AND the men of Ephraim said unto him.] When they presented the heads of the two princes unto him.

Why hast thou served us thus?] They thought themselves slighted by their brethren of the tribe of Manasseh; which they took the more heinously, because they looked upon themselves to be every way superior to them, by the blessing of Jacob.

That thou calledst us not when thou wentest to fight with the Midianites.] As he had done other meaner tribes, (vi. 35.) who were not so able to assist him as themselves.

And they did chide with him sharply.] Spake very angry words, as if they would have come to blows.

Ver. 2. And he said, What have I done now in comparison with you?] Proud men love to be praised; and therefore he magnifies their service as far surpassing his own.

Is not the gleaning of the grapes of Ephraim, better than the vintage of Abi-ezer?] A common proverb, I suppose, in those days, whereby they were wont to commend the smallest action of one, as superior to the greatest of another: and here it is most fitly applied; for it is as if he had said, These scattered parties that you have gleaned and picked up (as we now speak) at the fords of Jordan, are far more than those which I and my whole host (as it is called, vii. 15.) have destroyed.

Ver. 3. God hath delivered into your hands the princes of Midian, Oreb and Zeeb.] Which he was content they should think more considerable than all the common men that he had vanquished.

And what was I able to do in comparison with you?] To yield unto others the glory which they affect, wonderfully appeases their highest displeasure.

Then their anger was abated towards him when he had said that.] According to that of Solomon, Prov. xv. 1. This is an argument of the singular modesty and prudence of Gideon, and no less conspicuous in him than his courage; which is a mixture that rarely meets together, but is absolutely necessary to make a truly great man; who never appears so great, as when he treats insolent men with humility, and angry men with meekness.

Ver. 4. And Gideon came to Jordan, and passed over.] Or rather, had passed over; for he was gone over Jordan before Oreb and Zeeb were taken; but it is not related till now, that what concerned the Ephraimites might be told altogether without interruption.

He and the three hundred men that were with him.] Not one of which was lost.

Faint, yet pursuing them.] Tired with a long march, and eager pursuit; which notwithstanding they continued, being more solicitous for the public safety than their own.

Ver. 5. And he said unto the men of Succoth.] A city in the tribe of Gad, mentioned in Gen. xxxiii. 17. and other places.

Give, I pray you, loaves of bread unto the people that follow me.] A small request, considering their great merits.

For they be faint, and I am pursuing after Zebah and Zalmunna.] He gives two reasons for his request; because his men were faint with a whole night's labour for the public safety, and he had not made his victory so complete as he hoped to do, if his men were refreshed and enabled to pursue the enemy.

Kings of Midian.] It is no wonder we read of more kings than one in this country, there being five in Moses's time, (Numb. xxxi. 8.) and more than five times five in Canaan, which was divided into many petty kingdoms: and therefore, if we take Oreb and Zeeb also to have been kings, there is no improbability in it.

Ver. 6. And the princes of Succoth said.] The rulers and governors of the city, who had the chief authority among them; as Oreb and Zeeb had in the army of Midian, for it is the very same word in the Hebrew.

Are the hands of Zebah and Zalmunna now in thy hand, that we should give bread unto thy army?] They bid him first take those kings captives, and bring them thither with their hands bound behind them, before he made any demands of them. It is a bitter sort of taunt or derision, arising from irreligion; which made them think there was nothing of God in this victory, and that he would not be able to perfect it.

Ver. 7. And Gideon said, Therefore when the Lord hath delivered Zebah and Zalmunna into my hand.] As he was confident he would.

Then will I tear your flesh with the thorns of the wilderness, and with briers.] This city was near to a wilderness, in which there were plenty of thorns and briers; with which he threatens to thrash their flesh, as the word is in the Hebrew: which some think signifies, that laying briers and thorns on their naked bodies, he intended to bring the cart-wheel over them (as the manner was of thrashing out their corn) to fasten them deep in their flesh, and then crush them to death: such a kind of punishment David inflicted on the Ammonites, (2 Sam. xii. ult.)

Ver. 8. And he went up from thence.] He would not stay to avenge this repulse at present, but sacrificed his private resentments to the public service, and therefore went on after the enemy.

Unto Penuel.] Another city in the tribe of Gad, not far from Succoth; unto both which Jacob gave their name, (Gen. xxxii. 30. xxxiii. 17.)

And spake unto them likewise.] Desired some provision of them, for the same reason.

And the men of Penuel.] i. e. The principal persons of the city.

Answered him as the men of Succoth had answered him.] It is very likely they were idolaters; and therefore hated Gideon, who began to reform religion: and, trusting to the strength of their tower, despised the small forces he had with him.

Ver. 9. And he spake unto the men of Penuel, saying, When I come again in peace, I will break down this tower.] In which they confided; and perhaps pointed to it, when they gave him their rude answer.

Ver. 10. Now Zebah and Zalmunna were in Karkor.] We read of this place no where else; and therefore it is but a conjecture that it was in the confines of the tribe of Gad. St. Jerome saith, there was a castle in his time called Carcaria, about a day's journey from the city Petra; and Eusebius saith the same.

And all the hosts with them.] That is, all the troops or regiments, as we now speak, that fled with them.

About fifteen thousand men, all that were left of all the hosts of the children of the east.] This moved those of Succoth and Penuel to mock at Gideon; that he should think with three hundred men, and they fatigued (as we now speak), to vanquish fifteen thousand, and that he should make demands to them, as if he had his enemies already in his power.

For there fell a hundred and twenty thousand men that drew sword.] Besides all the people that attended their baggage.

Ver. 11. And Gideon went up by the way of them that dwelt in tents.] He fetched a compass, by the country of the Arabians called Scenitæ, because they dwelt in tents: and so he came upon the back of Zebah and Zalmunna; where they suspected no danger.

On the east of Nobah and Jogbehah.] Two cities, the last of which is expressly said to be in the tribe of Gad, Numb. xxxii. 35. and the former in the tribe of Manasseh, on the borders of Gad, as may be gathered from this place.

And smote the host: for the host was secure.] He fell upon them, it is very probable, in the night, as he had done upon their main army at the first: and they having fled as fast as they could, the day, and part of the night before, were gone to take their rest; supposing they had been out of all danger of disturbance, now they were got so far from the place of battle.

Ver. 12. And when Zebah and Zalmunna fled, he pursued after them.] We read of no refreshment that he and his men had all this time; but either they met with some by the way, or God miraculously supported them.

And took the two kings of Midian, Zebah and Zalmunna, and discomfited all the host.] Having routed their army, the two kings could make little resistance.

Ver. 13. And Gideon the son of Joash returned from the battle before the sun was up.] The Hebrew words milmahaleh hachares are so variously translated by very learned men, that it hath made it uncertain whether he returned after sun-rise, or a little before it set (as Kimchi among the Jews, and Mercer among Christians understand it), or, as our translation, before sun-rise: so the Vulgar, with Junius, and Tremellius, and others. And then it shews, both that Gideon had smote the army in the night, and that he made such haste to return, that he came to Succoth before they were aware, by break of day.

Ver. 14. And caught a young man of the men of Succoth, and inquired of him.] Surprised him in the field, and examined him who were the principal men of the city.

And he described to him the princes of Succoth, and the elders thereof, even threescore and seventeen men.] He wrote down (as the Hebrew word for describe signifies) the names, and, perhaps, the dwellings of the great men of the city, and of the judges; who were the persons that derided him, and whom alone he intended to punish; not all the people, who were not in the guilt.

Ver. 15. And he came unto the men of Succoth.] Got into the city very early; and called those men before him, who had put the late affront upon him.

And said, Behold Zebah and Zalmunna, with whom you upbraided me.] He kept these two kings alive, on purpose that the princes of Succoth might see the Lord had delivered them into his hand; and made their jeers turn to their own shame.

Saying, Are the hands of Zebah and Zalmunna in thy hand, that we should give bread unto thy men that are weary?] He repeats their own words to them, (ver. 6.) that he might reproach them with their inhuman usage of him; when he was in distress, and had done such wonders for their preservation.

Ver. 16. And he took the elders of the city.] Under this name of elders, all their great men are comprehended.

And thorns of the wilderness, and briers.] Which he had ready at hand.

And with them he taught the men of Succoth.] He thrashed or tare them (as he threatened, ver. 7. and as some copies here have it), and by this severe correction taught them better manners, and more wisdom. It is not said that he tormented them till they expired, (as some think he did, see ver. 7.) for then it would have been as plainly said, as it is in the next verse of the men of Penuel.

Ver. 17. And he beat down the tower of Penuel, and slew the men of the city.] It is not said the princes and elders, and therefore this looks as if the whole city had been guilty of the affront put upon him, and consequently punished by him. But the men of the city in this story, hath signified only the principal persons in it, as I interpreted ver. 8. (see ver. 15, 16.) and therefore it is probable no other men are here meant, who fled into the tower, perhaps, for safety (knowing their own guilt, and the danger they were in of suffering for it), and were there slain.

Ver. 18. Then said he unto Zebah and Zalmunna, What manner of men were they whom ye slew at Tabor?] Where Gideon brought them before him to be judged, is uncertain: and when it was that they slew some Israelites at Tabor, we can but guess. It is probable he brought them out to receive their sentence after he came home: and that some who hid themselves in dens and caves, which were in the mountains, (vi. 2.) being found out, were slain by the Midianites. And Gideon's brethren being missing, he desired to find out, whether they were the persons whom they slew.

And they answered, As thou art, so were they.] They were very like him, and perhaps resembled him in their countenance; as brethren frequently do one another.

Every one resembled the children of a king.] By this it appears, that Gideon was of a goodly presence; carrying greatness and majesty in his aspect: and that kings took care in those days to match only with graceful persons; by whom they might hope to have children like to themselves.

Ver. 19. And he said, They were my brethren, even the sons of my mother.] Though, perhaps, not by the same father.

As the Lord liveth, if ye had spared them alive.] As generous men are wont to do comely and graceful persons; who look like men of quality, as we now speak.

I would not slay you.] For not being of the race of Canaan, he was not bound by the law to cut them off.

Ver. 20. And he said unto Jether his first-born, Up, and slay them.] It was not unusual for great persons to do execution upon offenders in ancient times; no more than it unbecame them to sentence them to death: and therefore they had not, as now, such as the Romans called carnifices, public executioners; but Saul bade such as waited on him kill the priests; and Doeg, one of his great officers, did it, (1 Sam. xxii. 17, 18.) And Samuel himself is said to have hewed Agag to pieces in Gilgal; and Benaiah, the general of the army, to have fallen upon Joab at the horns of the altar. Accordingly Gideon would have had his son do this execution, that he might be early animated against the enemies of Israel; as Hannibal is reported, when he was a boy, to have been incensed against the Romans.

But the youth drew not his sword; for he feared, because he was yet a youth.] They were men, it is likely, of great stature, and of a fierce and stern countenance, who (as appears by the story) feared not death; which made the youth afraid even to look upon them.

Ver. 21. Then Zebah and Zalmunna said, Arise thou, and fall upon us: for as the man is, so is his strength.] They thought it more honourable to die by the hand of Gideon, who was a man of as great strength as dignity; and would sooner dispatch them, than a stripling could do.

And Gideon arose, and slew Zebah and Zalmunna, and took away the ornaments that were about their camels' necks.] As well as all the ornaments which they wore themselves. The word saharonim is found no where but here, and ver. 26. and in Isaiah iii. 18. where we translate it round tires like the moon. So our margin also in this place, ornaments like the moon; following the LXX. who translate it μηνίσκους, little moons. So ancient was this custom of wearing ornaments of this figure; which was spread afterward over many nations. Huetius thinks it came originally from the Phœnicians, who were the worshippers of Astarte, i. e. the moon; and went from them to the Arabians, who were very anciently devoted to the moon, who propagated it to the Turks; and the Brachmans also are wont to adorn their heads in the same figure; as he observes in his Demonstr. Evangel. propos. iv. p. 197.

Ver. 22. Then the men of Israel said unto Gideon, Rule thou over us, both thou, and thy son, and thy son's son also.] They would have made his dominion over them hereditary.

For thou hast delivered us from the hand of Midian.] They pretended to make this offer out of gratitude to him; but, in truth, they were disposed now (as their posterity were afterward) to throw off the Divine government; being desirous to set a king over themselves, like the rest of the nations round about them. And now they thought was a fit opportunity; when such an extraordinary judge was raised up, as had done wonders beyond all his predecessors; and might, they thought, be ambitious enough to establish the supreme authority in his family.

Ver. 23. But Gideon said, I will not rule over you, neither shall my son rule over you.] He absolutely rejected their offer; because he looked upon God as their king, who appointed what deputy he pleased to rule them: and therefore he accounted this to be an attempt to alter the government of God without asking his consent.

The Lord shall rule over you.] As he hath done hitherto. This shews that these two could not consist together; a successive dominion of kings and such governors as they now had by the Divine appointment. Such a one was Gideon, raised up by God when they needed a deliverer; and therefore he durst not accept of the authority they offered him, because it was a thing sacred, and proper only to the Divine Majesty to order who should govern: whence it is that the judgment which was administered among that people was called God's judgment, Deut. i. 17. and Solomon is said to sit upon the throne of the Lord, 1 Chron. xxix. 23. and the kingdom of his posterity is called the kingdom of the Lord, 2 Chron. xiii. 8. because, before kings were settled in Israel, the Lord was their king; from whom the government was derived to the house of David by a special act of God.

Ver. 24. And Gideon said unto them, I would desire a request of you.] Which he thought, after such a great offer from them, they would not deny him.

That ye would give me every man the ear-rings of his prey.] He doth not ask all the ear-rings they had got; but from every man one, or as many as he pleased.

For they had golden ear-rings, because they were Ishmaelites.] The Chaldee paraphrast well expresses it, because they were Arabians, who are called the children of the east, (vi. 3.) and generally wore such ornaments, as I observed upon Exod. xxxii. 2. Ishmaelites, also, and Midianites, were so near neighbours, and so mixed together, that the Scripture speaks of them as one people. (See upon Gen. xxxvii. 28.)

Ver. 25. And they answered, We will willingly give them. And they spread a garment, and did cast therein every man the ear-rings of his prey.] They made no difficulty to grant his request; but, as we speak, no sooner said than done.

Ver. 26. And the weight of the golden ear-rings that he requested was a thousand and seven hundred shekels of gold.] It is easy to compute what this makes of our money, by considering the value of a shekel, and the proportion that silver holds to gold. Of which see the very learned treatise of the Bishop of Peterborough, concerning Scripture Weights and Measures, chap. 4.

Besides ornaments.] Of which see above, ver. 21.

And the collars.] The Hebrew word hanetiphoth is thought to signify little pots of precious ointments. For neteph signifies a drop, or a tear; the most precious of which is balsam. Among the spoils of Darius (as Arius Montanus observes) historians mention boxes of ointments set with precious stones, and curiously wrought with elegant art.

And purple raiment that was on the kings of Midian.] Who were distinguished from other men, as kings are now, by robes peculiar to them.

And beside the chains that were upon their camels' necks.] All these, I take it, fell to Gideon's share, by the custom of war, without asking. For it was the ancient manner, as Grotius observes, to give the commander-in-chief the best of the spoils they had taken.

Ver. 27. And Gideon made an ephod thereof.] He would not have them think that he requested the ear-rings for his own private gain; but to employ them religiously in the service of God, by making a monument of his victory, as obtained solely by the miraculous mercy of God, for the restoring of his true religion among them. It is commonly said, that so much gold could not be laid out upon an ephod; and therefore some take this for a short expression, to signify the breast-plate, with the urim and thummim; that he (being now supreme governor) might consult God at his own house, in such difficulties as might occur: and they think it probable that he made also a private tabernacle with cherubims: for how else could he employ such a quantity of gold? An ephod being only fine linen embroidered with it, &c. which would not cost much. (See Exod. xxviii. 6.) Theodoret and St. Austin seem to incline to this opinion; for which I refer the reader to our Dr. Spencer, in his most learned work De Leg. et Rit. Hebr. p. 881. But I do not see how Gideon can be excused from apostacy from God, if he set up an oracle in his own house; nor was there any need of it, Shiloh being not far from him, in the tribe of Ephraim, which adjoined to this of Manasseh. Therefore I take this ephod to have been only a monument of his victory, and of God's great mercy, which conquerors were wont to erect: but he would not follow the common custom in erecting a pillar, and hanging up trophies, or any thing of that nature; but chose to make an ephod, as a token that he ascribed his victory only to God, and triumphed in nothing, but only in the restoration of the true religion by his means. As for the gold that was laid out upon it, the reader may observe, that it is said he made an ephod thereof; that is, out of this offering; but not that it was all spent in this.

And put it in his city, even in Ophrah.] This is to be well noted; because I think it shews that Gideon did not make this that he might have resort to God thereby on all occasions at home; for he went and dwelt at another place, (ver. 29.) It was kept here therefore as a monument of God's appearing to him, and of the sacrifice the angel here offered, and of all the wonders that followed, by the power of God who dwelt in the sanctuary. There are those who think, that because God bade Gideon build an altar, and offer his father's second bullock in Ophrah, (vi. 26.) he thence concluded, he might take upon him to have priestly garments made, and the high-priest came to minister at Ophrah upon extraordinary occasions. But he understood religion better than to make such conclusions, unless he had received a Divine command for this, as he did for the building of an altar.

And all Israel went thither a whoring after it.] This, I suppose, was after his death, when the people began to return to idolatry; and had this fancy, among others, that God would answer them here where this ephod was, as well as at his tabernacle in Shiloh, where he dwelt.

Which thing became a snare unto Gideon, and his house.] Occasioned the ruin of him and of his family. For though they perished after his death, yet he may be said to have suffered with them, because his name and memory, which is preserved in men's posterity, was in a manner extinct in Israel.

Ver. 28. Thus was Midian subdued before the children of Israel, so that they lifted up their heads no more.] To oppress the Israelites; or, perhaps, to disturb any of their neighbours.

And the country was in quietness forty years in the days of Gideon.] The country was in quiet in the fortieth year after the former rest restored to it by Deborah and Barak, as our primate Usher understands it, in his Annals ad A. M. 2759. and in his Chronologia Sacra, par. i. cap. 13. where, in more words, he thus interprets it: In the fortieth year after the rest restored by Deborah and Barak, the land began to rest again in the days of Gideon, after he had subdued the Midianites, who had oppressed them seven years. But the plainest account is, that after seven years' oppression by the Midianites, the country was in peace forty years in the days of Gideon, who was their deliverer; and died, as we read ver. 32. in a good old age.

Ver. 29. And Jerubbaal the son of Joash went and dwelt in his own house.] Having refused to be a king, and dismissed his army, he went from Ophrah (as I understand it), and lived not so publicly as he had done, but in a private house of his own in the country.

Ver. 30. And Gideon had threescore and ten sons, of his body begotten.] These last words are added to shew, that they were none of them adopted sons.

For he had many wives.] According to the manner of those times. And this is said to lessen the wonder of having so many children; many women bringing two or three at a birth, and one woman having had above twenty children by one man.

Ver. 31. And his concubine.] The difference between a wife and a concubine hath been often noted. Their wives administered the affairs of the family, the concubines meddled not with them; but, as the word signifies, were only admitted to their beds: and their children did not inherit, though they were married to them; for they were not harlots, but a secondary sort of wives.

That was in Shechem.] A famous city in the tribe of Ephraim, adjoining to that of Manasseh; where, going frequently to judge the people, he took a wife of this sort, who lived constantly with her father in this city, and not in Gideon's family.

She also bare him a son.] Beside the seventy beforementioned, as Josephus understands it.

Whose name was Abimelech.] His name is here set down when nothing is said of the names of the rest, because the following story depends upon it. And perhaps his mother gave him this name (signifying my father a king) out of pride and arrogance, that she might be looked upon as the wife of one who was thought to deserve a kingdom, though he did not accept it: which afterward, it is likely, inflamed the mind of this son to affect the royal dignity.

Ver. 32. And Gideon the son of Joash died in a good old age.] This is a phrase often used in Scripture, to signify that such persons lived long and in great prosperity and happiness.

And was buried in the sepulchre of Joash his father, in Ophrah of the Abi-ezrites.] Which was accounted a great blessing in those days.

Ver. 33. And it came to pass, as soon as Gideon was dead, that the children of Israel turned again.] He preserved them, it seems, in the true religion while he lived; but they had no great affection to it, it appears, by their revolting from it as soon as he was dead.

And went a whoring after Baalim.] This seems to have been a general name of all the gods which they worshipped, particularly of demons, which were all called Baalim from the first demon, or deified king in the world, Belus or Baal, as Mr. Mede thinks, book iii. p. 777.

And made Baal-berith their god.] They worshipped a new god, which was not known to them before, nor ever mentioned but here and in the next chapter: who was reputed, as some think, the god that punished those who broke their covenants and contracts; or, as others, was so called because his servants covenanted to maintain his worship and service. But Bochartus, by a more probable conjecture, interprets it Baal of Berith, i. e. of Berytus. That Baal which was worshipped in that famous city which had its name from Beroe, the daughter of Venus and Adonis, who was there worshipped, as Nonnus tells us. This he takes to be the Baal here mentioned; for Baal is of the feminine gender as well as of the masculine, as appears from St. Paul, Rom. xi. 4. and many places of the LXX. which Bochartus mentions, lib. ii. Canaan, cap. 17.

Ver. 34. And the children of Israel remembered not the Lord their God, who had delivered them out of the hands of all their enemies on every side.] Out of the hand of the king of Mesopotamia, and then of the Moabites, and after that of the Canaanites, and now lately of the Midianites and the children of the east.

Ver. 35. Neither shewed they kindness to the house of Jerubbaal, namely Gideon.] No wonder they were so ungrateful to his family when they were so forgetful of God: the fear of whom is the foundation of all virtue.

According to all the goodness which he had shewn unto Israel.] In hazarding his life freely, and working for them a glorious deliverance; and in leaving them in their liberty, by refusing the despotic power which they offered to put into his hands; and in governing them so prudently many years, that he left them in peace, and in the possession of God's true religion, when he died.

CHAP. IX.

Ver. 1. AND Abimelech the son of Jerubbaal went.] From his father's house, where it is likely he was educated.

Unto Shechem.] The place of his nativity.

Unto his mother's brethren.] Though the word brethren has many times a large signification, yet it is reasonable here to understand it properly, of his uncles by the mother's side; for his other near kindred are mentioned in the words following.

And communed with them, and with all the family of the house of his mother's father, saying.] Discoursed with them, and with all the rest of his cousins, and his near kinsmen, descended from his grandfather.

Ver. 2. Speak, I pray you, in the ears of all the men of Shechem.] By the men of this city are to be understood, the chief persons of authority in it, as in the foregoing chapter the men of Succoth signify the princes and elders of that place.

Whether is better for you, either that all the sons of Jerubbaal (which are threescore and ten persons) reign over you, or that one reign over you.] He wickedly supposed that the sons of Jerubbaal were ambitious of the kingdom which their father refused; and therefore prays them to consider, what horrible divisions and confusion it would make, if so many were permitted to pretend to the government; and how much better it would be to choose one of them from among the rest; pointing then (in the next words) to himself. He uses the argument of Homer, mentioned by Aristotle, οὐχ' ἀγαθὸν πολυκοιρανίη, &c. It is better to be subject to the rule of one man than of many.

Remember also that I am your bone and your flesh.] Since there must be a king, he represents himself, as the most desirable to them of all other single persons, he being of the same tribe, and their fellow-citizen.

Ver. 3. And his mother's brethren spake of him in the ears of the men of Shechem, all these words.] They were ready enough to promote his design, hoping for preferment under him. But neither he nor they considered, that it did not belong to them to set a judge over the people, much less a king, which was to shake off the government of God.

And their hearts inclined to follow Abimelech, for they said, He is our brother.] This consideration of their interest in him, prevailed with them against the clearest reason. For if it had been in any person's power to appoint a king, but God alone, the men of Shechem had it not in them, but all the men of Israel ought to have been consulted.

Ver. 4. And they gave him threescore and ten pieces of silver out of the house of Baal-berith.] Out of the public treasury, which was in this temple. It is uncertain what is meant by pieces of silver; but, in all probability, more than shekels; for they would have been but a small present to make a man a prince. Therefore the Vulgar translates it so many pound weight of silver, which learned men approve of, particularly Stanislaus Grepsius, in his book de Siclo et Talento. For seventy shekels were too little for his occasions; and so many talents too much for them to give. And thus Josephus interprets Gen. xxxvii. 28. where it is said, Joseph was sold to the Ishmaelites for twenty pieces of silver; that is, for so many pound weight of it.

Wherewith Abimelech hired vain and light persons.] The Hebrew word rekim, which we translate vain, signifies empty; that is, poor and needy persons: and the other word, pochazim, idle, vagabond fellows, that could settle to no business, but wandered about the country; who being commonly men of loose lives, were fittest for his purpose. Therefore Kimchi understands by them light-headed persons (as we speak), who have no settled principles, but are disposed to do any thing, though never so wicked. Such Zephaniah saith the prophets in his time were, (iii. 4.) light and treacherous.

Which followed him.] As a constant guard to him.

Ver. 5. And he went into his father's house at Ophrah.] With this wicked crew to attend him; who, I suppose, beset the house, that none might escape out of it. I supposed that he had a house in the country, viii. 29. for I could not see with what propriety he could be said to go and dwell in his house at Ophrah, in which he had always lived. But this was the house of the family, where all his children lived.

And slew his brethren the sons of Jerubbaal, being threescore and ten persons.] All of them except Jotham. Thus Romulus slew his brother Remus, as Tully observes, (lib. iii. de Officiis) " Specie quadam utilitatis," under the specious pretence of the public good; that the kingdom would be governed more happily by one, than by two persons.

Upon one stone.] Some understand this, as if he intended to make them a great victim to Baal; for a stone was sometimes used for an altar, 1 Sam. vi. 14, 15. And so they take this to have been done in revenge of the sacrifice of the bullock prepared for Baal upon the rock, (vi. 25, 26.) which crime of Gideon, as these idolaters accounted it, they designed to expiate by the sacrifice of all his sons that they could lay hold on. For that the men of Shechem joined in this impious slaughter, is manifest from ver. 18. and 24. of this chapter.

Notwithstanding, yet Jotham, the youngest son of Jerubbaal, was left; for he hid himself.] Either he had some notice of their intention, and saved himself by flight, or, when they came to seize them, got into some secret place in the house, where they could not find him; or, by some that pitied his youth, he was preserved from falling into their hands. So the LXX. and the Vulgar translate it, He was hid.

Ver. 6. And all the men of Shechem gathered themselves together, and all the house of Millo.] None seem to have understood these words better than Corn. Bertram, in his little book de Republ. Jud. cap. 9. where by col-baale Shechem he understands all the principal men or lords of that city; principes civitatis, the princes of the city, by whom it was governed: and by col-beth Millo, all the citizens, who in a full assembly (for Millo signifies fulness) agreed upon what follows: and so we read in the next chapter, (x. 18.) that the people and princes of Gilead consulted together, who should fight for them; that is, all the citizens met together, with their elders, (as these princes are called, xi. 5.) to advise about this matter: for when the Canaanites, and other people, ruled over the Israelites and oppressed them, they contented themselves with setting such a power over them, as should make them pay what tribute they imposed, and other taxes; but left them to their own government and laws, as appears from viii. 14. where we read of the elders of Succoth in the time of the Midianites.

And went.] To the place where they were wont to meet for public business.

And made Abimelech king.] Voted him their king, in full senate.

In the plain of the pillar that was in Shechem.] Or the oak (as St. Jerome commonly translates this word elon), where Joshua set up a pillar as a token of the covenant between God and them, Josh. xxiv. 26. That is, in a very remarkable place, as the manner was to do such things: but here, I suppose, they proclaimed him king, after they had chosen him in the common hall of the city: and some think they intended hereby to declare, that they would not forsake the worship of God, to which they were engaged, but only to join the worship of Baal with him: but see what I have noted of this pillar, Deut. xxvii. 13. And after all it must be confessed, that the Hebrew word mutzab doth not certainly signify a pillar; for I cannot find it so used in any other place of Scripture: and therefore St. Jerome translates this passage thus, By the oak which stood in Shechem, and the LXX. ἐν βαλάνῳ τῆς ὀτάσιως, which seems to signify as if it was the place where they had their stations, or solemn assemblies. See Mr. Mede's Discourse xviii.

Ver. 7. And when they told it Jotham.] Who had some friends among them, that took care to inform him of what passed: but it is an amazing thing, that in all Israel there should none be found to revenge the murder of this noble family: of which no account can be given, but that, with the sense of God and religion, they had lost all goodness and virtue. (See viii. 34, 35.)

He went.] From the place where he lay hid.

And stood on the top of Mount Gerizim.] Which overlooked the city of Shechem. (See Deut. xxvii. 12, 13.)

And lifted up his voice and cried, and said unto them.] This was not on the same day that Abimelech was inaugurated, but some time after; when he, it is probable, was absent, and all the people met (as Josephus saith) at a public festival; which was a fair opportunity for him to declare his mind to them.

Hearken unto me, ye men of Shechem, that God may hearken unto you.] It is a form of adjuration, whereby he not only intreats, but obliges them to be as attentive to him, as they desired God would be to their requests.

Ver. 8. The trees went forth on a time.] By this it appears, that such fictions as these, wherein the most serious truths are represented, were in use among the Jews (as they are still in the eastern countries) long before the time of Æsop, or any other author that we know of. And they made choice of them for two reasons; because men would suffer themselves to be reprehended this way, when they would not endure plain words; and they heard them also with delight and pleasure, and more easily remembered them than a rational discourse. So A. Gellius observes of Æsop's Fables, that they slid into the mind and affections of men, cum audiendi quadam illecebra, with a certain enticement to hear them, (lib. ii. cap. 29.)

To anoint a king over them.] This was two hundred years (as Mr. Selden observes in his Titles of Honour) before the first kings of Israel (Saul and David) were anointed. Which shews the great antiquity of this custom; and that it was the same to anoint a person, and to declare him king.

And they said unto the olive-tree, Reign thou over us.] By this they would easily apprehend he meant his father Gideon; to whom all the Israelites had offered the kingdom, when he was in a most flourishing condition, and had newly triumphed over their enemies.

Ver. 9. But the olive-tree said unto them.] In this reply he represents his refusal of the offer, and the reason of it.

Shall I leave my fatness, wherewith by me they honour God and man.] He makes the trees speak after the manner of men; who, when they are in a plentiful condition, and live at ease, are not willing to take upon themselves a great deal of care and trouble, especially when they think themselves to have honour enough already; as Gideon had, in being such a glorious conqueror over mighty enemies. God and man are said to be honoured by oil, because it was offered in sacrifice to God, and fed the lamps of his house; and priests were wont to be anointed with it among men. (See Lev. ii. 1. 4. Numb. xv. 4. 6, &c.)

And go to be promoted among the trees?] This is a most lively representation of the duty of a good man; who, for the public good, denies his own quiet and tranquillity. For the Hebrew word we translate promote, signifies (as is noted in the margin) action and agitation to and fro; shewing how a man must bestir himself who executes the kingly office; and what solicitude and continual carefulness is the concomitant of authority, when it is duly administered.

Ver. 10. And the trees said unto the fig-tree, Come thou and reign over us.] He intends to represent the same mind to be in all Gideon's sons that was in their father: for as Gideon refused the kingdom himself, so he did for his posterity, saying, I will not rule over you, neither shall my son, or my son's son (i. e. any of mine) rule over you, (viii. 23.) Therefore Abimelech had most vilely slandered them in suggesting that they affected a regal power over the people.

Ver. 11. But the fig-tree said unto them, Shall I forsake my sweetness, and my good fruit, and go to be promoted over the trees?] No fruit is more luscious than a fig, which makes this an apt representation of the sweet content, or rather full pleasure, that may be enjoyed in a private life, which it would be folly to exchange for the troubles and cares which men meet withal in the managery of public affairs, if they be not drawn to it purely out of love to the public good.

Ver. 12. Then said the trees unto the vine, Come thou and reign over us.] All these are noble trees, setting forth the same thing, that better men than Abimelech had refused that of which he was ambitious.

Ver. 13. And the vine said unto them, Shall I leave my wine, which cheereth God and man, and go to be promoted over the trees?] The same thing is repeated for the fuller illustration of the thing intended, according to the manner of all such ways of speech: for A. Gellius, in the place beforenamed, makes the birds among the corn, when it was to be reaped, say the same thing more than once to their dam before she bade them be gone. As for wine cheering God and man, it is a form of speech imitated by the heathen, particularly by Virgil, lib. ii. Georg. ver. 101. where speaking of noble vines, or wine, he saith, they were "Mensis et Diis accepta secundis." For wine, as the Hebrew doctors note, was not only used in their sacrifices, as it was also among the heathen; but Jarchi saith, Till the drink-offering was poured out, they did not begin the hymn that was then sung to God. (See upon Numb. xv. 5.)

Ver. 14. Then said all the trees unto the bramble, &c.] The meanest of all trees, good for nothing but to be burnt, aptly representing Abimelech, from whom they could receive no benefit, but much trouble and vexation from his ambitious cruelty.

Ver. 15. And the bramble said unto them, If in truth ye anoint me king over you.] This well sets forth Abimelech's distrust of the sincerity of the Shechemites; for which he had great reason, having no title to the kingdom but the great achievements of his father, and he the basest of all his sons.

Then come and put your trust in my shadow.] Be assured of my protection, if you live quietly under my government. This represents how ridiculous Abimelech was, in imagining that he should be able to maintain the authority of a king; for a bramble doth not spread itself so as to afford any shelter or shadow, it being a kind of a thorn, which the Hebrews call atad. From whence, as Avenarius observes, came the word aphris among the Greeks, and in Dioscorides the word ἀταδίμ. And from hence he thinks was derived the word οὐτάω, and οὐτάζω, which signify to wound, as a thorn doth when it pricks.

And if not, let fire come out of the bramble.] It is a wood that easily catches fire, as Forsterus observes out of Josephus, lib. v. Antiq. cap. 11.

And devour the cedars of Lebanon.] This represents the vengeance Abimelech would take of the greatest of them, if they proved unfaithful to him.

Ver. 16. Now therefore.] Here follows Jotham's application of this apologue, as the Greeks call it, unto his purpose.

If ye have done truly and sincerely in that ye have made Abimelech king.] If his preferment was a righteous act.

And if ye have dealt well with Jerubbaal and his house, and have done unto him according to the deserving of his hand.] And if they had requited Gideon and his family according to his merits, which were exceeding great.

Ver. 17. For my father fought for you, and adventured his life far.] Put it in great hazard.

And delivered you out of the hand of Midian.] When they were sorely oppressed by them, and could not help themselves.

Ver. 18. And ye are risen up against my father's house this day.] This shews the men of Shechem consented to the murder, and assisted Abimelech in it.

And have slain his sons, threescore and ten persons.] For they intended the slaughter of Jotham, as much as of the rest, if he could have been found.

Upon one stone, and have made Abimelech, the son of his maid-servant.] For concubines were often put to do the work of the house

King over the men of Shechem.] Who could not pretend to make him king over all Israel: no, nor over the whole tribe of Ephraim, but only of their city and territory.

Because he is your brother.] Without any title to it, but because he was a native of their city.

Ver. 19. If you have done truly and sincerely.] Like honest and upright men.

With Jerubbaal and his house this day, then rejoice ye in Abimelech, and let him rejoice in you.] He wishes they may be happy in one another.

Ver. 20. But if not, let fire come from Abimelech, and devour the men of Shechem, and the house of Millo.] This is not a prediction, but an execration or curse, as appears from the opposition to the foregoing wish, and from ver. 57. where it is called Jotham's curse. Which was not causeless, but like that of Joshua's, (Josh. vi. 26.) which was fulfilled, as this was. Not by fire, properly so called, breaking forth from Abimelech, but by his rage and furious revenge, which is fitly compared to fire, in allusion to what is said of the bramble, (ver. 15.)

And let fire come out from the men of Shechem, and from the house of Millo, and devour Abimelech.] He wishes they may mutually destroy each other, which came to pass by the righteous judgment of God, who hears the cries of the oppressed.

Ver. 21. And Jotham ran away, and fled.] As he might easily do, I have shewn upon Deut. xxvii. 13. The first word signifies, he made what haste he could away, as soon as he had done speaking; and the second, that he stopped not till he had got to a place of safety.

And went to Beer, and dwelt there, for fear of Abimelech his brother.] It is not certain where this place was, whether in the land of Israel, or out of it. It is probable, that it was in the tribe of Judah, about eight miles from Eleutheropolis, as both Eusebius and St. Jerome affirm.

Ver. 22. When Abimelech had reigned three years over Israel.] It is not said, over all Israel, who, it cannot be thought, would submit to the ambitious tyranny of so cruel a man as Abimelech was. And if Beer was in the tribe of Judah, we may be sure they did not own him for their king; for then Jotham could not have dwelt in safety there. The meaning therefore is, that he called himself king of Israel, and reigned over a great part of them, who were so desirous of a king (it appears by their offer made to Gideon), that they were content with him, rather than have none at all.

Ver. 23. And God sent an evil spirit between Abimelech and the men of Shechem.] At the three years' end, I suppose, God ordered things so in his providence, that they grew jealous and distrustful one of another, and fell into dissensions and discords.

And the men of Shechem dealt treacherously with Abimelech.] Conspired against him. So true is the observation of Grotius upon these words, that nothing is more unstable than the popular breath which is won by evil arts, and that men hate the wickedness which hath done them service.

Ver. 24. That the cruelty done to the threescore and ten sons of Jerubbaal might come, and their blood be laid upon their brother Abimelech, which slew them.] By this means God intended to punish Abimelech for the cruel murder of his brethren, whose blood cried for vengeance on him.

And upon the men of Shechem, which aided him in the killing of his brethren.] And to punish the men of Shechem, who enabled him to commit that wickedness, and helped him in it.

Ver. 25. And the men of Shechem set liers in wait for him, on the top of the mountains.] They were not yet broken out into open hostility against him; but there being a misunderstanding between them, Abimelech, I suppose, left the city in anger; but they thought he would return again, and thereupon set men to lie secretly on the top of the mountains over which he was to pass, to seize his person.

And they robbed all that came that way by them.] That the report coming to Abimelech's ears (as Arius Montanus understands it) how insecure his subjects were who passed that road, he might make the more speed, as good kings are bound to do, to clear the way from those thieves which infested it, and thereby give them an opportunity to seize him.

And it was told Abimelech.] What robberies were committed, and, perhaps, that they lay in wait for him.

Ver. 26. And Gael the son of Ebed.] We have no means to know who this Gael was, nor whence he came. R. Solomon thinks he was a gentile, and not one of the Jewish nation.

Came with his brethren.] He passed accidentally that way (as P. Martyr thinks) with his brethren and his attendants, about some business they had in that country: but the common opinion is, that he was a known enemy of Abimelech's, who hearing the men of Shechem were at defiance with him, came to offer them his service against him.

And the men of Shechem put their confidence in him.] That is, put themselves under his protection.

Ver. 27. And they went out into the fields, and gathered their vineyards, and trod the grapes.] Their first action under this new commander, was to go out of their city into their vineyards, which were in the fields, and gather their grapes, and press them, which they durst not do before, though the vintage was ripe, for fear of Abimelech; who being told how things stood there, had raised forces I suppose against them, but durst not now disturb them in their business, they being defended by Gael.

And made merry.] As they were wont to do in time of vintage, and now especially, when they were full of joy in hope to be rid of Abimelech's tyranny. The LXX. of the Vatican edition retain the Hebrew word, and translate it they made Ἐλλουλίμ, whereby some understand songs, as others dances: both are expressed by the Vulgar, and other copies of the LXX. have χορούς; for their merriment consisted very much in dances, with music and songs; which, as Max. Tyrius observes, were among the Greeks first used, and in honour of Bacchus, when they pressed out their grapes. (See Dr. Spencer, lib. iii. dissert. i. cap. 9.)

And went into the house of their god.] It is most likely into the temple of Baal-berith; there to offer their first-fruits, or such other sacrifices as were customary at that festival.

And did eat and drink.] Upon that part of the sacrifices which fell to the share of the people, who, perhaps, engaged in a covenant against Abimelech.

And cursed Abimelech.] Some think they only scoffed at him with taunts and reproaches, as men used to do in their cups: but the LXX. translate it κατηράσαντο, which signifies cursing, as we translate it; that is, they wished their god would confound him. And so we translate this word, Lev. xx. 9. Prov. xx. 20. A marvellous change, that they who lately gave him a great sum of money to advance him to the throne, should, in that very house from whence they took it, reproach him with imprecations of the Divine vengeance upon him.

Ver. 28. And Gael the son of Ebed said.] In the midst of this jollity, Gael (being elevated, I suppose, with wine) burst forth into this insulting language.

Who is Abimelech.] That is, he is but the son of a maid-servant, (ver. 18.)

And who is Shechem.] Some think he means the city of Shechem is as noble as he is base: why, therefore, should they be subject to him? but it seems, by what follows, to be rather the same thing repeated, Who, I say, is the Shechemite?

That we should serve him?] Suffer him to rule over us, and use us as he pleases.

Is he not the son of Jerubbaal?] Who threw down the altar of that god whom you worship.

And Zebul his officer.] Hath he not set one of his servants over you to be your governor?

Serve the men of Hamor the father of Shechem.] If we must be servants, let us restore the dominion of the old lords of this city, and subject ourselves to those who are descended from the ancient stock of Hamor; who was the father, as it were, of the Shechemites.

For why should we serve him?] But what reason can be given for our subjection to this upstart; who is famed for nothing, but his ambition and cruelty to his own brethren? this shews pretty plainly, that R. Solomon's opinion is true, that Gael was a gentile; who would have been glad to see the authority of the Canaanites restored. For though he suggests it only as comparatively more desirable than Abimelech's rule over them, yet, it is likely, he thought they might as well receive their government, as they had done their religion.

Ver. 29. And would to God this people were under my hand!] He wishes they would make him their king, at least their commander-in-chief: which it seems they had not yet resolved upon; some being still for Abimelech, and others not trusting to a stranger.

Then would I remove Abimelech.] That he should trouble them no more; but flee the country, as he was driven out of their city.

And he said to Abimelech, Increase thine army, and come out.] Some take this to be only a vapouring speech (as if Abimelech was present), when he knew he might boast and insult without danger, because he did not hear him; but it may as well be thought that he bid Abimelech's friends go and tell him what he said; that he wished him to reinforce his army, and come out (of the intrenchments wherein perhaps he was) and give him battle: for he pretended to scorn to set upon him by surprise, but desired to decide the quarrel in open field.

Ver. 30. And when Zebul, the ruler of the city, heard the words of Gael the son of Ebed, his anger was kindled.] It is likely he had carried fair (as we speak) with Gael hitherto; thinking it in vain to oppose a popular commotion, till their fury was a little calmed; but he could not bear these insolent thrasonical words of Gael, which perhaps were not spoken in his presence, but brought to him by some that heard them.

Ver. 31. And he sent messengers unto Abimelech privily, saying.] He had some wit in his anger, and did not openly declare his resentments; but gave secret intelligence to Abimelech how matters stood, with his advice how to proceed against Gael.

Behold, Gael the son of Ebed, and his brethren, be come to Shechem.] Where, no doubt, he informed him what entertainment he had found, and in what reviling terms he had spoken of him.

And, behold, he fortifieth the city against thee.] This was no sign that Gael desired, as he boasted, to meet Abimelech in a pitched battle; but that he rather provided for his own defence, in case he should be assaulted.

Ver. 32. Now therefore up by night, thou and the people that are with thee, and lie in wait in the fields.] His advice is, that, for fear of discovery, he should march with all his forces in the night, towards Shechem; and lurk in the fields till morning light.

Ver. 33. And it shall be, that in the morning, as soon as the sun is up, thou shalt rise up early, and set upon the city.] Surprise them, before they were better provided.

And, behold, when he and the people that are with him come out against thee.] As Gael had boasted he would do.

Then thou mayest do to them, as thou shalt find occasion.] He could give him no farther advice; but that then he should dispose his forces to the best advantage against him.

Ver. 34. And Abimelech rose up, and all the people that were with him by night, and they laid wait against Shechem in four companies.] He divided his army into four battalions (as they now speak), and disposed them in four places, as the Vulgar understands it: perhaps on the east, west, north, and south sides of the city.

Ver. 35. And Gael the son of Ebed went out.] Of his house.

And stood in the entering of the gate of the city.] To see, it is likely, if his soldiers were upon their guard.

And Abimelech rose up, and the people that were with him, from lying in wait.] Out of their lurking-places, where they had lain undiscovered all night.

Ver. 36. And when Gael saw the people, he said to Zebul.] Who, it seems, accompanied him, or, as governor of the city, was there to see every one do their duty.

Behold, there come people down from the top of the mountains.] Which were adjoining to the city, viz. Mount Gerizim, and Mount Ebal.

And Zebul said, Thou seest the shadow of the mountains as if they were men.] It being early in the morning, the trees, and all things else, cast long shadows, which being moved by the breath of air, which commonly accompanies the sun-rising, Zebul persuaded him he took for men marching down from the top of the mountains. Some think he spake this in mockery, that he was afraid of shadows; but delivered it in such a serious tone, that Gael believed he spake in earnest; by which it is plain that Zebul notably dissembled his resentments, and behaved himself as if he was on Gael's side; who was strangely infatuated, to trust one that was servant to Abimelech, and placed by him as governor of the city, whose pretences of friendship were reasonably to be suspected.

Ver. 37. And Gael spake again, and said, See.] Observe attentively.

There come down people by the middle of the land.] Now it was visible they were men; for they were come down to the middle of the mountains.

And another company come along by the plain of Meonenim.] It is likely the other two companies of the four, into which his forces were divided, appeared in other places, the more to distract the thoughts of Gael: and it is probable that Abimelech had seized the ambush, which they had laid for him on the top of the mountains, (ver. 25.) that they could carry no tidings of his coming. We read of this place no where else, and so I can give no account of it: but the Vulgar takes elon to signify not the plain, but an oak; and translates these words, by the way which looks towards the oak; which, in some copies of the LXX. are rendered, the oak of those that look towards, or that regard times, as we have it in the margin of our Bibles; as if it were like the oak at Dodona, among the Grecks, where they made divinations.

Ver. 38. Then said Zebul unto him, Where is now thy mouth, wherewith thou saidst, Who is Abimelech, that we should serve him?] Now Zebul pulls off his mask, and puts him in mind of the brags which he made, (ver. 28.)

Is not this the people that thou hast despised?] But now, he supposes, was afraid to encounter.

Go out, I pray thee, and fight with them.] He upbraids him with cowardice, unless he now shewed himself a man with his sword, as the other day with his tongue.

Ver. 39. And Gael went out.] It may seem strange that he did not first leave Zebul dead upon the spot behind him: but he was afraid of him, he having, as appeared afterward, a strong party in the city; and it was dangerous to have two enemies to deal withal, one without, and another within.

Before the men of Shechem, and fought with Abimelech.] As unprovided as he was he would not decline the fight, and was followed by the principal persons in Shechem.

Ver. 40. And Abimelech chased him, and he fled before him.] Towards the city.

And many were overthrown and wounded.] Some were killed, and others wounded.

Even unto the entering of the gate.] Where the rest, and Gael himself, got into the city, and there secured themselves: so the Vulgar, for explication's sake, He pursued him and drove him into the city.

Ver. 41. And Abimelech dwelt at Arumah.] It appears, by the next verse, this place was not far from Shechem; whither Abimelech thought fit to retreat, and there watch for an opportunity to be revenged of the Shechemites.

And Zebul thrust out Gael and his brethren, that they should not dwell in Shechem.] Because they were not able to defend it against Abimelech. Zebul had the stronger party on his side, otherwise he could not have expelled him; but Gael had so many adherents, that they durst not put him to death, for his ill management, as no doubt they called it, in the late fight.

Ver. 42. And it came to pass, on the morrow, that the people went out into the field.] Finding that Abimelech was retreated, as not strong enough, they imagined, to assault their city, they went about their business into the field; which, at that time of the year, after the vintage, was to plough and sow their lands, and dress their vines, and other trees: some will have it, that they went out to fight Abimelech again, which is not probable.

And they told Abimelech.] He wanted not some to carry him intelligence of it.

Ver. 43. And he took the people.] His forces, which lay in and about Arumah.

And divided them into three companies.] One of which (the next verse informs us) he commanded himself, and committed the other two to the conduct of their commanders.

And laid wait in the field.] With that company which he commanded, whom he ordered to lie close, and not discover themselves.

And looked, and, behold, the people were come forth out of the city.] He set some to spy when the people were come out, and set about their business.

And he rose up against them, and smote them.] His men came, on a sudden, out of their ambush, and killed many of them.

Ver. 44. And Abimelech, and the company which was with him, rushed forward, and stood in the entering of the gate of the city.] Made all the haste they could to get between them and home: and accordingly they posted themselves at the entering of the gate of the city; whereby they hindered those in the field from getting into it, and likewise those in the city from coming out to their relief: so that they were dispersed about the fields, where the other two companies picked them up, as it here follows.

And the two companies ran upon all the people that were in the fields, and slew them.] Which was a great disheartening, no doubt, to those in the city, to see so many of their fellow-citizens cut off.

Ver. 45. And Abimelech fought against the city all that day.] Having destroyed so many of the citizens in the morning, he made his battery against the city itself, the rest of the day.

And took it.] In the evening, I suppose, either by an assault, or by surrender.

And slew the people that were therein.] It is not said what became of Zebul, who, it is likely, went over to him, and directed him in his attack upon the city; leaving his own party, in whom he put no confidence, to perish with the rest.

And he beat down the city.] Laid the houses and walls level with the ground.

And sowed it with salt.] Salt makes land barren, and therefore Ralbag refers this to the ground about it or in it; that was wont to be employed for sowing any sort of grain, or planting vineyards, &c.: for, as Pliny observes, "Omnis locus in quo reperitur sal, sterilis est et nihil gignit," (lib. xxxi. cap. 7.) All places in which salt is found are barren, and bring forth nothing. Therefore Abimelech endeavoured to make this city a perpetual desolation. (See Bochart. Hierozoicon, p. 1. lib. iii. cap. 16.) But unless the soil had been salt of itself, his sowing salt there would not have made it barren; but would have soon recovered its fruitfulness: therefore all he intended was to shew his hatred of them, by wishing their city might lie waste, and be a perpetual desolation.

Ver. 46. And when all the men of the tower of Shechem heard that.] By these last words, it is plain this tower was not in the city, but at some distance from it: for otherwise, it would not have been said that they heard of the destruction of Shechem, but that they saw it with their eyes; yet it is likely, that this tower of Shechem was kept by a garrison of the Shechemites.

They entered into a hold of the house of the god Berith.] They durst not trust to the strength of the tower, but took sanctuary rather in a strong fortress of the temple of the god mentioned ver. 4. which was built, in all likelihood (according to the common custom of the world), upon one of the mountains hard by, and had near it this fortified strong hold; wherein they kept their treasure, (ver. 4.) It may be compared to the Roman capitol, and to the temple of Jerusalem, in aftertimes; which Josephus describes as an impregnable place.

Ver. 47. And it was told Abimelech, that all the men of the tower of Shechem were gathered together.] In the forenamed fortress.

Ver. 48. And Abimelech got him up to Mount Zalmon, he and all the people that were with him.] Some think this to be the same mountain which the Psalmist mentions lxviii. 15. and take it to have been near to Shechem, which had many mountains about it, (ver. 36.)

And Abimelech took an axe in his hand, and cut down a bough from the trees.] Which grew there in great abundance, for Zalmon seems to have had its name from the shadiness of the place.

And took it and laid it on his shoulders, and said unto the people that were with him, What ye have seen me do, make haste and do as I have done.] He, in some measure, imitates his father's speech to his three hundred men, before he went to fight, (vii. 17.)

Ver. 49. And the people likewise cut down every man his bough, and followed Abimelech, and put them to the hold, and set the hold on fire upon them.] Which was done with such expedition (as he ordered in the foregoing verse), that they within had no time to provide against it.

So that all the men of the tower of Shechem died also, about a thousand men and women.] Who perished in the fire and smoke, as the Vulgar here adds: but the Hebrew and LXX. say nothing of smoke, but only of fire: yet, it is highly probable, that many were choked by the smoke, which was very great and smothering, the wood being green: here the prediction, or rather imprecation of Jotham, ver. 20. was exactly fulfilled.

Ver. 50. Then went Abimelech unto Thebez, and encamped against Thebez, and took it.] This was a city, which, as Kimchi observes, had revolted from Abimelech; but it is uncertain whereabout it lay, though most think it in the territory near Shechem.

Ver. 51. But there was a strong tower within the city, and thither fled all the men and women, and all they of the city.] It was a place so large, that it could contain not only all the men of the city and their wives, but their servants also: who all betook themselves hither, as a place not easy to be taken, though the city could make little resistance.

And shut it to them.] Shut to the gate, and, I suppose, blocked it up so that it could not be opened.

And gat them up to the top of the tower.] Which was flat, as their houses were, with battlements round about it: here the besieged thought fit to stand in great numbers, that they might do what they could to beat him off, if Abimelech attempted to burn them, as he had done others in a neighbouring tower.

Ver. 52. And Abimelech came unto the tower, and fought against it.] His rage was insatiable; for, not content to have overthrown the Shechemites, and beat down their city, and burnt their strong hold, and taken Thebez, he beset their tower also; where, if he had not perished, none can tell how far his revenge would have proceeded.

And went hard unto the door of the tower to burn it with fire.] Being flushed with great success, he was so bold and hardy as himself to make this dangerous attempt.

Ver. 53. And a certain woman cast a piece of a mill-stone.] Which they had carried up among other stones and logs, and whatsoever they thought might offend the enemy: the Hebrew word rechab properly signifies the upper mill-stone, which moves (and, as it were, rides) upon the lower.

Upon Abimelech's head.] Being directed, no doubt, by a special providence of God, as the stone was out of the sling that killed Goliah, and the arrow wherewith Ahab was shot.

And all to break his scull.] Made such a fracture in it, that he concluded it to be mortal. Thus Plutarch relates that Pyrrhus, at the siege of Thebes, was killed by a woman, who threw a tile upon his head: but Abimelech's death by a stone is the more remarkable, because it carried some stamp of his sin upon it; for he slew all his brethren on one stone.

Ver. 54. Then he called hastily.] Fearing he should immediately expire.

Unto the young man his armour-bearer, and said unto him, Draw thy sword and slay me, that men say not of me, A woman slew him.] Though he knew she had given him his death's wound, yet he would have posterity think otherwise; for he thought it dishonourable to die by the hand of a woman: a foolish piece of vain-glory, wherewith he concluded his life as he had led it; for she had given him a mortal blow.

And his young man thrust him through, and he died.] Just when he imagined he was upon the point of conquering all opposition to him.

Ver. 55. And when the men of Israel.] That is, all that were in his army.

Saw that Abimelech was dead, they departed every man unto his place.] Disbanded themselves, having none to head them.

Ver. 56. Thus God rendered the wickedness of Abimelech, which he did unto his father, in slaying his seventy brethren.] Which was as much as in him lay, to root out the memory of his father, unless it survived in himself, who took a course to make his name infamous.

Ver. 57. And all the evil of the men of Shechem did God render upon their heads, and upon them came the curse of Jotham the son of Jerubbaal.] These two verses conclude this story with a Divine admonition, That no man should think such things came to pass by chance, but God, the Judge of all, punished both Abimelech and the men of Shechem according to their deserts, and made them the instruments of each other's destruction: and it is remarkable, that this punishment overtook them speedily, within less than four years after their crime was committed.

It was not the business of this holy writer to tell us what became of Jotham, no more than what became of Gael and Zebul: but only to shew, that as men have done, so God requites them; with which he ends this part of his history.

CHAP. X.

Ver. 1. AND after Abimelech.] Who was not a judge, much less appointed by God, but an usurper, who took upon him to alter the Divine government, and made himself a king.

There rose up.] It is not said that God stirred him up, as he did the foregoing judges; but it is so understood, because God would not have saved Israel by one that took upon him this high office without his order: and, therefore, as Peter Martyr well observes, in the conclusion of the foregoing chapter, that as, after many good judges God had given them, he suffered the cruel tyrant Abimelech to interpose himself, that their virtues might shine more illustriously by his wickedness; so, after he was gone, God was pleased to raise up to them good judges again, who learnt moderation by the punishment of his vain ambition: and, in all likelihood, the dreadful end of Abimelech and his partakers, who made him king, affrighted the Israelites from presuming to make another, of their own heads.

To defend Israel.] Or, to save, as it is in the margin: for this was the great office of a judge, to deliver the people from the oppression of their enemies: we do not find indeed from what enemies they were delivered by this judge; but they may be said to save and deliver, who preserve men's liberties from being invaded, as well as they that vindicate and restore them when they are lost: and therefore we well translate it, To defend Israel. He may be thought also to have delivered them from those confusions and disorders they were in, by the disagreement between Abimelech and those that made him king: for both sides had many partakers, which made great divisions, and dangerous combinations among the people; but were all happily ended by the prudent management of this governor. Serrarius also adds, that he might be said to save or deliver them, because he restored the purity of their religion, by abolishing the worship of idols: for we read, that after the death of Gideon, "they went a whoring after Baalim, and made Baal-berith their god," (viii. 33.) which they continued in the reign of Abimelech; but were now brought back to the worship of the true God, and remained in it, in the days of this and the following judges; otherwise there would not have been occasion to say, (ver. 6.) that after the death of Jair, "the children of Israel did evil again in the sight of the Lord:" but how far this is true, will appear upon ver. 8.

Tola the son of Puah, the son of Dodo.] So the Chaldee paraphrast understands the word Dodo, to be the proper name of his grandfather, as Puah was of his father: but there are those that by Dodo understand his uncle, viz. Abimelech forementioned: which seems to me unreasonable; for he was of another tribe, and his relation to such a man no good qualification, one would think, for this great trust.

A man of Issachar.] A mean tribe; which did not hinder his advancement by God to the highest dignity: and by this expression, a man of Issachar, he seems to have been of no great family, in that tribe.

And he dwelt in Shamir in Mount Ephraim.] After he was made a judge he settled in this place for the convenience of the people; it being in the midst of the land.

Ver. 2. And he judged Israel twenty and three years, and died, and was buried in Shamir.] There are no memorable acts of his recorded; for the principal intention of the holy writer of this book, was to shew what great calamities befel the Israelites when they forsook God's worship, and how graciously he delivered them, in a marvellous manner, when they returned to it: as I suppose they did, in the beginning of this man's government, and continued steadfast therein; so that they were not infested by their enemies.

Ver. 3. And after him arose Jair, a Gileadite, and judged Israel twenty and two years.] This is the first judge that was raised up from among those that lived beyond Jordan.

Ver. 4. And he had thirty sons that rode on thirty asses' colts.] For the noblest persons rode on these beasts, (see ver. 10.) and that not only in Judea, but in Arabia, and in other countries, even among the Romans, as Bochartus hath at large observed in his Hierozoicon, p. 1. lib. ii. cap. 13. And it is highly probable, that this is here mentioned, because these persons were ordered by their father to ride circuit up and down the country, to minister justice according to the law; as Samuel did when he judged Israel, 1 Sam. vii. 16. For the courts of judicature appointed by the law (Deut. xvi. 18.) were not yet settled; nor, in all likelihood, settled in every city, till the days of Jehoshaphat, as Mr. Thorndike observes in his Rites of the Church, chap. 4. p. 226.

And they had thirty cities.] Of which they were the governors, as the Vulgar understands it.

Which are called Havoth-Jair unto this day.] This Jair, as our most learned primate of Ireland observes in his Annals, (ad A. M. 3504.) was of the posterity of that Jair who called the cities which he took in Argob by his own name Havoth-Jair, the towns or villages of Jair, (Numb. xxxii. 41. Deut. iii. 14.) After whose example, these thirty sons of this younger Jair, (who, to distinguish him from the elder, seems to be called Bedan, 1 Sam. xii. 11. 1 Chron. vii. 17.) called these cities which they possessed by the very same name.

Which are in the land of Gilead.] In the same country, where the other cities anciently called by this name lay: from which, it is likely, they were distinguished by some such addition as this, the new Havoth-Jair.

Ver. 5. And Jair died, and was buried in Camon.] Which, it was probable, was the place where he dwelt while he judged Israel.

Ver. 6. And the children of Israel did evil again in the sight of the Lord.] Or, as the forenamed primate thinks it must be interpreted, had done evil again, &c. as was said viii. 33. and now is repeated, to shew the cause, why God delivered them up into the hands of their enemies: for he supposes this was before the death of Jair, as I shall note on ver. 8.

And served Baalim and Ashtaroth.] As they had frequently done in former times, ii. 13. iii. 7, &c.

And the gods of Syria.] They added to their former idolatries the worship of new gods; particularly those of Syria, which were, as Mr. Selden observes (in his Prolegomena to his book de Diis Syris), beside Bel, or Baal, and Astarte, Dagon, Moloch, and Thammuz.

And the gods of Zidon.] Their supreme gods were Baal and Ashtoreth, as the same great man observes, (in his ii. Syntagma de Diis Syris, cap. 2.) But it is likely they had more, such as Asaroth, Asarim, and Asarah; being the very same with Ashtoreth.

And the gods of Moab.] The principal of which was Chemosh, (1 Kings xi. 7.)

And the gods of the children of Ammon.] The chief of which was Milcom, (1 Kings xi. 5.) where Ashtoreth is mentioned as the goddess of the Zidonians.

And the gods of the Philistines.] They had more, it seems, beside Dagon; whose names are not mentioned in Scripture.

And forsook the Lord, and served not him.] Their hearts were possessed with the love of so many gods, that they quite forgot the Lord, and did not worship him at all; though they were wont formerly only to worship other gods together with him. This was such a strange apostacy, that one cannot but inquire into the reason of it, and (besides what I have noted upon ii. 12.) one reason may possibly have been, that the solemn reading of the law to all the people, once in seven years, was neglected: for we do not read that it was publicly done from the time of Joshua to the reign of Jehoshaphat, which was above five hundred years: it doth not follow, indeed, that it was not done, because it is not recorded; but if we consider how prone they were to return to idolatry, after the death of every judge, and how soon after the death of David (even in the reign of his son Solomon) it began to appear among them, it may incline one to think there was not sufficient care taken about this matter.

Ver. 7. And the anger of the Lord was hot against Israel, and he sold them into the hands of the Philistines, and into the hands of the children of Ammon.] Two of those nations, whose gods they chose to serve.

Ver. 8. And that year they vexed and oppressed the children of Israel.] That is, the Ammonites vexed them in the east (as we are told in the conclusion of the verse), while the Philistines vexed them in the west: for their idolatry being strangely increased, so was their punishment, by the invasion of their enemies on both sides, as the foregoing verse tells us; which is a preface to the following histories of their oppression by the Philistines and the Ammonites, both at the same time; but, to avoid confusion, he first relates the story of the Ammonites, who are at last named in the foregoing verse.

Eighteen years.] Their invasion began in the same year, but they did not end at the same time, for the Ammonites domineered over them only eighteen years; but the Philistines forty, (xiii. 1.) I must not here omit the construction which our primate Usher makes of these words, which run thus in the Hebrew, and he translates in this manner, They vexed and oppressed the children of Israel that year, (viz.) the eighteenth year. For the oppression, he thinks, began the fifth year of Jair, and continued till the twenty-second, which was his last. (See his Chronol. Sacra, p. 1. cap. 13.) But this is said only to solve a difficulty, which is, that if we suppose this oppression to have begun after the death of Jair, and to have lasted eighteen years (as our translation imports), it will be impossible to make the years of the government of the judges agree with what we read, 1 Kings vi. 1. that Solomon began to build the temple at Jerusalem, in the four hundred and eightieth year after they came out of Egypt: but there is a more easy way of accounting for this difficulty, by supposing that several of the judges were contemporaries, as will be apparent in this very history; (see upon xi. 25.) and if we do not take these words eighteen years to signify the continuance of the Ammonitish oppression, it is no where mentioned any where else; as the duration of all other oppressions is.

All the children of Israel that were on the other side Jordan, in the land of the Amorites.] Which belonged to the Amorites, till Moses dispossessed them, (Numb. xxi.) and gave the land to the two tribes of Reuben and Gad, and half the tribe of Manasseh.

Which is in Gilead.] The principal part of which was Gilead; out of which Jair sprang, being of the tribe of Manasseh; who, like a good man, used all his endeavours to purge the Israelites from idolatry; as Tola, I suppose, had done before: but they being, after the death of Gideon, fallen from God, and continuing in their idolatry all the reign of Abimelech, our forenamed primate supposes these judges were not able to reform them; but they rather grew worse, as is related ver. 6. And therefore God permitted the Ammonites and Philistines to begin to afflict them, as was said before in the fifth year of Jair; but not so as to make them subject to their power: for Jair held the government eighteen years after they began their inroads, but then their vexations and oppressions grew intolerable, and they not only afflicted his own country Gilead, but endeavoured to make their brethren, on the other side Jordan, to feel the weight of their power, as it follows in the next verse. This is said very plausibly, but cannot be admitted without some violence to the natural sense of the beginning of the verse; and also to the course of this history, which doth not mention their departure from God, and these oppressions of their enemies, on both sides, till after the death of Jair.

Ver. 9. Moreover, the children of Ammon passed over Jordan to fight against Judah, and against Benjamin, and against the house of Ephraim.] Who were the tribes that lay next to Jordan.

So that Israel was sore distressed.] For while the Ammonites afflicted those countries in the eastern part of Canaan, the Philistines made ravages in the countries of Zebulun, and Asher, and the rest of the tribes that lay on the western coast: for so the LXX. explain those words in the foregoing verse, In that year, ἐν τῷ καιρῷ ἐκείνῳ, in that same year, the Philistines in the west, and the Ammonites in the east, vexed and oppressed the children of Israel.

Ver. 10. And the children of Israel cried unto the Lord, saying, We have sinned against thee, both because we have forsaken our God, and also served Baalim.] All the rest of the gods mentioned ver. 6. are comprehended under the name of Baalim: which were so many and various, that they had quite drawn their affection from their own God; as they now sorrowfully acknowledge.

Ver. 11. And the Lord said unto the children of Israel.] By some prophet, I suppose.

Did not I deliver you from the Egyptians.] See Exod. xii.

And from the Amorites.] Who would have hindered their passage to the land of Canaan, (Numb. xxi.)

And from the children of Ammon.] Who were confederate with the Moabites to oppress them, (Judg. iii. 13.)

And from the Philistines?] In the days of Shamgar, (iii. ult.)

Ver. 12. The Zidonians also.] We never read of any invasion they made upon the Israelites; but only in general, that God left them, among other people, unsubdued, to prove the children of Israel, (iii. 3.) who took their opportunities, in all likelihood, to afflict them.

And the Amalekites.] Who joined both with the Moabites and the Midianites to oppress them, (iii. 13. vi. 3.)

And the Maonites did oppress you.] Maon is the name of a nation; the plural of which, Meunim, occurs in many places, particularly in 2 Chron. xxvi. 6, 7. where they are called in Greek Μιναῖοι· a people in Arabia, both in that which we call Felix, and in that called Deserta. Which latter was not far from the Moabites and the Ammonites; with whom interpreters are apt to confound the Meunites, as if, by a transposition of letters, they were the same with the Ammonites: which hath misled us in our translation of those words, 2 Chron. xx. 1. And with them from the Ammonites, which makes no sense; but if we read with them from Meunim (as it is in Greek ἐκ Μιναίων), all runs clearly, and makes perfect sense: and thus we ought to translate that place, 1 Chron. iv. 41. where we take Meunim to signify dwellings, and render the words thus, The habitations which were found there; as if where there were tents (which are mentioned before) there were not habitations, which are the same: therefore Meunim is the name of a people (as the LXX. understood it) who dwelt in tents, being Arabians: who being neighbours (as I said) to the Moabites and Ammonites, joined with them in their invasion of the land of Israel, and helped to oppress them: But they are plainly distinguished from the Ammonites, in the first place mentioned, and 2 Chron. xxvi. 6—8.

And ye cried to me, and I delivered you out of their hand.] When they were utterly unable to help themselves.

Ver. 13. Yet ye have forsaken me, and served other gods.] But all these deliverances proved ineffectual to keep them steadfast in the worship of God.

Wherefore I will deliver you no more.] He threatens therefore to leave them under the power of their enemies, which now sorely distressed them, as they justly deserved; but it was with an intention to awaken them to a more serious and hearty repentance, otherwise he resolved not to deliver them.

Ver. 14. Go and cry unto the gods you have chosen, let them deliver you in the time of your tribulation.] A bitter reflection both upon them and upon their gods, like to that in the song of Moses, (Deut. xxxii. 37, 38.)

Ver. 15. And the children of Israel said unto the Lord, We have sinned.] In worshipping such gods as could not save them.

Do thou unto us as seemeth good unto thee.] They submit to such punishment as he thought fit to inflict, confessing they deserved no favour; which shews their hearts were for the present very sensible of the folly wherewith they were reproached in the foregoing verse.

Deliver us only, we pray thee, this day.] They acknowledged that they deserved the severest punishment, but beseech him to have so much pity on them, as not to punish them this way, by letting these cruel enemies insult over them any longer.

Ver. 16. And they put away the strange gods from among them.] Gave open proof of their repentance by renouncing all idolatry.

And served the Lord.] And returned to the worship of the Lord, and of him alone, which is the most remarkable repentance and reformation that we read of hitherto in this history of the Judges; and it seems to have been so serious, that for a long time they did not relapse; for we read nothing of their idolatry in the time of those three judges that followed Jephthah.

And his soul was grieved for the misery of Israel.] Nor do we read before of such an expression of the Divine compassion towards them. Every one knows the Divine nature is not capable of grief, properly so called; but the meaning is, he quite altered his former intentions, and in much mercy resolved upon their repentance to deliver them. So Maimonides observes, that the word nephesh, which we translate soul, signifies his will, Jer. xv. 1. Though Moses and Samuel stood before me, my soul could not be towards this people; that is, it could not be his will to save them. And so here, his soul was grieved; that is, saith he, his will ceased from afflicting Israel any longer; for it was said before, that God's providence had deserted them, and he refused to relieve them till they called upon him and seriously repented; and then their miseries being very great by the sore oppressions of their enemies, he took pity on them, and willed their cruel afflictions should not continue. (See More Nevochim, par. i. cap. 41.)

Ver. 17. Then the children of Ammon were gathered together.] In the Hebrew, were cried together; that is, a proclamation went out, requiring all their dispersed troops, which were ravaging the countries of Judah, Benjamin, and Ephraim, to return back to their camp, on the other side of Jordan.

And encamped in Gilead.] Or, against Gilead; for both Arius Montanus and Peter Martyr think that they laid siege to Gilead, the chief city in those parts: by taking which, they hoped to be masters of all that country; and then, with greater forces, go over Jordan again, and conquer the other tribes beforementioned.

And the children of Israel assembled themselves together, and encamped in Mizpeh.] There were two Mizpehs on the other side Jordan, one in the tribe of Gad, the other in the half tribe of Manasseh, as I observed upon Josh. xi. 3. the latter of which may be probably thought to be the place where they now assembled, Jephthah, who was afterward chosen their captain, being one of this tribe. How many of the Israelites here encamped, and whether any of those in the land of Canaan, or only those of the two tribes and a half, cannot now be known; but upon their repentance, they seem to have recovered their ancient courage, and to have taken a resolution to drive the Ammonites out of their country, insomuch that thereupon the Ammonites seem to have left the siege, and to have made a retreat into their own land, either to recruit their army, and raise more forces, or for some other reason; for thither Jephthah sent messengers to them, after he was chosen general of the Israelites; and there he fought them, when they would not yield to his convincing arguments, that they unjustly invaded the Israelites, as appears in the following chapter.

Ver. 18. And the people and princes of Gilead.] Who were most nearly concerned in this matter, their country lying nearest to the Ammonites.

Said one to another.] Entered into a consultation, in a grand assembly of all the people, and their rulers. (See ix. 6.)

What man is he that will begin to fight against the children of Ammon?] Will be our leader. It seems to me a probable conjecture of Peter Martyr, that they consulted God also about this matter, who directed them, perhaps, to go to Jephthah.

He shall be head over all the inhabitants of Gilead.] They resolved, whatsoever the mind of the rest of the tribes should be, that he should command all the Gadites and Manassites that inhabited the land of Gilead.

CHAP. XI.

Ver. 1. NOW Jephthah the Gileadite.] A man of the same country with Jair, their last judge.

Was a mighty man of valour.] A warlike person, of great courage and conduct.

And he was the son of a harlot.] Or, but he was, &c. Some, by the Hebrew word zonah, understand a concubine, but it never signifies so in Scripture; but, as we translate it, a harlot; and sometimes one that kept a public house; for such people were wont to make their bodies as common as their houses, to all comers. (See Josh. ii. 1.) But several of the Hebrew doctors think that this word may signify either one of another tribe, or a stranger, one of another nation: and so Josephus himself here understands it, that he was ξένος περὶ τὴν μητέρα, a stranger by his mother's side. And Saidas Batricides saith, his mother was an Ishmaelite, as Mr. Selden observes, lib. de Successionibus, cap. 3. Now such were called νόθαι by the Greeks, as Grotius observes, who were born of a wife that was not a citizen. But among the Jews, if such persons embraced the law, their children were not stained, but capable to inherit among the rest of their brethren; and therefore Jephthah complains of his expulsion, (ver. 7.) looking upon himself as unjustly dealt withal, which could not have been said, had he been a bastard.

And Gilead begat Jephthah.] One of the posterity of Gilead, the son of Manasseh, was his father, who was called after the name of his great ancestor.

Ver. 2. And Gilead's wife bare him sons.] He took a wife also of the Jewish nation, who bare him several sons.

And his wife's sons grew up, and they thrust out Jephthah.] When his father was dead; for till then the inheritance was not to be divided; and, if he had been alive, he would not have suffered them to be so injurious to Jephthah, who was the son of a wife whom he loved extremely, as Josephus relates, lib. v. Antiq. cap. 9.

And said unto him, Thou shalt not inherit in our father's house.] Have no share of his estate.

For thou art the son of a strange woman.] This explains the word zonah, to be the same with a woman of another country; for there is no reason to think, that by another woman (as the words are in the Hebrew) he means a woman of another tribe, as the Chaldee paraphrast, R. Bechai, and others, expound it. (See Selden, in the place beforenamed, and Buxtorf, de Sponsal. et Divortiis, p. 61.)

Ver. 3. Then Jephthah fled from his brethren.] When they were so unkind as to drive him from his father's house, he did not think fit to stay in their country.

And dwelt in the land of Tob.] We read no where else of this country, which, it is likely, was not far from Gilead, upon the borders of the Ammonites, in the entrance of Arabia Deserta; or, perhaps, it is the same with the country called Ish-tob, 2 Sam. x. 6. 8. which was in Syria, and so near the Ammonites, that they hired forces from thence, as well as from other Syrians, to fight with king David. We find some footsteps of this land, it is very probable, in the second book of the Maccabees, chap. xii. 17. where we read of Τουβιήνοι Ἰουδαῖοι, i. e. Jews who dwelt in the land of Tob.

And there were gathered vain men to Jephthah.] Or empty men; for the word rekim signifies poor and needy persons, men of no estates, such as resorted to David when he fled from Saul, (1 Sam. xxii. 2.) So I suppose it to be here understood (not that they were profligate persons), for the word pochazim, light men, is not here added, as it is in the story of those who followed Abimelech, ix. 4. Therefore Grotius doth not seem rightly to have represented Jephthah, when he saith, he was one of those who "ex prædonum ducibus justi duces facti sunt," (lib. iii. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 3. sect. 3.) For these were not highwaymen, as we call them, that lived by prey; but only men of small or no fortune, who were glad of an occasion to join themselves to so gallant a man as Jephthah was. And so the word we translate gathered, imports that they listed themselves under him of their own accord, being invited to it by the great fame of his humanity and valour. But Grotius herein follows the Vulgar, who adds the word latrocinates, without any authority, either from the Hebrew, Chaldee, or LXX.

And went out with him.] Made excursions upon the enemies of the Israelites thereabouts, and got what booty they could from them for their subsistence, just as David did when he was forced to flee into the land of the Philistines, (1 Sam. xxvii. 8—11.)

Ver. 4. And it came to pass in process of time.] In the Hebrew it is after days, i. e. as primate Usher understands it (in the place abovenamed), after those years mentioned x. 8. viz. eighteen years, in the conclusion of which, when Jair was dead, the Ammonites took the following resolution; but there is no good ground, as I have shewn there, for this interpretation; therefore by after days I understand some time after their retreat into their own country, which I mentioned x. 17.

That the children of Ammon made war against Israel.] They only came in parties before to rob and spoil them; but now, finding the Israelites began to take courage, and had formed a camp in Gilead, (x. 17.) they raised an army, intending to conquer them and possess themselves of their country.

Ver. 5. And it came to pass, when the children of Ammon made war against Israel.] The Vulgar interprets it, pressed hard upon them.

The elders of Gilead.] Who are called princes, x. 18.

Went to fetch Jephthah out of the land of Tob.] Some of the principal persons of the country were sent in the name of all the inhabitants of Gilead, in an embassy to him, to invite him to return to them.

Ver. 6. And they said unto Jephthah, Come, and be our captain, that we may fight with the children of Ammon.] They did not pretend to make him their king (remembering, perhaps, what had befallen the men of Shechem and Abimelech), but only the leader of their army.

Ver. 7. And Jephthah said unto the elders of Gilead, Did ye not hate me, and expel me out of my father's house?] This signifies, that his brethren ejected him by the assistance of the public authority (unless we suppose that they were of the number of elders that were sent to him); or the elders, who saw the wrong his brethren did him, connived at it, and did not interpose, according to their office, to do him right, whereby they made his expulsion their own act.

And why are ye come unto me now when you are in distress?] As much as to say, What reason have you to expect that I should hearken to you, since I know it is only your distress which moves you to recall me?

Ver. 8. And the elders of Gilead said unto Jephthah, Therefore we turn again to thee now.] This may relate either to what immediately goes before, and then the sense is, We confess we are in distress, and therefore implore thy help (which, if thou wilt afford us, thou shalt command us all for ever); or to the beginning of the foregoing verse, and the meaning is, We are sensible of the injury that was done thee, and therefore are come to repair it, by inviting thee to be our head; for that is meant by their turning again to him: they had altered their mind, and not only revoked that unjust act, but offered him a recompence.

That thou mayest go with us, and fight against the children of Ammon, and be our head over all the inhabitants of Gilead.] Of the tribes on their side Jordan; for they could promise nothing for the tribes in the land of Canaan, some of which were oppressed now by the Philistines, as they were by the Ammonites.

Ver. 9. And Jephthah said unto the elders of Gilead, If ye bring me home again to fight against the children of Ammon, and the Lord deliver them before me, shall I be your head?] He offers to be the general of their army, if, after he had vanquished their enemies, they would, in good earnest, make him their governor in chief, and not throw him off when they had no further need of him. In which agreement he supposed the consent and appointment of God, by whose aid alone he hoped to be victorious.

Ver. 10. And the elders of Gilead said unto Jephthah, The Lord be witness between us, if we do not according to thy word.] They solemnly call God to witness their sincerity, confirming what was agreed by an oath, and wishing God to revenge it, if they did not perform what they promised.

Ver. 11. Then Jephthah went with the elders of Gilead.] Unto his own country.

And the people made him head and captain over them.] In a full assembly of the people, with the princes, (ix. 6. x. 18.) he was made general of their army; with an assurance he should be their head, after the war was successfully ended.

And Jephthah uttered all his words before the Lord.] The people had done their part, but Jephthah would undertake nothing, without God's approbation, before whom, in a solemn prayer, he laid all that he had said unto them; and it is likely that God answered him by some prophet, and authorized him to undertake the conduct and government of the people; (see x. 11.) for if he had done it without a Divine warrant, the Spirit of the Lord would not have come upon him, as we read it did, ver. 29.

In Mizpeh.] Where the children of Israel had gathered themselves together to oppose the Ammonites, x. 17. and where Jephthah chose to fix his habitation, after the conquest of them, ver. 34. of this chapter; for that Mizpeh, where all the tribes, we often read, met before the Lord, was on this side Jordan, not far from Jerusalem, either in the tribe of Judah, or of Benjamin. It is thought probable, by some learned men, that there was some proseucha, a praying-place, or place of Divine worship, here at Mizpeh, (see Josh. xxiv. 26.) where Jephthah uttered his words; which otherwise, they think, could not be said to be done before the Lord: but this is not a sufficient ground for such an opinion; for the Divine presence (as Rasi here observes) was in that place where all the people assembled upon a public concern. (See 1 Sam. xi. 15.) Kimchi observes the same upon the twentieth chapter of this book, ver. 1. where his words are, "In every place, in which Israel, or a great part of it, is assembled, the Divine presence dwells." (See my notes there.)

Ver. 12. And Jephthah sent messengers to the king of the children of Ammon.] Now he plainly acts as a chief governor, in appointing an embassy to go from him to the king of the Ammonites; which power he would not have assumed, if it had not been given him by God.

Saying, What hast thou to do with me.] That is, what is the ground of thy quarrel? Or, for what reason is this invasion made?

That thou art come to fight against me in my land?] This is the language of the supreme governor of the country, unto whom all were subject, as their lord; and demonstrates him to have been a most pious prince, that would first debate matters fairly, before he came to blows, according to the sense of a number of great men in future times, mentioned by Grotius at large, lib. ii. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 23. sect. 7. Unto which he was not bound, having taken arms only in his own defence; yet, to prevent the effusion of blood, he argues the case with the king of the Ammonites, who ought rather, if he thought himself injured by the Israelites, to have sent, before he took arms, to require satisfaction.

Ver. 13. And the king of the children of Ammon answered to the messengers of Jephthah, Because Israel took away my land when they came out of Egypt.] This is a mere colour and pretence, the land being none of theirs, when the Israelites conquered it, but the land of Sihon king of the Amorites: for, as to the country of the Ammonites, God expressly charged the Israelites not to meddle with it, (Deut. i. 19.) for he would give them none of it. It is true, this land, which they now claimed, had formerly belonged to the Moabites, but Sihon had made a conquest of it, and driven them out of it, as we read Numb. xxi. 26. The king of Ammon, therefore, could not call it his land, unless he was also king of Moab at this time, which is not improbable: whence it is, that, in the following dispute between him and Jephthah, there is a promiscuous mention of the Moabites, together with the Ammonites, as if they were but one people, (ver. 15. 17, 18.) and Chemosh, which was the god of the Moabites, is called (ver. 24.) the god of the king of Ammon: unto which may be added, that the land which Sihon conquered did not entirely belong to the Moabites, but some of it to the children of Ammon, as is expressly said, Josh. xiii. 25. where we read, that to the Gadites was given half of the land of the children of Ammon; therefore some part of Sihon's kingdom (where the Gadites were settled) had formerly belonged to the Ammonites.

From Arnon even unto Jabbok, and to Jordan.] These are the bounds of the country to which they laid a claim; the river Arnon on the south, and the brook Jabbok on the north (which we may call the length of the country), and Jordan on the west; unto which afterward is added the eastern bounds, when it is said, ver. 22. from the wilderness unto Jordan; which is the wilderness through which the Israelites entered into the territories of Sihon.

Now therefore restore these lands.] Which belonged to the Moabites and Ammonites.

Again peaceably.] The messengers of Jephthah had declared that he desired not war, but peace; which the king of Ammon tells him he must not expect, unless he resigned these countries to him.

Ver. 14. And Jephthah sent messengers again to the king of the children of Ammon.] This is an argument of a very peaceable disposition, and a high commendation of a warlike spirit, that he was still desirous to end this controversy by reason, and not by the sword.

Ver. 15. And said unto him, Thus saith Jephthah.] This is his reply; which seems to be delivered as from a man in authority.

Israel took not away the land of Moab, nor the land of the children of Ammon.] He denies the matter of fact upon which they grounded the war: for the Israelites found this country in the possession of Sihon.

Ver. 16. But when Israel came out of Egypt.] He proves the truth of what he affirmed, by a short history of what passed after they came out of Egypt; when the king of Ammon said (ver. 13.) they took this land from him.

And walked through the wilderness unto the Red Sea, and came to Kadesh.] This is not to be understood of Kadesh-barnea, but of that Kadesh mentioned Numb. xx. 1. 14. which was in the borders of Edom; unto which they came directly from the Red Sea: nor of their coming to the Red Sea, in the first year after they passed through it, mentioned Numb. xxxiii. 10. but of their last coming to it, in that station they made at Ezion-geber (after many stations in other places), which was upon the shore of the Red Sea; from whence they immediately marched to this Kadesh, (Numb. xxxiii. 35, 36.)

Ver. 17. Then Israel sent messengers to the king of Edom, saying, Let me, I pray thee, pass through thy land.] This shews, they were so far from invading any body's country, that they humbly begged leave to pass through Edom, engaging to do no violence, but to pay for every thing they wanted. (See Numb. xx. 14, &c.)

But the king of Edom would not hearken thereto.] Notwithstanding which, they were not provoked by their inhumanity to quarrel with them.

And in like manner they sent to the king of Moab, but he would not consent.] We do not read of such a message sent to the Moabites: but when they came from Ezion-geber into the wilderness of Moab, we find a command of God to them not to distress the Moabites, nor to contend with them in battle: which intimates there was some occasion for it; which was their refusal to grant them a common civility.

And Israel abode in Kadesh.] Put up all these affronts, and abstained from all violence, continuing quiet in the place where they had pitched their tents.

Ver. 18. Then they went along through the wilderness, and compassed the land of Edom, and the land of Moab.] When they were denied a passage the direct way, they chose rather to fetch a great compass, and travel many miles with great labour and toil, (see Numb. xxi. 4.) than give others the least disturbance.

And came by the east side of the land of Moab, and pitched upon the other side of Arnon.] See Numb. chap. xxi. 13.

But came not within the border of Moab: for Arnon was the border of Moab.] This is a demonstration that they did no injury to the Moabites, into whose country they did not enter. For they went no further than Arnon, which divided their country from the Ammonites.

Ver. 19. And Israel sent messengers unto Sihon king of the Amorites, the king of Heshbon.] Where his royal palace was. (See Numb. xxi. 25, 26.)

And Israel said unto him, Let us pass, we pray thee, through thy land unto my place.] Being denied passage through Edom and Moab, they sent a friendly message unto him, craving the favour of being permitted to go through his country unto Canaan. (Numb. xxi. 21, 22.)

Ver. 20. But Sihon trusted not Israel to pass through his coast.] Was jealous they would seize on his country.

But Sihon gathered all his people together, and pitched in Jahaz, and fought against Israel.] He contented not himself to refuse (as his neighbours had done) to grant a passage through his country, which they could not demand, but raised all his forces, and proudly marched to drive them away from his borders, (Numb. xxi. 23, 24.)

Ver. 21. And the Lord God of Israel delivered Sihon and all his people into the hand of Israel, and they smote them.] It was plainly an act of God to give the Israelites the victory; for they were unprepared for war, and tired with a long march about the land of Edom and Moab.

So Israel possessed all the land of the Amorites, the inhabitants of that country.] They did not dispossess the Moabites, but the Amorites, who then inhabited that country, which became the possession of the Israelites, by the right of a just war, in their own defence.

Ver. 22. And they possessed all the coasts of the Amorites, from Arnon even unto Jabbok, and from the wilderness even unto Jordan.] This is a description of the length and breadth of the land, from south to north, and from east to west: (see above, ver. 13.) None of which was then in the possession of the Moabites or Ammonites; who could not therefore charge the Israelites with taking any of their land from them.

Ver. 23. And so now the Lord God of Israel hath dispossessed the Amorites from before his people Israel.] This is a new title to this land; which they not only took in a just war, but was also given them by God, who made them victorious, and then bestowed it upon them.

And shouldest thou possess it?] It was absurd to think that they should take the pains to conquer it, and God should give it to them, that they might put the Moabites again in the possession of it, with whom they had no alliance; but, quite contrary, they had denied them the common right of mankind.

Ver. 24. Wilt not thou possess that which Chemosh thy god giveth thee to possess?] He doth not call Chemosh a god; but only argues from the opinion that they had of him, which all nations had of their gods, that they owed their conquests to them, to whom therefore they gave thanks for all their victories. Now he appeals to them, whether they would not keep what their god had given them, and look upon it as rightfully possessed by them.

So whomsoever the Lord our God shall drive out from before us, them will we possess.] By the very same title whereby the Moabites possessed the country wherein they now lived; from whence they drove out the ancient inhabitants. (Deut. ii. 10, 11.)

Ver. 25. And now, art thou any thing better than Balak the son of Zippor, king of Moab?] This is a third argument, that when this conquest was newly made by the Israelites, the then king of Moab (as potent as the present) laid no claim to this country, nor demanded to have it restored to him; but only was afraid they should invade the land he still possessed.

Did he ever strive against Israel.] Dispute their title with them.

Or did he ever fight against Israel.] Endeavour by force of arms to recover this country, as not belonging to them but to him.

Ver. 26. While Israel dwelt in Heshbon and her towns, and in Aroer and her towns, and in all the cities that be along by the coast of Arnon, three hundred years, &c.] In the last place he pleads prescription, and that for three hundred years; in which long space of time none of the kings of Moab pretended a right to this country, much less contended it with them; which argument was irrefragable. For if such a long undisputed possession cannot make a right to a country, it is impossible there should be any end of wars between kings and princes. But all mankind look upon those wars as unjust, which are made for recovery of countries wherein people have settled quietly for many ages; though, perhaps, in the first acquisition of them, their title was not good. Therefore it is not necessary to examine, whether Sihon had a just cause of war when he conquered this country; nor is it of importance, with respect to this, to examine whether the Israelites had held this conquest just three hundred years; for if a few be wanting, it is not material: but with respect to something else it is of great consequence, for the explaining of what we read 1 Kings vi. 2. that Solomon began to build the temple in the four hundred and eightieth year after they came out of Egypt. Which space is divided by these words of Jephthah into two intervals: the first of which contained three hundred and forty years; for they had possessed this country three hundred years, and they came out of Egypt forty years before its conquest: during which time they had been slaves to the Mesopotamians, Moabites, Canaanites, and Midianites. Now, if the years wherein they were oppressed by these four nations, and the years of peace and quiet which they enjoyed, be put together, from the first year of Chushan-Rishathaim to the last year of Jair, they produce a little more than three hundred years; so that no time is left for Joshua's conquest of Canaan, and his life after it, and for the generation that outlived him. But, by supposing that some of these things fell out in the very same time (as for example, during the fourscore years' rest in the eastern parts of the land after Eglon's death, they were oppressed twenty years in the north by Jabin), this difficulty is removed, and all comes right; as Sir John Marsham hath demonstrated in his Canon Chronicus: where he shews, that, from the death of Moses to this invasion of the Ammonites, there were three hundred years; allowing five-and-twenty years (as Josephus computes) for Joshua's government after they came into Canaan, and thirty-five years to the following generation that survived him. (See Seculum xi. Æra Exodi. And concerning the other interval, see here, xii. 14.)

Why therefore did ye not recover them within that time?] This question could not be answered, that in so long a time they should hear nothing of their claim till now.

Ver. 27. Wherefore I have not sinned against thee, but thou dost me wrong to war against me.] Upon all these reasons he concludes, the Ammonites had no cause to make this war; but were injurious in it to the Israelites.

The Lord the Judge be judge this day between the children of Israel and the children of Ammon.] The meaning is, that if they were not moved by these reasons, but the controversy must be decided by arms, he committed his cause to God, the righteous judge of the whole world, who, he doubted not, would do him right. By this day he doth not mean that God would determine the right, by giving him the victory then, when he spake these words (for he was not yet ready to give them battle), but that God would judge of the justice of his present plea, and accordingly give sentence, when the matter came to be tried in a battle.

Ver. 28. Howbeit the king of the children of Ammon hearkened not to the words of Jephthah which he sent him.] He would not yield to arguments, being obstinately resolved to fight it out.

Ver. 29. Then the Spirit of the Lord came upon Jephthah.] The people had chosen him for their leader, and promised to continue him their chief governor, as they had already made him; and now God publicly declares his approbation of their choice; and made him their judge, as he had done others before, (iii. 10.) by endowing him with an extraordinary measure of courage and wisdom, and all other qualities necessary to render him fit to be the ruler of his people.

And he passed over Gilead and Manasseh.] Went through the whole country of Reuben and Gad (which are comprehended in Gilead), and likewise the half tribe of Manassch, and levied what men he could among them.

And passed over Mizpeh of Gilead.] Went to the extreme part of the country northward, where Mizpeh was, towards Mount Lebanon and Hermon.

And from Mizpeh of Gilead he passed over unto the children of Ammon.] He marched from thence, with such forces as he had gathered, towards the enemy's country.

Ver. 30. And Jephthah vowed a vow unto the Lord, and said, If thou shalt without fail deliver the children of Ammon into my hand.] He did not make a doubt of it, but thought he might be more assured of victory, if he made a religious vow beforehand, of being very grateful to God for it. Which was the custom of the ancient Romans, as we find in Livy; who frequently tells us, that their generals were wont to vow to Jupiter, or Apollo, or others, part of the spoil they should take in war; or to build temples in their honour. And thus the Israelites, when king Arad came against them, as they were going towards Canaan (a little before the conquest of this country now in controversy), vowed to make his country a cherem, if God would deliver it into their hands. (See Numb. xxi. 2.)

Ver. 31. That it shall be, that whatsoever.] This comprehends all sorts of creatures, as the Hebrew doctors commonly observe.

Cometh forth of the doors of my house to meet me.] The Vulgar adds the word first, which must be understood; otherwise he would have been obliged to devote many things to the Lord, which might possibly come out of his house.

When I return in peace from the children of Ammon.] Come back victorious.

Shall surely be the Lord's, and I will offer it up for a burnt-offering.] If it was a thing fit to be offered: for if a dog or a swine should have happened to come out first to meet him, that was not lawful to be offered. But the great question is, Whether it was not as unlawful to offer his daughter, who seems to be comprehended in this vow? And it is said afterward, (ver. 39.) that he did unto her according to it. Josephus, and the Chaldee paraphrast, and several famous rabbins, think that he did offer her, being deceived by a mistake of the sense of that law, Lev. xxvii. 28. And though he might have been absolved from his vow by the high-priest, yet they tell an idle story, that they stood so much upon a punctilio of their dignity, that he would neither go to Phinehas, nor Phinchas vouchsafe to wait upon him. Which is a tale not to be found in the Talmud, but in some lesser writer, as Mr. Selden observes, lib. iv. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 11. where he shews, that the two Kimchis, father and son, with R. Levi ben Gersom, and others, interpret these words quite otherwise; and take the particle (which we translate and) to be a disjunctive; that is, as much as or. So Kimchi's words are, It shall be consecrated to the Lord, if it be not fit for a burnt-offering; or it shall be offered for a burnt-offering, if it be fit for it. And so they think she was devoted to God, and separate from all secular affairs, that she might give herself continually to prayer and holy exercises. Which opinion hath several difficulties in it, as he there observes; and it must be confessed, the stream of interpreters runs the quite contrary way: for though they call this votum temerarium, as Tertullian doth, a rash vow, or a foolish incautious vow, as Theodoret, St. Austin, and others; yet very great numbers (and indeed most of the ancient Christian writers) think that he did really offer her: though it cannot be denied, that there are great difficulties in this interpretation also; no such thing having ever been done in Israel; but such sacrifices declared abominable unto God: which it is a wonder he should not know, nor the people neither; who, one would have expected, should have hindered such a barbarous sacrifice. All that can be said in answer to this is, that they having been long accustomed to idolatrous worship, and he having lived out of his own country, and being a soldier, had forgotten their law, or retained but a very imperfect knowledge of it. But they that would see this matter largely discussed, may consult Ludovicus Capellus, who hath a long dissertation on purpose about it; and I shall say something more of it upon the latter end of this chapter.

Ver. 32. So Jephthah passed over unto the children of Ammon to fight against them.] He was not far from them before, (ver. 29.) but now he drew his army up to them, and engaged them.

And the Lord delivered them into his hand.] And thereby declared the Ammonites were in the wrong, (ver. 27.)

Ver. 33. And he smote them from Aroer.] Which was a city upon the banks of the river Arnon; or rather in the river, being encompassed with it.

Till thou come to Minnith.] Another city up in the country.

Even twenty cities, and unto the plain of the vineyards.] They chased them a great way, and destroyed their cities as they went along, till they came to the plain here mentioned. Or, as it is in the margin, unto Abel; a city, perhaps, which was very strong, called Abel-Keramim, as the LXX. understand it.

With a great slaughter.] Both in the field and in the cities.

Thus the children of Ammon were subdued before the children of Israel.] So that they infested their country no more.

Ver. 34. And Jephthah came to Mizpeh unto his house.] From which he went forth when he began this expedition, (ver. 29.)

And, behold, his daughter came out to meet him with timbrels and dances.] She was the first person of his family whom he saw at his return, who came, accompanied with some of her neighbours, to welcome him home, and congratulate his victory with music and dancing. So the old manner had been, Exod. xv. 20. and continued afterward, 1 Sam. xviii. 6.

And she was his only child: beside her he had neither son nor daughter.] In the Hebrew the words are, he had not from himself either son or daughter; intimating, perhaps, that though his wife had children by another husband, or he had adopted children, yet he had none descended from his own body but this only daughter, which made her the dearer to him.

Ver. 35. And it came to pass, that when he saw her, he rent his clothes.] As the manner was when any great calamity befel them. (See Lev. x. 6.)

And said, Alas! my daughter, thou hast brought me very low.] Quite spoiled my triumph.

And thou art one of them that trouble me.] Which was the more afflictive, because he expected from her the greatest comfort and pleasure.

For I have opened my mouth unto the Lord, and I cannot go back.] That is, made a vow which he could not retract. It is likely he told her what it was, though that be not here expressed; or by his deep sorrow at the first sight of her, she understood it was upon her account: but in this he was grossly mistaken, which way soever we interpret this vow; whether of separating her from company, or of offering her for a burnt-offering; for he was bound to neither, yea, he was bound not to offer her in sacrifice, which was a thing abominable. As for the other, there was no such power by their law granted to parents, to shut up their children, and separate them from all society with men, as Mr. Selden observes, there being not the least footstep of any such thing in the whole body of their Talmud, or in their lawyers.

Ver. 36. And she said unto him, My father, if thou hast opened thy mouth unto the Lord, do to me according to that which hath proceeded out of thy mouth; forasmuch as the Lord hath taken vengeance for thee of thine enemies, even of the children of Ammon.] A rare instance of religion, courage, obedience to her parents, and love to her country.

Ver. 37. And she said unto her father, Let this thing be done for me.] Grant me only one request; which was not inconsistent, she thought, with his vow; for he did not say he would execute it immediately.

Let me alone two months.] Leave me at liberty so long.

That I may go up and down upon the mountains.] Which were fit places for her purpose, being solitary, and far from company.

To bewail my virginity.] For it was accounted a great infelicity in that nation to die without issue.

I and my fellows.] Other virgins, her companions. This some take for an argument, that she was not to be sacrificed; for then she would have bewailed her death, rather than her want of posterity. But this is no concluding argument; for she might possibly look upon it as an honour to be a sacrifice unto God.

Ver. 38. And he said, Go. And he sent her away for two months, and she went with her companions, and bewailed her virginity upon the mountains.] They that think she knew she was to be offered, infer from hence, that she looked upon it as a greater calamity to die without issue, than merely to die.

Ver. 39. And it came to pass, at the end of two months, she returned to her father.] Having had time to bring her mind unto a perfect resignation to her father; or rather, to confirm herself in the resolution she had at first, cheerfully to submit unto whatsoever he had vowed.

Who did with her according to his vow which he had vowed.] That is, saith Kimchi, he made her a house, and brought her into it, and there left her secluded from the company of all men, and from all secular affairs. That is the meaning, he thinks, of the first part of his vow, It shall surely be the Lord's. And so Ralbag, a little more fully, She was separated from the company of men; for if she had had a husband, she could not have served the Lord alone, but must have served her husband also, as all wives are bound to do. Selden indeed saith, that he doth not see what law gave him this power to keep her from marriage; there being nothing of it in all their books, as was said before. But there is something like it in 2 Sam. xx. 3. where David shut up his concubines, and made them live in widowhood till their death. And he might take the liberty to do this (though no law gave him such power) rather than take away the life of his daughter, which was against law; for it condemned such sacrifices. But the truth is, there was no necessity of doing either, if he had understood or considered the law; for he might have paid a price for her to the priest, which the law prescribed, when a son or daughter was consecrated to God, (Lev. xxvii. 2, 3, &c.) Nay, they who consecrated themselves, might redeem themselves: and about this very case of Jephthah there was anciently a dispute between two famous doctors, Simeon ben Lakish and R. Johanan; the former of which maintained, that he ought to have paid the price or value of her according to the law; but the other maintained, he was not bound to do so much as that, because the vow was to offer a burnt-offering, in which his daughter could not be comprehended. For other animals only were capable of being offered in sacrifice. As for those words, Lev. xxvii. 28, 29. upon which Lud. Capellus hath founded his opinion that she might be sacrificed, Maimonides hath better restrained them to the sons and daughters of the Canaanites, devoted by God to destruction. But who can think that God would have the Hebrew children so devoted as those slaves were, upon whom a curse was denounced before they entered into Canaan? Beside, if Jephthah was bound to offer his daughter, who should be employed in that work? Should the priests? But their business was rather to persuade and deter him from what he had imprudently vowed. Should the magistrates? But they could not be ignorant that God had forbidden such sacrifices. Should Jephthah himself? But this would have argued him as void of common sense, as of natural affection. And who can think (as Theodoricus Hackspan goes on) that since God allowed cities of refuge, whither a manslayer might flee and be safe, when he had unwittingly killed a man, that the same privilege might not have been allowed to a son or a daughter, who was perfectly innocent (as this virgin was), viz. to save their lives by flight, or by paying a ransom?

The Jews are very doubtful in this matter; for some say Phinehas lost his priesthood, and it was translated to the family of Ithamar, because he did not absolve Jephthah from this vow: but others of the eastern writers say, he was forbid to release him by the spirit of prophecy; and Jephthah, when he was admonished by his friends to go and advise with him how to save his daughter, was forbid by an angel to go. (See Selden, lib. i. de Succession. ad Pontificatum, cap. 2. fol. 117, &c.) But the Targum upon this verse blames Jephthah for not consulting Phinehas; for if he had, he would have redeemed her for a sum of money.

And she knew no man.] This is looked upon, by those who think she was only consecrated to the Lord, as an argument of it; that after the performance of his vow, it is said, she knew no man; that is, as long as she lived, she continued a virgin.

And it was a custom in Israel.] They that think she was sacrificed, take these words as separate from those that follow, and interpret them, upon this a sanction was made, that none should hereafter, by the like error, offer human sacrifices. So the Targum. (See Selden in the place forenamed.) But there was no need of this statute; nor is it likely that the fable among the Greeks, concerning the sacrifice of Iphigenia by Agamemnon, was devised out of this sacred story, as Lud. Capellus conjectures; who fancies also this Jephtigenia, that is, the daughter of Jephthah (from whence might come Iphigenia), was not sacrificed upon the altar, but only slain; though the vow was, he would offer a burnt-offering. But we refer these words to what follows in the next verse.

Ver. 40. That the daughters of Israel.] They of that country.

Went yearly to lament the daughter of Jephthah the Gileadite.] Some interpret the Hebrew word thannoth to signify they went to discourse with her, or to comfort her; though the most ancient interpreters (as Bochartus observes, in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. i. cap. 9.) translate it as we do, θρηνεῖν, as the LXX. have it, to make lamentation. But quite contrary the learned Lud. de Dieu, different from the rest (except Sixtinus Amama, who hath the same notion), interprets it to praise her. Which signification he plainly derives out of the Arabic language; and beside, we ourselves in this very book (ver. 11.) seem to follow it, by translating it rehearse. And thus that excellent man explains this whole matter:—"She was not slain; but, as appears sufficiently from the foregoing words, was devoted to perpetual virginity; in which she deserved greater commendation than her father. For he, as soon as he saw her come to meet him, repented of the vow he had rashly made, and tore his clothes, lamenting the miserable condition into which he had brought himself and her: but she most courageously comforted her father, and, congratulating his victory, desired him not to be troubled about her, for she was ready to submit to what he had vowed. Upon the account of which heroic virtue, whereby she obliged the whole country, they could do no less than celebrate her praise every year."

Four days in the year.] One day in every quarter of the year they went to celebrate her fame with verses composed in her praise, as Grotius supposes. But whether they went to the place where she was retired, and there sang them before her, or in some other public place; and whether while she lived, or after her death, is uncertain, as De Dieu observes.

CHAP. XII.

Ver. 1. AND the men of Ephraim gathered themselves.] In the Hebrew, were called, by a public cry, or proclamation, to arm themselves.

And went northward.] To the country of Manasseh, on the other side Jordan. For this sufficiently shews that Mizpeh was in that country, and in the northern part of it, towards Lebanon and Hermon, as I observed before, xi. 29. Pet. Martyr thinks they did not march orderly thither, being not gathered together (as far as appears) by the authority of the magistrate, but in a tumultuous manner, as seditious people are wont to do.

And said unto Jephthah.] By this, and by what follows, it appears they came to Mizpeh, where Jephthah dwelt.

Wherefore passedst thou over.] They do not mean over Jordan, for there he was already; but from hence to the coast of the Ammonites. (See xi. 30. 32.)

To fight against the children of Ammon, and didst not call us to go with thee?] Their pride made them take it ill, that they had not a share in the glory of the late victory. Just as formerly they quarrelled with Gideon upon the like occasion, (viii. 1.) which shews they were a haughty tribe.

We will burn thine house upon thee with fire.] Their pride put them into such a strange rage, that they seem to threaten to burn him as well as his house.

Ver. 2. And Jephthah said unto them, I and my people were at great strife with the children of Ammon.] He answers their furious language with great mildness; and first tells them, that he did not undertake this war till he was forced to it by the Ammonites, who sorely distressed them, (x. 9.)

And when I called you, ye delivered me not out of their hands.] In the second place he denies their charge, and affirms the contrary, that he had begged their assistance, but they refused to give it him: yea (as the word we translate called signifies), he had cried aloud to them with earnest importunities to help them in their distress.

Ver. 3. And when I saw that you delivered me not.] That there was no hope of your help to preserve us from ruin.

I put my life in my hand.] Exposed myself to the utmost hazard; for he had but a small part of the people of Israel with him to fight with their powerful oppressors. This phrase seems peculiar to the Hebrews and the eastern writers; for among all the Greek and Roman writers, Isaac Casaubon saith he never met with it but once in Xenarchus; whom Athenæus alleges, introducing in one of his plays a man full of fear and trembling—ἐν τῇ χειρὶ τὴν ψυχὴν ἔχοντα.

And passed over against the children of Ammon.] With such forces alone as he could get on his side Jordan, (xi. 29, 30.)

And the Lord delivered them into my hand.] God approved his undertaking by giving him a great victory.

Wherefore then are ye come up unto me this day to fight against me?] Who had defended and preserved them. For if the Ammonites had vanquished Jephthah, they would soon have passed over Jordan and fallen upon the Ephraimites, as they had before attempted, (x. 9.)

Ver. 4. Then Jephthah gathered all the men of Gilead, and fought with Ephraim.] When he saw they were not pacified by this fair and peaceable apology, but still continued their menaces, he betook himself to arms, and raised as many men as he could to oppose them.

And the men of Gilead smote them.] Put them to flight, and made a great slaughter of them.

Because they said, Ye Gileadites are fugitives of Ephraim.] That which provoked them to kill so many of them was their scoffing language (added to their threats), whereby they reproached the men of Gilead, (who were the chief managers of the late war, xi. 29.) as if they were but the scum and dregs of the tribe of Ephraim; i. e. of those descended from Joseph, among whom they were the principal.

Among the Ephraimites, and among the Manassites.] That is, that dwelt in the land of Canaan: who looked upon the Gileadites, and the rest of the Manassites, on the other side Jordan, and in the most northerly part of it, as the refuse of their nation. But it must be acknowledged, that the words in the Hebrew are capable of another sense, and may be thus translated: Therefore (so the particle ki is often translated) they said, Fugitives of Ephraim are ye; that is, having smote them, the Gileadites called the Ephraimites run-aways. And the truth is, thus they (not the Gileadites) are called in the next verse: and then the following words may be thus translated, Gilead got between the Ephraimites and the Manassites. It is very probable, that the Manassites in Canaan joined with the Ephraimites in this presumptuous attempt upon the Gileadites; who being well acquainted with their own country, got between them and the river Jordan, to intercept their passage over it, as we read in the following verse.

Ver. 5. And the Gileadites took the passages of Jordan before the Ephraimites.] So that none could pass over at these fords, without their leave.

And it was so, that when those Ephraimites who were escaped.] They are the very same words in the Hebrew, which are used in the foregoing verse, The fugitives of Ephraim.

Said, Let me go over; that the men of Gilead.] Who were set to guard the passages.

Said, Art thou an Ephraimite.] They examined him what countryman he was; whether a Reubenite, Gadite, Manassite, on their side Jordan, or one of the Ephraimites on the other.

If he said, Nay.] For fear would make him deny it.

Ver. 6. Then said they unto him, Say now Shibboleth.] To find the truth, they put him to this test; whether his pronunciation of some words was like that of the Gileadites: for people of the same nation, who speak the same language, differ very much in their pronunciation of it, in several parts of the country: as in Greece, all spake Greek; but the Ionians, Attics, Dorians, and Æolians, spake it very differently. And so they did among the Romans; for at Prænestе, which was not far from Rome (as Pet. Martyr observes out of Plautus), instead of Ciconia, they said Konia. And so the Ephraimites said sibboleth, but could not pronounce shibboleth. There were many other words like this which they could not frame their mouths to speak, as the Gileadites did; but this was chosen, it is likely, because it was very fit for the purpose; shibboleth signifying not only an ear of corn, but also floods of water, (Psal. lxix. 2.) so that the test they put them unto was this, to bid them say, Let me pass over the water.

And he said Sibboleth; for he could not frame his mouth to pronounce it right.] If he was an Ephraimite, he presently discovered himself; for he could not pronounce the letter schin; which proceeded, I suppose, from the long use and custom of that people to pronounce otherwise, so that they could not frame the organs of speech to pronounce as the Gileadites did: which we see at this day among all nations; who, in different provinces, very much differ in their speech, though they use the very same language.

Then they took him, and slew him at the passages of Jordan.] Otherwise they let him go; for they used this mark of distinction on purpose, lest they should kill any of another tribe.

And there fell at that time of the Ephraimites forty and two thousand.] In the fight, and at the passages of Jordan, this number perished: which was a just punishment to take down their pride and insolence, in despising so great a man as Jephthah, and threatening to destroy his house, after so glorious a victory, whereby he had saved all the people of Israel; and reproaching their brethren also, whom they invaded without any cause, and seem to have intended to drive them out of their country.

Ver. 7. And Jephthah judged Israel six years.] After this humiliation of the Ephraimites, all the tribes, whom the Ammonites had oppressed (on the other side Jordan, perhaps, in the land of Canaan, as well as the Gileadites, and the rest on their side), submitted themselves unto him as their judge; and he continued six years in the government.

Then died Jephthah the Gileadite, and was buried in one of the cities of Gilead.] The Jews have several foolish conceits concerning his death and burial; because it is said, he was buried in the cities of Gilead, as the words are in the Hebrew: which they would have understood, as if he rotted (as a punishment for offering his daughter), and one piece of him, when it dropped off, was buried in one city, and another in the next city, &c.; when the plain meaning is expressed in our translation, that he was buried in one of the cities, that is, in Mizpeh, where he lived. (See Gen. xix. 29.) And so Aben Ezra and Ralbag interpret it: though the latter of these rabbins could not forbear to incline to one of the Talmudical fables; that he having no issue to propagate his name, ordered his body to be cut into several pieces, and buried in so many cities of Gilead; that every one might preserve his memory. Other fancies there are, in which men indulge themselves; and Peter Martyr hath thought fit to interpose his conjecture, that the word Iram, which we translate cities, may possibly be the proper name of a city in Gilead, wherein he was buried.

Ver. 8. And after him Ibzan of Beth-lehem judged Israel.] It is not said upon what occasion he was made judge; for, perhaps, he was raised up by God immediately after Jephthah's death, only to preserve them in the true religion, which was in some measure restored. Some of the Jews fancy him to have been the same with Boaz, who married Ruth the Moabitess, but without any ground at all that I can find.

Ver. 9. And he had thirty sons and thirty daughters.] A numerous issue was accounted a great blessing in those days: and though we read of no memorable act that this judge did, yet this is set down to shew that he was a person eminently favoured by God.

Whom he sent abroad.] The Vulgar refers this to his daughters, for whom he provided husbands, and sent his daughters to their houses, as the manner was, (Gen. xxiv. 67. xxxi. 50.)

And he took in thirty daughters from abroad for his sons.] This completed the blessing of God in the gift of so many children; who all lived to the state of men and women, and were all disposed by him in marriage, for that was in the power of parents. (See Gen. xxiv.)

And he judged Israel seven years.] Not all the Israelites, but those that Jephthah had judged; and none disputed his authority, but he ruled over them thus long.

Ver. 10. Then died Ibzan, and was buried at Beth-lehem.] There were two Beth-lehems, one in the tribe of Zebulun, and the other in the tribe of Judah; the latter of which, it is generally thought, is here meant, where he was born and buried.

Ver. 11. And after him Elon, a Zebulonite, judged Israel: and he judged Israel ten years.] It is observed by many, that Eusebius, in his Chronicon, passes by this judge, because he saith the LXX. do not mention him, though the Hebrew text doth: but, as all our present copies of the LXX. now mention him; so did those whom a very ancient writer used, viz. Theophilus Antioch. lib. i. ad Autolicum; and, which is more to be wondered at, those copies also which Eusebius himself followed in his tenth book, de Præpar. Evang. cap. 14. as our primate Usher hath observed in his Chronologia Sacra, par. i. cap. ult.

Ver. 12. And Elon the Zebulonite died, and was buried in Aijalon in the country of Zebulun.] These last words were added to distinguish this Aijalon here mentioned from another in the tribe of Dan, (i. 35.)

Ver. 13. And after him Abdon the son of Hillel, a Pirathonite, judged Israel.] The place where he was born shews that he was of the tribe of Ephraim, whom God at last honoured with a judge of their own country, after their pride had been humbled by Jephthah: for Pirathon is expressly said, ver. 15. to be in the land of Ephraim.

Ver. 14. And he had forty sons, and thirty nephews.] That is, grandsons.

That rode on threescore and ten asses' colts.] See ver. 10. This is said, to shew that God blessed him not only with a numerous posterity, but let them all grow up to be men. (See x. 4.)

And he judged Israel eight years.] The intention of this book is chiefly to shew how God punished them for their sins, and delivered them upon their repentance: but nothing remarkable of this kind falling out in the time of these three last mentioned judges, he omits to relate their other acts, which was beside his purpose.

Here it may be fit to note, that the other interval of the two mentioned upon xi. 26. consisting of a hundred and forty years, (which, added to three hundred and forty, in the foregoing interval, make up the four hundred and eighty years mentioned 1 Kings vi. 2.) it is evident that the latter part of them, viz. eighty-four years, was made up by the reigns of Saul and David, who each reigned forty years, (2 Sam. v. 4. Acts xiii. 21.) and the four first years of Solomon: therefore the remaining fifty-six years are made up of part of the eighteen years wherein the Ammonites oppressed Israel after the death of Jair, and the years wherein these four last named persons and Samuel judged Israel.

Ver. 15. And Abdon the son of Hillel the Pirathonite died, and was buried in Pirathon, in the land of Ephraim, in the mount of the Amalekites.] Some think this mount retained the name of Mount Amalek (as the words are in the Hebrew) from ancient times; the Amalekites having possessed it heretofore, when the Canaanites were the inhabitants of this country; but it may as well be thought (since all that is said is but conjecture) that it was so called from some famous overthrow, which the children of Ephraim gave the Amalekites in this place; for in the time of the judges they more than once joined with others against the Israelites. (See iii. 13. vi. 3. but especially see what I have noted upon v. 14.)

CHAP. XIII.

Ver. 1. AND the children of Israel did evil again in the sight of the Lord.] As he complained before, x. 6. when he began to speak of what befel them thereupon.

And the Lord delivered them into the hand of the Philistines forty years.] This is the sixth oppression, and the longest that they ever lay under: which is thought, by a great man I have often mentioned, to have ended seven months after the death of Eli, when the ark was brought back out of the land of the Philistines; and, by the same reason, it began so many months after he entered upon the government, after the death of Abdon. (See Usherii Annales, ad A. M. 2848. and his Chronologica Sacra, p. 1. cap. 12, 13.) But, I think, Sir John Marsham hath since that more rightly judged, that this oppression by the Philistines is not different from that mentioned x. 7, 8. but one and the same; they vexing and oppressing the Israelites in the west, when the Ammonites oppressed them in the east: for though the oppression of the Philistines lasted longer, yet it began at the very same time with the other; which made their distress the greater: and therefore that preface (x. 7.) belongs not only to what immediately there follows, concerning the Ammonites and Jephthah, but to what is here related concerning the Philistines and Samson: which the holy writer could not speak of both together without confusion; and therefore first relates the issue of the war with the Ammonites, and then relates the other part of the history concerning the Philistines, which he here begins: and by this synchronism all difficulties may be solved, and the years, which seem redundant, brought within their true compass. (See his Canon Chronicus, sect. 11. p. 293.)

Ver. 2. And there was a certain man of Zorah.] See Josh. xix. 40, 41.

Of the family of the Danites.] Sometimes the word family is used for a tribe. (See Josh. vii. 17.) Or, the meaning may be of a family among the Danites: from among whom it was very proper to have a deliverer raised up to them, for the Danites were near neighbours to the Philistines, who oppressed them.

Whose name was Manoah; and his wife was barren, and bare not.] Was not likely to have any children.

Ver. 3. And the angel of the Lord appeared unto the woman.] As he did to Gideon, (vi. 12.) in human shape; as the relation shews in the following verses, 5. 8, &c.

And said unto her, Behold now, thou art barren, and bearest not; but thou shalt conceive, and bear a son.] The greatest men of this nation were born of barren women; as Isaac was anciently, and Samuel and John the Baptist in future times.

Ver. 4. Now therefore beware, I pray thee, and drink not wine nor strong drink.] She was to live as the Nazarites did, (Numb. vi. 2, 3.) while she carried him in her womb, and, perhaps, while she nursed him; because, as it follows in the next verse, he was to be a perpetual Nazarite unto God, from his conception to his death, (ver. 7.) which he could not have been if she had drank wine or strong drink; because a child in the womb and its mother live by the same nourishment.

And eat not any unclean thing.] It is likely they were too negligent in those days, in observing the precepts about meats; otherwise there would have been no need to mention this.

Ver. 5. For, lo, thou shalt conceive, and bear a son; and no razor shall come on his head: for the child shall be a Nazarite unto God from the womb.] See upon Numb. vi. 4.

And he shall begin to deliver Israel out of the hands of the Philistines.] He did not perfectly deliver the Israelites from the yoke of the Philistines, but it was done after his death by Samuel; who put an end to this forty years' tyranny, by his famous victory at Eben-ezer, (1 Sam. vii. 13.) as the same Sir J. Marsham observes: who supposes Eli to have died in the midst of this servitude; that is, twenty years before this victory. Samson therefore only sorely galled the Philistines, but they still continued to oppress the Israelites, as they did when he was born; for it appears by these words, that when the angel spake to them, they were under the hand, that is, the power of the Philistines, and so continued all his days: for it is said, xv. 20. that he judged Israel twenty years, in the days of the Philistines; that is, while they tyrannized over Israel: from which tyranny he was so far from being a complete deliverer, that he himself was taken and bound by them; nor had he ever any command over the Israelites.

Ver. 6. And the woman came and told her husband.] The angel seems to have appeared to her in the field, and she acquainted her husband with it when she came home.

Saying, A man of God came unto me.] So they called prophets.

And his countenance was like the countenance of an angel of God, very terrible.] That is, venerable, or full of majesty; for so the men of God, I suppose, sometimes appeared; as may be gathered from the story of St. Stephen, who, being full of the Holy Ghost, when he stood before the council of Jerusalem, his face shone as if it had been the face of an angel, (Acts vi. 15.)

And I asked him not whence he was, neither told he me his name.] The lustre of his countenance struck such an awe into her, that she made no inquiry who he was, nor whence he came, and he was not pleased to tell her. Though the Vulgar (against both the Hebrew text, the Chaldee, and the LXX.) hath it, She asked him who he was, and whence he came, and what was his name, but he would not tell her.

Ver. 7. And he said unto me, Behold, thou shalt conceive and bear a son; and now drink no wine, nor strong drink, &c.] She recites the words of the angel unto her husband; who, as Josephus fancies, hearing her highly commend the person who appeared to her for his beauty and majesty, began to suspect her chastity; which is a conceit for which there is no ground, but much against it.

Ver. 8. Then Manoah entreated the Lord, and said, Oh, my Lord, let the man of God whom thou didst send come again unto us.] To make good the forenamed conceit, Josephus makes this to be the prayer of his wife, that he might satisfy the jealousy of her husband; directly contrary to what is here expressly said, that Manoah made this request. (See lib. v. Antiq. cap. 10.)

And teach us what we shall do unto the child which shall be born.] He did not in the least question his wife's chastity; no, nor blame her credulity, but desired himself to see the person (if God pleased) who had brought this good news to them, and to be informed how they should educate the child.

Ver. 9. And God hearkened to the voice of Manoah.] Who, it appears by this, desired only further satisfaction in that which he already believed.

And the angel of God came again unto the woman as she sat in the field.] Where, I suppose, (ver. 6.) he appeared to her before: and, I think, all interpreters agree, that it was on the very same day.

And Manoah her husband was not with her.] This is no sign of his jealousy, but rather quite contrary, that he had a great opinion of her virtue.

Ver. 10. And the woman made haste, and ran, and shewed her husband, saying, Behold, the man hath appeared unto me that came unto me the other day.] The word other is not in the Hebrew, but it may be translated, to-day. And, perhaps, he appeared to her at the first in the morning, and now in the evening.

Ver. 11. And Manoah arose, and went after his wife.] Who led him the way, to shew him where the man was.

And came to the man.] Whom his wife had desired to stay a while, till she called her husband to him, as Josephus probably enough conjectures: but I cannot imagine how he came to add, that when her husband saw him, οὐ δ' οὕτως ἐπαύετο τῆς ὑπονοίας, he was not instantly rid of his suspicion; for there is nothing like it in the following words.

He said unto him, Art thou the man that spakest unto the woman?] And told her, she should have a son.

And he said, I am.] The same Jewish writer adds, that Manoah prayed him to tell him what he had said to his wife; but the angel replied, it was enough that he had told it her.

Ver. 12. And Manoah said, Now let thy words come to pass.] These words may be no more than a wish, that what he foretold might prove true; though some look upon them as a prayer to God to make them good.

How shall we order the child? and how shall we do unto him?] The Hebrew word mischpat, which we translate order, signifies here the rule whereby he should live.

Ver. 13. And the angel said unto Manoah, Of all that I said unto the woman let her beware.] This general answer might have been sufficient; but that they might be the more careful, he adds, in the next verse, all the particulars he had mentioned to his wife, ver. 4. and something more largely.

Ver. 14. She may not eat of any thing that cometh of the vine.] i.e. Neither grapes nor raisins.

Neither let her drink wine nor strong drink, nor eat any unclean thing.] This seems to lay a charge upon him as well as her, to see this abstinence observed.

All that I commanded her let her observe.] Breed him up a Nazarite all the days of his life.

Ver. 15. And Manoah said to the angel of the Lord, I pray thee, let us detain thee until we have made ready a kid for thee.] He desired him to stay and accept an entertainment from them, which was anciently given to strangers, especially when they appeared like more than ordinary persons, (Gen. xviii. 3, 4, &c.) and was continued to these days, (Judg. vi. 18.) Some think he intended to offer a sacrifice of peace-offerings, and feast the man of God with that part which belongs to him that brought it to be offered.

Ver. 16. And the angel of the Lord said unto Manoah, Though thou detain me, I will not eat of thy bread.] He was persuaded to stay, but not to taste of his meat; for the word bread comprehends all provision of food.

And if thou wilt offer a burnt-offering, thou must offer it unto the Lord.] Or, But if thou hast a mind to express thy thankfulness, offer a burnt-offering, which must be wholly sacrificed unto the Lord. A prophet (as Manoah took this to be) might warrant men to sacrifice, though they were not priests, nor at the tabernacle, as Elijah did at Mount Carmel.

For Manoah knew not that he was an angel of the Lord.] As he did shortly after, when he appeared to be more than an angel.

Ver. 17. And Manoah said unto the angel of the Lord, What is thy name, that when thy sayings come to pass we may do thee honour?] He desired they might shew themselves grateful to him, by making him some present, which they could not do, unless they knew his name, and where he dwelt. So Josephus interprets doing him honour, ἵνα χάριν αὐτῷ καὶ δωρεὰν παράσχωσι, that they might give him thanks, and bestow some gift upon him.

Ver. 18. And the angel of the Lord said unto him, Why askest thou after my name, seeing it is secret?] Or rather (as it is in the margin) it is wonderful; so the LXX. θαυμαστὸν, admirable. Whose essence (for that is meant by name in Scripture) is to be admired, but cannot be comprehended. This shews it was the Lord himself; that is, the Word of the Lord, who was to be the Messiah; unto whom the prophet Isaiah gives the same name of Pele, the wonderful, (Isa. ix. 6.)

Ver. 19. And Manoah took a kid with a meat-offering.] Which usually attended the burnt-offering, as we read in the book of Leviticus.

And offered it upon the rock unto the Lord.] He did not offer it, properly speaking, but laid it upon the rock, as on an altar, to be offered unto the Lord. And so the LXX. προσήνεγκε, he brought it to be offered; he laid τοὺς ἄρτους καὶ τὰ κρέα ἐπὶ τῆς πέτρας, he laid the bread and the flesh upon the rock.

And the angel of the Lord did wondrously.] The word angel is not in the Hebrew, and therefore this is to be referred unto Jehovah, immediately foregoing, who appeared in the form of an angel, and now acted suitable to his name Pele, wonderful; unto which the word maphli (did wondrously) plainly alludes; that is, he brought fire, it is probable, out of the rock, as in the days of Gideon. So Josephus; for we read of no fire that Manoah brought, and yet there was a flame, in which the angel went up into heaven.

And Manoah and his wife looked on.] Which shews that Manoah was only a spectator of what was done, but did not offer the sacrifice.

Ver. 20. And it came to pass, when the flame went up towards heaven from off the altar.] So that part of the rock is called where the flesh and the bread were laid, being, I suppose, a very great stone, flat at the top like an altar.

That the angel of the Lord ascended in the flame of the altar.] In which he went up ὥσπερ ὀχήματος (as Josephus speaks), as in a chariot.

And Manoah and his wife looked on it, and fell on their faces to the ground.] Being astonished when they saw him, whom they took only for a prophet, to be an angel of the Lord; and, perhaps, worshipping the Divine Majesty, who had appeared in such an illustrious manner to them, and praying him to preserve their lives, which they thought in danger by such a sight.

Ver. 21. But the angel of the Lord did no more appear to Manoah and his wife.] There being no further occasion for it.

Then Manoah knew that it was an angel of the Lord.] By the wonderful things that he did, and ascending up to heaven in a flame, which demonstrated his celestial nature, which could not be hurt by fire.

Ver. 22. And Manoah said unto his wife, We shall surely die, because we have seen God.] This has been an old opinion among the Israelites. (See upon vi. 22.)

Ver. 23. And his wife said unto him, If the Lord were pleased to kill us, he would not have received a burnt-offering and a meat-offering at our hand.] She seems to have had a better consideration of the thing than her husband, and strongly argues him out of his fears, as altogether unreasonable: and, first, she makes God's acceptance of a sacrifice from them a plain demonstration of his favour to them; and his acceptance of it appeared by his kindling a fire himself, whereby it was consumed; and by the ascension of the angel in the flame, as if he went to carry the sacrifice unto God, and present it to him in heaven.

Neither would he have shewed us all these things.] Concerning the birth of a son, and the manner of his education, and his beginning the deliverance of Israel from their oppressors, of which there was no hope, if God intended to take away their lives from whom this son was to issue.

Nor would he at this time have shewn us such things as these.] Appeared again and again unto them, to acquaint them with these things, at a time when such visions were rare, and when they were in such distress, that God seemed to have abandoned them to the will of their enemies. These were two unanswerable arguments that they had no reason to think God would take away their lives, but continue them, for the fulfilling his promise.

Ver. 24. And the woman bare a son.] We have no direction whereby to know the time of his birth, but only this, that the angel said before he was conceived, (ver. 5.) that he should begin to deliver Israel from the hands of the Philistines. Which is a plain indication they were then under their power; that is, the forty years' oppression of the Philistines was begun; and, consequently, since his twenty years' judicature was in the days of the Philistines, (xv. ult.) that is, during their tyranny, he was born in the beginning of it: for we cannot well suppose that he began to be their deliverer before the eighteenth year of his age, as primate Usher observes in his Annal. ad A. M. 2849.

And called his name Samson.] Which, Josephus saith, signifies ἰσχυρὸν, strong, or robust; but whence he derived it I cannot imagine. Some think from Shemesh, which signifies the sun, which is a body of mighty force. So St. Jerome, who thinks Samson is as much as their sun; a great light of Israel, as David is called.

And the child grew, and the Lord blessed him.] As he grew up there plainly appeared in him extraordinary endowments of body and mind, which the Lord bestowed on him.

Ver. 25. And the Spirit of the Lord began to move him.] To do some unusual things, beyond mere human power, which were specimens of an heroical virtue. The Targum translates it, the spirit of fortitude or courage, &c.

At times.] Upon certain occasions, when it would be visible to the people, that God intended to work deliverance by him.

In the camp of Dan, between Zorah and Eshtaol.] See chap. xvi. 31. There was no army of the Danites encamped where Samson displayed his valour; but this is the name of a place, called Machana-Dan (the camp of Dan), in which, perhaps, Samson lived. The reason of this name is given afterward in the eighteenth chapter, ver. 12. where there is a history of an expedition of the Danites; which, though placed after this, yet was really before the times of Samson. But this camp, it appears by that place, did not lie between Zorah and Eshtaol, but in the tribe of Judah, or in the very borders of it: therefore the word and must be here supplied; in the camp of Dan, and between Zorah and Eshtaol, towards which that camp lay. If this be not allowed, we must suppose, that the six hundred men mentioned xviii. 11. made their encampment between Zorah and Eshtaol, before they marched out of their own country, and gave that place the same name which the other had near Kirjath-jearim, where they encamped the first night.

CHAP. XIV.

Ver. 1. AND Samson went down to Timnath.] A city in his own tribe, as we read Josh. xix. 47. (see there) but fallen, it is probable, into the possession of the Philistines, near to whose country it lay, who, at this time, oppressed the Israelites, and made them their tributaries, which did not hinder, but rather promote, all manner of commerce between them.

And saw a woman of Timnath, of the daughters of the Philistines.] That is, he fell in love with her; according to the vulgar saying among the Greeks, ἐκ τοῦ ὁρᾶν τὸ ἐρᾶν, from looking comes loving.

Ver. 2. And he came up, and told his father and his mother.] This was a part of the honour they thought was owing to their parents, to advise with them about their marriage, of which they did not treat, but left it to their parents. So it seems, by this, to have been in ancient times, though their children were of age (as Samson is now supposed to be), and, according to the later doctors among the Jews, fit to contract marriage themselves. (See Selden, lib. ii. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 3. and see above, xii. 9.)

And said, I have seen a woman in Timnath of the daughters of the Philistines; now therefore get her for me to wife.] This was when Samson was about twenty-two years old, as primate Usher computes it, who thinks Eli judged Israel at this time in civil affairs; but Sir J. Marsham makes account, as I observed, he died in the middle of this servitude.

Ver. 3. And his father and his mother said unto him, Is there never a woman among the daughters of thy brethren.] That is, in their own family.

Or among all thy people.] In the whole tribe of Dan.

That thou shouldest go to take a wife of the uncircumcised Philistines?] Which was against the law of Moses, in Exod. xxxiv. 16. Deut. vii. 3. For though they were none of the seven nations of Canaan, yet they were under the same condemnation, and their land was given to the Israelites.

And Samson said unto his father, Get her for me; for she pleaseth me well.] His mother, some think, expressed such dislike to the motion, that he applied himself wholly to his father, and beseeched him to favour his choice, because he was deeply in love with her.

Ver. 4. But his father and his mother knew not that it was of the Lord.] He felt some Divine motion in him, which carried him to this place to seek a wife; but his parents knew not of it till he told them (as some think), and then readily consented.

That he sought an occasion against the Philistines.] Which he knew this treaty of marriage would give him, whether it succeeded or miscarried.

For at that time the Philistines had dominion over Israel.] They were still, as they had been several years, under the power of the Philistines, who treated them, it is likely, with such scorn and contempt, as if they had been their slaves.

Ver. 5. Then went Samson down, and his father and his mother, to Timnath.] He overcame them by his importunity; or, perhaps, told them, as I said before, what a motion he felt from God to desire this match.

And came to the vineyards of Timnath.] Unto which he turned aside, upon some occasion not here mentioned.

And, behold, a young lion roared against him.] Came with full mouth (as we speak) to devour him. By this, and many other places, it appears, there were lions in Judea, from whence several places had their names, as Lebaoth, Josh. xv. 32. and Beth-lebaoth, xix. 6. Every one also knows, that a young lion, come to his full strength, was the fiercest of all other. And so cephir (Kimchi observes) is used for a lion grown bigger than gur, which signifies a lion's whelp.

Ver. 6. And the Spirit of the Lord came mightily upon him.] The same Spirit mentioned in the last verse of the foregoing chapter; which endued him with extraordinary courage and undauntedness of mind, together with a supernatural strength of body.

And he rent him as he would have rent a kid.] That is, as easily and speedily. The Hebrew word certainly signifies to tear in pieces, and therefore, if it be true what Josephus saith, (lib. v. Antiq. cap. 10.) that he throttled him with his hand (ἄγχει ταῖς χερσὶ), the meaning is, that, after he had strangled him, he rent him in pieces.

And he had nothing in his hand.] If he had encountered him being armed with some weapon, it had been a bold action; but when he was naked to receive his assault, was a miraculous resolution: by which he was encouraged to undertake greater things, as David was by the same power given him.

But he told not his father nor his mother what he had done.] Being afraid, perhaps, that this action might come to the ears of the Philistines, which might make them jealous of him.

Ver. 7. And he went down and talked with the woman.] Discoursed with her about marriage, which he propounded to her.

And she pleased Samson well.] All things were agreed, and she was espoused to him: but before the espousals she was converted to the Jewish religion, and made an entire proselyte, as R. Levi ben Gersom, and Moses Mikotzi, and other Hebrew doctors say; and then it was not unlawful to marry a stranger, as Joshua, they say, did Rahab. (See Selden, lib. v. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 15. and Buxtorf, de Sponsalibus et Divortiis, sect. 31.)

Ver. 8. And after a time.] In the Hebrew it is after-days; that is, a year, as that phrase often signifies, and is so translated by us, Exod. xiii. 10. where mijamim jamim is rightly translated from year to year. (See also Gen. iv. 3. and chap. xi. of this book, ver. 4.)

He returned to take her.] To complete his marriage: which was not wont to be celebrated between a man and a young virgin till twelve months after the espousals (as the Hebrew doctors say), that she might have so much time to adorn herself, and make herself every way fit for marriage. (See Selden, lib. ii. de Uxor. Hebr. cap. 8.) But if in that twelve months' time she lay with any other man, it was accounted adultery, and punished with death, because she was really his wife.

And he turned aside to see the carcass of the lion.] Which was now a mere skeleton, the flesh being all consumed: and so the Syriac interpreter here renders it.

And, behold, there was a swarm of bees and honey in the carcass of the lion.] Bees are observed, by Aristotle and others, to abhor stinking smells, and to abstain from flesh; which hath made some think it strange that a swarm of bees should breed in the carcass of a lion: but they did not consider that time had consumed the flesh, or it was eaten up by birds and beasts, and nothing but the bare bones remained; in which the bees did not breed, but settled themselves, when they swarmed, as they have done sometimes in dead men's sculls and in their tombs. (See Bochart, in his Hierozoicon, p. 2. lib. iv. cap. 10. and Vossius de Orig. et Progressu Idolol. lib. iv. cap. 72.)

Ver. 9. And he took thereof in his hand.] Or, as the Syriac translates it, it dropped into his hands, from the combs, that is, which they had made either in the belly, as St. Ambrose thinks, or in the breast, as Josephus, or (which Vossius rather thinks) in the head, or in the mouth of the lion, as the LXX. and Vulgar understand it: though Bochartus thinks that, instead of ἐν στόματι, in the mouth, it should be read in the LXX. ἐν σώματι λέοντος, in the body of the lion.

And went on eating.] Which was not unlawful, in case of hunger, though it was found in a carcass; because such ceremonial laws, as forbid such things, were not observed in cases of necessity: as appears by David's eating the shew-bread, and Elijah's eating food brought him by ravens.

And came to his father and mother.] From whom he had turned aside for a while, as he did when they first went to Timnath, (ver. 5.)

And he gave them, and they did eat.] Wild honey being delicious food in that country, as many places shew, (Deut. xxxii. 13. and Psal. lxxxi. 16.)

But he told them not that he had taken the honey out of the carcass of the lion.] For then, perhaps, they would not have eaten it.

Ver. 10. So his father went down unto the woman.] (Together with his wife and his son) to demand her, who was espoused to Samson, to consummate the marriage.

And Samson made there a feast; for so used the young men to do.] According to the custom of all countries: which feast was called by the Jews the nuptial joy, with which no other was to be intermixed; and all labour ceased, as long as it lasted. (See Selden, lib. ii. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 11. p. 172.)

Ver. 11. And it came to pass, when they saw him.] What a goodly person he was.

That they brought thirty companions to be with him.] Her friends, out of respect to him, brought this great number of bridemen to honour his nuptials: but some of the Jews think they had a further end in it, that they might serve as a guard to him, if he should attempt any disturbance; of which, they fancy, the Philistines were afraid, when they saw he was a man of might.

Ver. 12. And Samson said unto them, I will now put forth a riddle unto you.] This shews how ancient the custom was (which we find afterward among the Greeks), of proposing questions to be resolved in their compotations and feasts; that they might not be spent merely in dull eating and drinking, but there might be something to exercise and whet the wits of the company: and they called such riddles as these, which were contrived to puzzle men's thoughts, by the name of γρῖφος, which the scholiast upon Aristophanes defines to be παροίνιον ζήτημα, a question put among their cups. Athenæus discourses largely of such problems, as they also called them, in his Deipnosophists. (See Bochart, in his Hierozoicon, p. 2. lib. iv. cap. 12.)

If you can certainly declare it within the seven days of the feast.] So long the nuptial solemnity was wont to continue in ancient times, (Gen. xxix. 27.) They could not shorten the days, as the Jewish doctors tell us, but they might lengthen them; as they did at Tobit's marriage, when the solemnity continued fourteen days, though according to custom they were bound to keep but three, she being a widow, as Selden observes in the forenamed book, p. 185. and Buxtorf in his Synagoga Judaica, cap. 35.

And find it out, then I will give you thirty sheets, and thirty change of garments.] The Greeks followed this example, and gave rewards to him who resolved the question proposed, but set a mulct on those that could not.

Ver. 13. But if you cannot declare it, then you shall give me thirty sheets, and thirty change of garments.] Most take sidinim (from whence the word sindon seems to come) for such linen cloths as the whole body may be wrapped in; and therefore properly translated sheets: and change of garments signify new robes, which they might change for the old: but of the word sindon, see Braunius de Vestitu Sacerd. Hebr. lib. i. cap. 7. n. 7.

And they said unto him, Put forth thy riddle, that we may hear it.] They agreed to the conditions, and bade him propound it.

Ver. 14. And he said unto them, Out of the eater came forth meat, and out of the strong came forth sweetness.] The opposition is manifest in the first part of the riddle, but not in the second; for weakness is opposed to strength, not sweetness, whose opposite is bitterness, or sharpness: but Bochartus hath ingeniously observed, that these two words are sometimes confounded; for, in the Arabic language, the word mirra, which signifies strength, comes from marra, which signifies to be bitter: and so it is among the Latins, where acer, a sharp man, is as much as a valiant man, who eagerly (as we speak) engaged his enemies: and this very word (as he and others have noted) is used of lions, whom Ovid in his Fasti calls

"—— Genus acre leonum."

And therefore the riddle is truly this: Food came from the devourer, and sweetness from that which is eager and sharp; i. e. fierce.

And they could not in three days expound the riddle.] Whereupon (it appears by what follows) they applied themselves to his wife, and desired her (with good words, it is likely, at first) to try what she could do by her caresses, to persuade him to unriddle it to her.

Ver. 15. And it came to pass, that on the seventh day.] Which was the last day of the feast; when they were in danger to lose their wager.

They said unto Samson's wife, Entice thy husband, that he may declare to us the riddle.] By letting her know it; who they expected would tell it them.

Lest we burn thee and thy father's house with fire.] From entreaties they now betake themselves to threatenings, and those very terrible; which they concluded would make her as pressing upon them as they were upon her.

Have ye called us.] This signifies that they were invited by her friends to the feast.

To take what we have?] To make us pay very dear for our good cheer.

Is it not so?] Will not your kindness conclude in rudeness, by stripping us of our raiment?

Ver. 16. And Samson's wife wept before him.] She added tears to her entreaties.

And said, Thou dost but hate me, and lovest me not: thou hast put forth a riddle unto the children of my people, and hast not told it me.] This was prudent enough, to pretend to doubt of his affection, because he concealed this secret from her; for a new married couple are usually so kind as freely to unbosom themselves one to another.

And he said unto her, Behold, I have not told it my father and my mother.] With whom he had been long acquainted.

And shall I tell it thee?] Whom he did not yet so well know as to be sure she could keep a secret.

Ver. 17. And she wept before him the seven days, while the feast lasted.] That is, the rest of the seven days of the feast which remained after the third, she importuned him continually with tears, and upbraided him, I suppose, with want of kindness to her, as the foregoing verse imports.

And it came to pass, on the seventh day, that he told, because she lay sore upon him.] Made him very uneasy by her importunity, which he could not resist, though he had conquered the lion.

And she told the riddle to the children of her people.] For whom she had more affection than for her husband, or feared their displeasure more than his.

Ver. 18. And the men of the city said unto him on the seventh day, before the sun went down.] Just before the time was expired, which was prefixed for the solution of the riddle.

What is sweeter than honey? and what is stronger than a lion?] This is a compendious answer to the latter part of the question, which sufficiently comprehends the first: and St. Ambrose thinks, that, as soon as this answer was out of their mouth, Samson immediately interposed and said, What is more perfidious than a woman? which he had out of Josephus, who saith the same; and something like it follows in the next words.

And he said unto them, If ye had not ploughed with my heifer, ye had not found out my riddle.] The meaning is, that without the assistance of his wife (whom he compares to a young heifer, which is not yet subdued to the yoke of obedience) they had continued still as ignorant as they had been all the time of the feast. Ralbag, indeed, and some others, take the word ploughed in a lascivious sense; as if he meant that they had lain with his wife, or otherwise they had not got the secret out of her. But the words will not bear this interpretation; for he doth not say, If ye had not ploughed my heifer (which might have been so interpreted), but, If ye had not ploughed with my heifer; which plainly implies using her help to find out what they desired. (See Bochart. par. i. Hierozoicon, lib. ii. cap. 41.)

Ver. 19. And the Spirit of the Lord came upon him.] Which he had not always; but at special seasons it moved him, and gave him power to do extraordinary things, which otherwise had not been warrantable. (See ver. 6. and xiii. ult.)

And he went down to Askelon.] A city of the Philistines.

And slew thirty men of them.] As they were making merry, it is probable, either in the field, or the city, at some public solemnity, when great companies used to be gathered together, and to appear in their best apparel.

And took their spoil.] Whatsoever they had about them; and perhaps they that fled left a great many things behind them.

And gave change of garments unto them that expounded the riddle.] Together with the sheets he promised; which he purchased, perhaps, with the spoil.

And his anger was kindled.] Against his wife for betraying him, and against his companions for their underhand dealing.

And he went up to his father's house.] Left his wife with her own relations, and went to live at home with his father. It is plain by the whole story, that Timnath lay low, there being a descent from his father's house to it, unto which they went up from thence, (ver. 1, 2. 5. 7. 10.)

Ver. 20. And Samson's wife was given to his companion.] She it seems was as angry as he; and looking upon herself as forsaken, was easily persuaded to marry one of his bridemen.

Whom he used as his friend.] With whom he was more familiar, and treated him with greater kindness than he did the rest that honoured him with their company. For he, I suppose, was the principal brideman, who was called by the name of the friend of the bridegroom, as we read in the gospel of St. John, iii. 29. (See Selden, lib. ii. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 16. p. 200, &c.) This usage, no doubt, incensed Samson the more afterward against them; for he saw there was no faith in any of them.

CHAP. XV.

Ver. 1. AND it came to pass within a while after.] In the Hebrew the word is mijamim; which in other places signifies after a year, (see xiv. 8.) when his anger was appeased.

In the time of wheat-harvest.] Which was about the feast of Pentecost; a time of great joy.

That Samson visited his wife with a kid.] Which was no contemptible present, as appears by the story of Judah and Tamar, Gen. xxxviii. 17. For it was a delicious food, not only in Judea, but in other countries, as Bochartus hath shewn in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 2.

And he said, I will go in unto my wife into the chamber.] He attempted, with the usual freedom which husbands have with their wives, to go into her apartment, and enjoy her company.

But her father would not suffer him to go in.] For the reason following in the next verse.

Ver. 2. And her father said, I verily thought thou hadst utterly hated her.] He thought he had good grounds to conclude he would never come near her more, having not heard from him a whole twelvemonth.

Therefore I gave her to thy companion.] Whom it is likely she loved, having contracted an acquaintance with him by the friendship he had with her husband, (xiv. ult.) For though she was (as the Hebrew doctors suppose) a proselyte to the Jewish religion, yet she was not so well instructed as to know that it was not lawful, by their law, to marry another, till Samson had given her a bill of divorce; which he had not done, intending to return again to her.

Is not her younger sister fairer than she? take her, I pray thee, instead of her.] He had no mind to quarrel with Samson; and therefore endeavoured to assuage his anger with the offer of his other daughter, who was more beautiful than her who had forsaken him. This, indeed, was contrary to the law of Moses; but the Philistines, it seems, continued their old abominable customs, which God intended, by giving his law, to abolish, (Lev. xviii. 24. 27. 30.)

Ver. 3. And Samson said concerning them, Now shall I be more blameless than the Philistines, though I do them a displeasure.] He seems to have turned away in scorn and indignation, without making a reply to his father-in-law; but told the next persons he met, that he would be revenged of the Philistines for the wrong that had been done him; and that they might blame themselves for the mischief he intended them. By which it appears, that the people of that place approved of this marriage, and perhaps honoured it by their presence; whom Samson resolved therefore to chastise, not as a private person, but as appointed by God to vindicate the oppression of the Israelites. Which Grotius thinks he did ex naturali jure, as a piece of natural justice. (See lib. ii. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 20. sect. 8. n. 3.)

Ver. 4. And Samson went and caught three hundred foxes.] Some make a difficulty to believe this, because foxes are subtle creatures, and not easily caught: but they should consider such things as these, which Bochartus hath represented, that this country abounded with foxes, from whence several places had their names, particularly one in the tribe of Dan, (see chap. i. 35. and Josh. xix. 42.) and that under this name of foxes may be comprehended a creature very like a fox, called thoes, which go together in herds; so that two hundred (as good authors report) have been seen in a company together. And next, it is not said he caught these at one time, or in a day and a night; but there might be a week or a month's time allowed for the accomplishment of his design; in which his servants, and neighbours, and friends, no doubt, assisted him, if he desired it; so that such a number might be caught in a short time: for they were not caught, as some imagine, only by hunting, but in snares and nets, as he demonstrates in his Hierozoicon, lib. iii. cap. 13. where, in answer to such as ask why he chose foxes rather than dogs, or some other creatures, he thinks it is sufficient to say, that he brought about two ends; by the same means freeing the country from a great many noxious animals, by which he did much hurt unto their enemies.

And took firebrands, and turned tail to tail.] Which he tied together with a cord; yet not close, but at a distance, that they might run the better.

And put a firebrand in the midst between two tails.] Which he so fastened, that it should not fall off by their motion.

Ver. 5. And when he had set the brands on fire, he let them go into the standing corn of the Philistines.] Near unto which he let them loose; and they naturally ran into it to hide themselves from the fire; of which they are observed to be afraid. Beside, being coupled, they could not run into their holes.

And burnt up both the shocks, and also the standing corn.] By this it appears, that it was in the midst of wheat-harvest when this was done; some corn being cut, and other still standing; but all consumed. For the fire being once begun, the foxes were the more affrighted, and desiring to run from it, this still carried it to another place, where there was corn left, till they had burnt it quite up: beside, it is observed by the same author, that foxes do not run straight forward, but they make many turnings, by which means they destroyed the more.

With the vineyards and olives.] Foxes are observed to love grapes, and Solomon speaks of them as noxious to vineyards, (Cant. ii. 15.) whither they ran to satiate their hunger, after they had been long kept up by Samson. Some think, that as part of the three hundred foxes were sent among the corn, so the other part among the vines and olives: or, perhaps, being all let into the corn, and finding the flame increasing there, they went to seek shelter in the vineyards, whither they carried the fire.

Bochartus observes a very famous monument of this fact of Samson's, in Ovid's fourth book of his Fasti; where he saith, the Romans were wont every year, in the middle of April, to let loose some foxes in the Circus, with burning torches fastened unto their backs. The original of which custom, he justly thinks, could not be from so small an occasion as Ovid mentions, from the report of an old man he met withal. But that it was derived from hence, may well be questioned; because, though it fell out at the same time of the year that Samson did this thing, yet one can give no reason why the Phœnicians (from whom the Romans must be supposed to borrow it) should celebrate the memory of this mischief which Samson did them, in such a representation of it. (See him, in the place beforementioned, p. 856, 857, &c.)

Ver. 6. Then the Philistines said, Who hath done this?] The owners of the corn, or perhaps the country in general, made an inquiry after the author of this mischief.

And they answered, Samson, the son-in-law of the Timnite, because he had taken his wife, and given her to his companion.] Some of those who heard Samson's threatening words, (ver. 3.) it is likely, gave this information.

And the Philistines came up, and burnt her and her father with fire.] I suppose they burnt their house, and them in it. Whereby that very calamity came upon her, which she sought to avoid by betraying her husband, (xiv. 15.)

Ver. 7. And Samson said, Though you have done this.] The words in the Hebrew are a concise form of speech, If ye had done after this manner; that is, punished them sooner for the injury done him, it might have seemed love of justice; but now they did it only out of love to themselves.

Yet will I be avenged of you.] Or, but I will surely take a farther revenge of you. Unto which, no doubt, he was moved not by his own private spirit, but by that Spirit which raised him up to deliver God's people from their oppressors.

And then I will cease.] That is, unless they gave him further occasion, there should be an end of this quarrel.

Ver. 8. And he smote them hip and thigh.] It is hard to understand the meaning of this; of which Josephus only saith, that he slew many of them, ἐν πεδίῳ τῶν Παλαιστινῶν, in a field of the Philistines; but saith not a word concerning the import of hip and thigh. But the Chaldee paraphrast interprets it, He smote both footmen and horsemen, the one resting on their legs (as the Hebrew word schock signifies), and the other on their thighs, as they sat close to their horses. They that think this to be forced, take the meaning to be, that he smote them both on their legs and their thighs, as they fled away, so as to disable them from any service, though he did not kill them. I omit other interpretations.

With a great slaughter.] The word is with a great stroke, and so the LXX. translate it, which agrees well with the last interpretation, that he sorely wounded them.

And he went down.] With respect to the country of the Philistines he went up (as appears by the next verse), but from the mountainous part of Judea, where he was, he first went down.

And dwelt in the top of the rock Etam.] A strong place in the tribe of Judah (as Josephus relates), to the top of which no more than one man could come abreast, as we speak. By all this, and by what follows in the rest of his history, it is plain that Samson had no commission from God, nor was moved by him to raise an army, and make open war (as Gideon, and Jephthah, and others did), for the deliverance of Israel from the yoke of the Philistines, but only to weaken them, and to keep them in awe, that, out of dread of him, they might be less cruel in their oppression. And this, no doubt, he understood to be all that God intended to do by him, from the words of the angel, (xiii. 5.) "He shall begin to deliver Israel."

Ver. 9. Then the Philistines went up and pitched in Judah.] With a great number of men, as if they intended an absolute conquest of their country.

And spread themselves in Lehi.] A place so called afterward, from the jaw-bone wherewith Samson smote them.

Ver. 10. And the men of Judah said, Why are ye come up against us?] Since they paid their tribute (as Josephus observes) and had committed no offence against them, not having taken part with Samson in any thing he had done, they might well expostulate with them about this invasion.

And they answered, To bind Samson are we come up.] They soon satisfied them that they had no quarrel with them, but only with Samson, whom, if they would deliver up bound to them, they would withdraw their army.

To do to him as he hath done to us.] Punish him for the injuries he had done them; or rather, put him to death, as he had killed many of them.

Ver. 11. Then three thousand of the men of Judah went to the top of the rock Etam.] In the Hebrew it is went down; i. e. into the cave where he was in the top of the rock: for it is said, ver. 13. that they brought him up to the Philistines, whereas from the top of the rock it was down.

And said unto Samson, Knowest thou not that the Philistines are rulers over us?] And therefore not to be offended by us.

What is it that thou hast done unto us?] To provoke them to come against Judah.

And he said unto them, As they did unto me, so I have done unto them.] He saith nothing of any motion he had from God to do what he had done, but only tells them, that he had merely requited the wrong he had received from the Philistines.

Ver. 12. And they said unto him, We are come down to bind thee, that we may deliver thee into the hands of the Philistines.] They came with a little army, to shew they could by force take him; but they rather desired he would quietly resign himself to them, that they might deliver him bound to the Philistines.

And Samson said unto them, Swear unto me, that ye will not fall upon me yourselves.] He doth not upbraid them with their base cowardice, in coming so many against one man, and that to give up their deliverer into their enemies' hands, but consents to their desire, on condition that they would solemnly engage to do him no hurt themselves; for he was unwilling to shed the blood of his brethren, as he might have done, if they had attempted any thing against him.

Ver. 13. And they spake unto him, saying, No, but we will bind thee fast, and deliver thee into their hands; but surely we will not kill thee.] They promised to do as he desired, if he would submit to be bound and delivered unto the Philistines, who would not be otherwise satisfied.

And they bound him with two new cords, and brought him up from the rock.] To put him absolutely into the power of the Philistines: for two cords, and those fresh and new, wherewith they bound him, were sufficient to shew their real desire to comply with their demands.

Ver. 14. And when they came unto Lehi.] Where the Philistines had spread themselves, (ver. 9.)

The Philistines shouted against him.] As soldiers used to do, when they had gotten a great victory, their mischievous enemy being fallen into their hand.

And the Spirit of the Lord came mightily upon him.] Or, But the Spirit of the Lord, &c. Their joy was instantly quashed; for, by the mighty power of God, the cords immediately snapped in sunder.

The cords that were upon his arms became as flax that was burnt with fire.] Which is consumed in a moment.

And his bands loosed from his hands.] The Hebrew, to express how speedily and easily they were loosed, saith, they melted, or were dissolved, as wax is by the fire.

Ver. 15. And he found a new jaw-bone of an ass.] Of an ass that had not been long dead. So the word terijah signifies, which Kimchi here saith is an Arabic word, signifying moist and fresh, and, therefore, not so brittle as one that is dry, and hath laid long in the air and the sun. (See Bochart, in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 15.)

And put forth his hand and took it.] The providence of God laid it in his way, that he might not be wholly unarmed, when he had a numerous company of enemies to deal withal.

And slew a thousand men therewith.] The Philistines, no doubt, were strangely amazed to see the cords fall so easily, and suddenly, from his hands, and to see him come boldly, or rather furiously, towards them, which put them in a confusion, and gave him such advantage against them, that he made this great slaughter among them; wherein was fulfilled the promise of Moses, Lev. xxvi. 8. where he saith expressly, "One man of you shall chase a thousand." It is not unlikely, also, that the Philistines might fear the men of Judah, on this occasion, would join with him, which made them turn their backs and expose themselves to slaughter. But it was by a wonderful strength which God infused into him, that he was able to pursue them so long, till he had done such execution, which is incredible only to those who do not consider the power of God, who can raise our powers to what degree he pleases, and enfeeble the spirits of those who oppose his designs: so that they shall have no power to help themselves. It may not be amiss also here to note, that there are instances of men, who, by their natural courage, have made great havoc among their enemies: for Flavius Vopiscus reports, that Aurelian, in the Sarmatic war, slew forty-eight men with his own hands in one day; and in divers days, nine hundred and fifty: upon which the boys made a song, and shouted in their dances, after a military manner, Mille, Mille, Mille, Mille, Mille, Mille, decollavimus. Unus homo, Mille, Mille, &c. Mille, Mille, vivat, qui Mille, Mille occidit. And, upon another occasion, another little song was made of him, which Salmasius found thus disposed in ancient MS.

Mille Sarmatas, Mille Francos
Semel et Semel occidimus
Mille Persas quærimus.

Ver. 16. And Samson said.] Then he composed a triumphant song.

With the jaw-bone of an ass, heaps upon heaps; with the jaw-bone of an ass have I slain a thousand men.] This seems to have been the beginning, and, perhaps, the end of the song. In which words, Belehi hachamor chamorcha morathaim, every one may observe a graceful allusion; chamor signifying both an ass, and also a heap.

Ver. 17. And it came to pass, that when he had made an end of speaking.] Of reciting the song beforementioned, which contained more than these few words, as this phrase seems to import.

That he cast the jaw-bone out of his hand.] Which he held there while he was speaking.

And called that place Ramath-lehi.] That is, the projection, or casting away, of the jaw-bone, as the Chaldee and Kimchi interpret it, for so the word rama signifies, to throw any thing from one. It is called, ver. 9. and 14. simply Lehi; it being usual to leave out the beginning of names, as I have often observed, Salem being put for Jerusalem, and Shittim for Abel-Shittim, &c.

Ver. 18. And he was sore athirst.] By his great toil in the fight, and by his speaking so long, and so earnestly, as it is likely he did afterward.

And he called on the Lord, and said, Thou hast given this great deliverance into the hand of thy servant.] This is an express confutation of the fancy of Josephus, that God sent this thirst upon him, as a punishment for not giving him the glory of his victory, but ascribing it to his own strength; for which I can see no colour: for though God be not mentioned in his song, but only the jaw-bone, yet that was in itself so weak an instrument, that his acknowledging twice it was the only thing wherewith he slew so many, was a sufficient signification, that he ascribed not the victory to human power, but to the power of God, whose Spirit he felt come mightily upon him, when he set upon them: but what is there tacitly insinuated, is here in so many words expressed.

And now shall I die for thirst, and fall into the hands of the uncircumcised?] It seems he was very faint, for want of some refreshment, which made him so earnestly implore relief from God, who, he knew, would not fail to supply him in so great a necessity: for the remembrance of former benefits, when we thankfully acknowledge them, is a mighty support to faith, in the expectance of future; beside, he represents himself to God as a servant of his, who had taken all this pains, not to satisfy his own revenge, but by his instigation, and for the deliverance of his people.

Ver. 19. And God clave a hollow place that was in the jaw.] The Hebrew word mactes properly signifies the socket in which the great teeth in the jaw are fastened, (as Bochartus evidently proves, par. i. Hieroz. lib. ii. cap. 16.) one of which teeth he made drop out, and then caused water to come forth out of that hollow place: but our great primate follows those who think God made a cleft in some part of the earth, in that place called Lehi, from whence he made a fountain of water to spring up. And so Josephus saith, he brought it, κατά τινος πέτρας, out of a certain rock.

And there came water thereout.] From this cavity he caused water to issue (whereas blood is wont to flow when a tooth is plucked out), just as he brought water out of a rock in the wilderness, and made the meal and the oil to multiply in the widow of Sarepta's vessels.

And when he had drunk.] It is probable he took up the jaw, when he saw the water bubble out of it, and let it run into his mouth till he had quenched his thirst.

His spirit came again, and he revived.] He was so spent, it seems, that he was ready to die, till God sent him this water, unto which his power gave such a spirit, that it was as reviving as a draught of wine.

Wherefore he called the name thereof En-hakkore, which is in Lehi.] Or, as Bochart, I think, more truly renders it, Enhakkore-asher Belehi; that is, the fountain of him that called, which is in the jaw. (See him in the abovementioned place, p. 205.)

Unto this day.] Some have imagined, that the fountain continued in Lehi unto the time that this book was written: but Bochart there observes, that these words, unto this day, are not to be joined with those next before; for they are separated by an accent which divides them; and therefore the meaning is, that it is called to this day by the name forementioned.

Ver. 20. And he judged Israel in the days of the Philistines twenty years.] All his time they remained under the power of the Philistines, who, they confess, (ver. 11.) were their rulers, as they continued to be for forty years together, (xiii. 1.) of which these twenty were a part. In which he was not able to perfect their deliverance, but only began it by several small defeats he gave the Philistines, and several damages he did them: but, after all, he left the Israelites under their dominion; nor was there any deliverer arose till Samuel, who, I observed before, completed what Samson began, (1 Sam. vii. 13.)

CHAP. XVI.

Ver. 1. THEN went Samson to Gaza.] His late victory made him despise the Philistines, as Josephus thinks (καταφρονῶν τῶν Παλαιστινῶν), and adventure to go, in a bravery, into one of their principal cities, which lay in the south part of their country, towards Egypt. But it seems to me more likely, that he went thither secretly and unobservedly, in the dusk of the evening, or in a disguise, that he might the better spy in what posture they were, and what advantage he might possibly have of them.

And saw there a harlot.] Who kept, it is likely, a public-house to entertain strangers; but was as public herself; which had been the condition of Rahab. So Josephus ἐν τινὶ τῶν καταγωγῶν διέτριβε, he took up his lodging in one of the public inns of the city.

And went in unto her.] Was ensnared by her beauty to lie with her.

Ver. 2. And it was told the Gazites.] The magistrates of the city.

Saying, Samson is come hither.] By this it appears his coming thither was not publicly known; but by some means or other discovered: perhaps by the woman herself, into whose house he went, who gave private information of his being there.

And they compassed him in.] The meaning is not that they beset the house; for the next words shew the contrary; that they intended to seize him as he went out of the city.

And laid wait for him all night at the gate of the city.] Especially in that gate which led to his own country.

And were quiet all night.] Made no noise, for fear he should be alarmed, and contrive some way of escape; or desperately set upon them, and break through the guards.

Saying, In the morning, when it is day, we shall kill him.] He would fall into their hands they imagined, having no apprehension of danger.

Ver. 3. And Samson lay till midnight.] When he was admonished, perhaps by a dream, to be gone; or had some intelligence from his servants (whom he set to watch) that they lay in wait for him.

And arose at midnight.] In the dead time of the night, when nobody was stirring; and the soldiers themselves, perhaps, asleep: imagining he would lie till morning.

And took the doors of the gate of the city, and the two posts, and went away with them, bar and all.] He did not stay to break them open, but plucked up the posts out of the ground, with the doors hanging upon them fast barred; which so astonished the guards, that they had no heart to follow him.

And put them upon his shoulders.] He seems to have carried them a little way in his hands, and then lifted them up to his shoulders, and carried them before their faces in triumph. Which argued a mighty strength, and no less confidence in God.

And carried them up to the top of a hill that is before Hebron.] Some take this hill to have been near Hebron; which was twenty miles from this place. But it is more probable (as Peter Martyr conjectures) it lay between Gaza and Hebron; within the view of both: that inhabitants of the one city might behold them to their confusion; and they of the other to their encouragement to hope for deliverance.

Ver. 4. And it came to pass afterward.] How long after is not known.

That he loved a woman in the valley of Sorek, whose name was Delilah.] It is certain that Sorek was a place in the land of Judea; famous for choice vines, (as Bochart observes, from Gen. xlix. 11. Isa. v. 2. Jer. ii. 21.) and not above a mile and a half from Eschol; whence the spies brought a bunch of grapes, for a sample of the fruitfulness of the country. Unto this place Samson retired to refresh himself, perhaps, after his labours, with the delights of it; and there saw a woman, with whom he fell in love. But whether she was a woman of Israel, or one of the daughters of the Philistines, (who now were rulers of the country of Judah, xv. 11.) and whether he loved her as his wife, or kept company with her as a harlot, is not here signified. St. Chrysostom and others are of opinion, that he was married to her. But then, one would think, there should have been some brief mention of their wedding solemnities; or of his bringing her home to his own house. And the Philistines would not have been so bold as to attempt to draw her into their party, and bribe her to betray him into their hands. Which argues she had not the affection of a wife to him; but was a mercenary woman, that would do any thing to get money. And so Josephus understands it, Παρέβαινε δὲ ἤθη τὰ πάτρια, &c. He forsook the institutions of his country, and followed the degenerate manners of strange people, ἐρασθεὶς γυναικὸς ἑταιριζομένης, being enamoured with a harlot among the Philistines: which was the beginning of all the evils that befel him. For he did not keep her company for a night; but dwelt with her, and gave up himself so entirely to her, that he doated on her.

Ver. 5. And the lords of the Philistines came up unto her.] There were five of them in all, (as we read, iii. 3.) who, it is likely, all joined together to make a purse (as we speak) wherewith to corrupt her; and sent their agents to make large offers to her, if she would come into their interests.

And said unto her, Entice him, and see wherein his great strength lieth, and by what means we may prevail against him.] It is probable, that he had often declared that the source of his strength was a secret, known only to himself; which they hoped he might, with her blandishments, entice him to reveal unto her.

That we may bind him, and afflict him.] That she might not startle at the proposal, they tell her, they had no intention to kill him; but only to keep him fast in chains, and afflict him; so as to make him humble, and bring him low, that he might not be able to do them more mischief.

And we will give thee, every one of us, eleven hundred pieces of silver.] By which is commonly understood so many shekels; which made in all five thousand five hundred, which make almost two Hebrew talents. For the Jews make it a rule, that where pieces of silver are mentioned, the meaning is shekels. (See Gen. xxiii. 15.)

Ver. 6. And Delilah said unto Samson, Tell me, I pray thee, where thy great strength lieth.] She did not bluntly ask him this question, but, as Josephus very probably tells the story, the next time they were eating and drinking together, and he was caressing her, she fell into an admiration of all his wonderful deeds, and highly extolled them; desiring him to tell her how he came so much to excel all other men in strength.

And wherewith thou mightest be bound to afflict thee.] So that he should not be able to help himself.

Ver. 7. And Samson said unto her, If they bind me with seven green withes that were never dried, then shall I be weak, and be as another man.] Her last words, perhaps, made him suspect something. However, ἔτι φρονεῖν ἰσχυρὸς ἦν (as Josephus speaks), he was yet strong in his understanding, and not perfectly besotted on her; and therefore did not trust her with this important secret, but answered her deceitfully. Which cannot be excused from being a downright lie; unless we suppose he only jested with her, not believing she would take such an improbable thing for a truth.

Ver. 8. Then the lords of the Philistines brought up to her seven green withes which had not been dried.] It seems they lurked somewhere thereabout, that they might be informed speedily of what passed. And they took care to provide the withes themselves, that there might be no defect in them.

And she bound him with them.] Καθεύδοντα μεθύοντα, &c. She bound him hard with the withes, when he was asleep, and full of drink, as Josephus speaks.

Ver. 9. Now there were men lying in wait, abiding with her in the chamber.] In another room of the house, near to that where Samson slept, she had placed a band of soldiers (as Josephus also interprets it), who were ready, upon notice, to seize him. This is an argument that Delilah was not his wife; for in his own house, where he had his servants about him, it had not been possible for her to have placed soldiers secretly in any room without their knowledge.

And she said unto him, The Philistines be upon thee, Samson.] One would think they might have set upon him when he was in a deep sleep. But the plot was otherwise laid between them and Delilah; and they thought it not safe to come near a sleeping lion, for fear he should chance to awake, and tear them in pieces.

And he brake the withes as a thread of tow is broken when it toucheth the fire: so his strength was not known.] They found he was as subtle as he was strong; having deluded both her and them.

Ver. 10. And Delilah said unto Samson, Behold, thou hast mocked me, and told me lies: now tell me, I pray thee, wherewith thou mightest be bound.] The Hebrew writers rightly observe, that she did not say this to him immediately after the other; but at the next opportunity she took occasion to complain of his want of kindness in not acquainting her with what she desired to know; as if she was not able to keep the secret of a friend, which it was not fit for any body else to understand, as Josephus expresses it.

Ver. 11. If they bind me fast with new ropes that were never occupied, then shall I be weak, and be as another man.] He persists in his resolution to delude her.

Ver. 12. Delilah therefore took new ropes, and bound him therewith.] This looked more like truth than the former, and she took care, no doubt, to have the strongest ropes that they could get. And then made him a new entertainment, where he ate and drank till he was heavy with sleep; and then she took the opportunity to bind him as she had done before.

And said unto him, The Philistines be upon thee, Samson (and there were liers in wait in the chamber).] In the inner room, where they were formerly disposed so secretly, that Samson knew not of it; for if he had, he would have discovered her treachery.

And he broke them from off his arms like a thread.] Which deterred them from breaking out upon him.

Ver. 13. And Delilah said unto Samson, Hitherto thou hast mocked, and told me lies; tell me wherewith thou mightest be bound.] She prays him now to deal sincerely with her; for she persisted as resolutely in her attempts to draw the secret from him as he did in concealing it; which he still continued to do.

And he said unto her, If thou weavest the locks of my head.] The Nazarites being bound never to cut their hari, did not, I suppose, let it hang loose, but curled it up in locks, or plaited and broidered it after the manner of a chain: and Samson's hair was distributed into seven of these plaited locks. (See Dr. Spencer concerning this, lib. iii. cap. 6. dissert. 1. p. 585.)

With the web.] He seems to direct her to wrap these seven locks about a weaver's beam (as the Chaldee understands it), or to weave them one within another, so that they should be but one lock, and then he should be like another man, which is here to be understood. And in this he comes a little nearer to the truth, but still deceives.

Ver. 14. And she fastened it with a pin.] That they might keep tight and not be unloosed.

And said, The Philistines be upon thee, Samson. And he awaked out of his sleep.] This shews that she had taken the former advantages of him in his sleep.

And he went away with the pin of the beam, and with the web.] And thereby appeared as strong as ever he was. For, as the Vulgar understands it, she fixed this pin in the earth; or, as the LXX. in the wall. But there is nothing like it in the Hebrew text.

Ver. 15. And she said, How canst thou say, I love thee, when thy heart is not with me? Thou hast mocked me these three times, and hast not told me wherein thy great strength lieth.] She now uses her utmost art to overcome him; by telling him, I suppose, she would cast him off, because he did but pretend to love her; as appeared by his not trusting her: but, notwithstanding her importunate desire to be gratified in a small request, he had no less than three times put a cheat upon her.

Ver. 16. And it came to pass, when she pressed him daily with her words, and urged him.] Repeated this often, from day to day, most earnestly pressing him to give her a proof of his real affection, by disclosing this secret.

So that his soul was vexed unto death.] He was upon such a rack by two contrary passions struggling in him, love to her, and care not to lose his strength, that he was weary of life. That is, very melancholy, and unconcerned what became of him.

Ver. 17. That he told her all his heart.] God having forsaken him, because he had abandoned himself to sensual pleasure, his love of the harlot prevailed over his care of himself.

And said unto her, There hath not come a razor upon my head; but I have been a Nazarite from my mother's womb.] These words were spoken with a greater seriousness than any of the former; which made her conclude he had given her a true account. For thus Josephus paraphrases, I am under the care of God; by whose providence being born, I nourish my hair; for God forbade that I should ever have it cut off. All my strength lying in the increase and continuance of this hair, (lib. v. Antiq. cap. 10.)

If I be shaven, then will my strength go from me, and I shall become weak, and be like any other man.] There have been men of wonderful strength, whose memory is preserved in history; particularly by Pliny, lib. xii. Natural. Histor. cap. 20. and more are collected by Caspar Schottus, in his Mirabilia Naturæ et Artis, lib. iii. cap. 36. And now, at my present writing of this, there is more than one person in this city of extraordinary strength. But there is a demonstration that Samson's strength wholly depended upon the power of God, and was not inherent in himself; but came upon him when there was need, as long as he preserved himself consecrated unto God, by not shaving his head, and observing all other things belonging to the vow of a Nazarite. Which was a thing so notorious, that the heathens were not ignorant of it; but from hence devised (as learned men have observed), the fable of Nisus, the king of Megara; upon whose hair the fortune of his kingdom depended. (See Huetius, in his Quæstiones Alnetanæ, lib. ii. cap. 12. sect. 28. and our Dr. Jackson, in his first book on the Creed, chap. 15. parag. 3.)

Ver. 18. And when Delilah saw that he had told her all his heart.] Which she perceived, as I said, by the manner of his speaking.

She sent and called the lords of the Philistines.] Who still, it seems, waited thereabouts, to see what would be the success of their design; which she gave them hopes she should at last accomplish. This could not but have been discovered by some of Samson's servants, if he had had a family there, as he would if he had been married. I look upon this, therefore, as a proof that this woman was not his wife.

Saying, Come up this once, for he hath shewn me all his heart.] She was afraid they would not have hearkened to her any more, having been so often deluded; which made her give them this full assurance.

Then the lords of the Philistines came up unto her, and brought money in their hands.] Which they never did before; but now shewed her the reward was ready, if she performed her work.

Ver. 19. And she made him sleep.] Having given him, as Delrio thinks, a sleeping potion. Others think she had drawn him in to drink wine (which Josephus supposes she had done in former entertainments), unto which he not being accustomed, he was intoxicated with it. And having broken the law of the Nazarites in this point, was justly delivered up by God to suffer all that followed.

Upon her knees.] Resting his head, I suppose, upon her knees. Or, perhaps, she set him upon her knees, and with her arms about his neck, expressed the greatest affection to him, and care of him.

And she called for a man, and she caused him to shave off the seven locks of his head.] Which he did so gently, being a man of art, as not to awake him.

And she began to afflict him.] Not by any sensible pain; but by weakening him, and bringing him low (as the Hebrew word is often interpreted). For as soon as the razor touched his head, his strength began to be diminished.

And his strength went from him.] When all the locks were shaved off, his strength quite failed him.

Ver. 20. And she said, The Philistines be upon thee, Samson. And he awoke out of his sleep.] She cried so loud, and also shook him so much (out of pretended kindness to him, that he might escape the danger), that she roused him out of his sleep.

And he said, I will go as at other times before, and shake myself.] She had so often said those words, that he was in no fear; but thought to do as he had done before, that is, prepare himself to fall upon them.

And he wist not that the Lord was departed from him.] Being newly awakened out of a profound sleep, and scarce come to himself, he did not miss his hair; and so had no apprehension that God had deserted him.

Ver. 21. But the Philistines took him.] But he soon found he had no power at all left to resist his enemies; who laid hold on him, and took him prisoner.

And put out his eyes.] By a just judgment of God, as the Mischna observes in the title Sota, cap. 8. where they say he followed the delight of his eyes, and so he was punished with the loss of them. Which the Jews are wont to call measure for measure. They did not put him to death, much less cut him in pieces, as their hatred and fury might have provoked them to do; for they had promised Delilah they would only bind him, and afflict or humble him, (ver. 5.) and in those days all men made some conscience of keeping their word.

And brought him down to Gaza.] To be exposed there to scorn, where he had exposed them to shame, by carrying away the gates of their city. It was a place also of great strength, where he would be kept secure; and it was remote also from his own country.

And bound him with fetters of brass.] Put very strong and heavy fetters upon his legs.

And he did grind in the prison-house.] As slaves were wont to do. See upon Exod. xi. 5. and St. Jerome, Isa. xlvii. 2. where this is turned to another sense, according to the conceit of many of the Jewish doctors; but without any ground, for it is threatened there as a punishment to Babylon, and so it was inflicted here as a piece of drudgery, unto which Samson, as other prisoners, was condemned.

Ver. 22. Howbeit the hair of his head began to grow again, after he was shaven.] Or (according to the marginal translation), As when he was shaven. That is, grew in time to the same length it was of before Delilah cut it off: so that though his Nazariteship was interrupted by the shaving of his head, yet it was renewed, by letting his hair grow, and observing all other rules belonging to it. He could not offer sacrifice indeed for his expiation (as the law was in case of an interruption), but repented, no doubt, of his folly, and began his Nazariteship again, with prayer to God for a pardon of his former violation of it: and in this state of penitence he continued some time; for his hair would be a good while in growing again to its former length: when, being restored to the condition wherein he was before he lost the favour of God, together with his hair, the Divine Majesty was reconciled to him, and restored his former strength; which grew and increased, as his hair did.

Ver. 23. Then the lords of the Philistines gathered themselves together.] Not immediately after the taking of Samson, but after he had been some time in prison, as appears by the verse foregoing: for it is likely they made great preparation for the solemnity mentioned in the next words,

For to offer a great sacrifice to Dagon their god, and to rejoice.] To give thanks to their god at a festival, which they appointed, I suppose, on purpose to express their joy for their taking Samson prisoner: or, as Josephus thinks, ἑορτῆς οὔσης τοῖς Παλαιστινοῖς δημοτελοῦς, there being a public festival kept among the Philistines (which all nations had at certain seasons), they made it more famous, by greater sacrifices than ordinary, and by greater feasting and rejoicing, which were expressions of their thankfulness to their god; who is called Dagon, because, as R. Solomon, and many others think, he was in the form of a fish (for dag signifies a fish) from the navel downward, and upward in a human shape. Certain it is, this god had a human shape in the upper parts, for we read 1 Sam. v. 4. of his head, and the palms of his hands; though nothing is there said of his feet. It is certain, also, that the Syrians abstained from fish, as Porphyry notes; at least from the fish of that lake hard by which the temple of the famous goddess Derceto stood, not far from Askelon: in which, as Lucian saith, in his Dea Syria, ἰχθύες ἱεροὶ τρέφονται, sacred fishes were bred. This Derceto was the same with Venus, as many learned men think, whom the Sidonians called Atarge, and others Artage; but most commonly Astarte, which, in the Scripture, is Ashtaroth, the goddess of the Sidonians, (1 Kings xi. 5. 33. 2 Kings xxiii. 13.) and of the Philistines also, (1 Sam. xxxi. 10.) whom the Israelites imitated, (1 Sam. vii. 3, 4.) And, worshipping the gods of those who ruled over them, no wonder they followed their wicked manners, and gave themselves over to fornication: which is the best account that can be given of Samson's living in this sin, without reprehension; the nation being depraved, and having lost their ancient discipline, which corrected this vice; for their law permitted no harlot to be in Israel.

For they said, Our god hath delivered Samson, our enemy, into our hands.] All nations had this sense, that they owed all they enjoyed unto God: and especially made their acknowledgments to such gods as they worshipped, for the victories they got over their enemies.

Ver. 24. And when the people saw him.] For he was publicly exposed to all men's view, in his fetters, I suppose, and grinding in the prison.

They praised their god.] Some hymns, perhaps, were composed on this occasion; which they sang in praise of Dagon.

And said, Our god hath delivered into our hands the destroyer of our country, which slew many of us.] This was part of their song, which the Greeks call Pæan: and they give the very same epithet to Samson, that Homer doth to Hector, whom he frequently calls ἀνδροφόνον, the slayer of men.

Ver. 25. And it came to pass, when their hearts were merry.] As they used to be with good cheer, music, and such-like entertainments, at their festivals.

That they said, Call for Samson.] The lords of the Philistines ordered him to be sent for.

That he may make us sport.] It is uncertain whether they meant, that they would make themselves sport with him, by flouts and jeers; or that they would have him make them sport, by ridiculous gestures and speeches: Josephus takes it in the first sense.

And they called for Samson out of the prison-house, and he made them sport.] Perhaps they made him dance in his chains, or played with him at some such sport as we call blind-man's buff: but it is hard to believe that such a generous spirit as his would submit to do any thing that should make them laugh; therefore they made themselves all the sport they could, by their abuses of him, which he was forced to suffer.

And they set him between the pillars.] That he might be the more visible to every one in the place.

Ver. 26. And Samson said unto the lad that held him by the hand.] And led him about, as he was directed.

Suffer me that I may feel the pillars upon which the house standeth.] Which supported the roof of it, as appears from ver. 29.

Digitized by Microsoft®

That I may lean upon them.] To rest himself, pretending he was weary, as Josephus expounds it.

Ver. 27. Now the house was full of men and women, and the lords of the Philistines were there.] Some think this house was one of their temples, wherein they met to praise their god, and then to feast, as the manner was, upon the sacrifices which were offered on such occasions. (See ix. 27.) And, indeed, no private house can be thought to have had a room wide enough to contain such a number of people: but their temples were, in many places, large enough, and made so on purpose that a vast number might assemble in them; particularly that of Diana at Ephesus is celebrated for its greatness, as well as for its beauty and riches; (see Pliny, lib. xxxv. Nat. Hist. cap. 14.) all the people round about, from all parts, running thither at several solemnities, as many have noted: but others think it was some theatre, like those in aftertimes, built by the Romans, some of which were of a prodigious bigness: see Pliny, in the same book, cap. 15. where he mentions two theatres built by C. Curio, who was killed in the civil wars, on Cæsar's side. They were made of wood, so ample as to contain all the Roman people (as he speaks), and contrived with such art, that each of them depended upon one hinge: which moved Pliny to admire at the madness of the people of Rome, who would venture into a place, for their pleasure, where they sat "tam infida instabilique sede," in such an uncertain and unstable seat; for if that hinge had slipped, there had been a greater slaughter, than at the battle of Cannæ. This I mention, to silence the cavils of those who fancy no such capacious building could be made, as relied only on two pillars; which is not so strange as this admirable fabric of Curio.

And there were upon the roof about three thousand men and women, that beheld while Samson made sport.] Every one knows that the roof of their houses and temples were flat, so that men might stand or walk there: but how they should see Samson from thence, we cannot conceive, unless we suppose there were windows to open upon occasion, whereby to look into the house; or perhaps there were battlements at the top, in the inside (as in our cathedrals), where this great company of men and women stood: by whom we are to understand the vulgar sort; for the lords of the Philistines, and persons of quality, were in the body of the house.

Ver. 28. And Samson called upon the Lord, and said, O Lord God, remember me, I pray thee, and strengthen me, I pray thee, only this once, O God.] A most ardent prayer, proceeding from the anguish of his soul, as Josephus observes; nothing being more grievous than to be mocked, and exposed to public scorn, which he calls δεινότερον τῶν κακῶν, the sorest of all evils: but whether he spake these words within himself, or, as some think, with an audible voice, cannot be determined.

That I may be at once avenged of the Philistines for the loss of my two eyes.] If this had proceeded from a spirit of private revenge, God would not have heard his prayer (for he doth not love to gratify men's passions); but that is a proof that this desire proceeded from God, (as St. Austin understands it, lib. i. de Civ. Dei, cap. 21.) who intended to punish the Philistines for oppressing Israel, as well as abusing Samson, and depriving him of his eyes.

Ver. 29. And Samson took hold of the two middle pillars upon which the house stood, and on which it was borne up, &c.] On which the weight of the roof relied.

Ver. 30. And Samson said, Let me die with the Philistines.] He is not to be thought properly a self-murderer; for he was moved by an heroical spirit from God himself, to make himself a sacrifice (as I may call it) for the good of his country: and it is no more than great soldiers do, who are content to lose their lives, in defence of a post where they are placed, for the preservation of the army to which they belong. (See Grotius, in his book de Jure Belli et Pacis, lib. ii. cap. 19. sect. 5. n. 4.)

And he bowed himself with all his might; and the house fell upon the lords, and all the people that were therein.] But it was not by his might, but by a miraculous power of God, that this house was subverted, whereby all their mirth and jollity was extinguished in a moment.

So the dead which he slew at his death were more than they which he slew in his life.] This last act was the greatest of his whole life: for he not only slew more, but persons of greater note (their principal rulers and governors), and destroyed one of their temples (as most authors take this house to have been), together with their god: which must needs put those that survived into the greatest consternation and confusion.

This was a thing known to the heathen; for it is a very probable conjecture of some great men, that hence the Greeks framed the fable of their Hercules, who lived about his time, and whose name is the same with Samson's, if it be derived from Schemesh, the sun: for Hercules is as much as Or-chol, that which enlightens all, i. e. the sun. Of him it is reported, by Herodotus, That being bound in Egypt, he was brought in a pompous manner to be sacrificed to Jupiter; and resting awhile, till he could be placed on the altar, he broke out and slew all that were present.

Ver. 31. Then his brethren, and all the house of his father.] By brethren are commonly meant in Scripture the nearest kindred; and by the house of his father is meant, all the rest of his relations: or, perhaps, after the birth of this child, God bestowed the blessing of other children upon Manoah and his wife; as he did upon Hannah, after the birth of Samuel.

Came down, and took him.] By the permission of the Philistines, who had so much humanity (as all nations anciently had) as not to prohibit enemies from burying their dead: but the Israelites were now in subjection to the Philistines, and did not join with Samson in any of his enterprises; which he performed solely by himself: and beside, the Philistines were much humbled and mollified, no doubt, by this late disaster.

And brought him up.] With some pomp, or solemnity, it is likely; he being a very great man, and famous for his wonderful exploits.

And buried him between Zorah and Eshtaol.] These were two cities in the tribe of Dan, (Josh. xv. 33.) but on the frontiers of the tribe of Judah, as some gather from Nehem. xi. 29.

In the burying-place of Manoah his father.] To be buried in the sepulchres of their ancestors was accounted a great blessing by all nations, as Ezekiel Spanhemius notes upon Callimachus's hymn to Diana, ver. 131, 132. And we have examples of it in Scripture, Gen. xlvii. 29, 30. Nehem. ii. 3. 5. as the contrary was accounted a curse, 1 Kings xiii. 22.

And he judged Israel twenty years.] This was said before, xv. 20. and here mentioned again to shew that he continued to judge Israel (that is, to vindicate them from their oppressors, for we read of no other act of a judge) till he died. When he did as great an act as any he had done all the time of his judicature (or rather greater) for the humbling of the Philistines, who domineered over the Israelites, and restoring them to their liberty: which, though he could not effect, yet he did so much towards it, by the many mischiefs he did them, that not many years after his death they had the courage to betake themselves to their arms, and fight the Philistines, whom they overthrew, and subdued; so that they came no more to molest the Israelites all the days of Samuel, under whose government, as I observed before, they recovered their liberty from the long oppression of this people, (1 Sam. vii. 10. 13.)

CHAP. XVII.

HERE begins the second part of this book, which gives an account of several memorable transactions in or about the time of the Judges; whose history the author would not interrupt by intermixing these matters with it, but reserved them to be related apart by themselves, in the five following chapters: wherein he first gives an account how idolatry crept into the tribe of Ephraim; which he doth in this chapter: and then, secondly, how it was propagated among the Danites, in an expedition they made, wherein they sacked Laish: (chap. xviii.) and then, thirdly, he relates a most foul adultery committed in the tribe of Benjamin: (chap. xix.) after which follows the destruction of that tribe for countenancing that fact: (chap. xx.) and, lastly, the restoration of it, (chap. xxi.)

Ver. 1. AND there was a man of Mount Ephraim, whose name was Micah.] When this man lived, and did what follows, we may with some certainty gather from ver. 6. which tells us, there was no king in Israel at this time; that is, no supreme governor, with a power to keep the people to their duty. Which anarchy happened (as primate Usher and other great men observe) between the death of those elders who survived Joshua, and the first oppression of Israel by Chushan: in which space of time, it is manifest, the Israelites first fell from the worship of God, and polluted themselves with idolatry, see ii. 13. iii. 7. where we read the "children of Israel forsook the Lord, and did evil in his sight," i. e. committed idolatry: the beginning of which defection from God is described briefly in this chapter.

Ver. 2. And he said unto his mother.] Who seems to have been a rich widow, that lived with her son Micah.

The eleven hundred shekels of silver.] There is no mention of shekels in the Hebrew; but our interpreters followed the rule I mentioned, that where pieces of silver, or silverings, are spoken of, the meaning is shekels.

That were taken from thee.] Of which she was robbed: or, as the Vulgar understands it, which she had separated, or set apart; that is, devoted and consecrated to a holy use, but somebody had stolen and perverted to their own use.

About which thou cursedst.] Adjured all her family to discover the money; with some sort of curse upon them, if they knew where it was, and concealed it. (See Dr. Hammond upon St. Matt. xxvi. annot. 1.)

And spakest of also in my ears.] He was present, when she made this solemn adjuration.

Behold, the silver is with me; I took it.] He confessed the truth, for fear the curse should light upon him.

And his mother said, Blessed be thou of the Lord, my son.] She prayed the curse might be turned into a blessing upon him for his ingenuous confession.

Ver. 3. And when he had restored the eleven hundred shekels of silver to his mother, his mother said, I had wholly dedicated the silver unto the Lord.] This, some think, is the meaning of her cursing beforementioned. She confirmed, with an oath, the consecration of the money to God, after the manner of those who vowed any thing unto him, (Lev. xxvii. 28.)

From my hand.] Resolving not to keep it for my own use: or, thou shalt have it as a gift from me.

For my son, to make a graven image, and a molten image.] For the convenience of Micah and his family; that he might make some resemblance of God, whereby to worship him at home, without the trouble of going, upon all occasions, to the tabernacle at Shiloh. For it appears by the name Jehovah, to whom she consecrated the silver, that she did not intend to forsake the Lord God of Israel, but only to worship him by an image; unto which the Israelites had very early inclined, (Exod. xxxii.) and afterward generally relapsed into it in the days of Jeroboam.

Some are of opinion that her meaning was, her son might make either a graven or a molten image, which he pleased; but it is manifest he made both, from xviii. 18. where they are evidently mentioned as distinct. But that these were a representation of the two cherubims which covered the ark, I dare not affirm; for they being of different kinds, one a graven, the other a molten image, seems to import the contrary; for the cherubims were both alike. But see our most learned Dr. Spencer, lib. iii. cap. 3. dissert. 7. sect. 4.

Now therefore I will restore it unto thee.] She resolved to return it into his hands, for the use beforenamed.

Ver. 4. Yet he restored the money to his mother.] These words seem to signify, that at the first he only brought the money to her, offering to restore it; but she bid him keep it: which he refused to do; but would have her take it again into her hands, which she did.

And his mother took two hundred shekels of silver.] Some think she reserved the rest for her own private use, contrary to her vow: but it is more probable, that she gave them to her son, to make the ephod and teraphim, and other things belonging to that Divine service, which they intended to set up in their house.

And gave them to the founder, who made thereof a graven image, and a molten image.] It is not certain whether this silver was melted, and then the images made of it; or that for this sum of money the founder sold these images to him, made perhaps of brass, silvered over. And this is most probable, because they would have been very small, if they had been made only of two hundred shekels of silver.

And they were in the house of Micah.] Placed in some room of his house, where he intended to worship, as it follows in the next verse.

Ver. 5. And the man Micah.] This seems to import, that hereupon he looked upon himself, and was accounted, a very considerable person.

Had a house of gods.] The Hebrew words beth Elohim may well be translated a house of God; as Peter Martyr here understands it. And so the phrase is used in other places, Gen. xxviii. 22. and in the next chapter of this book, ver. 31. For his intention was to make an imitation of the house of God at Shiloh at his own home; which may also be truly called a house of gods (as we translate it), because, whatsoever his intention was, to worship God by images, was accounted by him the worshipping of other gods.

And made an ephod.] That the Divine service in his house might be performed with a greater resemblance of what was done at the tabernacle in Shiloh, he made priestly garments, as Peter Martyr understands it: who takes the ephod to comprehend not only the breast-plate adjoining to it, but the rest of the vestments used by the high-priest; for he intended, it appears by the next words, to set up an oracle in his own house. But whatsoever resemblance this ephod had in its shape and form to the ephod of the high-priest, it had none of that rich work in it which the high-priest's ephod had, nor no girdle or breast-plate belonging to it; being no more such a garment as that golden ephod, than his Levite was a priest; or his teraphim, an urim and thummim.

And teraphim.] Of this word I have said enough, upon Gen. xxxi. 19. where I have shewn, they were images whereby the eastern people consulted God, and hoped to receive answers from him. And therefore I take Micah's meaning to have been, to set up a holy oracle in his house, where the priest wearing an ephod, and other sacred habiliments, should consult God by these teraphim. But, as Mr. Selden well observes, (in his Syntagma i. de Diis Syris, cap. 2.) the worship of the true God, and of idols, were here blended together by him. For the ephod and the Levite (whom he afterward provided) were intended, no doubt, for the service of the true God; but the graven and molten image, and the teraphim, belonged unto demons (as he speaks), by which the children of Dan, in the next chapter, desire the Levite to inquire of God for them; for they neither trusted to the ephod alone, which related to God, nor to their teraphim alone, which were an invention of their own; but thought it necessary to join both together in Divine worship. And thus began idolatry in Israel, by the superstition of an old woman, who put this into her son's head. Many of the Jews fancy she was Delilah; who having got so much money of every one of the lords of the Philistines, thought it was fit to employ some of it to express her devotion. But this is an idle conceit, which hath no ground, but only her being named in the foregoing chapter; which relates a history of things long after Micah's time.

And consecrated one of his sons, who became his priest.] In the Hebrew it is, filled the hand of one of his sons; that is, as many think, the eldest son of his family, into whose hands he put sacrifices to be offered unto God. For that was the rite of initiating priests, as we find Exod. xxxi. 24. Lev. viii. 27

Ver. 6. In those days there was no king in Israel.] That is, this was before the time of the judges, when these things fell out; in whom there was a sovereign power to correct abuses, and especially to suppress idolatry; which power being now wanting, it was the reason Micah took upon him to make himself a private temple in his own house; because the ways (as Grotius conjectures) were dangerous when there was no supreme governor, being infested with thieves, or not kept in good repair, which made travelling uneasy. This last is more probable than that robbers infested the country; for it was now a time of peace, when the Levite travelled from one part of the land to the other securely enough; and the Danites sent spies a long way to search out the country of Laish without danger; and afterward marched with a great body to seek a new settlement; which, one would think, should rather have been employed in clearing their country where they were from such pestilent cut-throats, as some suppose to have infested it.

As for the name of king, it was given to the judges; just as it was to Moses, who was their supreme governor; but was not properly a king, as Hermannus Conringius observes, in his book de Rep. Hebr. sect. 49, &c.

But every man did that which was right in his own eyes.] And there can be no worse state of things (as Pet. Martyr here observes) than for every one to be left unto his own will and pleasure; as they were now, when they left the Lord their God: for being without the true God, they were also without a teaching priest, and without law, as the prophet Azariah's words are, 2 Chron. xv. 3. where he seems, in that and the following verses, to describe the lamentable state of things in these times, after the death of Joshua, and the elders that outlived him, to the days of Samuel.

Ver. 7. And there was a young man came out of Bethlehem-Judah.] There was another Beth-lehem in the tribe of Zebulun, (Josh. xix. 15.) and therefore this is called Beth-lehem-Judah, to distinguish it from that.

Of the family of Judah, who was a Levite.] By his mother's side he was of the tribe of Judah. Which is the most easy explication, notwithstanding what Kimchi saith to shew that genealogies are not derived from the mother. For here is no account of his genealogy, which is mentioned afterward, xviii. 30. from his father; but it is noted that his mother was of the tribe of Judah, to shew how he came to live at Beth-lehem, which was no Levitical city.

And he sojourned there.] Lived there as a stranger (for so the word gour signifies in the next verse), not as a citizen, and inhabitant of the place.

Ver. 8. And the man departed out of the city from Beth-lehem-Judah, to sojourn where he could find a place.] By this it appears he was a kind of vagabond, who rambled about from place to place to find a subsistence; for though there was sufficient provision made for the Levites, by the tithes of the land, yet we may well think they were not duly paid in a time of such confusion, that every man did what he list; there being no judge to see them do their duty.

And he came to Mount Ephraim, to the house of Micah, as he sojourned.] As he travelled about the country, he came hither, to beg an alms, perhaps, or, at best, to seek for some employment.

Ver. 9. And Micah said unto him, Whence comest thou?] He examined him, as the manner was, unto what country he belonged, and what was his business.

And he said unto him, I am a Levite of Beth-lehem-Judah, and I go to sojourn where I may find a place.] He was looking out for a maintenance somewhere or other, to support him in his necessitous condition.

Ver. 10. And Micah said unto him, Dwell with me.] He desires him to seek no further, but stay there, and settle with him in his house.

And be unto me a father and a priest.] The prophets, and other great men, were called anciently by the name of father, as Elisha calls Elijah, 2 Kings ii. 12. and the king of Israel calls Elisha, 2 Kings vi. 21. and the king of Syria is represented as speaking to him in the same language, 2 Kings viii. 9. and king Joash, xiii. 14. Therefore Micah's meaning is, he would make him the director and governor of his family, and reverence him accordingly, if he would undertake to perform all sacred offices among them.

And I will give thee ten shekels of silver by the year.] Next to honour, he promises him money, and all things needful for his support.

And a suit of apparel.] Or, as it is in the margin, a double suit. For so the LXX. and the Vulgar, ζεῦγος ἱματίων, a couple of garments. And there being something of order signified in the word herech, which we translate suit, many understand hereby a winter and a summer suit of clothes: and De Dieu hath justified this interpretation of a double garment out of the Ethiopic language, where this word signifies a companion; whence it may be probably concluded, that here is intended not one suit only, but two at least. With whom agrees Hottinger in his Smegma Orientale, cap. 5. p. 88. where he observes, that all, in a manner, are of opinion, that more suits of apparel than one are signified by this word; but whence to fetch that signification is not to be found but in the Ethiopic language, where it signifies a companion, a friend, another self, as his words are.

And thy victuals.] His constant diet at his table.

And the Levite went in.] Accepted of his offer, so far as to go into his house, and see how he liked every thing.

Ver. 11. And the Levite was content to dwell with the man.] After some time he resolved to settle in his house.

And the young man was unto him as one of his sons.] He treated him with such affection, that he was the more willing to stay there.

Ver. 12. And Micah consecrated the Levite; and the young man became his priest.] A wonderful presumption in them both; Micah having no authority to consecrate, nor the Levite (who was not of Aaron's family) being capable of the priestly office. But such was the confusion of those times, for want of a judge, that Micah's superstition had no check upon it; and the Levite's poverty and ambition tempted him to accept of the preferment proffered to him: his youth also made him the more ignorant.

And was in the house of Micah.] Continued with him to execute the priest's office.

Ver. 13. Then said Micah, Now I know that the Lord will do me good, because I have a Levite for my priest.] Who he thought had more right to the office, and would be more acceptable to God, than his own son, whom he had consecrated before, ver. 5.

By this it is evident, that he did not intend to forsake the Lord; but his mind was so blinded, that he took one small benefit for a sufficient sign of his favour, when he was guilty of so many heinous offences against the Divine Majesty: first, in making idols, and then in making one of his sons a priest; and after that, in drawing a poor young man into the same crime with him; and in taking upon him to consecrate a base Levite to be a priest; of which office he was not capable, if he had had power to consecrate one, which he had not. But both of them were intruders into that which belonged not to them; and thereby drew upon themselves a curse, rather than a blessing.

CHAP. XVIII.

Ver. 1. IN those days there was no king in Israel.] These words seem to be repeated, to suggest the reason of such enormous practices as are before mentioned, and here follow in this chapter.

And in those days.] When there was no judge in Israel. That is, saith the author of Tzemach David, in the interval between the government of Jair and Jephthah. Which is an idle opinion; and yet he saith he should be of it, did he not reverence his masters, who are of another mind; which is the truer: that these days were before there was a judge in Israel, between the death of Joshua and the elders that survived him, and the time of Othniel, who was the first judge that God raised up unto them. So Josephus, lib. v. Antiq. cap. 2.

The tribe of the Danites.] Or rather, a tribe, &c. For so the word schebet is sometimes used for a family in a tribe; as in the twentieth chapter of this book, ver. 12. it is said, "the tribes of Israel sent messengers to all the tribes of Benjamin," i. e. to all the families of the tribe of Benjamin; and in Isa. xix. 13. De Dieu observes the same: who also truly notes, that when the whole tribe is spoken of, it is not said Schebet hadani, as it is here, but Schebet Dan. Therefore hadani here, and in other places, signifies a family derived from that tribe.

Sought them an inheritance to dwell in.] Some of that tribe, which was very much straitened by the old inhabitants of the land (who pent them up in a narrow compass, which was not sufficient for them), inquired where they might find a commodious settlement in some other place.

For unto that day all their inheritance had not fallen unto them among the tribes of Israel.] They had an inheritance allotted them, as well as the rest of the tribes, (Josh. xix. 40, &c.) but by their sloth, and for want of that brotherly assistance which other tribes should have afforded them, they could not get possession of a considerable part of it; but were forced by the Amorites to content themselves with the mountainous part of their country, leaving them none of the champaigne (as Josephus observes), nor all the mountains neither. (See the first chapter of this book, ver. 34, 35.) Wanting room therefore for all their people and cattle, and being unable to deal with the Amorites, they sent some, as it here follows, to seek for a dwelling somewhere else.

Ver. 2. And the children of Dan sent of their family five men from their coasts.] It is no improbable conjecture of Arius Montanus, that there were five families of the Danites; out of each of which one man was chosen to make the following discovery.

Men of valour.] Who could not be daunted if they were taken for spies. Some think also men of quality; such as those whom Moses sent to spy out the land of Canaan.

From Zorah, and from Eshtaol.] Which places are the first named in the account of the lot of their inheritance, (Josh. xix. 41.)

To spy out the land.] They were sent εἰς μεσόγειον (as Josephus speaks) into the midland country (for the Danites were seated near the Philistines towards the sea-coast), to see if they could find out a convenient place for them.

And to search it.] To inquire into the condition of it, and of the inhabitants.

And they said unto them, Go, search the land.] They had a commission from their elders to go whither they directed them, in the plain country wherein Laish stood, (ver. 14.)

And when they came to Mount Ephraim.] These two tribes joined, as I observed upon i. 35.

To the house of Micah.] To the place where his house stood.

They lodged there.] Not in Micah's house, but in some place of Mount Ephraim, not far from it; as we may guess by the next verse.

Ver. 3. And when they were by the house of Micah.] Near to which, it is probable, there was a public inn, for the entertainment of such as came from the neighbouring parts to worship, or to ask counsel of the oracle at Micah's house.

They knew the voice of the young man the Levite.] Having been acquainted with him heretofore, when, it is probable, he was in their country; for he had led a wandering life.

And they turned in thither.] Went into Micah's house, at his invitation, or to salute him, and inquire of his welfare.

And said unto him, Who brought thee hither?] Far from that city of the Levites, I suppose, to which he belonged.

And what makest thou here?] What business hast thou in this place?

And what hast thou here?] How dost thou live and maintain thyself? For they knew he had been poor.

Ver. 4. And he said unto them, Thus and thus dealeth Micah with me, and hath hired me, and I am his priest.] He told them the agreement between Micah and him, mentioned in the foregoing chapter.

Ver. 5. And they said unto him, Ask counsel, we pray thee, of God, that we may know whether our way we go shall be prosperous.] They were as ignorant, it seems, as he; and thought God would give an answer there, as well as at his own house.

Ver. 6. And the priest said unto them, Go in peace.] Whether he had any answer from the teraphim, or feigned it out of his own head, is not certain; but he encouraged them to proceed in their design.

Before the Lord is your way, wherein you go.] He pretended to have this answer from the Lord, who, he assures them, would direct, guide, and protect them in their proceedings; for that is the meaning of their way before the Lord: under his eye; that is, his care and providence, who would dispose all things for their good success. Now, if the Levite did not devise this answer, which he thought would please them, but heard a real voice from the teraphim, which promised them prosperity, then it was permitted by God, to serve the ends of his providence, just as Nebuchadnezzar was encouraged by his diviners, to undertake the siege of Jerusalem, (Ezek. xxi. 21, 22.)

Ver. 7. Then the five men departed, and came to Laish.] Called Leshem in Josh. xix. 47. where this story is briefly told, by way of anticipation: see my notes there. It was a city which lay at the foot of Libanus, near the fountain of Jordan, as Josephus saith in the place abovenamed.

And saw the people that were therein, how they dwelt careless, after the manner of the Zidonians.] Had no fear of any enemy, no more than the Zidonians, who were a powerful people, in a strong city; whose customs, I suppose, they imitated.

Quiet and secure.] Because they knew nobody of whom they had any fear.

And there was no magistrate in the land, that put them to shame in any thing.] To punish them for any thing they did, which made them live as they pleased. There are very various interpretations of these words, of which De Dieu hath given the best account.

And they were far from the Zidonians.] Who might have otherwise come to their assistance, upon any sudden invasion, they following the manners and customs of that people; but they were a day's journey from them, as Josephus there saith.

And had no business with any man.] No traffic or commerce with any of their neighbours, nor they with them. This disposition laid them open to be a prey to any resolute invader.

Ver. 8. And they came unto their brethren in Zorah and Eshtaol.] From whence they were sent, ver. 2.

And their brethren said unto them, What say ye?] They asked them what account they brought of their journey.

Ver. 9. And they said, Arise, that we may go up against them.] This shews, that they were particularly directed to make a discovery of Laish.

For we have seen the land, and, behold, it is very good.] Γῆν ἀγαθὴν καὶ πάμφορον, as Josephus expresses it, a goodly country, and very fertile.

And are ye still?] Their brethren did not seem at first to believe them, which makes them stir them up by this question, and the following exhortation.

Be not slothful to go, and to enter to possess the land.] They speak as if they had no more to do, but to march thither, and take possession of the country.

Ver. 10. When ye go, ye shall come unto a people secure, and to a large land.] They use two arguments to excite them to the enterprise; that it was easy, and would be very advantageous.

And God hath given it into your hand.] They add the encouragement the priest had given them, (ver. 6.) which was the greatest of all.

A place where there is no want of any thing that is in the earth.] This magnifies the goodness of God to them, in discovering a country to them abounding with all manner of good things, which they very much wanted in the mountains wherein they were pent up. (See ver. 1.)

Ver. 11. And there went from thence of the family of the Danites, out of Zorah and Eshtaol.] Either family is here put for a tribe, or the singular number for the plural; there going out of some of the families of the Danites, the following number.

Six hundred men, appointed with weapons of war.] Carrying their wives, and children, and household-stuff with them; for they nothing doubted of making a settlement there. (See ver. 21.)

Ver. 12. And they went up, and pitched in Kirjath-jearim, in Judah.] Not in the city itself, but in the fields belonging to it, as appears from the last words of this verse. See concerning this place Josh. xv. 9. 60. which lay in the north part of the tribe of Judah, and so lay in the road to Laish.

Wherefore they called the place Mahaneh-Dan, unto this day.] See xiii. ult.

Behold, it is behind Kirjath-jearim.] On the west of it, towards the Mediterranean Sea, which is called the hinder most sea, Deut. xi. 24. as, on the contrary, the east is called Kedem, which imports as much as before. Here the Danites encamped the first night, after they came from Zorah and Eshtaol.

Ver. 13. And they passed thence unto Mount Ephraim.] The second day's march was to this place, still more northward.

And they came to the house of Micah.] Unto the town or village where Micah lived; for they did not yet come to his house, but afterward, (ver. 15.)

Ver. 14. Then answered the five men that went to spy out the country of Laish.] In the Hebrew language he is said oft-times to answer who speaks first, as in 1 Kings i. 28. and many other places.

And said unto their brethren.] Who knew, perhaps, that they called at this place by the way, and asked them, who dwelt there?

Do ye know that there is in these houses.] i. e. In that town or village, viz. in Micah's house, which was the chief in the town. (See ver. 12.)

An ephod, and teraphim, and a graven image, and a molten image?] Which the Levite had shewn them, or told them were in the house.

Now therefore consider what ye have to do.] Whether it might not be expedient to carry those sacred things along with them, which they fancied would be an assurance of the Divine presence with them: for from thence they had received an answer of peace, when they went to spy the country whither they were now going, (ver. 6.)

Ver. 15. And they turned thitherward, and came to the house of the young man the Levite, even unto the house of Micah.] To that part of the house where the Levite had his apartment, not to the sacred place where the forenamed idols were.

And saluted him.] Or, asked him of his health and welfare, as the Hebrew phrase signifies, Asked him of peace.

Ver. 16. And the six hundred men appointed with their weapons of war, which were of the children of Dan, stood by the entering of the gate.] Whither the five men brought the Levite out to them, or he, hearing there was such a company there, came out to view them, after the salutation was over.

Ver. 17. And the five men that went to spy out the land went up, and came in thither.] Having brought him out, they returned back to the place where they knew the images, &c. were.

And took the graven image, and the ephod, and the teraphim, and the molten image: and the priest stood in the entering of the gate, with the six hundred men, &c.] That is, while the Levite was discoursing with them, and wishing them, perhaps, good success, they robbed the chapel, and took away all the furniture of it. Some think Micah, also, was with him at the gate, entertaining them with meat and drink. But that is confuted by what follows.

Ver. 18. And these went into Micah's house, and fetched the carved image, the ephod, and the teraphim, and the molten image.] They not only took them, as is said before, but brought them out openly before the Levite's eyes, who saw them in their hands, and thereupon expostulated with them.

Then said the priest unto them, What do ye?] Will you be guilty of such a sacrilege; or, will you thus requite me, who have been very kind to you?

Ver. 19. And they said unto him, Hold thy peace, lay thine hand upon thy mouth.] Keep silence, and make no noise. So this phrase is used thrice in the book of Job, xxi. 5. xxix. 9. xxxix. 37. and in the book of Proverbs, xxx. 32. and the prophet Micah, vii. 16.

And go with us, and be unto us a father and a priest.] They invite him to serve them in the same quality as he did Micah, promising him the same authority, reverence, and affection that he had from him: and, moreover, they represent to him, in the next words, how much more advantageous it would be to minister unto so great a part of a tribe than to one private person.

Is it better for thee to be a priest unto the house of one man, or that thou be a priest unto a tribe and a family in Israel?] They were not a tribe, but only a part of it; yet so considerable a part being a great family, they are called a tribe and a family; that is, a whole family in that tribe.

Ver. 20. And the priest's heart was glad.] To think he should so very much mend his condition; for the same arguments which prevailed with him to dwell with Micah, were far stronger now (viz. covetousness and ambition) to move him to go along them.

And he took the ephod, and the teraphim, and the graven image.] Under which is comprehended also the molten image, which the five men brought out of the house with the other, (ver. 17, 18.)

And went in the midst of the people.] Who undertook to guard him from any assault that might be made on any side to bring him back: or he went, perhaps, with those sacred things (as they accounted them) in the midst of the people, in imitation of the ark, which was so placed when the camp of Israel marched, (Numb. x. 21.)

Ver. 21. And so they turned and departed.] From his house.

And put the little ones, and the cattle, and the carriage before them.] Both for safety, if any should pursue them, and that they might march no faster than they were able to bear it.

Ver. 22. And when they were a good way from the house of Micah.] Who did not immediately miss the Levite and his idols, and spent some time in assembling his neighbours.

The men that were in the houses near to Micah's house.] If there was not a town there before, it is likely the place of worship which Micah set up made many resort thither, and settle their habitation there.

Gathered together, and overtook the children of Dan.] Hoping to recover what they had taken away.

Ver. 23. And they cried to the children of Dan.] Desiring them to stop their march till they had spoken with them.

And they turned their faces, and said unto Micah, What aileth thee, that thou comest with such a company?] Accordingly they made a stand, and faced about, asking him what he would have, and what he meant to bring a little army with him, as if he intended an assault.

Ver. 24. And he said, Ye have taken away my gods which I made, and the priest, and ye are gone away.] By gods he means the symbols of the Divine presence; for he was not so sottish as to believe that he could make his god, he being a worshipper of Jehovah, (xvii. 3. 13.)

And what have I more? and what is this that ye say unto me, What aileth thee?] He thought it a strange question to ask what he ailed, when they had taken away that which he valued above all things in the world.

Ver. 25. And the children of Dan said unto him, Let not thy voice be heard among us.] They that were next to him advised him not to say a word more, lest, if the whole army should hear his reproaches, mischief might follow.

Lest angry fellows run upon thee, and thou lose thy life, and the life of thy household.] There are always such fierce and furious men among soldiers, who are incensed to bloody executions upon the least provocation; and these being men going to make their fortune (as we speak) it is likely were generally of such a violent temper.

Ver. 26. And the children of Dan went their way.] Turned about again, and pursued their march, with neglect and scorn of Micah.

And when Micah saw that they were too strong for him, he turned and went back to his house.] His zeal was not so great for his gods, but he loved his life better.

Ver. 27. And they took the things which Micah had made, and the priest which he had.] i. e. They kept them and carried them along with them.

And came unto Laish.] They seem to have made three days' march in this expedition, encamping first at Kirjath-jearim, and the next night at Micah's house, and coming the next day to Laish.

Unto a people that were at quiet, and secure.] Whom they found in the posture the spies had described them, ver. 10. having no scouts abroad to bring them notice of any approaching danger, nor any guards of the passes to their city, or at its gates; so that they were easily surprised.

And they smote them with the edge of the sword, and burnt the city with fire.] Killed the people of the country and city, unto which they set fire, when they had taken, I suppose, the spoil of it. Thus was fulfilled the prophecy of Moses concerning this tribe, Deut. xxxiii. 22. (See there.)

Ver. 28. And there was no deliverer, because it was far from Zidon.] See ver. 7.

And they had no business with any man.] Which deprived them of all intelligence.

And it was in the valley that lieth by Beth-rehob.] A city near to Hamath, in the most northerly part of the country. (See Numb. xiii. 21.)

And they built a city, and dwelt therein.] Larger, perhaps, than the former; which being not big enough to contain them, they thought fit to burn it and build a better.

Ver. 29. And they called the name of the city Dan, after the name of their father Dan, who was born unto Israel.] They gave it this name, that it might be remembered they belonged to the people of Israel, though they lived at a great distance from their own tribe, in the very extremity of the north of Judea (whereas the tribe of Dan had their lot in the south-west); from whence came the common saying afterward, when they would express the whole length of the country, from Dan to Beer-sheba.

Howbeit the name of the city was Laish at the first.] This seems to signify, that they did not burn the whole city, but so much as might strike a terror into the inhabitants, and make their conquest more easy; for he speaks of it as still the same city, though it lost its old name.

Ver. 30. And the children of Dan set up the graven image.] Together with the molten, no doubt, and made use of the ephod and teraphim here, as Micah had done in his house; fancying, I suppose, it was by a Divine direction from this oracle, that the five men had such good success, when they went to spy out this land, (ver. 5, 6.)

And Jonathan.] This was the name of the Levite who came along with them.

The son of Gershom, the son of Manasseh.] So not only the Hebrew, but the Chaldee, and the LXX. (both in the Roman edition, and in that of Basil, and in the Palatine MS. as Hottinger observes), which will not let us doubt it is the true reading: though the Vulgar hath put Moses instead of Manasseh, according to an idle conceit of some of the rabbins, who say, the letter nun, in the middle of the word, is not written even with the rest, but suspended above the rest of the letters, to shew, that though he was indeed the son of Moses, yet he should rather be called the son of Manasseh, because he did the works of Manasseh, and not of Moses; that is, was an idolater. So Kimchi (as the same Hottinger observes), who therein follows the Talmudists, in Bava Bathra. (See his Thesaurus Philologicus, lib. i. cap. 2. quæst. 4. and Bartoloccius, in his Kirjath-sepher, tom. i. p. 114.) And thus they made this Jonathan to be the grandchild of Moses, for Gershom was his son: but it is not likely he would have been left in so poor a condition, if he had been so nearly related to their great lawgiver; nor would he have had so ill an education. And, being now but a youth, it is not probable that he was the son of that Gershom, but of some other, who had the name of his famous ancestor given him, though his father's name was Manasseh: but it is wholly uncertain from what family of the Levites this man was derived; and these names, no doubt, were common to more than those who first bare them.

He, and his sons, were priests of the tribe of Dan.] Of that part of the tribe who settled here at Laish.

Until the day of the captivity of the land.] Some cavillers have endeavoured to frame an argument from hence, that this book was written in later times, after the ten tribes were carried away by Salmanassar; or, as some of the Jews in Seder Olam interpret the captivity of the land, to signify that by Nebuchadnezzar: but Kimchi and Ralbag very well object against this, that it is altogether unlikely these images should have been suffered to continue in the days of David; who was a man after God's own heart, and set himself to advance true religion to the utmost of his power, all the country over, from Dan to Beersheba: therefore Kimchi, with great reason, concludes, that by the captivity of the land is meant the taking of the ark by the Philistines, and carrying it captive into the temple of Dagon: which is confirmed, as our famous Selden observes (Syntag. i. de Diis Syris, cap. 2.) by the next verse, which saith, that, till Shiloh was destroyed, these images remained. And this taking of the ark, the Psalmist expressly calls a captivity, when he saith, Psal. lxxviii. 60, 61. "He forsook the tabernacle of Shiloh, &c. and delivered his strength into captivity, his glory into the enemy's hand." As for the interpretation of Ralbag, who takes this captivity to have been in the days of Jabin, king of Canaan, it is not worth confuting.

Ver. 31. And they set up Micah's graven image, which he made, all the time that the house of God was in Shiloh.] Which was all the time of the judges mentioned in this book; who, though zealous reformers, could not, it seems, extend their authority to the very skirts of the country, where idolatry still lurked in this corner of the land: for scarce any one of the judges ruled over the whole country of Israel; but only over such tribes as they delivered from imminent danger. This appears by the armies which Barak and Gideon raised; and in the double oppression they lay under, at the same time, in the west and in the east, by the Philistines and the Ammonites; when Jephthah was raised up against the latter, and Samson against the former: no wonder therefore that none of them could make a general reformation, nor abolish the idolatry in this place: but God used the Philistines as instruments to put an end to it; for when they destroyed Shiloh, where the true house of God was, they destroyed this house of gods, (as they esteemed it, see xvii. 5.) being a resemblance of it: and perhaps, as they brought the ark into the field against the Philistines, so the Danites brought these images, with the ephod and teraphim, and the priest, who was slain with Hophni and Phinehas; or, as Huetius thinks, carried captive into the land of the Philistines, with a great many other Israelites. But this place remained still so famous for the resort of people thither to worship, that when Jeroboam set up his golden calves, he erected one of them here in Dan, as another in Beth-el: where, there having been a real appearance of God, in ancient time, to Jacob, the people were easily made to believe there had been the like in Dan, in the time here mentioned.

CHAP. XIX.

Ver. 1. AND it came to pass in those days, when there was no king in Israel.] In the time beforementioned, xvii. 6. xviii. 1. (See there.)

That there was a certain Levite sojourning on the side of Mount Ephraim.] He seems to have been a stranger in this country, as the other Levite was, who sojourned in the land of Judah, (xvii. 7.)

And he took him a concubine out of Beth-lehem-Judah.] That is, a wife of the secondary sort, without such solemn espousals, or a dowry, as those called wives had. So the Talmudists generally think. But Abarbinel, following Rasi, thinks, that a concubine was taken with espousals, and only wanted a dowry, or a jointure (as we speak). Certain it is, such persons were really wives; and it was adultery in any other person that lay with them, but he who had married them. As this man had this woman, for he is expressly called her husband in the next chapter, (xx. 4.) and her father is called his father-in-law in this chapter, (ver. 47.) See Selden, lib. v. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 7. and Buxtorf, de Sponsal. et Divortiis, p. 11, &c. where the opinion of Abarbinel is largely represented.

Ver. 2. And his concubine played the whore against him.] Was false to his bed, into which she admitted some other person.

And went away from him unto her father's house in Beth-lehem-Judah.] To escape the punishment unto which she was liable as an adulteress: but there are those who, by the word tizneh, which we translate played the whore, will have no more to be meant, but that she was froward and contumaciously disobedient; so that she could not endure his company, but forsook him: the Chaldee plainly inclines this way; and the LXX. translate it ὠργίσθη αὐτῷ, She carried herself like a fury to him; and Josephus ἀλλοτρίως εἶχε, She behaved herself untowardly.

And was there four whole months.] Or, as others take it, A year and four months. For days in Scripture frequently signify a year: but the LXX. and Josephus take it for so many days as made four months.

Ver. 3. And her husband arose, and went after her.] His anger was over by this time, and his affection to her revived: perhaps also he heard she repented, and was become a better woman.

To speak friendly to her.] In the Hebrew, To speak to her heart; that is, to make her sensible of his kindness to her, notwithstanding her offence, and to assure her of his pardon.

And to bring her again.] To his own habitation, from whence she went away.

Having a servant with him, and a couple of asses.] And for that end came attended with a servant, to carry her and her baggage (as we now speak), with necessary provisions.

And she brought him into her father's house.] She seems to have been as ready as he for a reconciliation.

And when the father of the damsel saw him, he rejoiced to see him.] Embraced him with great affection and joy.

Ver. 4. And his father-in-law, the damsel's father, retained him.] Would not let him go away, as soon as he desired.

Ver. 5. And it came to pass on the fourth day, when they arose early in the morning, that he arose up to depart.] With an intention to leave him, and return to his own house.

And the damsel's father said unto his son-in-law, Comfort thy heart with a morsel of bread, and afterward go your way.] Her father had no mind to part with him so soon, hoping, by keeping him longer in his house, their conjugal love and affection would be more confirmed: and devising this way to detain him, by desiring him to take a short repast with him, before he began his journey; for this is meant by a morsel of bread, under which all sort of provisions are comprehended: wherewith he desired him to comfort, or, as the word literally signifies in the Hebrew, support his heart; which in English we express exactly by stay his stomach with a morsel, &c. For, in many authors, the heart signifies the stomach, as several have observed, particularly Gataker, in his Cinnus, lib. ii. cap. 16.

Ver. 6. And they sat down, and did eat and drink both of them together.] He made him a great feast, at which they sat a long time.

For the damsel's father had said unto the man, Be content, I pray thee, and tarry all night, and let thy heart be merry.] For he was earnest with him not to think of going away that day, but to spend it joyfully with him and with his daughter.

Ver. 7. And when the man rose up to depart, his father-in-law urged him; therefore he lodged there again.] He pressed his stay so hard, that when he offered to be gone, he prevailed with him to lodge there another night.

Ver. 8. And he arose early in the morning on the fifth day to depart: and the damsel's father said unto him, Comfort thy heart, I pray thee.] Stay till after dinner.

And they tarried till afternoon, and they did eat both of them.] He prolonged the entertainment, so that the sun began to decline before they had done.

Ver. 9. And when the man rose up to depart, he, and his concubine, and his servant.] Who had made all ready for their journey.

His father-in-law, the damsel's father, said unto him, Behold, now the day draweth towards evening, I pray you tarry all night: behold, the day draweth to an end.] In the Hebrew the words are, It is the pitching time of the day; that is, when men pitch their tents, to take their rest.

Lodge here, that thine heart may be merry.] He prays him that they may rejoice together one night more.

And to-morrow get you early on your way, that thou mayest go home.] He promises not to detain them longer than this night, but to let them go away as early as they pleased next morning, without any entertainment.

Ver. 10. But the man would not tarry that night.] Suspecting his father would use still the same kind artifice, or some other, to keep him longer with him.

But he rose up and departed, and came over against Jebus (which is Jerusalem), and there were with him two asses saddled, and his concubine also was with him.] He carried away all that he brought, (ver. 3.) and his wife also, whom he went to invite again to dwell with him.

Ver. 11. And when they were by Jebus, the day was far spent; and the servant said unto his master, Come, I pray thee, and let us turn in unto this city of the Jebusites, and lodge in it.] The famous city of Jerusalem (anciently called Jebus) had been taken by the children of Judah, (i. 8.) but the Jebusites still kept the strong fort of Sion, till the time of David, and thereby so commanded the lower town, that they forced the children of Judah and Benjamin to let them dwell with them there; (i. 21. Josh. xv. ult.) and it appears by this place, that they were the ruling party, and therefore it is called this city of the Jebusites. (See Josh. x. 1.)

Ver. 12. And his master said unto him, We will not turn aside hither into the city of a stranger, that is not of the children of Israel.] This is an argument that he was not like the other Levite, mentioned in the seventeenth chapter; for he would not take up his lodging among idolaters: and it also shews, that the greater part of the inhabitants were Jebusites, and the children of Israel had little or no power there; yea, it is possible that this happened so long before the days of the judges, that Jerusalem was not yet taken by the children of Judah.

We will pass over to Gibeah.] Which was possessed by the children of Israel, viz. the Benjamites.

Ver. 13. And he said unto his servant, Come, and let us draw near to one of these places to lodge all night, in Gibeah, or in Ramah.] The servant, I suppose, made some objection against Gibeah, and therefore he put him to his choice, either to go thither, or to Ramah; which was also a city belonging unto Benjamin, both of them lying northward of Jerusalem, and not far from it.

Ver. 14. And they passed on, and went their way; and the sun went down upon them when they were by Gibeah, which belongeth to Benjamin.] This is noted, to distinguish it from another Gibeah which belonged to Judah, (Josh. xv. 57.)

Ver. 15. And they turned aside thither, to go in and to lodge in Gibeah.] Being unable to reach Ramah, unless they would have travelled in the night, which had not been safe.

And when he went in, he sat him down in a street of the city.] There being, I suppose, no public inn in the town, unto which strangers might resort.

For there was no man that took them into his house to lodging.] They were grown so lewd in this place, that there was no humanity left among them; but the ancient custom of hospitality, in entertaining strangers, was quite abolished: or, if any had so much goodness remaining as to be inclined to it, they durst not make any invitation of a stranger to their houses, for fear of drawing mischief upon themselves, from their debauched neighbours.

Ver. 16. And, behold, there came an old man from his work out of the field at evening.] Before it was quite dark, which was also of Mount Ephraim, where this Levite dwelt, and he sojourned in Gibeah. Being but a sojourner himself, he had the more compassion on a stranger.

But the men of the place were Benjamites.] This was one of the cities given to the priests, Josh. xxi. 17. But the priests did not inhabit them alone, especially now when they were but few, and therefore let other persons, who were not priests, dwell there together with them.

Ver. 17. And when he had lifted up his eyes, he saw a way-faring man in the street of the city.] Who looked as if he was at a loss for a lodging.

And the old man said, Whither goest thou? and whence comest thou?] These were the usual questions made to travellers.

Ver. 18. And he said unto him, We are passing from Beth-lehem-Judah towards the side of Mount Ephraim; from thence am I: and I went to Beth-lehem-Judah.] This is a full answer to one part of his question, giving him an account where he commonly lived; though his occasions carrying him to Beth-lehem-Judah, he now immediately came from thence.

But I am now going to the house of the Lord.] This is an answer to the other part of his question: for Shiloh, where the house of God was settled, was in the tribe of Ephraim; (Josh. xviii. 1.) and thither, like a good man, he intended first to go, and give thanks to God, for restoring his wife to him; and, perhaps, to offer an expiation for her sin; and then to return to his own home, on the side of Mount Ephraim.

And there is no man that receiveth me to house.] Whereby he was in danger to lie in the street all night.

Ver. 19. Yet there is both straw and provender for our asses; and there is bread and wine for me, and for thy handmaid, and for the young man which is with thy servant.] He uses very civil and humble language, and also signifies he did not desire to be chargeable to any body; being so well provided with all things necessary, that he need not be a burden to him that would entertain him.

There is no want of any thing.] But only of a lodging.

Ver. 20. And the old man said, Peace be with thee.] He saluted him kindly, after the usual manner that friends and neighbours greeted each other.

Howsoever.] Do not speak of that.

Let all thy wants be upon me; only lodge not in the street.] I had rather entertain thee at my charge, than suffer thee to lie in the street.

Ver. 21. So he brought him into his house, and gave provender for their asses.] Took care both of them and of their beasts, at his own costs, as the words seem to import.

And he washed their feet.] As the custom was in those countries after travelling.

And did eat and drink.] Sat down to supper.

Ver. 22. And, as they were making their hearts merry.] Eating and drinking very freely.

Behold, the men of the city, certain sons of Belial.] See Deut. xiii. 13.

Beset the house round about.] That none might go out; and beat at the door; as if they would force their entrance: which made the master of the house come to ask them what they would have.

And they spake to the master of the house, the old man, saying, Bring hither the man that came into thy house, that we may know him.] These last words are capable of a good meaning, as if they designed only to examine him, and know who he was, and whence he came, &c. but the old man being acquainted with their wicked manners, understood their lewd intentions, and accordingly gave them the following answer. (See Gen. xix. 5.)

Ver. 23. And the man, the master of the house, went out unto them, and said unto them, Nay, my brethren, nay, I pray you, do not so wickedly; seeing this man is come into my house, do not this folly.] He endeavours to divert them from their purpose with kind words and humble entreaties; urging withal, the title the man had to his protection by the laws of hospitality, and the greatness of the sin they were about to commit.

Ver. 24. Behold, here is my daughter, a maiden, and his concubine, them will I bring out now, and humble ye them, and do with them as seems good unto you: but unto this man do not so vile a thing.] His earnest desire to preserve the laws of hospitality from violation (which was a thing very sacred in those days), made him forget the care he ought to have had to preserve his daughter's purity. He hoped also, perhaps, that they were not grown yet so wicked as to offer this injury to a neighbour, though they regarded not what they did to strangers, which made him offer them the man's concubine also, supposing it better than to let them do violence to her husband. He must be considered as in a confusion of thoughts, (like Lot, see Gen. xix. 8.) and so not to have minded so much what was right, as what was least wrong.

Ver. 25. But the men would not hearken to him.] And the Levite also, I suppose, absolutely refused to have the old man's daughter or his concubine exposed to their lust: whence arose a quarrel, insomuch that they threatened and designed to kill him, (as he himself tells the story, xx. 5.) which, it is likely, moved the old man to persuade him not to be so obstinate; but for the preservation of his life, which was in great danger, to yield a little to them: and persuading the men of the city not to be so furious, they came at last to compound the matter; and finding the Levite so resolutely bent to defend himself, were content only to have his concubine (whose beauty they admired, as Josephus saith, when they saw her come into their city), and to let him and the old man's daughter alone. Unto this they agreed, of two evils choosing the least.

So the man took his concubine, and brought her forth unto them.] With her own consent, it is probable; for she thought her husband would lose his life, and she not preserve herself.

And they knew her, and abused her all night until the morning: and when the day began to spring, they let her go.] Lest the light should discover who they were that had been so villanously wicked.

Ver. 26. Then came the woman, at the dawning of the day, and fell down at the door of the man's house where her lord was, till it was light.] She fell down dead, ὑπὸ λύπης καὶ αἰσχύνης (as Josephus speaks), with grief at what she had suffered, and shame to look upon her husband; and, it may be added, with the excessive abuse of her body.

Ver. 27. And her lord rose up in the morning.] So the women in these old times called their husbands, out of reverence to them, as the head of the wife. (See 1 Pet. iii. 5.)

And opened the door of his house, and went out to go his way.] Imagining, perhaps, that they intended to keep her, and he did not know where to find her, but must seek somewhere else by what means to recover her.

And, behold, the woman his concubine was fallen down at the door of the house, and her hands were upon the threshold.] She being stretched out at length; as people are sometimes, when they fall down with weariness upon their faces into a profound sleep.

Ver. 28. And he said, Up, and let us be going.] Supposing her to be only in a deep sleep, he began to rouse her up, and to speak comfortably to her (as Josephus takes it), knowing she was under a force, and did not willingly submit to their filthiness.

But none answered. Then the man took her up upon an ass, and the man rose up, and gat him into his place.] When he saw she was dead he made no outcry; but (as Josephus observes) prudently carried her away, as fast as he could, to his own home.

Ver. 29. And when he was come to his house, he took a knife, and laid hold upon his concubine, and divided her, together with her bones.] In the Hebrew the words are, according to her bones; that is, some of the pieces were bigger, some lesser, according as the joints would suffer her body to be divided.

Into twelve pieces.] That every tribe might have a limb of her, Benjamin not excepted. Among whom it was to be hoped there were some who would resent so foul a fact, though committed by their own brethren.

And sent her into all the coasts of Israel.] Giving the messengers a charge (as Josephus observes) to relate how she had been abused, which was the cause of her death. He knew not what other course to take to have justice done; for, as Josephus there observes, (lib. v. Antiq. cap. 2.) there was no settled court of judicature established according to the law. Which is the reason he gives (chapter the fifth of that book) why Eglon attempted to subdue the Israelites, because they were all in disorder, the laws being not put in execution.

Ver. 30. And it was so, that all that saw it said, There was no such deed done nor seen, from the day that the chil- dren of Israel came up out of the land of Egypt.] They not only condemned the fact, but were highly incensed at it, as a crime beyond all that had been heard of since they were a people: for it was a mixture of adultery and murder, with an attempt of sodomy, and that upon a Levite; a person consecrated to the Divine service, in some lower ministries.

Consider of it, take advice, and speak your mind.] These are either the words of the messenger, or rather of the people themselves, who exhorted one another not to pass over this deed, only with expressing their abhorrence of it; but to consider, and consult one with another what was to be done, and to declare their opinion freely, how so heinous a crime was to be punished. And accordingly we find, in the beginning of the next chapter, that, by common consent, the whole body of the people met together to advise about this matter.

CHAP. XX.

Ver. 1. AND all the children of Israel went out of their cities.] The principal persons, who were appointed to represent the rest.

And the congregation was gathered together.] This congregation consisted of the captains of thousands and hundreds, &c. which had been established by Jethro's advice, together with the principal citizens, as Corn. Bertram probably thinks, whom they called to this assembly.

As one man.] Except the people of Jabesh-Gilead, (xxi. 5. 8.) and they of the tribe of Benjamin, who had no sense of this wickedness. For there was a general summons, no doubt, issued out by command of their rulers, to require every one to meet at a certain place, mentioned in the following words, or otherwise to forfeit their lives.

From Dan even to Beer-sheba, with the land of Gilead.] That is, all Israel on this side Jordan, and on the other, were of the same mind in this matter.

Unto the Lord to Mizpeh.] There was a place of this name in the land of Gilead, as we read, xi. 11. but this Mizpeh here mentioned was in the confines of Judah and Benjamin, for which reason it is sometimes ascribed to the former, Josh. xv. 38. and sometimes to the latter, Josh. xviii. 26. being a place very conveniently situated for a general meeting of all the people, who often assembled there in future times, (1 Sam. vii. 5—7. 16. x. 17.) And it was not far from Shiloh, which made it the more convenient; because from hence they might, upon any occasion, immediately go to consult the Divine Majesty; which they intended to do now, when they had dispatched the business for which they met here, which was to examine the crime of which the Benjamites were accused; and if there were good proof made of it, to consider how to punish it as it deserved. Whence it is that Josephus saith, this congregation met in Shiloh, Εἰς τὴν Σιλοῦν συλλεγέντες καὶ πρὸ τῆς σκηνῆς ἀθροισθέντες, as if it were the same with Mizpeh. And, indeed, in this history, there is a little difference made, because they were so near one to another. (See ver. 26. xxi. 2.) But Mr. Mede thinks that here was a famous place of prayer, which is the house of God mentioned in those two verses. For so the author of the first book of Maccabees saith, (iii. 46.) That when the holy city and sanctuary lay desolate, by the tyranny of Antiochus Epiphanes, the people assembled together at Maspah, to make their supplications unto God, Ὅτι τόπος προσευχῆς εἰς Μάσφα τὸ πρότερον τῷ Ἰσραὴλ, because at Maspah had been, in former times, a place of prayer, for Israel; and therefore some of the Jewish doctors say, the first synagogue was built here, and make this the original of all those which were so frequent in aftertimes: for here, say Kimchi and Abarbinel, all the remaining kings of Canaan assembled (after the battle at Gibeon) to fight with Israel, (Josh. xi. 3.) And here Joshua finished his victories over the Canaanites, (ver. 8.) and therefore here, it is probable, he built an altar unto the Lord, in memory of so great a deliverance. But this conjecture is founded upon a plain mistake; for the land of Mizpeh, where Joshua completed his victories, was far from this, in the most northern parts of Canaan, near Lebanon, beyond the fountains of Jordan.

Mr. Mede, also, and Corn. Bertram think, that hither they brought the ark upon this great occasion, and so might properly be said to be gathered unto the Lord. But this seems to me improbable, that they should remove the ark hither, when it was so near them in Shiloh, to which they might as well go, as bring it to them. And as for that phrase, unto the Lord, it is no argument that either the ark was here, or so much as a place of prayer; for where all the people of God were assembled in any place, there God was in a special manner present; as when they all assembled to make David their king, it is said he made a league with them in Hebron before the Lord, though there was no ark nor altar there, (2 Sam. v. 3.)

I see no reason therefore to believe, that the Israelites were now gathered to Mizpeh as a place of prayer (for Shiloh was appointed for that purpose, which was very near it), but as a fitting place for such a great assembly to meet, and consult what was to be done in the present case. That was their business here; and when they had occasion to inquire of God, and to fast (and pray, no doubt), they went to Shiloh, to the house of God. (See ver. 26. and 28.)

Ver. 2. And the chief of all the people, even of all the tribes of Israel, presented themselves in the assembly of the people of God.] The word we translate chief, is in the Hebrew the corners, who were the strength and support of the people, as the corner-stones are of a building; viz. the heads of their tribes, rulers of thousands, and rulers of hundreds, fifties, and tens; who kept the people in some kind of order (now that they wanted a supreme governor, and the courts of justice were unsettled), and, it is likely, brought them along with them to this general assembly; which, in all probability, met in the open air, as they anciently did among the Romans, Athenians, and other people, as many learned men have observed. And Lycurgus, as Plutarch tells us, gave this reason for it, that noble rooms, adorned with pictures and statues, and such-like ornaments, did not contribute εἰς εὐβουλίαν, to right counsels, but rather did hurt, by distracting their minds, and turning them from their business: but the true reason was, because vast multitudes met together, which no house would contain, and therefore they assembled in the field; as Livy tells us, when the cause of Appius Claudius was heard, the people were cited to come into the campus Martius. (Lib. vi. cap. 20.)

Four hundred thousand footmen that drew sword.] That is, together with so many of the people (for there could not be so many chieftains), that came ready armed, to do as they should be directed. I have often observed, that the armies of the Jews were all infantry, there being no horses bred in their country. There are those, who, by the corners of the people, understand, not their chiefs, but all the tribes of Israel (making the next words the explication of these), who made up this great number of four hundred thousand; because, saith Cocceius, all the people, gathered together, is like a house that hath corners. But I shall not trouble the reader with various interpretations.

Ver. 3. Now the children of Benjamin heard that the children of Israel were gone up to Mizpeh.] They could not be ignorant of such an universal concourse of the whole nation, except themselves, nor of the cause of their meeting; but when they were told of it, would take no notice of it, being stupidly insensible of the crime that had been committed among them, or foolishly confident of their own strength; or rather, imagining their brethren would attempt nothing by war against them.

Then said the children of Israel, Tell us, how was this wickedness?] The Hebrew word dabru (tell) being in the plural number, denotes, that they spake to more than one; and therefore, in all probability, not only the Levite, but the good old man (his host) and his servant were there, to give an account of the fact.

Ver. 4. And the Levite, the husband of the woman that was slain, answered and said, I came into Gibeah that belongeth to Benjamin, I and my concubine, to lodge.] He relates from the beginning how it was; and they confirmed it, by their testimony to the truth of it. He being called her husband, it proves she was his legal wife.

Ver. 5. And the men of Gibeah rose up against me.] A great number of them, who were not restrained by the rest; and therefore he imputes the crime to them all.

And beset the house round about me by night, and thought to have slain me.] For he resolved to lose his life, as Ralbag here observes, rather than submit to their abominable desires.

And my concubine have they forced, that she is dead.] But though he preserved himself, he could not deliver her from them; but they abused her to death.

Ver. 6. And I took my concubine, and cut her in pieces, and sent her throughout all the country of the inheritance of Israel: for they have committed lewdness and folly in Israel.] Such a very heinous crime, as he thought the whole nation was bound to censure.

Ver. 7. Behold, ye are all children of Israel; give here your advice and counsel.] They all detested, he presumed, such foul wickedness, and therefore desires them to consider and resolve how to punish it. This could not be debated by all the multitude; therefore some of the principal persons, I suppose, were deputed to sit in council, and hear the cause, and then report their opinion to the several tribes.

Ver. 8. And all the people arose as one man, saying, We will not any of us go to his tent, neither will we any of us turn into his house.] The report being made from the great council, and their opinion declared, the people all agreed to keep in a body till they saw justice done, according to their resolution.

Ver. 9. And now, this shall be the thing we will do to Gibeah; we will go up by lot against it.] This seems to be a popular motion, who are in love with equality, and therefore desire, by their officers, that it may be determined by lots who shall go to war, and who shall stay at home to make provision for the army; for they did not know how long they should continue abroad, and it was not easy to provide for such a multitude.

Ver. 10. And we will take ten men of a hundred throughout all the tribes of Israel, and a hundred out of a thousand, and a thousand out of ten thousand, to fetch victuals for the people.] So one man took care that nine of his brethren wanted nothing; and ten took care of ninety, &c. In the whole, there were forty thousand of the four hundred thousand who went out to forage for the army.

That they may do, when they come to Gibeah of Benjamin, according to all the folly that they have done in Israel.] That the rest might be wholly intent upon punishing the inhabitants of Gibeah according to their deserts.

Ver. 11. So all the men of Israel were gathered together against the city, knit together as one man.] Nothing could contribute more to their good success, than this unity and concord among the officers and soldiers, who all agreed to put this resolution in execution.

Ver. 12. And the tribes of Israel sent men through all the tribe of Benjamin.] But first it was thought prudent and just, by the rulers of the people, to send an embassy to their brethren, to desire them to hearken unto reason; and therefore there was a select number chosen out of every tribe, who went to every city of Benjamin (it is probable), to offer such terms of peace as might prevent the war upon Gibeah. Or, they sent this message to every family in Benjamin, which were originally ten, for Benjamin had so many sons; from whom sprang such a number of people, that it made R. Solomon say, From Rachel were descended twelve tribes: for there were two sons of Joseph which made two tribes, besides these ten families of Benjamin, who were so powerful and valiant, that it puffed them up with pride, and was the cause of their ruin.

Saying, What wickedness is this that is done among you?] In the first place, they were ordered to represent the greatness of the crime that had been committed among them.

Ver. 13. Now therefore deliver us the men, the children of Belial, which are in Gibeah.] This was agreeable to the law of nations, by which the Philistines had thus demanded Samson of the Israelites, who had done them mischief, (xv. 10.) See Grotius, who gives a great many other examples of it out of Pausanias, Strabo, and other authors. (Lib. ii. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 21. sect. 4.)

That we may put them to death.] If the Benjamites themselves would not do justice upon them.

And put away evil from Israel.] According to the direction Moses had given in his law, (Deut. xiii. 5.) For the sin is taken away when it is duly punished.

But the children of Benjamin would not hearken to the voice of their brethren the children of Israel.] They seem to have been as unanimous in the defence of this wickedness, as the rest of the tribes were in their endeavours to have it punished. For, quite contrary to all their brethren, who, upon the hearing of this crime, met together, examined into it, sent messengers to desire the malefactors might be delivered to be punished, before they would enter upon a war, they most perversely refused to come to their assembly, or deliver up the malefactors, or so much as excuse the fact, much less deny it, but prepare themselves to protect such lewd criminals with all their power. One can scarce think that there were no good men left among them, but they were so few, that they had no authority; and the generality were so depraved, that they took part with the evil-doers. Perhaps they took it ill that the other tribes should meddle with the concerns of theirs; but if they had had any goodness in them, they would have saved them this labour, by calling the offenders to an account themselves: which they not doing, made the whole tribe guilty of the crime of a few, and provoked God justly to give them up to pursue their own destruction.

Ver. 14. But the children of Benjamin gathered themselves together out of the cities unto Gibeah, to go out to battle against the children of Israel.] Instead of hearkening to their brethren, or giving any reason of their refusal to satisfy their desires, they prepare themselves to fight with them.

Ver. 15. And the children of Benjamin were numbered at that time, out of the cities, twenty and six thousand men that drew sword.] So the Chaldee expressly mentions twenty-six thousand, but the Vulgar saith only twenty-five thousand, and the LXX. of the Roman edition twenty-three thousand; but other copies have twenty-five thousand, as Josephus also hath: who imagined, I suppose, that the number of twenty-six thousand would not agree with the account which follows, of twenty-five thousand and one hundred slain in the last battle and in the pursuit of them, (ver. 35. 45.) and six hundred only escaped, (ver. 47.) which make the number of twenty-five thousand seven hundred. But they should have considered, that the two former battles could not be fought without loss on the Benjamites' side, when so many fell of the Israelites, (ver. 21. 25.) And the other thousand men may well be supposed to have then perished, or some of them to have been left to defend their cities, where they were afterward slain, (ver. 48.)

Beside the inhabitants of Gibeah, which were numbered seven hundred chosen men.] Who were left, it is likely (or at least part of them), to defend that city, while the rest beforementioned went out to battle.

Ver. 16. Among all this people there were seven hundred chosen men left-handed.] Who could use their left hand as well as their right in any exercise. (See iii. 13.)

Every one could sling stones at a hair's breadth, and not miss.] Such excellent marksmen there have been in other countries; particularly in the islands called Baleares, where they were bred from children to hit a mark with a stone slung out of a sling, or else to lose their breakfast, as Strabo relates. (See Bochartus, in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. iii. cap. 10.) This extraordinary skill in their arms (for it is likely they handled other weapons with the like dexterity) and their natural courage emboldened them, with such a small number, to undertake a war against such a vast multitude of their brethren. Which warlike disposition of theirs was prophesied of by Jacob, when he saith, "Benjamin shall ravin as a wolf;" which is an undaunted fearless creature, (Gen. xlix. 27.)

Ver. 17. And the men of Israel, beside Benjamin, were numbered four hundred thousand that drew sword: all these were men of war.] This is mentioned again, to shew that they all persisted steadfast in their resolution, (ver. 2. 8.) to see justice done upon the men of Belial before they would return to their own home.

Ver. 18. And the children of Israel arose, and went up to the house of God.] In Shiloh, which was not far from Mizpeh, and asked counsel of God, by urim and thummim, as they did, i. 1. The Targum hath it, They asked counsel by the Word of the Lord. Some of their principal persons, that is, were sent to desire God to direct them, as he was wont to do in all great affairs concerning the safety of their commonwealth. For so God himself ordained, that the high-priest should appear before him with the breast-plate of judgment, to ask counsel of him for them in all their weighty concerns. (See Exod. xxviii. 30. Numb. xxvii. 21.)

And said, Which of us shall go up first against the children of Benjamin? And the Lord said, Judah shall go up first.] The same question and answer which we read in the beginning of this book; there being a pre-eminence, we may observe all along, given to the tribe of Judah.

Ver. 19. And the children of Israel rose up in the morning, and encamped against Gibeah.] These words seem to tell us, that Judah was only to lead the van (as we now speak), and stand in the front of the battle, to make the first assault; but that all the rest went up with them.

Ver. 20. And the men of Israel went out to battle against Benjamin.] When the Benjamites heard that Israel were encamped against Gibeah, they came to the relief of it; and the Israelites marched out of their camp to engage them.

And the men of Israel put themselves in array to fight against them at Gibeah.] The battle was near that city.

Ver. 21. And the children of Benjamin came forth out of Gibeah.] Those forces which were left in Gibeah for its defence issued out upon the Israelites in their rear, as their brethren fought them in the front.

And destroyed down to the ground of the Israelites that day twenty and two thousand.] Since God bade them go up, it may seem strange that they should receive such a defeat. But it is to be observed, that he did not promise them success; of which the Jews give these reasons: some of them say, that they sought him imperfectly, and therefore he gave them an imperfect answer. So D. Kimchi—they did not ask him if he would favour their enterprise, as they did at the last, when they said, Shall we go up, or shall we desist? That is, if we shall not succeed, we will cease the war. And then a clear and full answer is returned, Go up, for to-morrow I will deliver them into thy hand, (ver. 28.) But Abarbinel thinks they did not ask counsel in a due place, nor by the proper person; but by some other than Phinehas the high-priest, of whom there is no mention till the third time they went to consult the oracle, (ver. 28.) But a better reason is given in Pirke Eliezer, where they say, God was angry with the Israelites for their neglect of him, in suffering spiritual adultery among them, while they were very earnest to punish carnal. So they make God's answer to have been, when they inquired of him the reason of the miscarriage, Ye are zealous against the adultery of the tribe of Benjamin, but not against the idol of Micah, (cap. 38.) And, indeed, they fell early into idolatry after the death of Joshua, and the elders that survived him (as we read in the second chapter of this book), with which, though the Benjamites were defiled as well as others, yet he used them as scourges to punish the rest; intending, in due time, to take a terrible vengeance on them, both for that and all their other sins.

Ver. 22. And the people, the men of Israel, encouraged themselves.] Exhorted one another, not to be disheartened by their loss, but to renew the fight; for they knew they had a good cause, which made them the bolder to hope for victory.

And set their battle again in array, in the place where they put themselves in array the first day.] They were not so superstitious as to imagine the place wherein they fought was unlucky, and that with the change of it they should change their fortune (as they now speak), but confidently resolved to encounter them in the same spot of ground where they were overthrown before. Though there are those that think the ground was not well chosen, and that they were the more easily defeated, because they fought so near Gibeah; whose name imports, that it was situated on high, which gave them greater advantages to annoy the Israelites.

Ver. 23. And the children of Israel went up, and wept before the Lord until even.] They seem to have been sensible that this was one cause of their loss, that they had not more solemnly sought the Lord, as they now do; but with greater grief for their loss than for their sin.

And asked counsel of the Lord.] The Targum here uses again the same phrase; Asked counsel by the Word of the Lord, saying, Shall I again go up to battle against the children of Benjamin my brother? They seem to imagine that God did not approve of their going to war among themselves, who were all brethren.

And the Lord said, Go up against him.] Here is a leave to go up, but without any promise of success; which they should have desired.

Ver. 24. And the children of Israel came near against the children of Benjamin the second day.] Near to Gibeah.

Ver. 25. And Benjamin went forth against them out of Gibeah the second day, and destroyed down to the ground of the children of Israel eighteen thousand men; all these drew sword.] They had now destroyed forty thousand, which was a much greater number than the Benjamites had in their whole army.

Ver. 26. Then all the children of Israel, and all the people, went up.] Not only all the warriors, but other people.

And came unto the house of God, and wept, and sat there before the Lord.] Upon the bare ground, as they used to do in very great sorrow.

And fasted that day before the Lord until even.] Afflicted their souls for their sins, which they had not done before; at least, not with such seriousness as now they did.

And offered burnt-offerings.] This had not been done before. That is, they had not made such solemn supplications to God, as now they did by these offerings. (See upon Lev. i. 3.) And in particular, it is evident, that, in ancient time, burnt-offerings were offered as prayers for forgiveness of sins, that so they might obtain God's blessing, (Job i. 5.) And Balaam (who, no doubt, understood the ancient rites of religion) offered these offerings to obtain power from God to help Balak, and destroy the Israelites, (Numb. xxiii. 3. 15, &c.)

And peace-offerings before the Lord.] These were offered to acknowledge benefits received (which ought to accompany our prayers), and some of them also were a kind of prayer to God for the benefits they hoped still to receive. (See upon Lev. vii. 16.)

Ver. 27. And the children of Israel inquired of the Lord.] The same expression is again in the Targum; by the Word of the Lord.

For the ark of the covenant of God was there in those days.] They had inquired of the Lord before, but not as they ought to have done; and therefore no mention is made till now of the presence of God continuing among them. For, confiding in the justice of their cause, and their vast forces, they seem to have made but slight and perfunctory addresses to God before they undertook the war.

Ver. 28. And Phinehas, the son of Eleazar, the son of Aaron, stood before it in those days.] To stand before it, is as much as to minister unto God before the ark, where he resided. (See upon Deut. x. 8. xviii. 7.) Some think this is here set down to direct us to the time when this war was made, which was not long after the death of Joshua, (as I said before, xix. 1.) otherwise Phinehas must have been now (if this were after the time of the judges) above three hundred years old, which is far beyond the age to which men then lived; for it was above so many years since he did that noble fact mentioned in Numb. xxv. Saidus Batricides, therefore, more justly makes him to have been high-priest only twenty-five years; and the Chron. Alexandr. mentions three other priests between him and Eli, as Mr. Selden observes, lib. i. de Succession. in Pontif. cap. 2.

Saying, Shall I yet again go out to battle against the children of Benjamin my brother, or shall I cease?] This is a plainer query than either of the former (as Pet. Martyr here observes); for at first they only asked what tribe should first go up, presuming the war was fit to be made, (ver. 18.) and the second time only, whether God would have them renew the fight, (ver. 23.) But now they ask, whether they should proceed in the war, or desist from any further attempt? that is, saith he, they leave it wholly to God's pleasure; desiring to do no more, if he did not think good to accompany them with his blessing.

And the Lord said, Go up; for to-morrow I will deliver them into thy hand.] Accordingly he condescended to give them a gracious answer, assuring them of a speedy victory.

Ver. 29. And Israel set liers in wait round about Gibeah.] This seems to intimate, that, in the former onsets, they had relied too much upon their numbers: but now, though they were encouraged by God himself, they grew more humble and less audacious in their enterprise, laying ambushes secretly in several places on several sides of the city.

Ver. 30. And the children of Israel went up against the children of Benjamin on the third day, and put themselves in array against Gibeah, as at other times.] I suppose they appeared in the same place mentioned ver. 22. as if they intended to renew the fight there. And this was, perhaps, the third day after the last battle; one having been spent in going to Shiloh, and another in fasting and prayer there. Or, by the third day may be meant the third day of battle.

Ver. 31. And the children of Benjamin went out against the people, and were drawn away from the city.] The children of Israel pretending to avoid fighting, and to flee from them; as we read in the next verse they had agreed.

And they began to smite of the people, and to kill, as at other times.] In the two former battles.

In the highways, of which one goeth up to the house of God.] That is, to Shiloh.

And the other to Gibeah in the fields.] So called, to distinguish it from this Gibeah; which, as I said, stood upon a hill, as the other did in lower ground.

About thirty men of Israel.] Whom they killed in the rear of their army, as they retreated.

Ver. 32. And the children of Benjamin said, They are smitten down before us, as at the first.] From this flight they presumed they should get a new victory over such cowards.

But the children of Israel said, Let us flee, and draw them from the city into the highways.] But this was only a stratagem of the Israelites, to draw them away from Gibeah into a more advantageous place of setting upon them.

Ver. 33. And all the men of Israel.] All that were posted in a certain place, whither they designed to draw the Benjamites.

Rose up out of their place, and put themselves in array at Baal-Tamar.] The sight of such a body of men appearing unexpectedly ready to encounter them, must needs be a great surprise to the Benjamites, who thought of nothing but pursuing those that run away from them.

And the liers in wait of Israel came forth out of their places.] At the same time, they that were placed in ambush behind them, rose up to assault the city.

Even out of the meadows of Gibeah.] Whether it be translated the meadows, or the plains, or the flat ground, that lay before the city, it is not material; for the sense is the same. (See Lud. de Dieu.)

Ver. 34. And there came against Gibeah ten thousand chosen men out of all Israel.] Some look upon these as a detachment (as they now speak) from the main body at Baal-Tamar, who marched to assault the city on one side, while the liers in wait assaulted it on the other.

And the battle was sore; but they knew not that evil was near them.] The Benjamites fought stoutly; but were not sensible of the danger they were in to be destroyed.

Ver. 35. And the Lord smote Benjamin before Israel: and the children of Israel destroyed of the Benjamites that day twenty and five thousand and a hundred men: all these drew the sword.] This is a general account of the fight, and of the Benjamites' loss; the particulars of both are related in the following verses.

Ver. 36. So the children of Benjamin saw that they were smitten.] There was an apparent overthrow given them by the Israelites: the manner of which is described from the beginning of the action of this day, to the conclusion, in the following part of this chapter.

For the men of Israel gave place to the Benjamites.] Seemed to flee before them; as was before related.

Because they trusted to the liers in wait, which they had set beside Gibeah.] Resolving not to fight till they saw their ambush had executed what was commanded against the city.

Ver. 37. And the liers in wait hasted, and rushed upon Gibeah.] Which they did with all speed, as soon as they saw the Benjamites withdrawn a good way from the city; and fell upon the inhabitants on a sudden.

And the liers in wait drew themselves along, and smote all the city with the edge of the sword.] Having entered the city, they spread themselves into the several parts of it, and killed all they found therein.

Ver. 38. Now there was an appointed sign between the men of Israel and the liers in wait, that they should make a great flame with smoke to rise up out of the city.] They had agreed beforehand, that when the city was taken by the liers in wait, they should set it on fire; whereby the Israelites might know when it was time to face about, and fight with the Benjamites.

Ver. 39. And when the men of Israel retired in the battle, Benjamin began to smite and kill of the men of Israel about thirty persons; for they said, Surely they are smitten down before us, as in the first battle.] Till that sign was given, they retreated as if they were beaten, and lost some men; whereby the Benjamites were deceived into secure hopes of a new victory.

Ver. 40. But when the flame began to arise out of the city with a pillar of smoke, the Benjamites looked behind them, and, behold, the flame of the city ascended up to heaven.] It is likely the Israelites shouted when they turned about to fall upon the Benjamites; which made them look back to see what unexpected supplies they had received.

Ver. 41. And when the men of Israel turned again, the men of Benjamin were amazed.] At this sudden change from flight to fighting.

For they saw that evil was come upon them.] They being beset by the Israelites both behind and before.

Ver. 42. Therefore they turned their backs before the men of Israel.] Whom they had pursued; but now ran away from them.

Unto the way of the wilderness.] For they were beset on all other sides.

But the battle overtook them.] That is, the men of war pursued them so closely that they could not escape.

And them which came out of the cities they destroyed in the midst of them.] Or, they that came out of the cities, viz. of Israel, helped to cut them off.

Ver. 43. Thus they inclosed the Benjamites round about, and chased them, and trode them down with ease.] For they made no resistance, but only sought where they might flee for safety.

Over against Gibeah towards the sun-rising.] There is another translation of the latter part of this verse, in the margin of our Bibles, with which I shall not trouble the reader, because it makes no alteration in the sense, which is to shew where the greatest slaughter of them was made.

Ver. 44. And there fell of Benjamin eighteen thousand men.] In the wilderness, eastward of Gibeah.

All these were men of valour.] Stout soldiers, as appears by the two defeats they had given to the numerous army of the Israelites.

Ver. 45. And they turned, and fled towards the wilderness, unto the rock of Rimmon.] The remainder of the army of Benjamin endeavoured to save themselves, by flying to a strong inaccessible place which was in that wilderness.

And they gleaned of them in the highways five thousand men.] They could not flee thither in a body, but scattered up and down in the highway; where they picked up five thousand more, and slew them.

And pursued hard after them to Gidom, and slew two thousand of them.] And following them very close, as far as to a place called Gidom, they killed two thousand more.

Ver. 46. So all which fell that day of Benjamin were twenty and five thousand men that drew sword.] For they slew in the first conflict eighteen thousand; and in several parties, as they fled towards the rock Rimmon, seven thousand more, which make up this sum. (See ver. 15.)

All these were men of valour.] Who would not surrender themselves, but chose rather to be killed.

Ver. 47. But six hundred men turned, and fled to the wilderness unto the rock Rimmon.] These seem to have turned into some nearer way unto the strong hold than the rest: or, being with the foremost, and more nimble than others (for it was accounted a rare quality in a soldier to be swift of foot), got thither before the Israelites could overtake them.

And abode in the rock Rimmon four months.] From whence they durst not adventure to stir, unless it were to fetch provisions; which they might easily do, the rage of the Israelites being in a little time slaked by so great a destruction, and turned into compassion.

Ver. 48. And the men of Israel turned again upon the children of Benjamin.] Left their pursuit of them in the wilderness, and turned towards the country of Benjamin.

And smote them with the edge of the sword, as well the men of every city as the beast.] Those beforementioned were men that drew the sword; that is, soldiers. But there were a great many husbandmen, and shepherds, and others; whom, in their fury, they also slew.

And all that came to hand.] Even women and children. For they had devoted to destruction all that came not up to Mizpeh, when they were summoned, (xxi. 5.) which none of the Benjamites did; for which reason they slew the men, women, and children, of Jabesh-Gilead, (xxi. 10.)

Also they set on fire all the cities that they came to.] This was as terrible an execution, as if they had been gross idolaters, whom they were commanded thus to punish. (See Deut. xiii. 15, 16.)

CHAP. XXI.

Ver. 1. NOW the men of Israel had sworn in Mizpeh.] When they first assembled there, before they began the war against Benjamin, (xx. 1, &c.)

Saying, There shall not any of us give his daughter unto Benjamin to wife.] They did not think of destroying the whole tribe when they took this oath; but only obliged themselves not to marry with them, no more than with the seven wicked nations of Canaan, because they refused to punish that villanous fact which had been committed among them, and resolved to defend the malefactors. This made the Israelites to abominate them, as people with whom it was not fit to contract an affinity.

Ver. 2. And the people came to the house of God.] Went up to Shiloh.

And abode there till even before God, and lifted up their voices, and wept sore.] Some days after their fury was over, and they coolly considered what they had done in the heat of war, their joy and triumph for their victory was turned into mourning and lamentation for the loss of so many of their brethren; for instead of a feast, they seem to have kept a fast; as they did before the last battle, (xx. 26.)

Ver. 3. And said, O Lord God of Israel, why is this come to pass in Israel, that there should be this day one tribe lacking in Israel?] This is an usual way of expressing great grief, wherewith they bewail the loss of a whole tribe, which they saw no means how to repair, because there were no women left in the tribe of Benjamin, with whom they in the rock of Rimmon might marry; and they had sworn that none of the other tribes should give their daughters to them; so that they must either marry with strange people, which was against the law, or remain unmarried, whereby the tribe would be extinct. They seem also to lament their own excessive wrath; for why should the women be destroyed with the men, who had no share in the management of public affairs; nor could be supposed guilty of refusing to make satisfaction for the injury done to the Levite's concubine?

Ver. 4. And it came to pass on the morrow, that the people rose early, and built there an altar.] There seems to have been no need of this, there being one settled altar at the house of God, according to the law of Moses; and then it was unlawful to build another. But some think it was gone to decay in those bad times; which is very improbable, for they lately offered sacrifices there, (xx. 26.) And the daily sacrifice, no doubt, was continued in Israel, either to the Lord, or the other gods they joined with him. It is more likely, therefore, that they erected a new altar upon this present occasion, when such a multitude of sacrifices were to be offered by all the people of Israel, that the ordinary altar was not sufficient to contain them. Thus Solomon did when he dedicated the temple, 1 Kings viii. 64. And by the direction of God, it was frequently done in other places; and not only at the house of God, as by Samuel, 1 Sam. vii. xi. xiv. and David, 2 Sam. xxiv. and Elijah, 1 Kings xviii.

And offered burnt-offerings and peace-offerings.] As they had done before the last battle. For God having made them victorious, they thanked him for it, and prayed him to continue his mercy to them; particularly begging his direction, it is probable, in the present strait wherein they were, about restoring the tribe of Benjamin.

Ver. 5. And the children of Israel said, Who is there among all the tribes of Israel that came not up with the congregation unto the Lord?] When summons went out to call them together, under a great penalty upon those who absented themselves. (See xx. 1.)

For they had made a great oath concerning him that came not up to the Lord to Mizpeh, saying, Surely he shall be put to death.] This great oath was in the nature of a cherem, as the Hebrews call it; whereby it was lawful for the whole congregation to devote those to destruction, who did not obey public orders in time of war, or great distress. (See upon Lev. xxvii. 29.)

This oath, I take it, was made by the great assembly of their rulers (called the whole congregation) before they summoned the people to Mizpeh; as the other oath (mentioned ver. 1.) was made after the people were come thither, upon the Benjamites' refusal to do justice.

Ver. 6. And the children of Israel repented them for Benjamin their brother, and said, There is one tribe cut off from Israel this day.] They still continued to lament their too great severity against Benjamin, and begin to consult how to repair the breach they had made.

Ver. 7. How shall we do for wives for them that remain, seeing we have sworn by the Lord.] The Targum continues its usual style, by the Word of the Lord.

That we will not give them of our daughters to wives?] This was the question debated in their common council, (see ver. 16.) how to bring themselves out of this difficulty, into which they were brought by their oath, which, being rashly made, it might be thought ought not to be kept. But they had such a reverence to a solemn oath, that they resolved to do all that was possible to find a way to keep their oath, and yet not to let the Benjamites be without wives.

Ver. 8. And they said, What one is there of the tribes of Israel that came not up to the Lord to Mizpeh?] Some in the council proposed to make an inquiry into all their tribes, whether they could find any that had not regarded the other oath they had made, (ver. 5.) And it appeared (as the next words tell us) that, Behold, there came none to the camp from Jabesh-Gilead to the assembly.

Ver. 9. For the people were numbered, and, behold, there were none of the inhabitants of Jabesh-Gilead there.] A rare instance of piety, that none of the whole congregation of Israel (who were now numbered) departed home, till they had been at the house of God, to give thanks for the victory he had given them.

Ver. 10. And the congregation sent thither twelve thousand men of the valiantest, and commanded them, saying.] This was the first result of their consultations.

Go and smite the inhabitants of Jabesh-Gilead with the edge of the sword.] This was a city on the other side of Jordan, in the tribe of Manasseh; who were ordered to be slain, as public enemies, because they had not obeyed the order of the whole congregation; and, by refusing to join with them against the Benjamites, had made themselves partakers of their crimes.

With the women and the children.] In this, their anger transported them again beyond reason; for these had not offended. And if it be said they were all under the cherem, I do not see how they could justify their sparing all virgins, as we find they did by a public decree; unless we suppose, that God (before whom they now were) dispensed in this case, because of the public necessity.

Ver. 11. And this is the thing that ye shall do, Ye shall utterly destroy every male, and every woman that hath lain by man.] The Hebrew doctors here raise a difficult question, as they account it, how they could know those who had lain with man, from those that had not. D. Kimchi fancies, that all the women were ordered to pass before the ark, and they who were stopped there, and could go no further, were taken for virgins. Others, that they passed before the crown of the high-priest, and they who had known a man, turned yellow or pale. But these are idle conceits, and I will mention no more of them, which are still more extravagant; when the plain account is, That they slew such as were not commonly reputed to be virgins, and saved those that were. (See Wagenseil, in his Confutation of Lipman's Carmen Memoriale, p. 400.)

Ver. 12. And they found among the inhabitants of Jabesh-Gilead four hundred young virgins, that had not known man by lying with any male; and they brought them unto the camp to Shiloh.] Which shews, that the making them pass before the ark is a foolish conceit; for they were looked upon as virgins before they came to Shiloh, where the ark was.

Which is in the land of Canaan.] Which the city of Jabesh-Gilead was not; but in the land taken from the two kings of the Amorites, Sihon and Og.

Ver. 13. And the whole congregation sent some to speak to the children of Benjamin that were in the rock Rimmon, and to call peaceably to them.] To give them the public faith, that they might safely return, and be received kindly by the Israelites.

Ver. 14. And Benjamin came again at that time.] All the six hundred men, who had saved themselves in that fortress.

And they gave them wives, which they had saved alive of the women of Jabesh-Gilead.] Which they thought they might lawfully do, notwithstanding their oath, because it obliged those only who were present in the assembly where it was made, not the absent, as they of Jabesh-Gilead were.

And yet so they sufficed them not.] For still two hundred wanted wives.

Ver. 15. And the people repented themselves for Benjamin.] This gave occasion to a new lamentation, whereby they testified to the Benjamites how sorry they were for what had been done.

Because that the Lord had made a breach in the tribes of Israel.] For the punishment of their crime was approved by God, though they executed it with too much severity.

Ver. 16. Then the elders of the congregation said, How shall we do for wives for them that remain, seeing the women are destroyed out of Benjamin?] This made them enter into a new deliberation in the council of the elders, how to get wives for the two hundred men remaining, since there were none in the tribe of Benjamin, and no more to be found among themselves, without breaking their oath.

Ver. 17. And they said, There must be an inheritance for them that are escaped of Benjamin, that a tribe be not destroyed out of Israel.] These words, there must be, are not in the Hebrew, where the words run thus, The inheritance of them that are escaped, is for Benjamin, &c. That is, the children of Benjamin must have that part of the country which was given them by the Divine lot for their inheritance, and we must not give it to any other persons; for then a tribe would be lost in Israel. This was all that some in the council said, who proposed no means whereby this tribe should be restored, but only asserted it must be done, leaving others to consider how.

Ver. 18. Howbeit we may not give them wives of our daughters: for the children of Israel have sworn, saying, Cursed be he that giveth a wife to Benjamin.] These persons, who spake next in the council, only increased the difficulty, by putting them in mind not to think to help their brethren by breaking their oath.

Ver. 19. Then they said.] Then some rose up in the council, after a long debate, and gave the following advice.

Behold, there is a feast of the Lord in Shiloh yearly.] All the three great festivals were to be observed in the place where God settled his habitation, which was now at Shiloh, where all the people assembled to praise God, and to feast one with another. And though some think the feast of the Passover to be here meant, yet it is more commonly, and with more reason, concluded, to be the feast of tabernacles, which was a time of exceeding great joy, because they had newly gathered their vintage; and then they dwelt in booths, behind which the Benjamites might conveniently lurk, and watch their opportunity to carry away the virgins. This feast of tabernacles, also, was the only season wherein the Jewish virgins were allowed to dance.

In a place which is on the north side of Beth-el.] This is not a description of Shiloh, whose situation was better known than any other (being the place where all Israel went to worship), but of the place where they met to dance, which was not in the city, but in the fields, where they had more liberty, and a freer air.

On the east side of the highway that goeth up from Beth-el to Shechem, and on the south of Lebonah.] This place is thus particularly described, that the Benjamites might know exactly where they might most advantageously lie concealed, to obtain their purpose.

Ver. 20. Therefore they commanded the children of Benjamin.] They had some authority who made this order; and Josephus calls them the γερουσία, the senate of the elders, whom Bertram makes bold to call the Seventy, as if the great Sanhedrin (as the Jews call them) was now settled: but I have shewn elsewhere that is not probable, though it be certain, from ver. 16. that there were some chief persons in every tribe, whom the people obeyed when there was no judge in Israel, who all seem to have been assembled on this occasion.

Saying, Go and lie in wait in the vineyards.] Which were nigh to the place beforementioned, and, it is likely, encompassed the place where they danced.

Ver. 21. And see, and, behold, if the daughters of Shiloh come out to dance in dances.] As they supposed they would, because it was the custom to express their joy in this manner: and though the women were not bound to come up to these solemn feasts, but only the men, yet some devout women did voluntarily frequent them, as we learn from the story of Hannah. And they that lived at Shiloh, and the places adjacent, no doubt, observed such times, as the men did, being near to the house of God; though it must be confessed, that parents were not wont to bring young virgins unto these feasts.

Then come ye out of the vineyards.] When they saw them so engaged.

And catch ye every man his wife of the daughters of Shiloh.] By the daughters of Shiloh, perhaps, are not meant only such as lived in that city, but thereabouts, who all met on this occasion.

And go ye to the land of Benjamin.] Carry them away to your own country; which they might the more easily do, because men and women did not, in those days, dance together, but women by themselves. Thus they thought they kept their oath, because they did not give them wives, but only suffered them to take them, and to keep them when they had them. The great Grotius endeavours to acquit them of violating their oath by this rule, That the signification of an oath is not to be extended, "ultra receptum loquendi morem," beyond the received manner of speaking; therefore they were not perjured, who, when they had sworn not to give wives to the Benjamites, permitted those who were stolen to live with those that carried them away. "Aliud enim est dare; aliud amissum non repetere:" For it is one thing to give, another not to demand that which is taken away to be restored. (See lib. ii. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 13. sect. 5.) But this seems to me to be far from justifying them in this matter; for they did not merely permit them to take these virgins, but advise and direct, nay, order and command (as the word is in the foregoing verse), to take and carry them away. And, therefore, what Josephus saith to salve this business is not true, that it was done, οὔτε προτρεπομένων οὔτε κωλυόντων, the Israelites neither exhorting to it, nor prohibiting it.

Ver. 22. And it shall be, when their fathers or their brethren.] Any of their nearest kindred.

Come unto us to complain.] Desiring them to do them right; which shews they were men of authority.

That we will say unto them, Be favourable unto them for our sake.] Do not prosecute them for what they have done, because it was by our advice, who did not know otherwise how to provide them with wives.

Because we reserved not to each man his wife in the war.] If there be any fault it is ours, whose rage carried the slaughter too far, and left no women to preserve their tribe. They advise them therefore to let their anger cease now (as Josephus speaks), because they had let it break out ἀμέτρως, beyond all bounds already.

For ye did not give unto them at this time, that ye should be guilty.] They put them in mind, that if there was any guilt, it was not in them that had kept their oath, and did not give wives to the Benjamites, nor could help their taking them. How Josephus came here to add to this speech, that they said they would tell them, they should have taken care to set a better guard upon their daughters, I cannot imagine; for, at such time of mirth, they always thought themselves secure from danger.

Ver. 23. And the children of Benjamin did so, and took them wives, according to their number, of them that danced, whom they caught.] That is, they carried away two hundred, for so many they wanted. With this is commonly compared, by interpreters, the rape of the Sabine virgins by Romulus: but there was a great deal of difference; for those were strangers, over whom Romulus had no power, and therefore was the cause of a war; but these were Israelites, subject to the authority of the elders, and was done to make peace and quiet. Though the truth is, the elders, in advising this, did wrong to those parents, whose children were taken away without their consent; but this they thought better than directly breaking their oath, or letting the title perish; for the preservation of which they were constrained to do some hard things: but in one thing they did very well, that they permitted them to take wives only according to their number; that is, every man a wife, and no more. So that though polygamy was tolerated, yet they did not advise or countenance it; no, not for the more speedy restitution of a tribe. It might happen, some of these young virgins were heiresses, and so their estates would be translated into another tribe: but the Jews say, that law against marrying into another tribe, and inheriting land in another tribe, did not belong to future ages, but only to that wherein the division of the land was made. (See our great Selden, de Success. ad Leges Hebr. cap. 18. where he alleges this very example of it, fol. 59.)

And they went and returned unto their inheritance.] In the land of Benjamin.

And repaired their cities, and dwelt in them.] And tilled the land, as Josephus adds; so that in time this tribe was restored, εἰς προτέραν εὐδαιμονίαν, to its former flourishing condition.

Ver. 24. And the children of Israel departed thence at that time, every man to his tribe, and to his family; and they went out from thence, every man to his inheritance.] To look after his own private affairs, the public concerns being now at an end.

Ver. 25. In those days there was no king in Israel.] There were elders, (ver. 16.) who had some authority, and there was a high-priest; (xx. 28.) yet for want of a king (as our great primate Usher observes, in his book of the Power of the Prince) all things went to wreck, and were in great confusion: and by a king, as Corn. Bertram observes, (de Rep. Jud. cap. 9.) is meant a supreme governor, such as Moses and Joshua were, and after them the judges: so this word is used Deut. xxxiii. 5. The meaning of these words therefore is, That in those days there was none who had so much power over all the Israelites as to keep them in order, and not only admonish them of their duty, but make all their tribes observe it, by punishing all public wrongs, and all whoredoms, and idolatries: and, consequently, there was no great Sanhedrin, as the Jews speak of in future times, which they would fain find in all ages foregoing.

Every man did that which was right in his own eyes.] For want of such a supreme authority, every tribe, and every city; nay, which is more, every private man (as Bertram there glosses) committed many horrid things, which were not publicly punished. This was the cause of Micah's idolatry, as was noted before, (xvii. 6.) and of the Benjamites' filthiness, (xix. 1.) and now of these enormous things done by all the Israelites, in killing all the Benjamites without distinction, when the law required the children should not suffer for their parents' offence; in binding themselves by such a rash oath, to give them none of their daughters to be their wives; in killing all the women of Jabesh-Gilead, who were not virgins; and now in permitting, nay, ordering this rape, rather than break a rash oath; which should teach men to be thankful for that authority which is over them, to preserve them from such-like enormities: for which end (as the same primate there observes) the custom was, among the ancient Persians, to let the people loose to do what they list, for five days after their king died, that, by the disorders which were then committed, they might see the necessity of having a king to govern them, and when they had one, to be more obedient to him.

BOOK OF RUTH.

THIS book is a kind of appendix to the book of Judges, and a manuduction to the book of Samuel; and therefore fitly placed between them. It hath its title from the person whose story is here principally related; which, indeed, is wonderful. For she left her own country, kindred, and relations, which the Jews say (though I confess without any good proof of it) were not only honourable, but royal, out of her great affection to her mother-in-law, and her religion; to live with her in the land of Israel, in a poor and mean condition. It is very probable, the same person who wrote the book of Judges was the author of this also, viz. Samuel; who, by adding this to the end of that book, brought down the history unto his own times; and gave us withal, the genealogy of David, from Pharez the son of Judah, that it might evidently appear Christ sprang out of that tribe, according to Jacob's prophecy, Gen. xlix. 10. but by a gentile woman (that all nations might hope in his mercy), full of faith, and of earnest desire to enter into that family; which made her despise the pride of her own nation, and choose to live despicably among the people of God.

CHAP. I.

Ver. 1. NOW it came to pass, in the days when the judges ruled.] These words direct us to the time when the things contained in this book fell out, though we cannot certainly tell what judge then ruled. David Ganz will have it to have been in the days of Ibzan, mentioned Judges xii. 8. because he was the only judge born at Beth-lehem; from whence he concludes him to have been the same with Boaz. But that is so weak a reason, that Guil. Vorstius, in his annotations upon him, thinks rather it was in the days of Deborah and Barak. I shall not mention his arguments, there being a great man of our own (the most learned Usher) who places this history in the times preceding; either in the days of Ehud, when the Moabites oppressed Israel, or rather of Shamgar, who succeeded him. Which is the opinion likewise of Du Pin, who takes these things to have been done about twenty-eight years after the death of Joshua. (See Usserii Chronol. Sacra, par. i. cap. 12.)

That there was a famine in the land.] This inclines me to think these things came to pass in the days of Gideon, for that is the only time that we read of a famine in the days of the judges; when the Midianites, Amalekites, and the children of the east, "came and destroyed the increase of the earth, and left no sustenance for Israel, nor for their cattle." (Judg. vi. 3, 4.)

And a certain man of Beth-lehem-Judah.] There were two Beth-lehems, as I have often noted: one in the land of Judah, the other in the tribe of Zebulun; (Josh. xix.

15.) They had their name from the great fruitfulness of the place where they were situated; which argues this famine to have been very sore, that even in these places there was a scarcity of provision.

Went to sojourn in the land of Moab, he, and his wife, and his two sons.] He carried his whole family with him into the neighbouring country of Moab, which was near to the land of Judah, at the end of the salt sea; and it seems had now plenty in it, when the land of Israel was famished.

Ver. 2. And the name of the man was Elimelech.] Who, if we may believe many of the Jewish doctors, was a noble and potent person in his country.

And the name of his wife Naomi.] They make her also of a noble extraction, she being (as the Talmudists say in Baba Bathen) the niece of Naasson, prince of the tribe of Judah, and daughter of his brother Salmon.

And the name of his two sons Mahlon and Chilion, Ephrathites of Beth-lehem-Judah.] The name of Ephrathites is given them, because they were not only born, but, I suppose, bred up, and lived in the same place with their father; which, from its great fruitfulness, was called Ephrata, as well as Beth-lehem.

And they came into the country of Moab, and continued there.] Settled their habitation in that country, which had not been lawful, unless it had been in a public calamity, or some great private necessity, as Maimonides observes. (See Guil. Schickard, in his Mischpat Hammelech, cap. 3. Theor. 10.)

Ver. 3. And Elimelech, Naomi's husband, died; and she was left, and her two sons.] She a widow, and they fatherless. This, Josephus thinks, was after he had been there ten years; but the most, if not all others, think he died a little after he came into this country.

Ver. 4. And they took them wives of the women of Moab.] Which was not lawful, unless they had first become proselytes to the Jewish religion; as Aben Ezra concludes they were, from those very words from whence others prove the contrary, ver. 15. where it is said, Orpah returned unto her people, and unto her gods. This is a testimony, saith he, that she had been converted to Judaism. But the Chaldee paraphrast is quite of another opinion, and saith they transgressed the commandment of the Lord, by taking to them strange wives. And so the Midrasch upon Ruth, as Buxtorf observes in his book De Sponsalibus et Divortiis, sect. 31.

The name of the one was Orpah, and the name of the other Ruth.] Who do not seem to have been of such great quality, as the Talmudists fancy, but of the common rank; otherwise they would not have been bestowed upon strangers.

And they dwelt there about ten years.] After their marriage.

Ver. 5. And Mahlon and Chilion died also both of them.] For their days were cut short, saith the Chaldee paraphrast, because they married strange women; and for the same reason (if it be true) they may be thought to have died without issue, for there is not the least intimation that either of them had any.

And the woman was left of her two sons and her husband.] In a very melancholy condition, being in a country of strangers.

Ver. 6. Then she arose with her daughters-in-law, that she might return from the country of Moab.] She packed up her goods, and made herself ready to leave the country of Moab, and her daughters accompanied her, it being the custom to conduct those whom they loved, some part of their way when they went a long journey.

For she had heard in the country of Moab how that the Lord had visited his people, in giving them bread.] They were such near neighbours, that they soon had intelligence in Moab what was done in the land of Israel.

Ver. 7. Wherefore she went forth out of the place where she was.] The necessity which forced her thither no longer remaining.

And her two daughters-in-law with her.] Who loved her as their own mother.

And they went on the way to return unto the land of Judah.] This relates unto Naomi, for her daughters had never been there.

Ver. 8. And Naomi said unto her two daughters-in-law.] When they were come to the borders of the country of Moab, she said the following words.

Go, return each to her mother's house.] She desires them to accompany her no further, but go back to their own home. And it seems it was usual in Moab, as well as in Israel, for widows to dwell with their parents. And the women here also had apartments distinct from the men, where the daughters lived with their mothers, as the sons with their father.

The Lord deal kindly with you, as you have dealt with the dead, and with me.] She dismissed them with her blessing, praying God would be as good to them, as they had been good wives to their husbands, and good daughters to her.

Ver. 9. And the Lord grant that ye may find rest, each of you in the house of her husband.] And that they might be happily settled in houses of their own, with good husbands; whom she wishes they might long enjoy in peace and quietness.

Then she kissed them.] As was usual, when friends took their leave one of another, or when they met together.

And they lifted up their voice, and wept.] Were all extremely grieved to think of parting.

Ver. 10. And they said unto her, Surely we will return with thee unto thy people.] They resolved to accompany her to Beth-lehem.

Ver. 11. And Naomi said, Turn again, my daughters; why will you go with me? Are there yet any more sons in my womb, that they may be your husbands?] This shews, that the custom of men's marrying their brother's widow, when he left no issue (which was before the law of Moses, Gen. xxxviii.) was so ancient, that it was derived into other countries, who were not descended from Abraham.

Ver. 12. Turn again, my daughters, and go your way; for I am too old to have a husband. If I should say, I have hope, if I should have a husband also to-night, and should also bear sons,

Ver. 13. Would you tarry for them till they were grown? Would you stay from having husbands?] She persists in the same argument, and presses it home, that she was too old to marry, and they too young not to marry again: but should she marry immediately, and be sure she should have children, nay, sons, it would be unreasonable for them to wait till they were fit to be their husbands.

Nay, my daughters; for it grieveth me very much for your sakes, that the hand of the Lord is gone out against me.] She would have them by no means think of any such thing; and likewise represents to them, what a mean condition God had reduced her unto, which was the more heavy, because she was able to do nothing for them.

Ver. 14. And they lifted up their voices, and wept again.] It gave them great trouble, whether they thought of going with her, or of parting from her.

And Orpah kissed her mother-in-law.] Took her leave of her. The Jews observe three sorts of kisses, which were usual and commendable among them, all others being wanton: one in token of reverence to any person's dignity, (1 Sam. x. 1.) A second at the meeting of friends, (Exod. iv. 27.) A third at their parting, of which they give this as an example. Unto which R. Tanchuma adds a fourth, saluting of near relations, (Gen. xxix. 11.) which is, in a manner, the same with the second. Drusius thinks there was another, which he calls the kiss of prayer, which was in use in the primitive church, and taken, he thinks, from the Jews: but Buxtorf saith, he can find no such thing in all their books. (See Lex. Talmud. in the word Nesikah, fol. 1408.)

But Ruth clave to her.] Would not part from her, but steadfastly resolved to go with her to her own country.

Ver. 15. And she said, Behold, thy sister-in-law is gone back to her people, and to her gods.] The principal of which was Chemosh, as we read Numb. xxi. 29. 1 Kings xi. 7. By this it appears, Orpah was not made a proselyte to the Jewish religion, but still continued to worship the gods of her country. Yet this did not make such a difference in the family (as diverse religions commonly do now), but that she loved her husband entirely, and had a great affection to his mother, even after his death.

Return thou after thy sister-in-law.] This may seem strange, that she should, in effect, press her to go and worship idols; but her intention was to try her, and to persuade her to do nothing rashly, especially not to change her religion, without due consideration, and weighing well her reasons for it: for if she had been led merely by her affection to her, to embrace also her religion, she might have revolted from it when she died, or when she saw her condition very desolate.

Ver. 16. And Ruth said, Entreat me not to return from following thee: for whither thou goest I will go, and where thou lodgest I will lodge.] Be content, that is, with any condition in her company.

Thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God.] This is a resolution to embrace the Jewish religion entirely, so as to be incorporated with the Israelites, as if she had been a native among them.

Ver. 17. Where thou diest I will die, and there will I be buried; the Lord do so to me, and more also, if aught but death part thee and me.] She resolves that nothing but death shall make a separation between them, and not that neither, wholly, for she would lie by her in the same sepulchre: and this she confirms with an oath, or solemn imprecation upon herself, that worse might befal her than any thing Naomi could suffer, if she did not faithfully adhere to her: which form of speech we find afterward in many places, (1 Sam. iii. 17. xiv. 44. xx. 13. 2 Sam. iii. 9. 35, &c.)

Ver. 18. And when she saw that she was steadfastly minded to go with her, she left speaking to her.] She said not a word more to her of her leaving her, when she saw she had a settled and well-grounded resolution to become a proselyte to the true religion. So the Chaldee paraphrast explains it, representing Naomi as declaring to her at large, that there was a great number of precepts (no less than six hundred and thirteen) to be observed by those who would be of her religion. In particular, the rest of the sabbath, to which they were obliged, and to worship one God alone, &c. Unto all which she answered, Whatsoever thy people observe, I will do the same, as if I had been one of them from the beginning.

Ver. 19. So they two went until they came to Beth-lehem.] Which shews they were but in a mean condition, having no servant to wait on them, nor an ass to carry them.

And it came to pass, when they were come to Beth-lehem, that all the city was moved about them; and they said, Is this Naomi?] It being reported by them who knew Naomi that she was returned, all the people ran out of their houses to see her, and beholding a great change in her garb and countenance, they could scarce believe it was she. But the Arabic and Syriac versions take it quite otherwise, that all the city rejoiced, and said, This is Naomi. And the LXX. whom they follow, to the same purpose, ἤχησε ἡ πόλις, the city rang with the news, and they asked if this were Naomi; for several had never seen her before, or did not remember her, but had only heard much of her.

Ver. 20. And she said unto them, Call me not Naomi, call me Mara.] She told them her old name was not suitable to her present condition, which required she should rather be called by a contrary; from whence some gather, that Naomi was not the name given her at first by her parents, but a popular name commonly given her by her neighbours, because of her comely presence and courteous behaviour.

For the Almighty hath dealt bitterly with me.] This is the reason of the new name of Mara, whereby she would be called, which signifies bitter. Josephus saith that Naomi, in their language, signifies εὐτυχίαν, prosperity, and Mara ὀδύνην, grief and pain.

Ver. 21. I went out full, and the Lord hath brought me home again empty.] The Targum takes this to relate unto her husband and children, with whom she went out to the country of Moab, which now were taken away from her; but it is reasonable to extend it to the estate they carried along with them for their support in a strange country, where they lived to spend it all.

Why then call ye me Naomi, seeing the Lord hath testified against me, and the Almighty hath afflicted me?] God is said to testify against any persons when he passes sentence upon them, and judges them, by sending afflictions upon them; at which Naomi doth not murmur, but only humbly acknowledges God had inflicted grievous punishments upon her, which she thought testified his displeasure.

Ver. 22. So Naomi returned, and Ruth her daughter-in-law with her, which returned out of the country of Moab.] As much as to say, This is a brief account of Naomi's return to her own country, together with her daughter-in-law, who would accompany her.

And they came to Beth-lehem in the beginning of barley-harvest.] The time of their return is also noted, which was about the Passover; for after the offering of the sheaf, mentioned Lev. xxiii. 10, 11. on the second day of unleavened bread, they began to cut barley: whence the Chaldee paraphrast thus explains these words, They came to Beth-lehem in the entrance of the Passover; and on that day the children of Israel began to mow the sheaf that was to be waved, which was of barley.

CHAP. II.

Ver. 1. AND Naomi had a kinsman of her husband's, a mighty man of wealth.] So gibhor chail is well translated; for riches make men mighty and powerful. Though the Chaldee would have it signify a man mighty in the law, by which they do not mean a man of great wisdom and goodness, but, as that paraphrast explains it upon 1 Chron. iv. 22, 23. after the manner of the Jews (whose heads are full of their Academies and Sanhedrins), he was the rab or chief ruler of the academy of wise men at Beth-lehem.

Of the family of Elimelech; and his name was Boaz.] Whose ancestors are mentioned in the conclusion of this book, and his descendants also, who lived at Beth-lehem as he did.

Ver. 2. And Ruth the Moabitess said unto Naomi, Let me go into the field, and glean ears of corn.] This is a great argument of her modesty and dutiful affection to her mother-in-law, that she would not go any whither, no, not to earn something for their support, without her leave.

After him in whose sight I shall find grace.] Either she did not know that poor strangers had a right to glean, as well as the poor of Israel, (Lev. xix. 9, 10.) or out of her great piety she would not challenge it as a right, but as a favour, which she would thankfully acknowledge.

And she said, Go my daughter.] This is a sign of Naomi's low condition, otherwise she would not have suffered her to go and seek for a supply of their needs among the poorest sort of people.

Ver. 3. And she went, and came.] Into a field, where she saw some reapers.

And gleaned in the field after the reapers.] Gathered up the scattered ears of corn, which fell from them, and were left behind them.

And her hap was to light on a part of a field belonging to Boaz, who was of the kindred of Elimelech.] By the direction of God's good providence (not by any man's guidance) she came into a piece of ground which belonged to the great man beforementioned.

Ver. 4. And, behold, Boaz came from Beth-lehem.] It is remarkable, that he followed her into the same field.

And said unto the reapers, The Lord be with you. And they answered him, The Lord bless thee.] Such was the piety of ancient times, that they were wont to pray God to prosper the honest labours of those that they saw employed, who made a return of the like prayers for them, which the gentiles themselves practised, especially in harvest-time, which they would not begin, by putting the sickle into the corn, till Ceres had been invoked, as Virgil informs us in his Georgics, lib. i. ver. 347, 348.

This is the first time that we meet with this religious salutation, The Lord be with you; which we afterward find was familiar, and was continued even to our Saviour's days, when the angel saluted the blessed Virgin after this manner, (Luke i. 28.)

Ver. 5. Then said Boaz unto his servant that was set over the reapers.] To see them do their work, and that they had provision fit for them; and, it is likely, to pay them their wages. Josephus calls him ἀγρονόμος, and the Chaldee calls him rab, the master, ruler, or governor of the reapers.

Whose damsel is this?] Either she did not appear, when all the city came to see Naomi; or Boaz did not take so much notice of her, as to know her again.

Ver. 6. And the servant that was set over the reapers answered and said, It is the Moabitish damsel that came back with Naomi out of the country of Moab.] He did not know her name, perhaps, but he describes her as a stranger, that, out of love to her mother-in-law, and her religion, had left her own country, and come to dwell among the Israelites. So the Chaldee paraphrast makes him answer, She is become a proselyte.

Ver. 7. And she said, I pray you, let me glean and gather after the reapers among the sheaves.] What she might have demanded by the law as her right, she asks a courtesy, which, no doubt, moved the man to be the more obliging to such a modest and well-bred woman.

So she came.] That is, he admitted her; for, perhaps, they were not bound to let the poor come immediately into the fields, as soon as the reapers had cut down the corn, and bound it up in sheaves, but when it was carried off. They might choose also, among the poor, whom they thought most worthy, or most necessitous.

And hath continued even from the morning until now.] That is, all the day; for I suppose it was in the afternoon, when the heat of the day was over, that Boaz came to visit his reapers. So the servant describes her as a very diligent woman, who had not intermitted her labour, but only for a little time, to eat, or to rest herself.

That she tarried a little in the house.] The meaning is, she went and stayed awhile in the tent which was pitched in the field, for such as were weary to refresh themselves; or for other necessary occasions. So Aben Ezra expounds the word house; in which some think Boaz found her resting herself, and wondering to see a stranger there, inquired who she was.

Ver. 8. Then said Boaz unto Ruth, Hearest thou not, my daughter?] A form of speech calling for attention to what is said.

Go not to glean in another field, neither go from hence.] He would not have her go to glean in any other field, nor to stir from thence to supply any of her wants, as appears by what follows.

But abide here fast by my maidens.] Who reaped as well as men (as the next verse shews), and their company was the fittest for her on all accounts. Some think this was a labour too hard for women, and therefore they will have it, that his maidens only came to bring provisions for the men, as Virgil describes Thestylis to have done, in his second Eclogue, ver. 10.

Ver. 9. Let thine eyes be on the field that they do reap, and go thou after them.] Observe their motions, and follow them.

Have I not charged the young men that they touch thee not?] Give thee no molestation, as the Vulgar understands it. And so the word touch sometimes signifies, to do harm to others, (Psal. cv. 15.) But the Chaldee paraphrast extends it further, that they should not come near her, but keep at a distance from her, and consequently offer no incivility or rudeness to her, which was too common among rustics, especially when they were full of mirth, in harvest and vintage-time.

And when thou art athirst, go unto the vessels, and drink of that which the young men have drawn.] There was excellent water at Beth-lehem, (2 Sam. xxiii. 15.) which either the reapers, or some that attended them, had brought in vessels into the field, to quench their thirst when they were dry.

Ver. 10. Then she fell on her face, and bowed herself to the ground.] A posture of the greatest reverence and submission, either in civil or religious worship, and was used when they would express their most grateful sense of any favour done them. (See Gen. xxiii. 7. 12. xxvii. 29, &c.)

And said, Why have I found grace in thine eyes, that thou shouldest take knowledge of me, seeing I am a stranger?] To take knowledge of any person, is to shew kindness, in the Scripture language, and is the effect of finding grace, that is, favour with any one; which was the greater in Boaz, because he had never seen her before, or was not acquainted with her.

Ver. 11. And Boaz answered and said unto her, It hath been fully shewn me all that thou hast done unto thy mother-in-law since the death of her husband.] Naomi had related to some friends, who had informed Boaz at large of her great affection to her mother.

And how thou hast left thy father and thy mother, and the land of thy nativity, and art come unto a people whom thou knewest not heretofore.] To be a proselyte to their religion (as the Chaldee paraphrast explains it), upon which account the greatest kindness was due to her.

Ver. 12. The Lord recompense thy work, and a full reward be given thee.] He looked upon it as a very high act of faith and virtue in her, to leave all that was dear to her in this world to become a member of their church; which he prays God amply to requite. The Chaldee paraphrast makes her say here, "That she was come from a strange people, who were made unworthy to be admitted into the congregation of the Lord:" but he answers to her, "Our wise men say, That the men of Moab only, not the women, are excluded from our society," &c. (See what I have noted upon Deut. xxiii. 5.)

Of the Lord God of Israel, under whose wings thou art come to trust.] To seek for protection, and commit thyself unto his care and good providence; which was a pious confidence so pleasing to God, that the Chaldee paraphrast makes Boaz say, "In this thy righteousness thou shalt be delivered from the judgment of hell, and thy portion shall be with Sarah, Rebekah, Leah, and Rachel;" that is, she should have an eternal recompence. This phrase, of trusting under the wings of the Divine Majesty, is often used by the Psalmist, Psal. xvii. 8. xxxvi. 7. lvii. 1. lxi. 4. lxii. 7. xci. 4. All which places speak of the shadow, or the covert of his wings, which seem to be a metaphor taken from the cherubims, who spread their wings from one side of the holy place unto the other, upon which the Divine Majesty sat; which protection and safeguard was represented in the cloud which covered the Israelites in the wilderness, (Numb. xiv. 14.)

Ver. 13. Then she said, Let me find favour in thy sight, my lord; for that thou hast comforted me, and for that thou hast spoken friendly unto thy handmaid.] She humbly begs the continuance of his good opinion of her (though she acknowledges herself, in the next words, to be very unworthy of it), for it had given the greatest consolation to her in her desolate condition.

Though I be not like to one of thy handmaidens.] So obscure she means, being a stranger, and of a country under an ill character among them, that she was not equal to one of his meanest servant maids.

Ver. 14. And Boaz said unto her, At meal-time come thou hither.] He enlarges his favour to her, and orders her at the time of repast to come and eat among his servants. I cannot devise how the ancient Jews came to apply these words to the kingdom of the Messiah, and to his suffering condition here in this world; but so it is, that the Midrasch, upon this place, makes these words, Come thou hither, to signify as much, as come to thy kingdom; and the morsel dipped in vinegar, to denote the reproaches and torments of the Messiah: which is an argument that they expected such a king, as should be exposed to such sufferings as our blessed Saviour endured, who saith, in the Psalmist, "They gave me vinegar to drink," (lxix. 21.) which, perhaps, was the original of this application of Boaz's words to the Messiah, whose coming they longed for, and found it foretold in more places than we are aware of.

And eat of the bread, and dip thy morsel in the vinegar.] Under the name of bread is comprehended all the provision which was made for the reapers, with which they had vinegar for sauce, it being very cooling and refreshing in hot seasons, as the time of harvest was. So Pliny observes, lib. xxiii. cap. 1. "Aceto summa vis est in refrigerando;" which cooling quality is taken notice of by Rasi, and others, upon this place.

And she sat beside the reapers.] With the women, that is, who reaped.

And he reached her parched corn.] This seems to signify, that Boaz himself ate with them, or stood by them, to see they were well provided; and took a particular care of her, unto whom he reached some parched corn, which was an usual, and no mean food in those countries, as appears from 2 Sam. xvii. 28. But it may be understood of the servant set over the reapers, (ver. 5.) or some of them, who, observing her modesty, that she did not carve for herself, reached to her some of the provision made for them.

And she did eat, and was sufficed, and left.] There was such plenty (Boaz being a great and a good man), that more was set before them than they could eat; at least, she left some of that which was carved to her. This meal, I suppose, was after the heat of the day was over, in the afternoon; for then they dined, but their best meal was a supper.

Ver. 15. And when she was risen up to glean, Boaz commanded his young men, Let her glean even among the sheaves, and reproach her not.] For that looked something like filching, to come among the sheaves. But Josephus takes the sense to be, that she should be permitted, if she pleased, to cut down corn herself for her own use, which is not likely.

Ver. 16. And let fall also some of the handfuls on purpose for her, and leave them that she may glean them, and rebuke her not.] As if she was too bold, in gathering what belonged not to her.

Ver. 17. So she gleaned in the field until even, and beat out that she had gleaned.] It seems they did not in those days carry home their gleanings as they gathered them in the ears, but beat the corn out with a rod; and freeing it from the chaff, carried it away pure, with less trouble than otherwise it would have given them.

And it was about an ephah of barley.] An ephah is commonly taken to be about a bushel of our measure. See my notes on Exod. xvi. 36. where it appears, that an ephah contained ten omers, and that an omer was sufficient for one person's food for a whole day; therefore Ruth now had gathered as much as would keep her and her mother five days.

Ver. 18. And she took it up, and went into the city; and her mother-in-law saw what she had gleaned.] That is, wondered at the quantity.

And she brought forth, and gave to her that she had reserved, after she was sufficed.] Josephus thinks this is spoken of Naomi, that set before her daughter-in-law some remainders of the victuals that her neighbours had brought her in Ruth's absence; but it rather signifies Ruth's care of her mother-in-law, whom she had in mind, when she was feasted with the reapers with more than she could eat, (ver. 14.) and therefore brought what she left home for her refreshment.

Ver. 19. And her mother-in-law said unto her, Where hast thou gleaned to-day? and where wroughtest thou? blessed be he that did take knowledge of thee.] For she concluded, that without the special favour of some person to her, it had not been possible for her to have made such a day's work.

And she shewed her mother-in-law with whom she had wrought, and said, The man's name with whom I wrought to-day is Boaz.] Whose near relation to them Ruth did not yet know.

Ver. 20. And Naomi said unto her daughter-in-law, Blessed be he of the Lord.] Or rather, Let him be most blessed; for lamed prefixed to Jehovah increases the sense, as in Gen. x. 9. (See there.)

Who hath not left off his kindness to the living, and to the dead.] Continued to be kind to the relicts of Elimelech and his son, as he had been to them when they were alive.

And Naomi said, The man is near of kin to us, one of our next kinsmen.] In the Hebrew, one of our goels, to whom of right it belonged to redeem the land, and raise up the name of his dead brother, by marrying his widow, according to the command, Lev. xxv. 25 Deut. xxv. 5. (See upon the fourth chapter of this book, ver. 5.)

Ver. 21. And Ruth the Moabitess said, He said unto me also, Thou shalt keep fast by my young men.] Though the word nearim be of the masculine gender, yet it signifies all young people, and particularly the maidens, to whom he bid her keep close, (ver. 8.) And so both the LXX. and the Chaldee here expound it; and so Naomi, it appears by the next verse, understood it.

Until they have ended all my harvest.] Not only the barley-harvest, in which they were now employed, but the wheat-harvest, which followed it. (See ver. 23.)

Ver. 22. And Naomi said unto Ruth her daughter-in-law, It is good, my daughter, that thou go out with his maidens, that they meet thee not in any other field.] She advises her to accept his kindness, and not to be found gleaning in any other field, where she might not be so welcome; and beside, it would look like a distrust of his kindness, if not a despisal of it, should she not do as she was invited.

Ver. 23. So she kept fast by the maidens of Boaz to glean, unto the end of barley-harvest, and of wheat-harvest.] Which continued many days; and in all that time she found, no doubt, the same kind entertainment, which is not here repeated.

And dwelt with her mother-in-law.] Constantly came home to her at night, after she had done her labour. Or the meaning is, when harvest was ended, she did not gad abroad, but kept her mother company at home; for so the Hebrew, she sat with her mother-in-law.

CHAP. III.

Ver. 1. THEN Naomi her mother-in-law said unto her, My daughter, shall I not seek rest for thee.] A settlement in a house of her own, with a good husband.

That it may be well with thee?] That she might live more comfortably than she could do with her. The Chaldee understands it, as if she confirmed it with an oath, that she would give herself no rest till she had married Ruth.

Ver. 2. And now is not Boaz of our kindred, with whose maidens thou wast?] She puts her in mind of what she had told her before, (ii. 20.)

Behold, he winnoweth barley to-night in the thrashing-floor.] The corn being gathered, thrashed or trodden out, it was next of all winnowed, to separate it from the chaff; and this was commonly done in the evening, when the heat of the day was over, and cool breezes began to rise. (See Gen. iii. 8.)

Ver. 3. Wash thyself therefore, and anoint thee.] Frequent bathings were necessary in those countries, where they continue to this day for cleanliness; and anointing for smoothing their skin, and making them appear more amiable.

And put thy raiment upon thee.] Her best clothes, as the Vulgar expresses it; or her ornaments, as the Chaldee.

And get thee down to the floor.] To some place near it, where she might see, and observe what was done.

But make not thyself known unto the man.] She would have her conceal herself, so that Boaz might not see her; nor, as some understand it, any man else.

Until he shall have done eating and drinking.] Upon such occasions they made feasts for the labourers in the harvest.

Ver. 4. And it shall be, when he lieth down, thou shalt mark the place where he shall lie.] To sleep, after the feast was done, and the guests were gone.

And thou shalt go in.] To the thrashing-floor, where he lay down, as we read ver. 7.

And uncover his feet, and lay thee down.] She was not to lie by his side, for that had been immodest; but at his feet, in the posture of an humble supplicant.

And he will tell thee what thou shalt do.] Either he presently understood her meaning, when she told him who she was, or explained it unto him; and Naomi did not doubt he would comply with her desires, and put her into a legal way of accomplishing them.

Ver. 5. And she said unto her, All that thou sayest unto me I will do.] She put a great confidence in her mother's prudence and piety, and trusted God would give good success to her design; which seemed not very modest, but had no other intentions than what was agreeable to the law of God, and accordingly prospered.

Ver. 6. And she went down unto the floor, and did according to all that her mother-in-law bade her.] Concealed herself, but observed when he came into the thrashing-floor, and where he lay down to sleep.

Ver. 7. And when Boaz had eaten and drunk, and his heart was merry.] This is a sign he had made a great feast, that he and his reapers, and perhaps other neighbours, might rejoice together; and (as the Targum understands it) praise God for his goodness in giving them plenty, after the famine that had been in the land. For so the words there are, His heart rejoiced, and he blessed God, who had heard his prayer, and removed the famine from the land of Israel.

He went to lie down at the end of the heap of corn.] Such was the plain way of living in those ancient times, that the most wealthy persons looked after their own business, both in the field and at home; which made Boaz not go to his house, but lie perhaps upon the straw in the floor where his corn had been winnowed, to secure it from thieves, till it could be laid up in his barns. These thrashing-floors were covered at top to keep off rain, but lay open on all sides, that the wind might come in freely for the winnowing of the corn; which being done, I suppose they were shut up at night with doors fitted to them, that, if any body lay th r he might be kept warm; and the corn, as I said, be secured from the danger of robbers.

And she came softly, and uncovered his feet, and laid her down.] Before the doors were shut up, she came in so softly, that none perceived her, and when he was asleep, lay down at his feet, not naked, as it is supposed she was, but in her clothes, which we do not find she put off; for she had no intention of lying with him, but only of giving him an opportunity to consider what the law required of him. This, indeed, looks like a dangerous practice, which her mother-in-law put her upon, exposing both her and him to great temptations, and therefore many have condemned it as a very perilous adventure; but the known piety both of Boaz and Ruth, who were not now in their youthful years (at least Boaz was of a great age), made Naomi confident no sin would be committed by them.

Ver. 8. And it came to pass at midnight, that the man was afraid.] It is a sign he went to bed sober, though merry, in that he waked so soon, and was not drowsy, but apprehensive of something extraordinary; for going to sleep alone, he perceived another in bed with him. Or, all this is to be ascribed to a Divine motion, which secretly suggested such thoughts to Naomi, and awaked Boaz at a time when men used to sleep most soundly.

And turned himself.] Being much troubled, he turned himself about to feel who or what it was. The Hebrew word jilaphet, which we translate turned himself, is variously interpreted, and hath an unusual signification put upon it by the Targum, and the Gemara Sanhedrin, (cap. 2. n. 4.) where the modesty and chastity of Boaz is highly extolled, and compared with that of Joseph.

And, behold, a woman lay at his feet.] He perceived by her clothes, and (when she spake) by her voice, that it was a woman.

Ver. 9. And he said, Who art thou?] He had no thoughts of abusing her, as the Targum observes, but only inquires who she was, and what her business was there.

And she answered, I am Ruth thy handmaid.] She humbly acknowledges her meanness, and then acquaints him with her business.

Spread therefore thy skirt over thine handmaid.] In the Hebrew, Spread thy wing; which is a phrase importing taking a person into one's protection and tuition; and here not a common one, but such as was matrimonial. Therefore the Chaldee plainly renders it, Let thy name be called upon thy handmaid, by taking me for thy wife. See of this phrase upon Deut. xx. 30. From hence, at this day, when two persons are married among the Jews, the man throws the skirt of his talith over his spouse, and covers her head with it, as Buxtorf observes in his Synagoga Judaica, cap. 39.

For thou art a near kinsman.] This is the reason of her address to him; which may be rendered, as we translate it in the margin, one that hath right to redeem; for so the word goel signifies. (See the foregoing chapter, ver. 20.)

Ver. 10. And he said, Blessed be thou of the Lord, my daughter.] He was so far from being incensed at her boldness, that he wishes her all happiness.

For thou hast shewed more kindness in the latter end than at the beginning.] He doth not condemn her as immodest, but commends her true kindness both to her mother and to her husband, which appeared now more than before, by her endeavours to preserve his name and family.

Inasmuch as thou followedst not young men.] This is a high commendation, that she did not seek a husband to satisfy her lust, but to preserve the memory of him who was dead.

Whether poor or rich.] That is, of any sort.

Ver. 11. And now, my daughter, fear not.] He would not have her think he had an ill opinion of her because she took this course, or be in doubt whether her motion was acceptable to him; or that, being a stranger and poor, he would despise her.

I will do unto thee all that thou requirest.] That is, take her to be his wife.

For all the city of my people doth know that thou art a virtuous woman.] She had behaved herself so, as to gain a general report of extraordinary virtue, as the Hebrew word chajil imports; which signifies one that doth things strenuously. The words we translate, all the city of my people, in the Hebrew are, all the gate of my people: by which we rightly understand, all that entered in at the gate; that is, the whole city. But the gate being the place where justice was wont to be administered, the Chaldee paraphrast interprets it, It is manifest unto all that sit at the gate of the great Sanhedrin of my people, that thou art a just woman, &c. This shews that Boaz was truly a very excellent person, who thought great virtue to be a great portion.

Ver. 12. And now, it is true that I am thy near kinsman: howbeit there is a kinsman nearer than I.] This, I suppose, was well enough known to Naomi; but she understood his disposition so well, that she thought it would be in vain to make any application unto him.

Ver. 13. Tarry this night, and it shall be in the morning, that if he will perform unto thee the part of a kinsman, well; let him do the kinsman's part.] He resolved to make no longer delay than was absolutely necessary; but promises in the morning she should have right done to herself, and to her deceased husband, either by the next kinsman, or by himself. Some of the Jews take the word Tob, which signifies good, and we rightly translate well, to have been the name of the other kinsman, who was called Tob: and indeed, it is likely, this was a name among that people, from whence, by the addition of iah to it (which was very common) came Tobiah. Rasi saith he was the brother of Elimelech; but there is no reason to believe this: for, when it had been proper to mention his name in the next chapter, ver. 1. we only read that Boaz called him Peloni almoni (Ho, such a one), which were words used when they called any one indifferently.

But if he will not do the part of a kinsman to thee, then will I do the part of a kinsman to thee, as the Lord liveth.] He confirms his promise to her with an oath, that, if the other person refused, he would marry her.

Lie down until the morning.] Having given her this security, and thereby quieted her mind, he bids her take a little bodily rest; which was very needful, having been, no doubt, full of restless and anxious thoughts, what would become of her all the former part of the night.

Ver. 14. And she lay at his feet until the morning.] In the same place where she lay down at first; having no other design, but only humbly to implore his justice and kindness unto her deceased husband.

And she rose up before one could know another.] That is, before it was light; so that if any body had seen her, they could not have known who she was.

And he said, Let it not be known that a woman came into the floor.] Some think he spake this to his servants: but they were not yet stirring; and if they were, they could not discover whether she was man or woman. It was spoken therefore to her, whom he would have to be careful both of her own fame and of his; for, as Josephus here notes, Great caution is to be used to prevent such rumours, especially when there is some ground for them, καὶ μάλιστ' ἐπὶ γεγονόσι.

Ver. 15. Also he said, Bring the veil that thou hast upon thee, and hold it.] The Hebrew word mitpacath is variously interpreted, it signifying any kind of covering. The LXX. translate it περίζωμα, by which they seem to have meant that which we call an apron, or a kirtle, which is bound about one. The Vulgar, pallium; but it is by us most properly rendered a veil; which modest women were wont to throw over their heads, to cover their faces.

And when she held it, he measured six measures of barley, and laid it on her.] He would not let her go away without some token of his love to her; and nothing was more ready at hand in the thrashing-floor than the corn that lay there. It is not certain how much this measure contained, but, no doubt, in the whole, he gave her as much as she could well carry; and was so kind also, as himself to lay it upon her shoulder. Some fancy that this load was too heavy for her, but barley is far lighter than wheat: and the Chaldee paraphrast here saith, "Strength was given her from before the Lord to bear it." And then adds, "Immediately there was a prophecy, that from her should proceed six righteous persons;" each of which should be blessed with six benedictions; "David, Daniel, his three companions, and the king Messiah."

And she went into the city.] The Chaldee saith, Boaz went into the city; and the Hebrew favours this interpretation. For the word for went is in the masculine gender, as in the next words it is in the feminine.

Ver. 16. And when she came to her mother-in-law, she said, Who art thou, my daughter?] It was so early in the morning when she returned home, that Naomi could not well discern who it was that desired the gate might be opened; but perceived it was a woman, whom she calls her daughter, as they used to do in civility, it appears, by Boaz's language, ver. 10. But the Vulgar takes it quite otherwise, that she asked her, What hast thou done, my daughter? That is, how hast thou succeeded? And, indeed, the answer favours this; and the Hebrew words will bear it, if mi be interpreted not who, but what.

And she told her all that the man had done to her.] How kindly he had treated her; and what promises he had made her.

Ver. 17. And she said, These six measures of barley gave he me.] Then she shewed her the present he made her.

For he said to me, Go not empty unto thy mother-in-law.] Without some token of my affection. Some imagine barley (which is not so valuable with us as wheat) was too mean a thing to bestow upon her. But they do not consider, that in those countries it was a better sort of corn than it is in these parts of the world; for bread was commonly made of it, and that not only by the poor, but the better sort: of which we find examples, both in the Old Testament and the New. See 2 Sam. xvii. 28. 2 Kings iv. 42. And in the gospel we read of barley-loaves, wherewith Christ fed the multitude; particularly John vi. 9. And, indeed, Pliny saith this was the most ancient food. (Antiquissimum in cibis Hordeum, lib. xviii. Nat. Hist. cap. 7.)

Ver. 18. Then said she, Sit still, my daughter.] She bids her trouble herself no farther, for she had done enough.

Until thou know how the matter will fall.] But wait and expect, till she saw the issue: which the Targum expresses piously, in this manner, Till thou knowest how this matter will be determined from heaven, and wonderfully disposed.

For the man will not be in rest till he have finished the thing this day.] She knew him so well to be a man of his word, that he would immediately go about the business, according to his promise, (ver. 14.)

CHAP. IV.

Ver. 1. THEN went Boaz up to the gate.] Where there was a great concourse of people; and where the judges sat. So the Chaldee paraphrast, He went to the gate of the house of judgment, where the Sanhedrin sat. (See my note upon Deut. xvi. 18.)

And sat him down there.] Among the elders, as the forenamed paraphrast will have it: but that is not likely, for he called the other kinsman to come and sit down by him.

And, behold, the kinsman of whom Boaz spake came by.] See iii. 12.

Unto whom he said, Ho, such a one! turn aside, sit down here.] When they could not think of a man's name, or did not think fit to name it, they used these words, Peloni almoni; which Daniel contracts into one word, Palmoni, (viii. 13.) and is the same with the Greek ὁ δεῖνα.

And he turned aside, and sat down.] Supposing Boaz had some business with him, he did not go on his way, but turned aside to speak with him. This was about noon (as Josephus saith), when greater multitudes were wont to be assembled in such public places, than at other times of the day.

Ver. 2. And he took ten men.] He would have a sufficient number of witnesses of what he did; which, as Maimonides observes, was very necessary in the espousal of a person to one's wife. For, saith he, if it had been enough to do it privately, many would have taken a harlot into their houses for a time, and pretended she was their wife; therefore it was ordained, that, after any man had espoused a woman, he should marry her publicly, after the example of Boaz, of whom we read, he took ten men, &c. (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 49.)

Of the elders of the city.] How many elders there were in every city, is not certain; insomuch that Bertram conjectures, there were as many as there were captains of thousands, of hundreds, of fifties, and tens, in every city. Josephus, indeed, saith, there were seven, (lib. iv. Antiq. cap. 6.) which perhaps was the determinate number in his time. But anciently, one would think, there were more, because here Boaz mentions ten elders (who were the same with judges) in the city of Beth-lehem, which made Bertram (de Republ. Judaica, cap. 9.) the more confident, that, as the captains of thousands, &c. in every city, were the elders of that city, so there were as many in every city, of the one as of the other. As for what the Talmudists say, that there were three judges in pecuniary causes, and three-and-twenty in capital, it must belong, if it be true, to later times.

And said, Sit you down here. And they sat down.] To hear the cause he intended to bring before them.

Ver. 3. And he said unto the kinsman, Naomi, that is come out of the country of Moab, selleth a parcel of land, which was our brother Elimelech's.] He calls him their brother, because he was near of kin to them. And he mentions Naomi's return out of the country of Moab, to intimate, that her poverty constrained her to sell her estate, which her husband left her. That interest she might part withal, to supply her necessities, but it could not take away the right of redemption; for, as Mr. Selden observes in his book de Successionibus, cap. 16. both Elimelech the father, and Mahlon the son (unto both which Boaz was of kin), gave this patrimony to their wives before they died (for otherwise they could not have had the possession of it): or rather, the former gave his interest to Naomi, and the latter his to Ruth; which, how it was done, Maimonides shews in his treatise de Donationibus, cap. 6.

Ver. 4. And I thought to advertise thee of it, saying, Buy it before the inhabitants, and before the elders of my people.] Before those that sat in the gate of the house of judgment, and before these elders, as the Targum expounds it; that is, the ten elders beforementioned, that the bargain might be firmly made, and the estate legally passed over to him.

If thou wilt redeem it, redeem it; but if thou wilt not redeem it, then tell me, that I may know.] That is, understand thy mind in this matter.

For there is none to redeem it besides thee, and I am after thee.] That is, no other kinsman remaining of that family but they two.

And he said, I will redeem it.] For it is likely it lay convenient for him.

Ver. 5. Then said Boaz, What day thou buyest the field of the hand of Naomi, thou must buy it also of Ruth the Moabitess, the wife of the dead.] For they both had an interest in it; but Boaz prudently conceals the name of Ruth, till he had consented to buy the land, and then tells him whom he must take along with it.

To raise up the name of the dead upon his inheritance.] According to the law mentioned Deut. xxv. 5, &c. as it is commonly interpreted. But it was rather (in Mr. Selden's opinion) the fulfilling of the law, mentioned Lev. xxv. 24, 25. lib. de Successionibus ad Leges Hebr. cap. 15. where he observes, that this phrase, to raise up the name of the dead, (which is mentioned also, ver. 10.) is quite different from that mentioned in Deuteronomy; being no more, as R. Solomon notes, (upon iii. 9.) than if he had said, that the name of her dead husband may be had in remembrance, so that when she came into that field, men might say, This is the wife of Mahlon. There is a long discourse also in Abarbinel, upon Deut. xxv. to prove, that this doth not belong to that law, of a man's raising up seed to his brother. (See Buxtorf, de Sponsal. et Divortiis, sect. 27.) But if it do, Grotius thinks that law only obliged ὁμοπάτριοι, brethren by the same father to marry the brother's widow; but custom, in process of time, obliged the next of kin to do it. (See upon Matt. xxii. 24.)

Ver. 6. And the kinsman said, I cannot redeem it for myself, lest I mar my own inheritance.] He had a wife and children already, which made him afraid to marry a poor woman with a small parcel of land, which would not provide for the children he might have by her, without diminishing his own inheritance of which he was possessed. To which the Chaldee paraphrast adds, that it might have made great contentions in his family: for thus he makes him speak, I cannot redeem it (viz. on that condition), for I have a wife already; and it is not fit for me to bring another into my house, for fear brawling and quarrelling arise in it, and lest I hurt my own inheritance. In like manner the Midrasch, upon this book, makes him discourse. But Rasi interprets the words, as if the meaning was, that he should bring a blot upon his posterity, by marrying a Moabitish woman (which he thought was forbidden by the law), for children are called a heritage, Psal. cxxvii. 3. But in this he acknowledges the man was mistaken, as many of their ancient doctors were, for the law did not forbid the marrying a woman of that country. But the plainest sense is (as Mr. Selden observes), that many inconveniences might arise in his family by this marriage, not only by the disagreement of his wives, but by the difficulty of providing for so many children as she might bring him, and of giving them good education, and by distracting his inheritance, and such-like things; which he prudently considered as good reasons of his refusal. (See lib. i. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 9.)

Redeem thou my right to thyself; for I cannot redeem it.] Which is thus paraphrased by the Targum, Do thou therefore redeem it, because thou hast no wife, which hinders me from redeeming.

Ver. 7. Now this was the manner in former times in Israel, concerning redeeming, and concerning changing.] There was no law, that we can find, about the following rite, but only custom, which had long prevailed; when men redeemed lands that had been alienated, or gave possession of them to another person.

For to confirm all things.] To make the bargain valid.

A man plucked off his shoe, and gave it to his neighbour; and this was a testimony in Israel.] A sufficient evidence, that he transferred all his right unto that person to whom he delivered his shoe. It is not easy to give an account of the original of this custom; but the reason of it is plain enough, it being a natural signification that he resigned his interest in the land, by giving him his shoe, wherewith he used to walk in it, to the end that he might enter into it, and take possession of it himself.

The Targum, instead of his shoe, hath the right-hand glove; it being the custom, perhaps, in his time, to give that in room of the shoe. For it is less troublesome to pull off a glove than a shoe, and deliver it to another, though it hath the same signification; as now the Jews deliver a handkerchief to the same purpose. So R. Solomon Jarchi affirms, We acquire, or buy, now by a handkerchief, or veil, instead of a shoe.

Ver. 8. Therefore the kinsman said unto Boaz, Buy it for thee.] After the accustomed manner.

So he drew off his shoe.] And gave it Boaz, in token that he parted with all his right to him. The Jewish doctors, indeed, differ very much about this matter; for some say, he that parted with his right to redeem the land pulled off his shoe, and gave it to him that bought it; but others, that he who bought it, gave his shoe to him that sold it. The truth is, the text may be either way understood, but it seems to me most reasonable to think, that he who parted with his right parted with his shoe also. See Selden, lib. vi. de Jure Nat. et Gent. juxta Disciplin. Hebr. cap. 5. where he observes again, how different this was from the rites used, when one renounced his brother's wife. And Abarbinel looks upon this as a demonstration, that the plucking off the shoe here mentioned, is not the same with that in Deut. xxv. For Ruth doth not here appear to loose his shoe, (as the brother's wife is there ordered to do, ver. 9.) much less did she come to spit in his face; of which there is not one word in this ceremony; which he shews wholly belongs to the sale of lands, or to their redemption, and bringing them back again into the family to which they belonged. This appears from the following words, where mention is made of nothing but of a purchase of Elimelech's estate.

Ver. 9. And Boaz said unto the elders, and to all the people, Ye are witnesses this day, that I have bought all that was Elimelech's, and all that was Chilion's and Mahlon's, of the hand of Naomi.] She had the first right in the land after the death of her husband, and her two sons after her; which she entirely parted withal by this contract unto Boaz, to whom the other kinsman had passed over his right of redemption, by the political ceremony of plucking off the shoe.

Ver. 10. Moreover, Ruth the Moabitess, the wife of Mahlon, have I purchased to be my wife.] He had her by the right of the same purchase, and did not succeed into the right of a brother, mentioned in Deut. xxv.; for he was not brother to Elimelech, but only a remote kinsman of the same family, as Abarbinel there observes, who could not enjoy the land, while she lived, unless he would take her with it; to whom it belonged as long as she lived, and was to go to her issue when she died.

To raise up the name of the dead upon his inheritance.] That the parcel of land which he bought, might still be called by the name of Mahlon, whose wife Boaz married.

That the name of the dead be not cut off from his brethren, and from the gate of his place.] That his name hereby might be remembered, not only in his own family, but in all the city of Beth-lehem; for by the gate of his place, is meant all the people that entered in at the gate.

Ye are witnesses this day.] Both that he bought the land, and Ruth together with it, at such a time.

Ver. 11. And all the people that were in the gate, and the elders, said, We are witnesses.] After this open declaration, there was no need of any instrument in writing to confirm the purchase.

The Lord make the woman that is come into thy house like Rachel and like Leah.] Such a solemn benediction of those who were going to be married was very ancient, as we learn from Gen. xxiv. 60. and the Jews continue it to this day, which, they say, was always in the presence of ten grave persons, at the least, (as Mr. Selden observes, lib. ii. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 12.) conformable to this example of Boaz, (ver. 2.) and the eldest of them pronounced the benediction, which was a ratification of what was agreed: so our Mr. Thorndike excellently observes, that the benediction, which we Christians use in marriage, is a sign of the allowance of the church presupposed, as this benediction of Boaz and Ruth presupposeth the act to be allowed by the elders, or consistory, who sat in the gate of Bethlehem. See Rites of the Church in a Christian State, p. 241. In the Review of which he observes, that this seems to be confirmed by the opinion of Epiphanius, who saith, Our Lord was invited to the marriage of Cana in Galilee, that, as a prophet, he might bless the marriage; which, it is certain, the church hath always practised, to signify, that the marriage was approved to be made according to the laws of God. And therefore Conradus Pellicanus (an eminent man at the beginning of the Reformation) here well notes, that prayers and benedictions are never to be omitted in marriage.

Like Rachel and Leah.] That is, very fruitful.

Which two did build up the house of Israel.] Were blessed with a numerous posterity. They do not mention the two handmaids, because these were Jacob's principal wives (and Rachel chosen first, as she is here placed), whose servants bare children, not for themselves, but their mistresses. (See Gen. xxx. 3.)

And do thou worthily in Ephratah, and be famous in Bethlehem.] These two are but different names of the same place, where Boaz and Ruth also lived, who seems now to have been present, as Josephus represents her, and who they prayed might be a great example of all virtue in that city.

Ver. 12. And let thy house be like the house of Pharez (whom Tamar bare unto Judah), of the seed which the Lord shall give thee of this young woman.] Both Boaz, and all the Beth-lehemites, derived their original from Pharez, whose family was very illustrious in Israel; and therefore they could not have wished Boaz a greater blessing, than to have as noble an issue as he was to Judah.

Ver. 13. So Boaz took Ruth.] Carried her home to his own house, with all the solemnity, it is likely, which was usual in such cases.

And she was his wife.] And all other rites, which were observed in those days, being performed, they were completely made man and wife.

And when he went in unto her, the Lord gave her conception, and she bare a son.] A year after their marriage, as Josephus saith

Ver. 14. And the women said unto Naomi.] After Ruth's delivery.

Blessed be the Lord, who hath not left thee this day without a kinsman.] The Hebrew name of goel (which we translate kinsman) properly belonged to Boaz, and not to his son, who was now born: and yet the child seems to be here meant, which made the Arabic translator render it, hath not left thee without an heir, who being to succeed his father, what he had done might be ascribed to his son.

That his name may be famous in Israel.] They hoped God would make him an eminent person among them.

Ver. 15. And he shall be unto thee a restorer of thy life.] Such a comfort, as to make her, in some sort, young again.

And a nourisher of thine old age.] And in old age take care of her, and support her.

For thy daughter-in-law, which loveth thee, which is better to thee than seven sons, hath borne him.] For they hoped he would inherit his mother's virtues, and particularly her affection to Naomi, which was so surpassing, that it made her a greater blessing to her, than a great many sons of her own body would have been; for they would scarce have been able, out of so small a fortune, to maintain themselves; whereas this being the son of a rich father, could afford her also a plentiful maintenance.

Ver. 16. And Naomi took the child, and laid it in her own bosom, and became nurse unto it.] Brought it up with a most tender affection, for his mother gave him suck: and then Naomi took him from her, and educated him as her own child.

Ver. 17. And the women her neighbours gave it a name.] It did not belong to the neighbours, but to the father or mother, to name the child; but they advised Naomi to call it by a name suitable to their foregoing discourse. (See Luke i. 39, &c.)

Saying, There is a son born unto Naomi.] Unto whom they had promised such great comfort from this child, that it moved them to desire it might have the following name.

And they called his name Obed.] That is, one who should be very serviceable unto her; for Obed signifies δουλεύων, a servant, as Josephus interprets it. By which name, saith he, Naomi called the child κατὰ συμβουλίαν γυναικῶν, by the advice and counsel of the women, ἐπὶ γηροκομίᾳ αὐτῆς τραφησάμενον, as one appointed to take care of her in old age. The Targum thus paraphrases upon this name, Who served the Lord of the world with a perfect heart; a piece of which service consisted in giving due honour unto parents. Some make it a question, why this child was not called Mahlon, according to the law which seems to require it? But this hath been answered already, that what Boaz did, was not in obedience to the law in Deut. xxv. for he was not the brother of Mahlon (in which case the child must have borne Mahlon's name), but only a remote kinsman.

He is the father of Jesse, the father of David.] For whose sake this whole book seems to have been written, that it might be certainly known from whom he was descended, the Messiah being to spring from him; which is the reason why the following genealogy is annexed for the conclusion of this book.

Ver. 18. Now these are the generations of Pharez.] He begins no higher, because every one knew that Pharez was the grandson of Jacob, and he the son of Isaac, &c.

Pharez begat Hezron.] In the land of Canaan, before they went down into Egypt, as we read Gen. xlvi. 12.

Ver. 19. And Hezron begat Ram.] So he is called in 1 Chron. ii. 6. but in the New Testament, Aram, (Matt. i. 3. Luke iii. 33.)

And Ram begat Amminadab.] These two were born in the land of Egypt, where Amminadab also begat Nahshon.

Ver. 20. And Amminadab begat Nahshon.] Who was prince of the children of Judah, when they came out of Egypt, as the author of the book of Chronicles observes, (1 Chron. ii. 10.) which is confirmed by Moses, in his words, Numb. i. 7. vii. 12. x. 14. where we find, that, in the second year after their coming out of Egypt, he was the principal person in his tribe.

And Nahshon begat Salmon.] Who was born in the wilderness, in all probability, and was called also Salma, (1 Chron. ii. 11.)

Ver. 21. And Salmon begat Boaz.] Of Rahab, whom he took to be his wife after the taking of Jericho, (Matt. i. 5.)

And Boaz begat Obed.] Here the Targum makes Boaz the same with Ibzan, Judg. xii. 8. (which is altogether improbable), in whose days he saith the famine, spoken of in this book, happened; from which they were delivered by the prayers of Boaz.

Ver. 22. And Obed begat Jesse.] Who was also called Nahash, as some think, and is expressly affirmed by the Targum, because Zeruiah and Abigail are said to be David's sisters, 1 Chron. ii. 16. and Abigail is said to be the daughter of Nahash, 2 Sam. xvii. 25. But David's mother, perhaps, had a former husband, whose name was Nahash, by whom she had these daughters.

And Jesse begat David.] Unto whose time there being but four generations; and Salmon, the first of the four, married Rahab, after their entrance into Canaan; from thence, to the fourth year of king Solomon, there being four hundred and forty years, (as appears from 1 Kings vi. 2.) it must necessarily follow, that, unless we suppose some other coming between (for which we have no good warrant), these four persons, Salmon, Boaz, Obed, and Jesse, begat a child in their old age. And, indeed, Boaz supposes himself to be no young man, when he spake those words to Ruth, iii. 10. And Jesse was counted an old man, when David his son was a youth, (1 Sam. xvii. 12.) and therefore, that account which primate Usher hath given of this matter, in his Chronologia Sacra, par. i. cap. 12. seems very reasonable, that taking out of that number of four hundred and forty, the seventy years that David lived, and the four first years of Solomon's reign; then, from their coming into the land of Canaan, to the nativity of David, there remain three hundred sixty and six, as Aben Ezra observes in the conclusion of this book. Now these years may be thus commodiously distributed, if we suppose Rahab to have borne Boaz in the forty-second year after they entered Canaan; and if we assign a hundred and two years before he begat Obed; and a hundred and eleven to Obed, before he begat Jesse; and as many to Jesse before he begat David; which make the just sum of three hundred sixty and six. And this is nothing strange; for long after this time, we read of very old men who might be capable to beget children at the age now mentioned; particularly Jehoiada the high-priest, who lived a hundred and thirty years, (2 Chron. xxiv. 15.) And in our days, Thomas Parr lived a hundred and fifty-two years, and begat a child when he was a hundred and five years old, as the same primate there observes, and produces a great many other examples of persons who lived to a great age, very vigorous. And, if we could believe the Jewish doctors, they tell us in Juthasm, that Ruth lived to the time of Solomon, and sat with Bath-sheba, when he caused a seat to be set for her at his right hand, (1 Kings ii. 19.) I shall only add, that Bonfrerius hath largely confirmed this opinion of these persons begetting the children here mentioned in their old age, and confuted those who explain this otherways, by supposing three Boazes, and other devices, in his commentary upon the first verse of this book. Only he (and Serrarius, also, who before him was of the same mind) has made a different distribution of the three hundred sixty-six years beforementioned, by supposing other years of their age, wherein these four persons begat their sons; which is not at all material.

I shall end all with the Targum's paraphrase on the last words of this book; which are, Jesse begat David king of Israel. Which some Latin copies following, from thence Cardinal Cajetan concludes, this book was written not only after the birth of David, but after he was made king of Israel; that is, after he was anointed by Samuel to be king of Israel.

THE

FIRST BOOK OF SAMUEL.

THE two books which bear the name of SAMUEL, are thought by the Talmudists, in Bava Bathra, to have been composed, in part, by himself (that is, the first twenty-four chapters of the first book), and the rest by Gad and Nathan the prophets. And so Procopius Gazæus saith, that this book is called by the Syrians the Prophecy of Samuel. This opinion the Talmudists found upon the 1 Chron. xxix. 29. where it is said, "Now the acts of David, first and last, behold, they are written in the book of Samuel the seer, and in the book of Nathan the prophet, and in the book of Gad the seer." By which words it is evident, that Samuel did write a book, and that it contained some of the acts of David, which, it is very probable, are these that we read in this book. Besides which there were two other books, written by two other prophets, who continued his history to the end of his life. It must be confessed, indeed, that three distinct books are mentioned in that place of the Chronicles; and we cannot be sure that we have in those two books all that was contained in those three; but only an extract of the substance of them, which perhaps might be made by some following prophet, and divided into two books, which were called by the name of Samuel, because he was the most eminent person of the three, and his acts are here recorded in the first place. Certain it is, this work was extant before the book of the Kings was written; for mention is there made, of what we read in this history, 1 Kings ii. 27. And in the book of the Chronicles several things are repeated, which we find here, in the very same words. It is highly probable, also, that Samuel having undertaken to write the history of the Judges (to which as an appendix he added the book of Ruth), would not leave it imperfect; but added in this book what concerned Eli and himself; who were the last judges of that nation.

See the preface to the book of Judges.

CHAP. I.

Ver. 1. NOW there was a certain man of Ramathaim-zophim.] Either he was born at this place, or lived there (perhaps both), which is called Ramah, ver. 19. of this chapter; and here Ramathaim (in the dual number, as the grammarians speak), because it was built upon two hills, which made it appear like a double city. The title of Zophim seems to be added to it, because it being a high place, there was a watch-tower in it: where, upon occasion, men were set to observe who approached from all parts round about. Or, as St. Jerome, and others think, because here was a school of the prophets, who were wont to seat themselves in such places as were remote from company, and fit for contemplation; which made Elijah and Elisha frequent Mount Carmel. And thus the Chaldee paraphrase translates these words, There was a man of Ramathaim, a disciple of the prophets. Who in the book of Ezekiel are called watchmen: and from hence some think came the Greek word Σοφός: which was the title of astronomers at the first, who from high places contemplated the stars.

Of Mount Ephraim.] This is added to distinguish this from other places, which had the name of Ramah, in other tribes; particularly in that of Benjamin, Josh. xviii. 25.

And his name was Elkanah, the son of Jeroham, the son of Elihu, the son of Tohu.] It appears by this genealogy, that Samuel was a Levite, of the family of the Kohathites; as we read 1 Chron. vi. 33, 34, &c. See Mr. Selden, in his book de Succession. in Pontif. lib. i. cap. 18. where he confutes those who fancy Samuel was a priest, yea, the high-priest, as Petavius himself imagined.

The son of Zuph, an Ephrathite.] Ephrata is the same with Beth-lehem, which was in the tribe of Judah. Therefore Zuph is not called an Ephrathite, because he was descended from the Beth-lehemites (for he was a Levite), but because he dwelt in that place; as the Levites were dispersed through all the tribes. So Mr. Selden there speaks (from the Hebrew doctors, and the Targum), "Domicilii ratione, non sanguinis;" he is called an Ephrathite, on the account of his habitation, not of his blood.

Ver. 2. And he had two wives; the name of the one was Hannah, and the name of the other Peninnah, &c.] Hannah seems to have been his first wife, who proving barren, his earnest desire of children moved him to take another, as Abraham had by Sarah's consent; which was not in those times disallowed by God; who saith himself, that he had given to David many wives, (2 Sam. xii. 8.) which shews it was not then a sin in them to have more than one. (See Grotius, in his book de Jure Belli et Pacis, lib. ii. cap. 5. sect. 9, 10.)

Ver. 3. And the man went up out of his city.] For though Ramah stood high, yet Shiloh stood higher: and he first went down the hill from Ramah, before he could go up to the other.

Yearly to worship, and to sacrifice to the Lord of hosts in Shiloh.] Where the tabernacle now was, and where all sacrifices were to be offered, and no where else. Hither all the people were bound to resort, at the three great festivals, (Deut. xvi. 16.) and not to appear before the Lord empty. Accordingly Elkanah not only worshipped God, with prayers and thanksgivings, but offered such sacrifices as were suitable to the festival: and it is likely presented other gifts, according to his ability, as is there required, ver. 17.

And the two sons of Eli, Hophni and Phinehas, the priests of the Lord, were there.] Ready to offer such sacrifices as were brought to the altar. Whose service Elkanah did not refuse to use, because they were notoriously profane; but reverenced their office, as still priests of the Lord, from whose impure hands he vouchsafed to accept the offerings of pious people.

Ver. 4. And when the time was that Elkanah offered.] His peace-offerings, which were wont to accompany others at the great festivals. For instance, at the Passover, they offered not only the paschal lamb, but several other sacrifices, as I noted upon Deut. xvi. 7; all the seven days of unleavened bread having peculiar sacrifices belonging to them. (See Numb. xxviii.) And so there were on the seven days of the feast of tabernacles, (Numb. xxix.) Now, on some of these days, Elkanah offered such sacrifices as might make a feast for his family and friends, according to the law, Deut. xii. 12.

He gave to Peninnah his wife, and to all his sons and daughters.] The males only were bound to appear before God at these festivals; but devout persons were wont to bring their wives also with them, and their daughters as well as sons; especially when they dwelt so near the house of God as Elkanah did, whose habitation at Ramah was not above seven miles from Shiloh. It doth not appear that there was any peculiar court at the tabernacle (as there was afterward at the temple) for the women to worship in by themselves; but they came in with their husbands, and performed their duty close to them.

Portions.] Of that part of the peace-offerings which belonged to him that offered them. Which was the whole, except the fat which belonged to the Lord, and the breast and right shoulder which belonged to the priest. (Lev. vii. 34.) With the rest the sacrificer made a feast for himself, his family, and friends; giving to every one a portion of the sacrifice; whereby they had communion with the Lord, by partaking with him of his sacrifice, which had been offered to him at his altar.

Ver. 5. But to Hannah he gave a worthy portion.] Or a double portion; in token of his extraordinary respect and kindness to her.

For he loved Hannah: but the Lord had shut up her womb.] Or, though the Lord, &c. Her barrenness did not make him love her less, but rather more; because he would support and comfort her under that affliction.

Ver. 6. And her adversary also provoked her sore, to make her fret, because the Lord had shut up her womb.] It added to her affliction, that Peninnah set herself against her; and was wont to twit her with her barrenness, saying, when her husband sent her a more liberal portion of the holy things than she received, Though he be so kind to you, yet you bring him no children, as I do; which gave her great vexation.

Ver. 7. And as he did so year by year, when she went up to the house of the Lord, so she provoked her.] She constantly took this occasion to upbraid her with her barrenness, when her husband expressed such extraordinary kindness to her.

Therefore she wept, and did not eat.] Her grief was so great, that it made her turn the festival into a fast. So Tertullian understands it, who (in his book de Jejuniis, cap. 7.) saith, God rewarded her fasting and prayers with what she desired, vouchsafing, "inanem cibo ventrem filio implere, et quidem propheta;" to fill her belly empty of meat with a son, and he a prophet.

Ver. 8. Then said Elkanah her husband to her, Hannah, why weepest thou? and why eatest thou not? and why is thy heart grieved? am not I better to thee than ten sons?] In him we have an example of a most excellent husband, who patiently tolerated the insolent humour of Peninnah, and comforted dejected Hannah with words full of tender affection. Which was truly, in St. Peter's language, to dwell with his wives, κατὰ γνῶσιν, according to knowledge, as Victorinus Strigelius here observes. We cannot from the last words of this verse conclude (as some of the Hebrew doctors do) that Peninnah had ten sons (which was not such a pleasure to her as the affection he had for Hannah would have been), for they may signify, according to the common language of holy Scripture, only a great many sons.

Ver. 9. And Hannah rose up after they had eaten in Shiloh, and after they had drunk.] The kind words of Elkanah seem to have persuaded her to eat and drink cheerfully. In whom we have an example of an excellent wife; who, sensible of her husband's kindness, endeavoured to please him by complying with his desires, and avoiding all things that might be grievous to him.

Now Eli the priest.] He was both the high-priest and also the judge at this time of the Israelites, being born in the end of Gideon's judicature, and died in the middle of the Philistines' tyranny over the Israelites, twenty years before the great victory Samuel got over them at Eben-ezer, as Sir John Marsham computes, who rightly observes, that whensoever his judicature began (which is not recorded) it consisted only in hearing and judging causes by his pontifical authority. For he wrought no deliverance for Israel that we read of: but was such a judge as Samuel's sons were, (viii. 1.) and as Samuel himself was after Saul began to reign. When all the days of his life he continued to go about the country and do justice, which he administered also when he came home at his own house, (vii. 15. 17.)

Sat upon a seat by a post.] The Hebrew word is upon a throne; it being a seat raised up to some height to make him conspicuous to all that entered into the house of God, where he sat at the door of it. The Jews, in Seder Olam, and in Jalkut, have a conceit that Eli was this very day, when Hannah came to pray, made judge of Israel: so that from hence they date the beginning of his judicature. But this is a weak conjecture, built merely on this phrase, sat on his seat. Where, as Abarbinel observes, he sat as the high-priest, and not as a judge. And this was no new thing, but according to custom, that he might preserve good order there; give his advice to those who had occasion to consult him; resolve their doubts, and give them his blessing. And he thinks that Samuel was born ten years or more before the judicature of Eli.

In the temple of the Lord.] It is not unusual to call the tabernacle by the name of a temple: as the temple, when it was built, is called a tabernacle. (See Jer. x. 20. Lament. ii. 6.) Yet the Talmudists, from the Hebrew word hachil (which is here used), say, that when the tabernacle was removed from Gilgal to Shiloh, the sides of it were built of stone, and covered at the top with curtains, having no solid roof. And from hence they fancy it is called beth, the house of the Lord, (ver. 24.) which Maimonides interprets a house of stone. But there is no certainty of this: for such words as these have a larger sense. And indeed we are taught as much by the 1 Kings iii. 2. where it is expressly said, that there was no house built unto the name of the Lord, until the days of Solomon: and 2 Sam. vii. 6. where Nathan speaks in God's name to David, in these words, " I have not dwelt in a house since I came out of Egypt." (See L'Empereur, in his preface to Codex Middoth.)

From the first words of this verse, it appears that Hannah rose up to go to the temple at the time of the evening sacrifice, for it was after they had dined.

Ver. 10. And she was in bitterness of soul, and prayed unto the Lord, and wept sore.] Her grief returned when she was alone, and thought of her barrenness; which made her pray with great vehemence, and many tears, for a child.

Ver. 11. And she vowed a vow.] As was usual, when they earnestly longed to obtain what they sought with prayers and tears.

And said, O Lord, if thou wilt indeed look upon the afflictions of thy handmaid, and remember me, and not forget thy handmaid.] These are three various expressions of the same thing: whereby she declares, though with great humility, how much she was concerned, to obtain her request, of being delivered from her barrenness: for that is the meaning of looking upon her affliction, and remembering her. (See Gen. viii. 1. Exod. iii. 7. 16.)

But wilt give unto thy handmaid a man-child.] She thrice calls herself his handmaid, out of a profound sense of her meanness and his majesty: and desires a man-child, because only such could wait upon the Lord in the service of the tabernacle; as she intended her son should do, if God bestowed one upon her.

Then will I give unto the Lord all the days of his life.] The Levites were not bound to serve at the tabernacle until they were twenty-five years old; and not after they were fifty: but she devoted him to the ministry there from his childhood, as long as he lived.

And there shall no razor come upon his head.] She vowed he should be a Nazarite; part of whose description this is, (Numb. vi. 5.) And so the best of the Jewish doctors interpret it; for the exposition of the Chaldee paraphrast is very forced: but from hence the opinion of the Talmudists is confuted, who say, (in the Mischna, in the title Sota, cap. 3.) that a man might devote his child to be a Nazarite before he was of age; but a woman could not. Nor doth any of them take notice of this example of Hannah; which hath made some think, that possibly they looked upon this as done by an extraordinary motion, and therefore not to be a rule to others; especially since she did it before her child was born. (See J. Wagenseil, in his learned notes upon that book, p. 448.)

Ver. 12. And it came to pass, that as she continued praying before the Lord, that Eli marked her mouth.] The inward anguish of her soul, it is probable, made the motions of her mouth and her countenance very different from what is usual.

Ver. 13. Now Hannah, she spake in her heart; only her lips moved, but her voice was not heard; therefore Eli thought she had been drunk.] Hearing her say nothing, but only seeing her lips move a long time; with such gestures, it is likely, of her body, hands, and eyes, as argued a very great commotion; he took her to be disordered with the wine she had drunk liberally at the forenamed feast. For it is apt to make one talk much, and the great agony wherein she was might something distort her face.

Ver. 14. And Eli said unto her, How long wilt thou be drunken? Put away thy wine from thee.] He seems to bid her go to bed and sleep; and then come and pray to God.

Ver. 15. And Hannah answered and said, No, my lord; I am a woman of a sorrowful spirit: and have drunk neither wine nor strong drink.] Of the difference between wine and strong drink, see Numb. vi. 3. 5. Great affliction of spirit makes one distaste meat and drink

But have poured out my soul before the Lord.] An usual expression for sincere and fervent prayer.

Ver. 16. Account not thy handmaid for a daughter of Belial.] This is a phrase signifying the most lewd persons, that regarded neither God nor men. (See Deut. xiii. 13.)

For out of the abundance of my complaint and grief have I spoken hitherto.] The accusation against her being very foul, she purgeth herself from it very earnestly; but in a modest manner, and with due respect to the office which Eli held in the church.

Ver. 17. And Eli answered and said, Go in peace: and the God of heaven grant thee thy petition that thou hast asked of him.] Her sober and respectful answer convinced the old man of his error; and moved him to dismiss her with his blessing, and a solemn prayer to God that he would grant her request.

Ver. 18. And she said, Let thy handmaid find grace in thy sight.] For which she returned him most humble thanks, and desired the continuance of his prayers.

So the woman went her way, and did eat, and her countenance was no more sad.] She departed from the temple with such satisfaction and assurance her own prayers and his would be heard, that there remained no more any token of sorrow and grief; but she ate her meat, and looked cheerfully.

Ver. 19. And they rose up in the morning early, and worshipped before the Lord, and returned, and came to their house in Ramah.] I suppose she acquainted Elkanah with her prayer and with Eli's blessing: and it is likely that he now made a solemn vow to God if he would be pleased to fulfil her petition. (See ver. 21.)

And Elkanah knew Hannah his wife; and the Lord remembered her.] According to her prayer, (ver. 11.)

Ver. 20. And it came to pass, when the time was come about, after Hannah conceived.] The usual time that women go with child before they be delivered.

That she bare a son, and called his name Samuel.] Sometimes fathers, and sometimes mothers, gave the name to their children. (See upon Gen. iv. 26.)

Saying, Because I have asked him of the Lord.] This was the reason of his name: which she gave him, that he as well as she might keep in mind the interest God had in him; from whom she obtained him by ardent prayers. For Saulmeel (which is contracted into Samuel) signifies asked of God, as we translate this word in the margin of our Bibles. He was born (as Sir John Marsham computes with great probability) in the time when the Philistines domineered over Israel for forty years together, (see Judges x. 7. xiii. 1.) but in what year cannot certainly be determined.

Ver. 21. And the man Elkanah, and all his house, went up to offer unto the Lord the yearly sacrifice.] At the feast of the Passover, or some other of the three great festivals. He is a great example of piety; who carried his whole family to worship God with him at those solemn times which the law enjoined.

And his vow.] Which it is likely he made, either when he saw his wife was with child, or, perhaps, before, when she told him what hope she had her prayer would be heard, and he worshipped God, (ver. 19.)

Ver. 22. But Hannah went not up; for she said unto her husband, I will not go up till the child be weaned, and then I will bring him, that he may appear before the Lord, and there abide for ever.] She was not bound by the law to go up with her husband: and, therefore, though she was wont to go, she resolved, as became a prudent woman, to stay at home till the child was strong enough, not only to accompany her, but to be left at the house of the Lord, and be capable of being instructed in the service of God.

Ver. 23. And Elkanah her husband said unto her, Do what seemeth thee good: tarry until thou hast weaned him.] Interpreters here note the sweet agreement that ought to be (according to the example of this happy couple) between husband and wife.

Only the Lord establish his word.] We do not read of any thing the Lord had spoken about this child: unless Elkanah looked upon what Eli had said as spoken by God, because he was God's high-priest. Or the Hebrew words may be translated, the Lord establish his work; i. e. perfect what he hath begun, by making the child grow till he was fit for his service. For the word dabar signifies any matter or thing as well as word.

So the woman abode.] At home.

And gave the child suck till she weaned him.] She herself was his nurse, and suckled him, after the example of Sarah. (See upon Gen. xxi. 7.) And, it is likely, continued to do so (out of her great affection to him) several years. Some think three; but it is not improbable six or seven, as Lyra conjectures. And so long I remember one to have sucked, in the place where I was born.

Ver. 24. And when she had weaned him, she took him up with her, with three bullocks, and one ephah of flour, and a bottle of wine.] As they were not to appear before the Lord empty; so, upon this occasion, they brought an ample offering to him; to testify their gratitude to the Divine Majesty. And it is highly probable, that one of these bullocks was wholly offered to God as a burnt-offering, and the other two were peace-offerings; or, as some will have it, one a sin-offering, and the other a peace-offering. Which had a large measure of flour for a meat-offering, and of wine also attending it; that they might rejoice together before the Lord, when they feasted with him upon the peace-offering.

And brought him unto the house of the Lord in Shiloh: and the child was young.] In the Hebrew the words are, hanaar-naar, the child was a child, i. e. wholly at their disposal.

Ver. 25. And they slew the bullock, and brought the child to Eli.] They first performed their duty to God, by offering a whole burnt-offering to him; reserving the rest, I suppose, till they had acquainted Eli with God's goodness to them, that they might all rejoice together.

Ver. 26. And she said, Oh, my lord! as thy soul liveth, my lord, I am the woman that stood by thee here, praying unto the Lord.] Many take these words, as thy soul liveth, for an oath; whereby she assures him, that, as certain as he was alive, she was the person whom he saw in that place praying, and took for a distempered woman. But others (particularly D. Kimchi) think there is nothing of an oath in them, they being only a form of well-wishing to him; as if she said, I wish thee a long life, that thou mayest educate my son.

Ver. 27. For this child I prayed; and the Lord hath given me my petition which I asked of him.] She had told him nothing of what she prayed for, when he reproved her, but only in general, that she was extremely afflicted for want of something, which she earnestly begged of God. But now she acquaints him with it, and with her vow she made, if God granted her desire; which she was now come to accomplish.

Ver. 28. And therefore also I have lent him unto the Lord.] Or, restored him to the Lord (as the Targum expounds it), from whose gift she received him.

As long as he liveth he shall be lent unto the Lord.] Or, as the words may be translated, all the days that he shall be desired for the Lord. That is, as long as God should think fit to employ him in his own house; which was till he made him a judge, (vii. 15.) Then he was not fixed at Shiloh, but went about the country to Beth-el, and Gilgal, and Mizpeh; and then settled at his own house in Ramah, as we read there, ver. 17.

And he worshipped the Lord there.] This shews that Elkanah was with Hannah, and gave his consent to this dedication of their child, to such service as God should think fit to employ him in: which he humbly prayed God to accept.

CHAP. II.

Ver. 1. AND Hannah prayed, and said.] Hymns are wont to be comprehended under the name of prayers, (Psal. lxxi. 20.) to the composition of which holy souls were sometimes raised by Divine inspiration, in their devout meditations upon the extraordinary goodness of God to them. And, indeed, it was the most ancient way, as I have observed heretofore, of preserving the memory of things to posterity: poets being more ancient than historians, or orators, as Lactantius observes, lib. vii. Div. Instit. cap. 23. Nor were the western people less famous for this than the eastern: the Germans, for instance, having their most ancient annals in verse; as Hermannus Conringius hath shewn out of a great many authors, in his preface to Corn. Tacitus, de Germanorum Moribus.

My heart rejoiceth in the Lord.] She was acted by the same spirit which moved St. James to give this direction, chap. v. ver. 13. "Is any afflicted, let him pray, (as she did, i. 10.) is any merry, let him sing psalms," as she now doth: for she was lately extremely sad and sorrowful, and could not eat: but now, by the goodness of God, is filled with joy; which made her burst out into this thanksgiving.

My horn is exalted in the Lord.] She who was bowed down and dejected, now lifts up her head and triumphs: for exalting the horn signifies the height of glory.

My mouth is enlarged over my enemy.] She was now furnished with a full answer to Peninnah, who upbraided her with her sterility.

Because I rejoice in thy salvation.] All this joy and triumph arose from the goodness of God to her; who had delivered her from the reproach of barrenness: which raised her, as appears by the sequel, to the expectation of far greater things.

Ver. 2. There is none holy as the Lord.] The holiness of God signifies his peerless perfections; as Mr. Mede hath shewn in many parts of his works. (See p. 11.)

For there is none besides thee.] Which perfections are peculiar to himself: for though the Scripture vouchsafeth sometimes unto the gentile demons the name of gods, yet it never calls them holy ones.

Neither is there any rock like our Rock.] See upon Deut. xxxii. 31.

Ver. 3. Talk no more so exceeding proudly.] This was good advice to Peninnah, and such-like persons; not to insult over others who are not so happy as themselves.

Let not arrogance come out of your mouth.] Or, as the Targum interprets it, forbear reproaches. For so the Hebrew word atat signifies, hard words.

For the Lord is a God of knowledge.] None knows what he intends, who perhaps will exalt those who are now abased. Or, he knows how to bring to pass such things as men think to be impossible.

And by him acts are weighed.] Or, by him works are prepared: even when there is no disposition in nature to them.

Ver. 4. The bows of the mighty men are broken, and they that stumbled are girt with strength.] Now the great sense she had of God's power branches out itself into an humble acknowledgment of this glorious attribute, in divers instances. And, first, in vanquishing the most victorious: for bows were a principal part of warriors' weapons, (Psal. xliv. 6.) and their girdles being a principal part of the military habit, is elegantly translated to signify strength and warlike prowess. Whence Virgil calls feeble persons unmeet for war, discinctos, ungirt, as Servius observes. (See Bochart, in Canaan, lib. ii. cap. 13.) Whence the apostle, among the spiritual armour, exhorts the Ephesians to be girt about with truth, (Ephes. vi.) For to gird and to arm, to be girt and to be armed, are the same thing in Greek and Latin authors. (See also Psal. xviii. 39. lxv. 6.)

Ver. 5. They that were full have hired themselves for bread; and they that were hungry ceased.] To complain of hunger. This vicissitude of human affairs, especially the sudden turns there are sometimes, from a great height of prosperity to a very low condition, and on the contrary, are very wonderful, and seriously to be pondered; that no man may be proud, nor any man despair. The instances of these in history are to be found in a great many authors, besides what our own experience may furnish us withal.

So that the barren hath born seven.] That is, many children. She reflects upon the great change which God had made in her own condition. And Procopius Gazæus notes, that here, "Hymno prophetiam admiscet;" she mingles prophecy with her hymn of praise, and foretells the fecundity of the church: for the number seven denotes a multitude.

And she that hath many children is waxen feeble.] The Jews fancy, that every time Hannah bare a child, two of Peninnah's children died. But this seems rather to have a general respect to those that have been fertile, and grow barren when God pleaseth.

Ver. 6. The Lord killeth, and maketh alive; he bringeth down to the grave, and bringeth up.] The same thing is repeated in different words; and the sense is, the power of life and death is in the hands of God: whom he pleases he takes out of the world, and whom he pleases he continues in it; raising men up even from the grave, when they were dropping into it. (See Deut. xxxii. 39. Psal. xxx. 3.)

Ver. 7. The Lord maketh poor, and maketh rich; he bringeth low, and raiseth up.] She acknowledgeth the power and wisdom of God, in making men of different eruditions; some poor, and others rich; yea, in making the same men who were very poor to become very rich; and they who were mean and contemptible become great and eminent. Theodoret treats excellently of the wise providence of God, in not making men all alike; but some of a lower, some of a higher rank: Oration vi. against the heathens.

Ver. 8. He raiseth the poor out of the dust, and lifteth up the beggar from the dunghill; to set them among princes, and to make them inherit the throne of glory.] Instances of this kind in the Holy Scriptures are Joseph and Daniel; the one a prisoner, the other a captive: but preferred to the highest dignity, by the kings of Egypt and Babylon. And in these later ages, Victorinus Strigelius observes a memorable instance of the truth of these words, in Matthias Corvinus, king of Hungary; who was brought out of prison, and set on the throne, not by sedition, nor by civil war; but by the unanimous consent of all the estates of the realm, in grateful memory of the benefits they had received by his father, the great Hunniades.

For the pillars of the earth are the Lord's, and he hath set the world upon them.] These words contain the reason of all that precedes in the five foregoing verses: for the very earth being founded, upheld, and supported by the Lord, no wonder that all the inhabitants of it are in his power, to dispose of them as he thinks good.

Ver. 9. He will keep the feet of his saints, and the wicked shall be silent in darkness.] Pious affections in those days rose up, many times, to the height of prophecy: whereby God continued in that nation his true religion, in the midst of their idolatrous inclinations. Accordingly, here Hannah begins to predict the deliverances of the Israelites (who were God's holy ones, or saints, by being peculiarly separated to him and his service) from the hand of the Philistines, and other enemies: who she prophesies should stumble and fall, as men do in the dark, when the Israelites, by God's direction, succeeded in their enterprises.

For by strength shall no man prevail.] As appeared afterward in Goliath.

Ver. 10. The adversaries of the Lord shall be broken in pieces; out of heaven shall he thunder upon them.] As he did literally when Samuel fought with the Philistines, (vii. 10.) and when David also vanquished them, (Psal. xviii. 13.) Procopius Gazæus applies this to the assumption of Christ, with the mission of the Holy Ghost, and the happy success of the apostles' preaching, and to Christ's second coming.

The Lord shall judge the ends of the earth.] As he did when he subdued the Philistines, who lived in the extremity of the country of Judea westward: and now sorely oppressed the Israelites.

And he shall give strength unto his King.] That is, to David. Of whom she prophesies; who was most properly God's king, whom he appointed in the room of Saul; who by his disobedience forfeited his kingdom and was rejected by God.

And exalt the horn of his Anointed.] God commanded Saul to be anointed by Samuel, x. 1. but it was upon condition, which he not fulfilling, the same person was commanded to anoint David, xv. 29. xvi. 1. Upon which the Spirit of the Lord departed from Saul and rested on David, xvi. 13, 14. Whom God so wonderfully protected, that all the subtlety and power of Saul could not destroy him: and when he came to the throne, God wonderfully exalted him, as she here speaks: by enlarging his dominion very far, and making him such a glorious prince (higher than the kings of the earth), that he was the most eminent type of the great King of all, our Lord Christ, to whom these words in the fullest sense belong. "For who doth not see, (saith St. Austin, in his seventeenth book, de Civitate Dei, cap. 4.) that the spirit of this woman (whose name was Anna, which signifies grace) prophesied of the Christian religion, the city of God, whose king and founder is Christ; and of the grace of God, from which the proud are estranged, that they may fall; but the humble are filled with it, that they may rise:" which is the chief import of this hymn. And, indeed, this is the first time that the name of Messiah (or Anointed) is found in Scripture: there being no such word in all the foregoing books of Moses, Joshua, the Judges, or Ruth. And therefore it is the more to be remarked: this prophetess being the first that mentions the Messiah, in this song: with which the song of the blessed Virgin hath such a perfect resemblance, that one cannot but think Hannah had a respect to something higher than the quarrel between her and Peninnah, and the son which God had given her, or the great acts of David: for the words are too magnificent to be confined to so low a sense. And therefore Kimchi upon these words ingenuously acknowledges the King here mentioned is the Messiah, of whom Hannah spake either by prophecy or tradition. For there was a tradition among them, that there should a great King arise in Israel: and she seals up this song, with the mention of that King, who should save them from all their enemies.

It may be thus paraphrased:

1. Great is the goodness of God to me, which makes my heart leap for joy; great is the honour he hath done me: so that my mouth, which had nothing to answer when my enemy upbraided me, now boasts of the favour of God to me, who to my exceeding great joy hath bestowed a son upon me.

2. For the Lord is incomparable in all perfections, which none have but himself alone: whose excellences are so transcendent, that there is none in whom we can find so secure a sanctuary in all our troubles as we have in him.

3. Do not vaunt and brag therefore any more on this fashion, nor speak contemptuously of others: for as nothing can be hid from him, so he knows how to bring to pass the strangest things: nor can any man hinder it (let their pride, and confidence, and power, be ever so great), but his counsel shall stand.

4. The strength of armed forces is good for nothing, if not prospered by him: who brings down those who were mighty conquerors; and advances those who were their miserable slaves.

5. The rich have been seen to fall into such decay, as to want their necessary food: and poor starved wretches have come to great plenty. As likewise barren women, as I, have had a numerous offspring, and they that had many children lost them all.

6. No man can keep himself alive when God calls him away from hence: and he unexpectedly restores men to life, when they were in the very jaws of death.

7. It is according as he orders, that some men are rich, others poor: and the very same men who now are in a low condition, he raises up to greatness and splendour; and, on the contrary, abaseth those that walk in pride.

8. They that are in the most sordid plight he advances, when he pleases, to the most glorious state: for what can hinder him from shaking the very foundations of the earth, and overturning all things, which are upheld and supported only by his almighty power?

9. The best way therefore is, by piety, to secure the favour of God; who, by preserving all his faithful servants from falling, will fill their mouths with his praises: but confound the wicked, who now boast themselves, when with amazement they are thrown down into a miserable condition. For let not any man be so vain as to imagine, that by his strength he can maintain himself in his high station; or keep down good men from rising up to glory.

10. They that oppose God shall be broken in pieces; he will strike a terror into them, and make them fall flat before him. For it is he that is the Judge of the world; and there is no corner of it where men can hide themselves from his sentence. He will advance the king whom he shall choose, even the Lord Christ; and make him great in spite of all opposers: who shall not be able to hinder his exaltation, or the growth and increase of his kingdom.—

Ver. 11. And Elkanah went to Ramah to his house.] When the festival was ended.

And the child did minister unto the Lord.] As soon as he was capable.

Before Eli the priest.] According as he appointed him.

Ver. 12. Now the sons of Eli were sons of Belial.] Very wicked men, (see Deut. xiii. 13.) being impious, covetous, guilty of violence, and filthy lusts.

They knew not the Lord.] They were not professed atheists; but they minded not the Divine service, nor took any care to do God honour; being ignorant (as Kimchi expounds it) of his law.

Ver. 13. And the priest's custom was, when any man offered sacrifice.] Brought his peace-offerings to be offered at the altar.

That the priest's servant came, while the flesh was seething, with a flesh-hook of three teeth in his hand.] The person who brought the peace-offerings having the largest share in these sacrifices, there were certain rooms, when the temple was built, both in the court of the women, and of the men, wherein they had liberty to boil the flesh, in order to feast with God at his own house: which Christians afterward imitated in their feasts of charity. The like rooms there were at the tabernacle, in the outward court of it. (See L'Empereur, in his Annot. upon Codex Middoth, cap. 2. sect. 6. p. 80, 81.)

Ver. 14. And he struck it into the pan, or kettle, or cauldron, or pot.] There were several sorts of vessels for this use; according as the flesh to be boiled was little or much.

All that the flesh-hook brought up the priest took for himself.] This was a new custom, which they profanely introduced: for, not content with the right shoulder and the breast, which were theirs by the law, (Lev. vii. 32.) they would take what they pleased of the rest, that belonged to the people: at least, so much as a fork with three teeth brought up, when they struck it into the pot where the flesh was boiling.

So they did in Shiloh, unto all the Israelites that came thither.] This aggravated their crime, that they made a constant practice of it: and did not only on some occasions commit such wickedness.

Ver. 15. And before they burnt the fat.] Which entirely belonged unto God, (Lev. ii. 16. vii. 23. 25.)

The priest's servant came, and said to the man that sacrificed, Give flesh to roast for the priest.] This was a high contempt of God, to demand their part before God had his. For the noblest guests at feasts were always served first.

For he will not have sodden flesh of thee, but raw.] The flesh-hook did not always bring up the best; therefore, as soon as the sacrifice was cut up, they came and took the choicest pieces.

Ver. 16. And if any man said unto him, Let them not fail to burn the fat presently, and then take as much as thy soul desireth: then he would answer, Nay; but thou shalt give it me now: if not, I will take it by force.] This argues the very height of imperious impiety, that such submissive language should not prevail with them to have so much respect to God, as to let him have his portion in the first place: though they offered the priest more than his share, after God was served. None knows to what pitch of wickedness a man may arrive, when once the sense of God is extinguished, and gone out of his mind.

Ver. 17. Wherefore the sin of the young men was very great before the Lord.] Having many grievous aggravations.

For men abhorred the offering of the Lord.] Nothing brings religion so much into the contempt of the people, as the open profaneness of those who are the ministers of it.

Ver. 18. But Samuel ministered before the Lord, being a child.] Though very young, yet he carefully performed such offices at the tabernacle as he was capable to discharge: and did not follow the bad example of his familiars and domestics, as we may suppose Hophni and Phinehas were.

Girded with a linen ephod.] We do not read any where of any peculiar garments appointed for the Levites in their ministration, but only for the priests; and this was none of them, as appears from Exod. xxviii. 40, 41. And therefore the ephod which the priests are said to wear in chap. xxii. of this book, ver. 18. were quite different from the ephod ordered in Exod. xxviii. for Aaron the high-priest alone: which had a curious girdle belonging to it, and the breast-plate with precious stones inseparable from it; and was wrought with gold, and blue, and purple, and scarlet, (Exod. xxviii. 6.) But the ephod which the priests, or any other persons are said to wear, is (for distinction's sake) always called ephod bad, an ephod made of fine linen: which was not a sacred but an honorary vestment (as I may call it), being a short garment hanging upon the shoulders down to the middle of the back, but without any girdle or curious work in it; which having some likeness to that of the high-priest's, was used by the inferior priests to make them more respected as special ministers of God; and by other great persons upon some solemn occasion, as David did, (2 Sam. vi. 24.) and Eli (seeing such a great appearance of God in him) ordered Samuel to do; though it was not a habit appertaining to the Levites, much less to him who was not of age, according to the exact rules of the law, to serve in the tabernacle. Thus Kimchi and Ralbag understand it. And the LXX. in 2 Sam. vi. 15. translate it στολὴν ἑξαλλον, an eximious garment. (See Jo. Braunius de Vest. Sacerd. lib. ii. cap. 6. p. 602.)

It seems no improbable conjecture of Fortunatus Scacchus, that from hence was derived the latus clavus among the Romans, which was a vestment proper to their senators and presidents. It was first brought from the Etruscans, by Tullus Hostilius, when he conquered them: whose ancient language agrees so much with the Hebrew, that one may well think they had many things from them. (See Myrothec. cap. iii. 43.)

Ver. 19. Moreover, his mother made him a little coat, and brought it to him from year to year, when she came up with her husband to offer the yearly sacrifice.] The ephod being used, I suppose, only in the service of God, it was provided at the public charge. But for his ordinary wearing, Hannah took care, at her charge, to provide him a coat, and other things, it is likely, suitable to it, that she might still express her piety in contributing to his maintenance at the house of God. And it is very probable, that this little coat was woven with her own hands; as the ancient tradition is, that Christ's seamless coat was woven by the blessed Virgin. And so in Joma the doctors say, (cap. 3.) that a priest might use a garment in his ministry, which was made by his mother. (See Braunius, lib. i. cap. 17.)

Ver. 20. And Eli blessed Elkanah and Hannah his wife, and said, The Lord give thee seed of this woman, for the loan which is lent unto the Lord.] He gave them this benediction by a Divine suggestion; and thereby verified what she uttered in her prophetical song, (ver. 5.)

And they went to their own home.] Their affection to their son did not make them stay there, and neglect their domestic affairs.

Ver. 21. And the Lord visited Hannah, so that she conceived, and bare three sons and two daughters.] None are losers by what they lend unto the Lord.

And the child Samuel grew before the Lord.] Not only in stature, but in wisdom also and virtue, (see ver. 26.) Of so great moment it is to season the minds of children early with a sense of God and of religion: which is likely to continue with them, and improve, as they grow in years.

Ver. 22. Now Eli was very old.] Which made him listless and unactive.

And heard all that his sons did unto all Israel.] Yet wanted not information of all the forementioned enormous practices of his sons.

And how they lay with the women that assembled.] Whose impiety and luxury proceeded so far, as to move them to debauch those women who came to worship God. Of the word assembled, see Exod. xxviii. 8. Unto which may be added, that the Hebrew word tzaba signifies not only a great many gathered together, but also a station: that is, stated times of attendance, which devout women observed for fasting and prayer. For that was their business at the temple; unto which they resorted at certain times for these ends.

At the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.] These words sound as if they committed this lewdness in the presence of all the people. But such beastiality would not have been suffered: and therefore this refers to their assembling at the door of the tabernacle: from whence they led them to some private room about the tabernacle (as there were many afterward about the temple), where they defiled them.

Ver. 23. And he said unto them, Why do you these things?] Beforementioned, ver. 14—16. 22.

For I hear of your evil doings by all this people.] Their wickedness was so notorious, that there was a general complaint of it; which should have moved him to greater severity, than merely to reprove and chide them with such gentleness and lenity, as these and the following words import. Which proceeded partly from the coldness of old age; partly from his too great indulgence to his children; and partly (as Corn. Bonavent. Bertram conjectures) from his being more intent upon the defence of their civil liberties, than the restoring ecclesiastical discipline.

Ver. 24. Nay, my sons; it is no good report that I hear: ye make the Lord's people to transgress.] By making them neglect and despise the service of God, (ver. 17.) and tempting them to lewdness, (ver. 22.) This is the language of a tender father, not of a zealous judge; who ought to have passed a public censure upon them, for their public crimes, by turning them out of their office, or some sharp punishment; which his office gave him authority and power to inflict upon such infamous offenders.

Ver. 25. If a man sin against another, the judge shall judge him; but if a man sin against the Lord, who shall entreat for him?] If one neighbour do an injury to another, the business may be composed by the judge; who, interposing his authority, either takes up the difference, or sees the person satisfied who was offended. But if one injure the judge himself (which was the present case), who shall take the confidence to speak in his behalf? Was it ever heard that any one interceded for a man to his prince, when he intended to kill the prince himself? Eli argued well; but he should not have referred their punishment unto God, when it was in his power to punish them himself.

Notwithstanding, they hearkened not unto the voice of their father; because the Lord would slay them.] The words may be rendered out of the Hebrew, But they would not hearken to the voice of their father; therefore the Lord resolved to slay them. But, according to our translation, the sense is right enough: for when men have long sinned grievously against many admonitions (which it may be supposed their father had given them), whereby they become incurable; God deprives them of that prudent consideration and discretion, which would save them from destruction. So Rasi upon these words, The sentence of judgment was already sealed against them.

Ver. 26. And the child Samuel grew on, and was in favour both with the Lord and with men.] The words in the Hebrew are, he went on, or grew great and tall, and was good, that is acceptable, both to God and men. The meaning is, he made a great progress in wisdom and goodness, as well as increased in stature: so that God was well pleased with him, and he was well esteemed by the people. The same is said of our Saviour, Luke ii. 52. where Theophylact thus glosses, Τουτέστι, καὶ τῷ Θεῷ εὐάρεστα ἔπραττε, καὶ τοῖς ἀνθρώποις ἐπαινετά; i. e. He did those things that were well-pleasing to God, and were praised by men.

Ver. 27. And there came a man of God unto Eli.] That is, a prophet, who was divinely inspired to deliver the following message to him. Some say this was Phinehas, others Elkanah; without any ground.

And said unto him, Thus saith the Lord.] This is the constant language of prophets.

Did I plainly appear.] In the Hebrew, manifestly reveal myself.

Unto the house of thy fathers.] Unto Aaron, who was the head of the family of priests. (See Exod. iv. 27.)

When they were in Egypt, in Pharaoh's house?] In miserable bondage. As much as to say, Have I conferred such favours upon you, and do you thus requite me? It is the way of the prophets, when they call men to repentance, to aggravate their sins by an enumeration of God's great benefits unto them. (See Isaiah i. 2, &c. and Micah vi. 3—5.)

Ver. 28. And did I choose him out of all the tribes of Israel to be my priest.] The highest dignity in the nation.

To offer upon mine altar, to burn incense, to wear an ephod before me?] These were the several parts of the priest's office: and the last contains the greatest of them all, which belonged only to the high-priest; who alone appeared before God to consult him by urim and thummim, when he wore the golden ephod, with the breast-plate annexed to it; for they were inseparable, (Exod. xxviii. 6. 12. 28.)

And did I give unto the house of thy father all the offerings made by fire of the children of Israel?] There were none of the sacrifices offered at the altar of which the priest had not some share, (see Numb. xviii. 8—10, &c.) For even of the burnt-offerings, which were wholly consumed on the altar, the skin was, by an express law, given to the priest, (Lev. vii. 8.)

Ver. 29. Wherefore kick ye at my sacrifice, and at my offerings, which I have commanded in my habitation.] As refractory oxen were wont to do, when they were pricked with a goad, to stir them up to work at the plough: which signifies the highest irreverence and contempt of God's authority. (See Bochart, in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 29. latter end.)

And honourest thy sons above me, &c.] By suffering them to continue in the priest's office, and profanely to feast themselves with the best of the sacrifices, before God was served.

Ver. 30. Wherefore the Lord God of Israel saith, I said, indeed, that thy house, and the house of thy father, should walk before me for ever: but now saith the Lord, Be it far from me.] God revokes the decree he had made in favour of him and his family, of being high-priests throughout all generations. Which office was first settled upon Eleazar, the eldest son of Aaron, and upon his posterity; for the very same promise is made to Phinehas the son of Eleazar, (Numb. xxv. 15.) which is here said to be made to Eli, who was descended from Ithamar, the youngest son of Aaron: unto whom the high-priesthood was translated from the family of Eleazar, for some sin or other: as now it was resolved it should be translated back again from the family of Ithamar, to that of Eleazar; because of the horrid sins of the sons of Eli. For what cause Phinehas, or his posterity (for there are various opinions about the time), lost the priesthood, and how they recovered it in the time of David, see Mr. Selden, lib. i. de Success. ad Pontificat. cap. 2, 3. and Constant. L'Empereur, in his annot. on Bertram de Repub. Jud. p. 411. Some think, that after Phinehas, those three persons mentioned in 1 Chron. vi. 50, 51. Abishua, Bukki, and Uzzi, succeeded in the priesthood; and then came in Eli: but of this there is no certainty. Procopius Gazæus here observes, that this verse, "Latenter totius Judaici sacerdotii finem innuit;" doth secretly intimate the abolishing of the whole Jewish priesthood. For this promise, saith he, Thy house, and the house of thy father, shall walk before me for ever, was not made to Ithamar, but to Aaron; and, therefore, he shews here what should befal the whole tribe. Such conditional decrees are frequent in Scripture; particularly in Jer. xviii. 7—10.

For he that honoureth me I will honour, and he that despiseth me shall be lightly esteemed.] A remarkable instance of which we have in the records of the Christian church: for Eusebius tells us, in the time of that persecution which he mentions in the eighth book of his Ecclesiastical History, some of the pastors of the church, who had not governed the flock of Christ as they ought to have done, were condemned to be keepers of camels, and of the Emperor's horses (a punishment among the Romans in those days, as Valesius observes), ἡ θεία κατακρίνασα δίκη, &c. The Divine justice judging them worthy of no better employment. (Cap. 12. de Martyribus Palestinæ.)

Ver. 31. Behold, the days come, that I will cut off the arm of thy father's house.] Our arm being the instrument whereby we perform all things; this threatening signifies, that not long hence God would utterly take away all power and authority from him, and from his family; both as he was a priest, and as he was a judge.

That there shall not be an old man in thy house.] But his posterity should die, as it follows, (ver. 33.) in the flower of their age, which was accounted a great judgment in that nation. So Manasseh ben Israel, who observes, in his book de Termino Vitæ, p. 87. that the Gemara upon Jebamoth mentions a certain family in Jerusalem, none of which commonly lived above eighteen years. Of which they inquiring the reason of R. Johanan ben Zachæi, he bade them search, if they were not of the family of Eli, upon which God had passed this sentence, that they should die in the flower of their age: and it was discovered that they sprang from him.

Ver. 32. And thou shalt see an enemy in my sanctuary.] The marginal translation seems most literal, Thou shalt see the affliction of the tabernacle. As he did, for he saw the tabernacle deprived of the ark, which was the glory of it; and lived to hear the ark was taken by the Philistines, (iv. 4. 11.) But his family was not thrown out of the priesthood till the days of Solomon.

In all the wealth which God shall give Israel.] The Hebrew words may be translated, After all the good God hath done to Israel.

And there shall not be an old man in thy house for ever.] He repeats the foregoing threatening, to shew the certainty of it. But some by an old man understand an elder. So the Talmudists in the Gemara of the Sanhedrin, cap. 1. where they make the meaning to be, that if any of his family did live long, they should never come to honour. For so they tell the story; that R. Johanan missing of some preferment that was designed and endeavoured for him, and taking it very heavily, the doctors that were his relations prayed him not to be troubled; For we are (said they) of the family of Eli, of whom it is said, there shall be no old man of thy house for ever; that is, none be promoted to any dignity.

Ver. 33. And the man of thine, whom I shall not cut off from my altar, shall be to consume thy eyes, and to grieve thy heart.] It was not a favour to let any of them live, but a punishment to those who were grieved to see the high-priesthood taken from their family, and those that belonged to it reduced to great poverty. It is usual in Scripture, to say that of the parents, which properly belongs to their posterity.

And all the increase of thy house shall die in the flower of their age.] This doth not belong to all the posterity of Ithamar, but only to the family of Eli.

Ver. 34. And this shall be a sign to thee, that shall come upon thy two sons, Hophni and Phinehas; that in one day they shall die both of them.] See iv. 11. 17.

Ver. 35. And I will raise me up a faithful priest, that shall do all that is in my heart, and in my mind.] This seems to be meant of Zadok, who was anointed in the room of Abiathar, (1 Chron. xxix. 22.)

And I will build him a sure house.] The high-priesthood continued in his line till the captivity of Babylon, as appears from Ezek. xl. 16. and a long time after it, as Josephus shews, lib. x. cap. 4. and our famous Selden, lib. i. de Success. in Pontif. cap. 5, 6. where he shews their perpetual succession till the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. But Procopius Gazæus here notes, that though this, according to the history, is meant of Zadok, who was put into the priesthood by Solomon, and in whose line it continued; yet it belongs to none, in the highest sense, but to our Lord Jesus Christ, who offered himself to the Father for us, and is our great high-priest for ever.

And he shall walk before mine anointed for ever.] By the anointed of God here is meant the king; for whom the high-priest consulted God on great occasions: and therefore is said to walk before him; because he directed him in his proceedings, and shewed him what he ought to do, in all difficult cases.

Ver. 36. And it shall come to pass, that every one that is left in thy house.] The remainder of his family, who were not cut off.

Shall come and crouch to him for a piece of silver, and for a morsel of bread.] The Hebrew word which we translate crouch, signifying to bow and to worship, the Vulgar understands these words, as if they were spoken not of their coming to beg of the high-priest, but to pray to God in so poor a condition, as not to be able to bring more than a farthing, or mite, to the treasury, and nothing but a bit of bread (not so much as a bird, much less a sheep or bullock) for a sin-offering. But the Chaldee takes the words as we do, for humbling himself to the priest beforementioned, begging a small relief of his great poverty, to which he was reduced. The Hebrew word for a piece of silver is agorah, which signifies a minute piece of silver, in the very derivation of the word, as many think. So the meaning is, he should humbly beg, though ever so small a relief.

Put me, I pray thee, into one of the priests' offices, that I may eat a piece of bread.] Begging of the high-priest that he might enjoy the meanest pension that was allowed to those priests who were prohibited to officiate. For so the words may be translated, Somewhat belonging to the priesthood. (See 2 Kings xxiii. 9. Ezek. xliv. 13.) This seems to have been fulfilled in the days of Abiathar, who, for treason, was not only put out of his office, but sent to live upon his own farm in the country; and not suffered to live upon the portion given to priests at the temple, (1 Kings ii. 26, 27.) By this means his posterity fell into extreme want; in which the just judgment of God may be observed; that the children of those who were so wanton, that they would not be content unless they had the choicest parts of the sacrifice for their portion, should fall into so low a condition, as to beg their bread.

CHAP. III.

Ver. 1. AND the child Samuel ministered unto the Lord before Eli.] Performed such services at the tabernacle as Eli directed, being now about twelve years old, as Josephus thinks.

And the word of the Lord was precious in those days.] God did very rarely in those days reveal his mind to any person. (See ver. 21.)

There was no open vision.] Here vision includes all the ways whereby God revealed himself to men. Which he did then so seldom, that whatsoever revelation there might be privately to some pious persons, there was none then publicly acknowledged to be a prophet, unto whom the people might resort to know the mind of God. Which was the cause that Samuel, being twice called by God to attend unto him, thought it had been Eli who called him: for they were so unacquainted in these days with the prophetical spirit, that we read of no more than two prophets in all the days of the Judges, (iv. 4. vi. 8.)

Ver. 2. And it came to pass at that time.] After the man of God mentioned in the foregoing chapter (ver. 27.) had been with Eli; perhaps that very night after he had delivered his message.

When Eli was laid down.] To sleep.

In his place.] In the court of the tabernacle, where there were divers rooms for several uses of the priests; as there were afterward at the temple.

And his eyes began to wax dim, that he could not see.] Clearly to do his duty, after it grew duskish: which made him, it is likely, go to bed betimes, and leave directions with Samuel what to do, until it was time for him to repose himself. And this might be the reason that Samuel ran so hastily to him, when he thought he called for him, that he might know what he wanted, men of his age, and dimsighted, being less able to help themselves.

Ver. 3. And ere the lamp of God went out in the temple of the Lord, where the ark of God was.] The lamp in the great shaft of the golden candlestick, which bent towards the most holy place (called the western lamp), never went out; but some other of them did go out when it was morning. (See upon Exod. xxvii. 20, 21.) The meaning therefore is, that, ere it was day, the Lord called Samuel. (See Dr. Lightfoot of the Temple, chap. 14. sect. 4.)

And Samuel was lain down to sleep.] In the court of the Levites, as the Targum explains it; or in some other place near to Eli, that he might be ready to assist him on any occasion. The words seem to import, that he had watched most of the night, (for so some were to do, Psal. cxxxiv. 1.) and towards morning went to repose himself. For thus the words run in the Hebrew, and in the LXX. and Vulgar: Before the lamp of God went out, and Samuel lay down to sleep in the temple of the Lord, &c. Insomuch, that Victorinus Strigelius translates the words thus, And Samuel went to lie down in the temple of the Lord, where the ark of God was, before the lamp of God went out.

Ver. 4. That the Lord called Samuel.] Out of the most holy place. So the Targum: A voice was heard out of the temple of the Lord.

And he said, Here am I.] It is likely Eli lay nearer the tabernacle than Samuel did, and yet heard nothing: but the voice passing him by, was directed to Samuel, who alone heard it. These words, Here am I, are a form of speech, signifying attention to what was said, and readiness to do what should be commanded.

Ver. 5. And he ran unto Eli, and said, Here am I; for thou calledst me.] He thought Eli had some ministry wherein to employ him, and therefore started up presently, and ran to know what his pleasure was. Which shews the great readiness and promptness of his obedience, which made him come, yea, run at his first call.

And he said, I called not; lie down again. And he went and lay down.] He thought he might dream.

Ver. 6. And the Lord called yet again, Samuel. And Samuel rose, and went to Eli, and said, Here am I; for thou didst call me, &c.] He was sure there was nobody yet come to the temple, it being night and the doors shut, and therefore concluded it could be none but Eli that called him: and it is probable, the voice was like that of Eli's.

Ver. 7. Now Samuel did not know the Lord.] He had not yet learned to know discipline from before the Lord, as the Targum interprets it: that is, how God was wont to teach and instruct men in his will; which the next words explain.

Neither was the word of the Lord yet revealed unto him.] He was unacquainted with the way wherein God made known his mind unto the prophets, because he had never spoken to him before: so that he did not know how to distinguish between the voice of God and of a man. Maimonides expounds it, He did not understand that the Lord was wont to speak with a soft, whispering voice; which was therefore called Bath-col.

Ver. 8. And the Lord called Samuel again the third time. And he rose, and went to Eli, and said, Here am I; for thou didst call me. And Eli perceived that the Lord had called the child.] This repetition of the voice so oft, awakened Eli to think that this was no fancy of the child's; and, therefore, since he knewtha t he did not call him, he concluded the Lord did; and by this means he was disposed to give credit to what Samuel should tell him, as an oracle of God.

Ver. 9. Therefore Eli said unto Samuel, Go, lie down: and it shall be, if he call thee, that thou shalt say, Speak, Lord; for thy servant heareth.] He tells him, in effect, that it was the voice of God which he heard; and instructs him how to behave himself, when he called again; and to answer, that he was ready to perform whatever he commanded.

So Samuel went and lay down in his place.] Which was not far, as I said, from the place where Eli lay.

Ver. 10. And the Lord came, and stood.] This word stood (Kimchi thinks) denoteth some glorious appearance of God to him; because this is the same word which is used in Numb. xxii. 22, 23. 31. where the angel is said to stand to oppose Balaam's proceedings. And so the Targum: The Lord was revealed, and stood and called, &c.

And called as at other times, Samuel, Samuel!] Only he repeats his name, to move the greater attention.

Then Samuel answered, Speak; for thy servant heareth.] He omits the name of the Lord, in his answer which Eli directed him to make: either out of fear, or uncertainty, whether it was the Lord that spake to him, or not.

Ver. 11. And the Lord said unto Samuel, Behold, I will do a thing in Israel, at which both the ears of every one that heareth it shall tingle.] Which in our language we express thus: It shall stun all that hear it: as a man is, when a clap of terrible thunder strikes his ears, which even deafens him, so that he can hear nothing else. This was fulfilled, when the doleful news came that the ark was taken, and both Eli's sons slain, and he fell down and brake his neck, &c.

Ver. 12. In that day I will perform against Eli all the things that I have spoken concerning his house.] By the man of God in the foregoing chapter.

When I begin, I will also make an end.] He doth not mean that he would begin and make an end at once; but that he would persevere in his punishments, and not desist when he began, till all his threatenings were fulfilled, viz. in the death of Eli, and of his sons; and the slaughter of eighty-five priests of this family by Doeg, and the thrusting Abiathar (who escaped that slaughter) out of his office, and so depriving that family of its dignity and honour.

Ver. 13. For I have told him, that I will judge his house for ever, for the iniquity which he knoweth.] For he could not be ignorant of the crimes committed so publicly; and of which there was such a general complaint.

Because his sons made themselves vile.] Or, they made light of God and of his people; having no regard to either of them. Or, they made the service of God vile in the eyes of the people; as the words may be translated, and as the LXX. understand them.

And he restrained them not.] He did not frown upon them, as it is in the Hebrew. Which doth not signify, that he shewed no sign of displeasure against their wickedness (for he did chide them, though too gently, for it), but he did not severely reprove them; and when that would not restrain them, turn them out of their office, or suspend them until they were reformed. For which cause God passed this severe sentence upon the whole family; that they should lose the dignity of the high-priesthood, and be made as vile and contemptible as they had rendered God's service.

Ver. 14. And therefore I have sworn unto the house of Eli, that the iniquity of Eli's house shall not be purged with sacrifice nor offering for ever.] By iniquity is meant the punishment of iniquity; which he threatens should not be removed, or mitigated, by any sort of sacrifices, or oblations, that could be brought to the altar; but only (as the Gemara upon Rosch Hashanah ventures to say) by the law, and by the retributions of the saints. By the law, they mean not merely the study of the law, but the practice of it, by observing God's commands; and by retributions of the saints, works of charity, bounty, and liberality, beyond what the Divine law required. (See Dr. Windet, de Vita functorum Statu, p. 193.)

Ver. 15. And Samuel lay down until the morning, and opened the door of the house of the Lord.] This was one of the works of the Levites, to open and shut the door of the court of the Lord's house.

And Samuel feared to shew Eli the vision.] Having no commaud from God to do it; and being loath to grieve the old man by telling him bad news.

Ver. 16. Then Eli called Samuel, and said, Samuel, my son. And he answered, Here am I.] The old man being so solemnly threatened by the late message from God to him, was afraid he was concerned in what the Lord had now said to Samuel.

Ver. 17. And he said, What is the thing that the Lord hath said unto thee? I pray thee hide it not from me: God do so to thee, and more also, if thou hide any thing from me, &c.] He adjures him to declare to him all that he had heard, and conceal nothing; which obliged him to satisfy his desire, as Micaiah and our blessed Saviour did in the like case.

Ver. 18. And Samuel told him every thing, and hid nothing from him. And he said, It is the Lord; let him do what seemeth him good.] This sentence being denounced by a child, who had his dependance upon Eli, far from any secular cunning, being unable to discern between the voice of the Lord and the voice of his tutor, till he instructed him, was a great deal more terrible to Eli than the message of the prophet had been, and wrought a greater effect upon him. For he humbly acknowledged the justice of God, and submitted to his sentence (as many of the fathers think) with a truly penitent heart. For now he knew (as our Dr. Jackson observes), that the sentence was irreversible, being confirmed by an oath, (ver. 14.) and the humility and modesty of Eli's answer, persuaded that excellent person, that the fearful sentence denounced against him extended no further, than to the irreversible deposition of him and his family from the priesthood, unto a poor and mean estate, wherein they were to live hereafter. (Consecration of the Son of God, chap. 18. parag. 5.)

Ver. 19. And Samuel grew, and the Lord was with him.] There were manifest tokens that God favoured him, as he did Joseph, (Gen. xxxi. 2.) The Targum hath it, Memra, the Word of the Lord was his help: or he revealed more and more of his mind to him: so that Israel knew God intended him for the office mentioned in the next verse.

And did let none of his words fall to the ground.] A metaphor from arrows shot out of a bow, which hit the mark. And they may refer either to the words of Samuel, or of God; which is the same. This proved him to be a prophet, or a man divinely inspired.

Ver. 20. And all Israel, from Dan even to Beer-sheba.] The whole country of Judea. (See Judg. xx. 1.)

Knew that Samuel was established to be a prophet of the Lord.] Settled to be a constant prophet, who supplied the want of urim and thummim, when the ark was taken from them.

Ver. 21. And the Lord appeared again in Shiloh: for the Lord revealed himself to Samuel in Shiloh by the word of the Lord.] Having begun to appear in Shiloh, he continued this great favour: for he revealed himself to Samuel, not by dreams and visions, but by speaking to him in an audible voice, as he had done, ver. 4, &c. And indeed he seems to have been the first prophet, that was raised up to be a public instructor and governor of God's people. Others there had been before him; but not with so high an authority, and public approbation. And therefore St. Peter saith, (Acts iii.) "All the prophets from Samuel spake of those days:" as if he was the first eminent prophet whom the Lord raised up to them after Moses.

CHAP. IV.

Ver. 1. AND the word of Samuel came unto all Israel.] The revelation of God's mind and will, which had been very scarce among them in former days, (iii. 1.) now grew very plentiful: for, as Samuel himself was ready to instruct every one that came to him, so he set up colleges of the prophets (as we read in the following parts of this book), who in time were settled in divers parts of the country, for the better preserving and spreading the knowledge of God among the people, (x. 5. xix. 18—20, &c.) Which made Abarbinel discourse in this manner, upon the foregoing words: "In the days of Eli the word of the Lord was scarce, and vision was seldom: but when Samuel appeared, not only he prophesied frequently, but many of the Israelites, by his means, were endued with the same spirit, according to these words, And the Lord appeared more frequently in Shiloh (so he understands them), because the Lord was revealed to Samuel in Shiloh. Which signifies, that the influence of the spirit which descended upon Samuel in Shiloh, reached unto others, because of its abundance, who were disposed to receive it: so that they also prophesied."

And Israel went out against the Philistines to battle.] This was in the middle of that forty years' dominion that the Philistines had over the Israelites, mentioned Judg. xiii. 1. unto which they were encouraged, perhaps, by the death of the lords of the Philistines; and the great slaughter which Samson had made of them at his death, (Judg. xvi. 27. 30.)

And pitched besides Eben-ezer.] Thus this place was called when this book was written; and so denominated from the famous battle which Samuel fought with the Philistines, twenty years after this, (vii. 12.)

And the Philistines pitched in Aphek.] In a place in the tribe of Judah, as we read Josh. xv. 53. upon the confines of the Philistines' country. But see xxix. 1. of this book.

Ver. 2. And the Philistines put themselves in array against Israel: and when they joined battle, Israel was smitten before the Philistines, &c.] Though Samuel was established a prophet, and it was so publicly known, that all Israel came to consult with him (as the foregoing verse seems to import), yet the elders did not take his advice about this war; as Ralbag thinks. Whose opinion is more probable than theirs, who think they did advise with him, and that he bade them fight, on purpose that the sentence upon Eli's sons might be fulfilled.

Ver. 3. And when the people were come into the camp, the elders of Israel said, Wherefore hath the Lord smitten us to-day before the Philistines?] They thought the justice of their cause was sufficient to entitle them to the favour of God, though they themselves were wicked. Thus Brutus cried when he fell, "O Jupiter! what is the cause of so great calamity?" not reflecting upon his horrible exactions in Cyprus; and his great ingratitude to Cæsar, whom he slew in the senate.

Let us fetch the ark of the covenant of the Lord out of Shiloh, that when it comes among us, it may save us out of the hands of our enemies.] This was as foolish as the other, to confide in God's help, when they lived in open disobedience to him.

Ver. 4. So the people sent to Shiloh, that they might bring from thence the ark of the covenant of the Lord.] This being done without any warrant from God, provoked him, rather than procured his presence with them. But they seem to have done it in imitation of Joshua marching with the ark against Jericho; for which he had a Divine authority, but they had none. Strigelius, therefore, well applies to this the observation of Polybius, that "many not studying to imitate the lives of excellent men, but only some of their extraordinary actions, have done nothing but expose their own folly to the world."

Which dwelleth between the cherubims.] Or, upon the cherubims, as the Chaldee, the LXX. and the Vulgar here translate it. But Lud. de Dieu is not satisfied with this sense; for he thinks the Divine Majesty did not sit upon the wings of the cherubims, but under them; in the space between them and the ark, which was his footstool: and therefore he translates these words, who inhabiteth the cherubims; which were as a canopy over the Schechinah.

But I have followed the ancient translation, in my notes upon Exod. xxv. 22.

And the two sons of Eli, Hophni and Phinehas, were there with the ark of the covenant of God.] Which they were ordered to bring out of its place (into which the Levites might not enter), and to accompany it unto the army.

Ver. 5. And when the ark of the covenant of the Lord came into the camp, all Israel shouted with a great shout.] As if they had already gotten the victory.

So that the earth rang again.] It was so loud, that it might be heard a great way off. (See 1 Kings i. 40. and what I have noted there.)

Ver. 6. And when the Philistines heard the noise of the shout, they said, What means the noise of this great shout in the camp of the Hebrews? And they understood that the ark of the Lord was come into the camp.] They sent to get intelligence, or were informed of it by some deserters.

Ver. 7. And the Philistines were afraid: for they said, God is come into the camp.] The symbol of God's presence; which perhaps they imagined the Israelites worshipped as their God.

And they said, Woe unto us, for there hath not been such a thing heretofore.] In all their battles that they or their neighbours had fought with the Israelites, they never heard of such a thing as this; which they thought must produce some extraordinary effect.

Ver. 8. Woe unto us! who shall deliver us out of the hand of these mighty Gods?] They fought with men before, but now with God, before whom none could stand. The Hebrew words Adirim Elohim, which we translate mighty Gods, are translated by Theodoret, the strong God: which agrees with what goes before, God is come into the camp: and with the Targum, Who shall deliver us out of the hand of the Word of the Lord, &c.

These are the Gods.] Or, this is the God.

That smote Egypt with all the plagues in the wilderness.] They seem not to have perfectly understood the sacred story; but thought all those plagues which are there spoken of had fallen on the Egyptians, while the Israelites were in the wilderness; where they were when their last plague befel them, by their being drowned in the Red Sea: but Jonathan thus paraphrases it: Who smote the Egyptians with all manner of plagues; and did wonders for his people in the desert.

Ver. 9. Be strong, and quit yourselves like men, ye Philistines!] These words were spoken by their great commanders, as the foregoing words in all likelihood were; who understood what had been done in foreign countries.

That ye be not servants unto the Hebrews, as they have been to you: quit yourselves like men, and fight.] When they were recovered out of the fright, which seized on them at first, they considered, that notwithstanding the power of their God, they had made the Israelites subject to them, and also overthrown them in a late battle; and therefore their present danger should only raise their courage, and make them fight more valiantly.

Ver. 10. And the Philistines fought.] They gave battle to the Israelites.

And the Israelites were smitten, and they fled every man unto his tent.] They were so routed, that they did not flee to their camp with an intent to renew the fight, (as they did before, ver. 3.) but dispersed themselves to their own home. And hitherto many of them dwelt in tents, as I observed before. (See Josh. xxii. 14. Judg. vii. 8. xx. 8.)

And there was a very great slaughter; for there fell of Israel thirty thousand footmen.] There fell but four thousand in the former battle, before the ark came among them, (ver. 2.) so little did the bare presence of the ark profit wicked men, that it rather did them hurt.

Ver. 11. And the ark of God was taken; and the two sons of Eli, Hophni and Phinehas, were slain.] It is likely that (as Josephus saith) Eli parted with the ark from the tabernacle very unwillingly; but when he could not help it, he charged his sons, who went along with it, to lose their lives rather than lose it.

Ver. 12. And there ran a man of Benjamin out of the army, and came to Shiloh the same day.] Some of the Jews have a fancy that this man was Saul: for no other reason, that I can find, but because he was of that tribe, and a proper man, who, it is likely, could run swiftly. How far Shiloh was from Aphek, or from Eben-ezer (both which were in the tribe of Judah, as Shiloh was in Ephraim), near to which this battle was fought, is not certain; but not so distant but that a man might run the same day from the one to the other.

With his clothes rent, and with earth upon his head.] According to the manner of those who bewailed any great calamity. (Josh. vii. 6. Job ii. 12. Ezek. xxvii. 30.) From which last places, it appears, it was a custom among other nations. And is most lively expressed by Virgil in Æneid xii. ver. 609—611. where Latinus is represented as rending his clothes, and throwing dust upon his grey hairs, when he lamented his private and the public losses. Tiraquellus hath heaped up a great many examples of this, in his annotations on Alex. ab Alexandro, lib. iii. cap. 7.

Ver. 13. And when he came, lo, Eli sat upon a seat by the way-side: for his heart trembled for the ark of God.] He had caused a seat, I suppose, to be set for him, by the side of the gate that entered into the city, (ver. 18.) that he might hearken after news; being extremely concerned, above all things, for the ark of the covenant of God.

And when the man came into the city.] He passed by Eli, and said not a word to him, though he saw him sitting there; because he was loath he should be surprised with such sad tidings. Or, perhaps, he came into this city at some other gate.

And told it, all the city cried out.] Looking upon themselves as put out of the Divine protection, because they had lost the symbol of his presence, and the book of the covenant, the blessings of which they could no longer claim.

Ver. 14. And when Eli heard the noise of the crying, he said, What means the noise of this tumult? And the man came in hastily, and told Eli.] They about him had not the heart to resolve his question, but brought the man speedily to acquaint him with the truth.

Ver. 15. Now Eli was ninety-eight years old; and his eyes were dim, that he could not see.] He was not able to discern the sadness that was in the people's countenances, but only heard their shrieks and lamentations.

Ver. 16. And the man said, I am he that came out of the army, and I fled to-day out of the army.] The man represents himself as an eye-witness of what had passed, that he might gain the more credit to what he said: and adds, that he brought the freshest news.

And he said, What is there done, my son?] He asked if they had fought, and with what success.

Ver. 17. And the messenger answered and said, Israel is fled before the Philistines, and there hath been also a great slaughter among the people, and thy two sons, Hophni and Phinehas, are dead, and the ark of God is taken.] He hid nothing from him; but reserved the worst news till the last.

Ver. 18. And it came to pass, when he made mention of the ark of God, that he fell from off the seat backward, by the side of the gate.] At the entrance of the city, where his chair was set.

And his neck brake, and he died.] Though he was too indulgent a father, yet he was highly commendable in this, that he was not so much affected with the loss of his sons, and the slaughter of the people, as with the loss of the ark of God. For he kept up his courage, and did not fall, till he heard that mentioned. The more public any concern is, the more it is laid to heart by men of worthy spirits. Such a one was Eli, with whom God was angry upon his sons' account; otherwise he was adorned with many virtues, as Procopius Gazæus observes.

For he was an old man, and heavy.] Being oppressed with grief he swooned away; and being both very old, and very unwieldy, his fall was the more dangerous, and the vertebræ of his neck the more easily displaced.

And he judged Israel forty years.] This aggravated the calamity of his family, that, having been so long in the highest station, it fell into great afflictions in a moment. (See upon chapter the first, ver. 9.) The Jews observe, in Seder Olam Rabba, cap. 13. that on the day he died, God forsook the tabernacle in Shiloh, having delivered his strength into captivity, &c. (Psal. lxxviii. 60, 61.)

Ver. 19. And his daughter-in-law, Phinehas's wife, was with child, near to be delivered: and when she heard the tidings that the ark of God was taken, and that her father-in-law and her husband were dead, she bowed herself and travailed; for her pains came upon her.] The great anguish of her mind brought on her labour: and, as Josephus thinks, two months before her time. Which doth not well agree with what is said in the beginning of this verse, that she was near to be delivered. The Hebrew word which we translate bowed herself, signifies she fell on her knees. For so the manner was in those countries: which Ludolphus confirms in his Ethiopic History, and his commentary upon it, (lib. i. cap. 14. n. 101.)

Ver. 20. And, at the time of her death, the women that stood by her.] Assisted at her labour.

Said unto her, Fear not; for thou hast born a son.] The mention of which they thought would have revived her; according to what we read in the gospel of St. John, xvi. 21.

But she answered not, neither did she regard it.] Being so overcome with sorrow and grief, that she minded nothing that was said or done about her.

Ver. 21. And she named the child Ichabod, saying, The glory is departed from Israel: because the ark of God was taken, and because of her father-in-law, and her husband.] Only having a little recovered her spirits, she lamented this chiefly, that God was gone from them: for so the word glory frequently signifies in Scripture, (Psal. cvi. 20. Jer. ii. 11.) The Hebrew word אי also signifies the same with לא not, as Ludolphus observes, in his commentary upon his Ethiopic History, (lib. i. cap. xvi. 106.) And so Bochartus here translates Ichabod, by inglorious, or without glory: that is, saith he, without the true God, (par. i. Hieroz. lib. ii. cap. 34.)

Ver. 22. And she said, The glory is departed from Israel; for the ark of God is taken.] She seems to have expired with these words; which she repeats again, because this chiefly lay at her heart; as the concerns of religion do in all pious spirits.

CHAP. V.

Ver. 1. AND the Philistines took the ark of God.] Why God suffered the ark of his presence to fall into the hands of those uncircumcised people, Abarbinel gives four or five reasons. The Israelites were such great sinners, that they were unworthy of his presence among them. The idolatry of Micah remained to this day in the land; therefore he fulfilled his threatening, (Lev. xxvi. 19. 31.) The sin, also, of the priests highly provoked him to deliver up the ark, which was in their hands, when they were killed. And the Israelites greatly offended in carrying the ark into the battle, without asking counsel of God: who resolved to demonstrate his power even among the enemies of Israel.

And brought it from Eben-ezer.] Where the Israelites were encamped before the battle, (iv. 1.) and whither it is possible they fled, to save the ark, when their army was overthrown.

Unto Ashdod.] One of the five cities of the Philistines, where some of the Anakims were left unsubdued by Joshua, (Josh. xi. 22.) and was in future times the principal city of the country, called Azotus. And perhaps it was so now; which might be the reason the ark was carried thither, rather than to any other city; being situated also in the middle of the five principalities; and having a famous temple in it (mentioned in the next verse), whither all the country resorted.

Ver. 2. And when the Philistines took the ark of God, they brought it into the house of Dagon, and set it by Dagon.] The heathen were wont to offer part of the spoil that they took in war unto their gods: and what could there be more acceptable than this to Dagon, who seemed to have triumphed over the God of Israel? thus we read, in after-ages, how conquerors triumphed not only over the people whom they vanquished, but over their gods also. As Isaiah represented Bel and Nebo carried captive, when Babylon was taken, (xlvi. 1, 2.) And Jeremiah saith the same of Chemosh, the god of Moab, and Malcolm, the god of Ammon, (xlviii. 7. xlix. 3. and see Dan. xi. 8.) Thus the Romans did very frequently, as Bochartus shews, in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 34. Yet there are some who imagine, that their setting the ark by Dagon (on the side of him), signified that they intended to do some honour to it, as having the presence of God in it. Concerning Dagon, see what I have noted upon Judg. xvi. 23. and Mr. Selden, Syntag. ii. de Diis Syris, cap. 3. where he confutes those who think Dagon hath his name from dagan, which signifies corn (as if he were the inventor of it), and confirms the opinion of those who think he had his name from dag, which signifies a fish; fishes and pigeons being sacred to him. Some take this idol to have been the same among the Syrians, with Triton among the Europeans, or with Neptune, or (as Scaliger will have it), with Venus, who was worshipped under the name of Atergatis, and Adargatis: which are only the corruption of the Hebrew words Addir-daga, i. e. magnificent fish, as Mr. Selden there observes; though Bochart thinks this was a different goddess from Dagon, (par. i. Hieroz. lib. i. cap. 6.)

Ver. 3. And when they of Ashdod arose early in the morning.] To go to pray at the temple.

Behold, Dagon was fallen with his face to the earth before the ark of the Lord.] In a posture of the most humble adoration: which was prostration; acknowledging the God of Israel to be above all gods. In this some of the Jews think there was a miracle in a miracle, as they speak: for whereas the ark was set by Dagon (i. e. on one side of him) when Dagon fell, it was not right forward, but he was turned about with his face towards the ark. (See Buxtorf de Area Fœderis, p. 171.)

And they took Dagon, and set him in his place again.] Looking upon it as a mischance.

Ver. 4. And when they rose early on the morrow morning, behold, Dagon was fallen with his face to the ground before the ark of the Lord.] Which shewed his former fall was not by chance, but by the power of God, before whom he could not stand.

And the head of Dagon, and both the palms of his hands, were cut off upon the threshold.] It is likely Dagon stood on high, upon some pedestal or altar; from whence he was not only thrown down, but his head and his hands thrown out of the door with the greatest contempt: being cut off upon the threshold of the temple. A token (as most interpreters think) that this idol was void of wisdom and power, his head and his hands (which are the seat of those qualities) being gone. Some have a fancy that Dagon had feet also upon his tail: from whence the LXX. it is likely, here add, that both his feet were cut off also: which hath no ground at all in the Hebrew text. (See Selden, in the forenamed book; and Vossius de Idolol. lib. ii. cap. 16.)

Only the stump of Dagon was left him.] In the Hebrew the words are, only Dagon was left to him: that is, saith Kimchi, nothing but the form of a fish remained; all that resembled a man being broken off. Thus the Lord shewed there was no god besides him: his ark, though taken captive and carried into a strange land (as St. Chrysostom discourses, Orat. v. adversus Judæos), throwing down their idol twice, and thereby demonstrating, that the Israelites were not overthrown for want of any power in their God to defend them, but for the iniquity of those that worshipped him.

Ver. 5. Therefore neither the priests of Dagon, nor any that come into Dagon's house, tread on the threshold of Dagon unto this day.] Out of reverence to it; looking upon it (as Abarbinel glosses) as a holy thing, by the touch of Dagon's head and hands. So foolishly did they pervert the meaning of God, that, instead of thinking Dagon to be no god, they honoured the very threshold of his temple as if it had some divinity in it. For it is an idle conceit which the Jews have in Jalkut, that forsaking Dagon they worshipped his threshold. (See Buxtorf, in his Hist. Arcæ, cap. 19. p. 172.) This superstition continued for some ages, as Bochartus gathers from Zephan. i. 9. where God saith he will punish those that leap on the threshold, after the manner of the Philistines, as he expounds it, after the Targum, par. i. Hierozoic. lib. ii. cap. 36.

From those words, unto this day, Hobbes and such-like writers frame an argument, that this book was not wrote by Samuel; not considering that these things happened when Samuel was but a youth, and that this was written when he was old; so that there was a considerable space of time between them.

Ver. 6. But the hand of the Lord was heavy upon them of Ashdod.] Since they were so blind as not to see his hand in throwing down their god, &c. he smote them with such sore plagues in their own bodies, as made them sensible of his power.

And he destroyed them.] With a pestilence, I suppose, of which many died. (See ver. ult.)

And smote them with emerods, even Ashdod, and the coasts belonging to it.] Not only the people of the city, but of the villages belonging to it, were smitten with this plague. About which interpreters differ very much: some taking this disease for a dysentery, which was so violent that it rotted their guts, and made them fall down and come out. Whereupon others think it was that which we call procidentia ani, the falling of the fundament; but most interpreters, both ancient and modern, take it as we do, for the emerods. For it was some disease in the hinder-parts, as appears from the words of the Psalmist, lxxviii. 66. as they are commonly understood. See my notes on Deut. xxviii. 27. and Nic. Fuller Miscell. lib. v. cap. 3. especially Bochartus, in his Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. i. cap. 36. where he gives a large account of the Hebrew word apholim, which is used only here and in the forenamed place of Deuteronomy.

At the end of this verse, the Vulgar and the LXX. also add, that a great number of mice started up out of the earth, and overrunning their fields, made great waste there. But, as Lyra well observes, this gloss in all likelihood being written in the margin, out of chap. vi. ver. 4, 5. it crept at last into the text, though it be neither in the Hebrew, nor the Chaldee, nor Syriac, nor Arabic. (See Bochart, in his Hierozoic. par. i. lib. iii. cap. 34.)

Ver. 7. And when the men of Ashdod saw that it was so, they said, The ark of the God of Israel shall not abide with us: for his hand is sore upon us, and upon Dagon our god.] Now their eyes were opened to see, that though they had vanquished the Israelites, they could not stand before the God of Israel. And it seems no unreasonable conjecture, that they speak here, and in the following verse, concerning the ark, with a note of distinction; calling it the ark of the God of Israel, (ver. 8. 10, 11. vi. 3.) and the ark of the Lord, (vi. 8.) For other nations had such arks, and for the same use, to put their mysteries in them: as in this were the tables of the covenant alone. Clemens Alexandrinus relates what trash and other filthy stuff was in the μυστικαὶ κισταὶ, the mystical coffers of the heathen. From whose superstition, that the Israelites might be preserved, God, perhaps, appointed this ark to be made by Moses. (See his Προτρεπτικὸς λόγος, p. 13, 14.)

Ver. 8. They sent therefore, and gathered the lords of the Philistines unto them, and said, What shall we do with the ark of the God of Israel?] They desired a general council might be held, to consult what to do in this case; whether to keep the ark, or how to dispose of it.

And they answered.] i. e. The lords of the Philistines (who in the language of that country were called Sarnim, the same with Sarim in the Hebrew) came to the following resolution.

Let the ark of the God of Israel be carried about unto Gath. And they carried the ark of the God of Israel about thither.] They seem to be possessed with a superstitious conceit, that there was something in the place which was offensive to him; and that he might be better pleased with another: just as Æneas and his people indicted their beds and their houses, of the disasters that befel them; and Cadmus forsook his own city,

——— "tanquam fortuna locorum Non sua se premeret"———.

as if the ill luck which hunted him had been the place's, not his own: as our Dr. Jackson observes, out of Ovid, in his Original of Unbelief, chap. 18. parag. 4.

Gath was the next city to Ashdod, northward of it: in which some of the Anakims also remained. (Josh. xi. 21.)

Ver. 9. And it was so, that, after they had carried it about, the hand of the Lord was against the city with a very great destruction.] A great many died of the pestilence, as they had done at Ashdod.

And he smote the men of the city, both small and great, and they had emerods in their secret parts.] They that did not die were sorely tormented by emerods; which was a disease they had never known before; as some understand the last words. Or, they had those the physicians call blind emerods: which do not swell outwardly, but lie hidden within; and are the most grievous and hard to be cured of all other.

Ver. 10. Therefore they sent the ark of God to Ekron.] The last city of the Philistines northward: where in after-times (if not now) the famous god called Baal-zebub was worshipped, (2 Kings i. 2.)

And it came to pass, as the ark of God came to Ekron, that the Ekronites cried out, saying, They have brought about the ark of the God of Israel to us, to slay us and our people.] These seem to be the words of the governors of the city; who had learned, from the experience of the other great cities, that no place was secure from the stroke of the God of Israel.

Ver. 11. So they sent and gathered together all the lords of the Philistines.] As they of Ashdod had done, (ver. 6.)

And said, Send away the ark of the God of Israel, and let it go again to its own place, that it slay us not, and our people.] Destroy the whole city.

For there was a deadly destruction throughout all the city; and the hand of God was very sore upon them.] Which made them desire it might be sent out of the country, and not to the other cities in the south, Gaza and Askelon.

Ver. 12. And the men that died not were smote with emerods: and the cry of the city went up to heaven.] This is the explication of the foregoing words: some were struck with the pestilence as soon as the ark came thither, and others lingered under intolerable pains, which made them cry out in an inexpressible manner: for this is an hyperbolical speech; things that are exceeding great beyond expression, being said to reach up to heaven, (Deut. i. 28.) Thus Virgil, lib. ii. Æneid. in many places, ver. 223. 338. 488.

"Clamores simul horrendos ad sydera tollit.
——— Sublatus ad æthera clamor.
——— Ferit aurea sydera clamor."

CHAP. VI.

Ver. 1. AND the ark of the Lord was in the country of the Philistines seven months.] The Hebrew word sadeth, which we translate country, signifying a field (as the LXX. here translate it, ἐν ἀγρῷ), Theodoret, and Procopius Gazæus, think, that the Philistines, being so plagued by the ark in their cities, sent it into the open fields: but were disappointed of their hope, of being freer from the hand of God there, than in their cities; for mice sprung up out of the ground, and wasted their corn and their fruits, as the LXX. here add, at the end of this verse, as they did in the foregoing chapter, ver. 6. καὶ ἐξέζεσεν ἡ γῆ αὐτῶν μυίας, and their land bubbled up mice. But the Chaldee hath no such thing; and saith expressly, The ark was in the cities of the Philistines seven months.

Ver. 2. And the Philistines.] That is, the lords of the country.

Called for the priests.] Who were best skilled in sacred rites and ceremonies.

And the diviners.] Who were a kind of prophets, pretending to know the will of God, and to foretel future events. See Deut. xviii. 12. of this word kosemim, which we translate diviners. From whence Bochartus thinks the Roman word Casmilli is derived, being as much as Kosme-el, the minister of God.

Saying, Tell us what we shall do to the ark of the Lord?] They never called it the ark of the Lord till this time: but now were struck with some apprehension that the Lord was above all gods.

Tell us wherewith we shall send it to its place.] They did not call them to be resolved by them whether they should send it home or not, (for upon that they seem to have been resolved already, ver. 11.) but in what manner it should be sent, and whether accompanied with any presents to obtain his favour.

Ver. 3. And they said, If ye send away the ark of the God of Israel.] Against which resolution they had nothing to object, but rather approved it.

Send it not empty.] They answer directly to the question, first in general, that it must not be sent back without some offering.

But in any wise return him a trespass-offering.] Concerning the Hebrew word asham, which we translate trespass-offering, and how it differs from a sin-offering, see upon Lev. v. 15. It seems to be presented by the Philistines as an acknowledgment that they had offended the God of Israel, by bringing his ark from its proper place, for which they begged his pardon by this offering.

Then ye shall be healed, and it shall be known to you why his hand is not removed from you.] It seems their plagues still continued (notwithstanding their resolution to send home the ark), but they hoped by this offering they would be removed; and the reason would appear why they were removed no sooner: for these diviners were not sure from whence these plagues came: but by this means they thought they should either be healed, or know the ark was not the cause of their sickness.

Ver. 4. Then said they, What shall be the trespass-offering which we shall return to him?] It is very observable what reverence they had to their priests and prophets, without whose advice they would do nothing: and therefore desire to be particularly informed what the trespass-offering should be, that they might not send one that was improper. All nations thought their gods were to be appeased when they were angry, by honorary gifts, as many have observed: particularly Bochartus, in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 36. And of that opinion they were in these ancient times. But wise men still gave it in charge, "Ne quis impius oblatis donis Deum placare audeat:" that no wicked man should presume to attempt to appease God by the offering of gifts, as Cicero speaks, lib. ii. de Legibus.

They answered, Five golden emerods, and five golden mice, according to the number of the lords of the Philistines.] Who were five, and were to be at the charge of offering one for each of them. This also was a custom among the ancient heathens, to consecrate unto their gods such monuments of their deliverances, as represented the evils from which they were freed. As they dedicated to Isis and Neptune a table, which contained the express image of the shipwreck, which they had escaped: and slaves and captives, when they had regained their liberty, offered their chains. Which Christians in the fifth century began to imitate, as Bochartus observes (in the forenamed place) out of Theodoret. Accordingly the Philistines, hoping shortly to be delivered from the emerods and mice, wherewith they were sorely afflicted, sent the images of them unto that God from whom they expected deliverance. And this is still practised among the Indians, as Tavernier relates in his travels to their country, p. 92. where he saith, that when any pilgrim goes to a pagod for the cure of any disease, he brings the figure of the member affected; made either of gold, silver, or copper, according to his quality; which he offers to his god, and then falls a singing, as all others do after they have offered. Mr. Selden also hath observed, that mice were used among the ancient heathen for lustration and cleansing, de Diis Syris, Syntag. i. cap. 6.

For one plague was on you all, and on your land.] The plague of emerods upon their own bodies; and the plague of mice upon their land.

Ver. 5. Wherefore ye shall make images of the emerods, and images of your mice which mar the land.] By this it appears, that their country was infested by mice, which had eaten their corn in the field, and other fruits of the earth. Which is a plague which divers ancient authors mention, as sent upon several countries, by the anger of their gods: particularly upon a city in Mysia, and upon the country of Troas, as is observed by Huetius, in his Quæstiones Alnetanæ, lib. ii. cap. 12. n. 12. And Bochart hath collected a great many more examples of such devastations in Spain, Italy, Thrace, &c. made by mice; which have the name of achbar in Hebrew (as he thinks), signifying a destroyer of the field. (Hieroz. par. i. lib. iii. cap. 34.)

And ye shall give glory unto the God of Israel.] That is, acknowledge him, by this present to him, to be the inflicter of these plagues, and to have power to remove them; begging his pardon, and seeking for healing from him. For thus this phrase signifies in the like case, Rev. xvi. 9. where St. John complains, that after many plagues men did not repent, to give glory unto God: that is, by repenting, to acknowledge his sovereign authority, justice, holiness, &c.

Perhaps he will lighten his hand from off you, and from off your gods, and from off your land.] For they had all suffered; their gods as well as themselves, and their land.

Ver. 6. Wherefore then do ye harden your hearts, as the Egyptians and Pharaoh hardened their hearts? When he had wrought wonderfully among them.] These words seem to import, that some of them were loath to send the ark away with such presents; and objected against it: which moved the priests and diviners, to bid them take heed, lest they brought upon themselves the fate of Pharaoh, and his people. With whose history these men were acquainted; and being discreet persons made a good use of the examples of former times: and believed as much as many of the Israelites did, or rather more.

Did they not let the people go, and they departed?] When it was too late, they consented to what was demanded. The Jews say in Jalkut, that the Philistines at first said among themselves, This is the God who smote the Egyptians with ten plagues: but they are all ended. Whereupon God said, "Do you imagine I have not one plague more? I will send such a one upon you, as never was from the beginning of the world," &c. (See Buxtorf. Hist. Arcæ Fœderis, cap. 19.) If they had any such thoughts, their priests pertinently enough put them in mind of the Egyptians: that they might not make themselves like them in hardness of heart; as God had made them like in their plagues.

Ver. 7. Now therefore make a new cart, and take two milch-kine, on which there hath come no yoke.] Both these were in honour of the ark; that they employed nothing about it which had ever served for any other use. And there was another reason also for the latter of these; that they might be the more certain they were led by the God of Israel, if they went directly unto his country: for kine unaccustomed to the yoke are wont to run back, and turn out of the way into which they are put.

And tie the kine to the cart, and bring their calves home from them.] This would make it still more wonderful, if they did not return to their calves, when they heard them bleat after them; which they naturally would have done, if a greater power had not drawn them a contrary way.

Ver. 8. And take the ark of the Lord, and lay it upon the cart; and put the jewels of gold, which you return him for a trespass-offering, in a coffer by the side thereof; and send it away, that it may go.] They had either heard, or by their present sufferings were made to fear, that it was dangerous to look into the ark; and therefore they did not open it, to put their present within it; but put it in a coffer by the side of it. It is probable the word argaz (which we meet withal no where else), in the language of the Philistines, signifies either a coffer, or a purse, or a wallet, as Josephus translates it: and Bochartus thinks it likely, that these golden jewels were put into little bags, which hung on either side the ark.

Ver. 9. And see, if it go by the way of its own coast.] Without any guide: and being set (as Josephus saith) in a place where three ways met.

To Beth-shemesh.] A city in the tribe of Judah, in the confines of both countries.

Then he hath done us this great evil: but if not, then we shall know that it is not his hand that smote us; it was a chance that happened to us.] From some unknown cause.

Ver. 10. And the men did so; and took two milch-kine, and tied them to the cart, and shut up their calves at home.] The men of Ekron did all this, as the priests had directed.

Ver. 11. And they laid the ark of the Lord upon the cart, and the coffer with the mice of gold and the images of their emerods.

Ver. 12. And the kine took the straight way to the way of Beth-shemesh, and went along the highway, lowing as they went, and turned not aside to the right hand, or to the left.] Though they had no driver, nor visible director; and had such strong attractives to draw them back, and there were so many other ways in which they might have gone; yet they went directly towards Beth-shemesh, without the least deviation; lowing all the way after their calves, which had been taken from them: unto whom their natural affection would have inclined them to return, if by a higher hand they had not been led forward to the land of Judah.

And the lords of the Philistines went after them to the borders of Beth-shemesh.] To observe (as the priests advised, ver. 9.) whether of themselves they would go thither.

Ver. 13. And they of Beth-shemesh were reaping their wheat-harvest in the valley.] Which being about Pentecost, it shews the ark was taken captive in the latter end of the foregoing year. (Compare this with ver. 1.)

And they lifted up their eyes, and saw the ark, and rejoiced to see it.] Come back to them in such a wonderful manner, without any visible conductor.

Ver. 14. And the cart came into the field of Joshua, a Beth-shemite, and stood there.] This was another marvellous thing, that the kine went no further; being come into a territory of a city of the priests, (for so Beth-shemesh was, see upon Josh. xxi. 16.) who were to take care of the ark of God.

Where there was a great stone.] Which seems to have been the boundary of the two countries.

And they clave the wood of the cart, and offered the kine a burnt-offering unto the Lord.] The great stone, I suppose, serving instead of an altar; whereon they offered a whole burnt-offering of praise and thanks to God for his goodness: for they thought in reason that this cart, and these kine, should never be converted to any common use, and therefore employed them in making this sacrifice. In which the priests did not sin, though cows were not, by the law, allowed to be offered to God, and no offering was to be made, but in the place which God had chosen. For this was to be understood of ordinary offerings, not of such as an extraordinary occasion might require; and besides, the ark being here, God was so also (who as yet appointed no place for its future residence, now Shiloh was destroyed), and so their sacrifices, they thought, in reason, might be here acceptable to him. And they the rather chose to offer these cows to God, because they belonged to him, and therefore were to be his sacrifices; they having drawn his ark, and been particularly directed by him.

Ver. 15. And the Levites took down the ark of the Lord, and the coffer that was with it, wherein the jewels of gold were.] It was not the business of the Levites to take down the ark; but of the priests: who after they had disposed it to be fit for the Levites to take it upon their shoulders, the Kohathites were to carry it. (See Numb. iv. 15.)

And put them upon the great stone.] Where, it is probable, they had before offered up the kine, instead of an altar.

And the men of Beth-shemesh offered burnt-offerings, and sacrificed sacrifices, the same day unto the Lord.] The sacrifices (which they are said to sacrifice) were peace-offerings; which they added to their whole burnt-sacrifices, that they might make a feast upon them; as an expression of their great joy to see the ark returned to them in such a miraculous manner.

Ver. 16. And when the five lords of the Philistines.] Who stood upon the borders of their country, (ver. 12.)

Had seen it.] Beheld all the forenamed wonders.

They returned to Ekron the same day.] And reported, no doubt, what they had seen: which convinced them, that their plagues came from the God of Israel

Ver. 17. And these are the golden emerods, which the Philistines returned for a trespass-offering unto the Lord; for Ashdod one, for Gaza one, for Askelon one, for Gath one, for Ekron one.] Each city of this country, I suppose, was at the charge of presenting one emerod. Which cities are not reckoned in the order wherein they lay; but Ashdod being the city to which the ark was first brought, it is mentioned first. But from south to north they lay in this order Gaza, Askelon, Ashdod (which as I said was in the middle of them), Gath, and Ekron.

Ver. 18. And the golden mice, according to the number of all the cities of the Philistines belonging to the five lords, both of fenced cities, and of country villages, even unto the great stone of Abel, whereon they set down the ark of the Lord; which stone remaineth to this day in the field of Joshua the Beth-shemite.] As the golden emerods were made at the public charge of those cities, so were the mice also: unto the making of which the villages likewise contributed. For their fields being principally afflicted by the mice, as the cities were by the emerods; and they being all sharers, some way or other, in the public calamities, it was thought reasonable they should all join in this trespass-offering: which was an offering of the whole nation, as far as ever their coast extended, and that was to the great stone mentioned ver. 14. which is there called Eben-gedolah, the great stone; but here Ebel-gedolah, the great weeping, from the lamentations which were here made upon the following occasion, mentioned in the next verse.

Ver. 19. And he smote the men of Beth-shemesh, because they had looked into the ark of the Lord.] Which God had forbidden, not only to the common people, but to the sons of Levi also, (Numb. iv. 20.) But their curiosity made them forget their duty: being desirous either to see whether the Philistines had taken out the tables of the covenant; or that they might have a view of such an ancient sacred monument, written by God's own hand. Out of this story, as Bochartus ingeniously conjectures, the Greeks forged the fable of Bacchus; who was very angry with the Athenians, because they did not receive his mysteries with pomp, when they were brought out of Bœotia into Attica; and smote them with a sore disease in their secret parts. In his Canaan, lib. i. cap. 18. in the latter end.

Even he smote of the people fifty thousand and threescore and ten men.] This translation is made by an unaccountable transposition of the words: which in the Hebrew lie exactly thus, He smote of the people, threescore and ten men, fifty thousand men. Which the Gemara, with Jarchi and Kimchi, and the Targum, expound, He smote all the Sanhedrin, which were seventy men, and fifty thousand of the common people. (See Selden, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 19. n. 3.) But as it is a question whether there was any such Sanhedrin in these days, and it is certain there was not at Beth-shemesh; so it is not likely it was such a populous place, nor is there any particle to couple the last sum with the foregoing. Therefore Bochart's interpretation is far more reasonable, which is this, He smote threescore and ten men; fifty out of a thousand men. God was so indulgent, that is, as not to slay all that were guilty, but only seventy of them; observing this proportion, that out of a thousand offenders, he smote only fifty persons; that is, a twentieth part. So that of fourteen hundred that deserved punishment, he smote only seventy men; which is the twentieth part of that number. And this interpretation is very easy, only supplying the particle mem before eleph, making the sense to be out of a thousand. And he instances in many places of Scripture, where this particle is manifestly wanting, to make out the true meaning. See his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 36. p. 370. where he shews that Josephus thus understood these words, lib. vi. Antiq. cap. 2. where he saith God smote Ἑβδομήκοντα τῶν ἐκ τῆς Βηθσάμης κώμης, seventy of those of the village of Beth-shemesh. And thus Abarbinel also understands the first words, that he smote at Beth-shemesh only seventy men; the other number, he thinks, refers to those who were slain in the country of the Philistines; the story whereof is now finished. For the particle beth, he thinks, signifies as much as with, in this manner: Together with the seventy of Beth-shemesh, he smote in all fifty thousand, because of the ark. But Bochartus's interpretation is most natural; which is highly applauded by another person of very great learning, Johan. Wagenselius, who, in his annotations upon the Gemara of Sota, (cap. 7. sect. 15.) saith, "Ipsa veritas militat," Truth itself defends this opinion of Bochartus. And indeed it cannot be conceived, there should be so many as our translation supposes, to be slain at Beth-shemesh, and the coasts thereof, being but a village; or if there had, it is very improbable that God would smite so many at once: for there would have been none left to make lamentation. Therefore, as the Romans decimated the soldiers that had offended; that is, put every tenth man to death; so God here punished half so many for this offence of looking into the ark.

And the people lamented, because the Lord had smitten of the people with a great slaughter.] It was a great slaughter, considering the smallness of this place; as Abarbinel glosses upon these words, who takes it, as Josephus doth, for a village. And it is not strange that some should be smitten with death; for it was always accounted, in all nations, a great profaneness for any one that was not initiated to look into their mysteries; to prevent which hereafter God made so many examples of his displeasure in this place. Instances of those among the heathen, who were struck blind, or upon whom some other calamity fell upon such account, the illustrious Spanhemius hath noted in his observations upon Callimachus's hymn in Lavacrum Palladis, ver. 34. yea, though they did it ignorantly, as he shews upon ver. 78. 82. p. 606. (See also Huetius, in his Alnetanæ Quæstiones, lib. ii. cap. 12. p. 200.)

Ver. 20. And the men of Beth-shemesh said, Who is able to stand before this holy Lord God? and to whom shall he go up from us?] They seem by this to be sensible of their rashness, and acknowledge the holiness of God to be such, that they were not worthy of his Divine presence among them; but desires that some who could do him honour better than they, might take the ark into their care. But Abarbinel thinks they were only struck with a great fear, as the Philistines were when God plagued them; which made them send the ark from one place to another, as they of Beth-shemesh now sent to those of Kirjath-jearim, to come and fetch the ark to their city; fearing more of them should die, if it stayed with them at Beth-shemesh.

Ver. 21. And they sent messengers to the inhabitants of Kirjath-jearim, saying, The Philistines have brought again the ark of the Lord; come ye down, and fetch it unto you.] This was a city which stood upon a hill, and therefore they desired them to come down from thence. And being a strong place, there they thought the ark might be secure, in case of any new incursions of their enemies. See concerning this city, Josh. xv. 9, 10. where it is called also Kirjath-Baal, xviii. 14. and Baalah, or Baal-Judah, 2 Sam. vi. 2. 1 Chron. xiii. 6.

CHAP. VII.

Ver. 1. AND the men of Kirjath-jearim came, and fetched up the ark of the Lord.] They cheerfully received the message; and were so far from thinking themselves in danger by entertaining it, that they thought it a blessing, and kept it with them till the reign of David.

And brought it to the house of Abinadab in the hill.] In the highest part, I suppose, of the city: as David afterward placed it upon Mount Sion.

And sanctified Eleazar his son to keep the ark of the Lord.] Which belonged to the Levites: therefore Abinadab was of that tribe, otherwise he could not have consecrated (i. e. set apart, or solemnly appointed) his son to keep the ark, i. e. to attend it, and see that no rudeness was offered to it; as well as to keep a guard about it, to defend it from violence. If it be inquired why they did not carry the ark to Shiloh, its ancient seat, the answer is, that the Philistines had destroyed that place; and the tabernacle, upon the death of Eli, was removed from thence unto Nob, where it remained till the death of Samuel. And after his death it was carried to Gibeon, where it remained fifty years, according to the account of the author of Seder Olam Rabba. All which time the ark was in Kirjath-jearim, till David brought it first to the house of Obed-Edom, and then to his own city. After which the tabernacle still remained at Gibeon till Solomon's temple was built, 1 Chron. xvi. 39. 2 Chron. i. 3. where we read, that, even after the death of his father, Solomon sacrificed at Gibeon, the tabernacle being there.

Ver. 2. And it came to pass, while the ark abode in Kirjath-jearim, the time was long; for it was twenty years.] This is not to be understood of the whole time that the ark remained here; for it continued, as I said before, in this place, till the time of David, (2 Chron. vi. 3.) which was about forty-six years; therefore it refers to the following words.

And all the house of Israel lamented after the Lord.] Or rather (as Dr. Lightfoot translates them), Then all the house of Israel, &c. Their idolatry had taken such deep root in them, that neither the loss of the ark, nor the slaughter of so many Israelites, wrought upon their hearts. But it was twenty years before they minded the ark, or took any notice of it. Then they were awakened to some sense of their duty, and began to seek the favour of God, and lament their apostacy from him. (See his Annot. on this place, and upon Acts iii. 24. p. 758.) And one reason why they did not regard the ark, was, perhaps, because it was now seated in the borders of the country of the Philistines, of whom they were afraid. And this is the sense of Abarbinel. For though others think, that from the day that the ark came to Kirjath-jearim, the Israelites began to lament their sins, and to turn to God; having heard of the miracles that had been done in the land of the Philistines, &c. yet he doth not approve of this opinion; but will have their lamentation to begin after the ark had been twenty years at this place, where it remained many more years than twenty.

Ver. 3. And Samuel spake unto all the house of Israel.] Who were assembled at some solemn festival; or were summoned by him to attend him; for after the death of Eli he began to judge Israel.

If you return to the Lord with all your heart.] By this it appears, that his reproofs and instructions, and the representation he had made of their sin, and of their danger, had touched their hearts, and made them begin to lament themselves, and seek his favour; whereupon he exhorts them to give this following proof of their sincerity.

Then put away the strange gods and Ashtaroth from among you.] By the strange gods I take Baalim to be meant; which are frequently joined with Ashtaroth, as they are in the very next verse to this, where their obedience to this exhortation is reported. (And see upon Judg. ii. 12, 13. 17. iii. 7. viii. 33.)

And prepare your heart unto the Lord.] By serious resolutions.

To serve him only.] As it follows in the next verse.

And he will deliver you out of the hands of the Philistines.] Who had now oppressed them, less or more, for the space of forty years.

Ver. 4. Then the children of Israel did put away Baalim and Ashtaroth, and served the Lord only.] There was now, I suppose, a general reformation made in the worship of God.

Ver. 5. And Samuel said, Gather all Israel to Mizpeh.] A place where they had been wont anciently to assemble upon great occasions. (See upon Judg. xx. 1.)

And I will pray for you unto the Lord.] To accept of their repentance, and pardon their sins, and establish them in their good resolution to serve the Lord alone; and to deliver them out of the hand of the Philistines. For all which he could have prayed alone by himself; but he thought their public prayer would be more effectual.

Ver. 6. And they gathered in Mizpeh, and drew water, and poured it out before the Lord, and fasted on that day, and said there, We have sinned against the Lord.] This being a day of humiliation, fasting, and prayer, as appears by the latter part of these words, interpreters commonly expound the former part of them, as belonging to the same matter. And some think, as the Targum doth, that by pouring out water, is to be understood the tears of contrition, which were drawn from the bottom of their hearts, and fell from their eyes before the Lord. Others think they washed their bodies in water, signifying the purification of their souls from the filthiness of sin. And others (which Bochartus himself thinks more probable), that this water was poured on the ground, in token of the expiation of their sin, which they desired and hoped might be remembered no more: as water poured on the ground could no more be seen. Unto which they think a place in Job alludes: (xi. 16.) but we no where find any such rite as this among the Jews, either in ancient or later times. And the conjecture of Fortunatus Scacchus seems more ingenious, that an altar being to be erected to offer sacrifice, they poured out water to cleanse the ground, that it might not be set up in an impure place, (Myrothec. Elæochrysm. Sacr. ii. cap. 31.) But after all, I think the interpretation which Constantine L'Empereur hath given of these words (in his annot. on Codex Middoth, cap. 2.) is far more reasonable; which is, that they poured out water in token of joy, after they had fasted and confessed their sins (for he translates the words, "Postquam jejunarunt," after they had fasted on that day), as they were wont to do in the feast of tabernacles: unto which he refers those words in Isa. xii. 3. in which the prophet foretels the joy that should be in the days of the Messiah, by saying, "Ye shall draw waters with joy out of the wells of salvation:" alluding to a known rite among the Israelites in the feast of tabernacles, unto which our Saviour is thought to allude, John vii. 37, 38. And there is the greater reason for this interpretation, because Samuel had just before promised them, that the Lord would deliver them from the Philistines, if they heartily repented: which made them rejoice in hope of it, because they did now sincerely turn to him.

And Samuel judged the children of Israel in Mizpeh.] When they were reconciled to God, he reconciled them one to another, by determining their differences and doing right where any one was wronged: or he declared the law to them whereby they were to be judged; and, perhaps, punished some gross idolaters, or other great offenders.

Ver. 7. And when the Philistines heard that the children of Israel were gathered together at Mizpeh, the lords of the Philistines went up against Israel.] Being ignorant of the true reasons of this meeting, the Philistines imagined the Israelites assembled to consult about war, and so resolved to be beforehand with them, and surprise them.

And when the children of Israel heard it, they were afraid of the Philistines.] Being unarmed, I suppose, or not prepared to give them battle.

Ver. 8. And the children of Israel said unto Samuel, Cease not to cry unto the Lord our God for us, that he will save us out of the hands of the Philistines.] According to the promise made to them, (ver. 3.)

Ver. 9. And Samuel took a sucking lamb.] For after a lamb was eight days old, it was fit to be sacrificed unto God, (Exod. xxii. 30. Lev. xvii. 27.) The Hebrew word tale is the name for the youngest sheep, as ajil is for the eldest, and chebes for one between both.

And offered it for a burnt-offering wholly unto the Lord.]

Whereby he supplicated the Divine mercy, as the son of Sirach explains it: (Ecclus. xlvi. 16.) "He called upon the mighty Lord, when his enemies pressed him on every side, ἐν προσφορᾷ, by the obligation of a sucking lamb."

And Samuel cried unto the Lord God of Israel; and the Lord heard him.] Which is a demonstration, that though he was not a priest, nor this place appointed for sacrifice, yet, as a prophet, he had authority from God to build an altar any where, and to make his supplication in this manner. Thus other holy men, Gideon and Manoah, were warranted to offer extraordinary sacrifices in places which God had not before appointed. And it is probable that God answered Samuel, as he did Manoah, by fire consuming the sacrifice, in testimony of God's acceptance, (Judg. xiii. 20.) And thus we read of an altar he built in another place, ver. 17. as Elijah did in following times.

Ver. 10. And as Samuel was offering up the burnt-offering.] Before it was consumed.

The Philistines drew near to battle against Israel.] Hoping to find them unprepared. The son of Sirach saith, they of Tyre joined with the Philistines in this action, (Ecclus. xlvi. 17.)

But the Lord thundered with a great thunder on that day upon the Philistines, and discomfited them; and they were smitten before Israel.] They were affrighted, like men out of their wits, with thunder and lightning; which killed many of them before the Israelites could come up to fight them. For, together with this horrible tempest, Josephus saith there was an earthquake, and that the earth opened in several places, and swallowed up some of them, who, like blind men, ran into those gaps.

Ver. 11. And the men of Israel went out of Mizpeh, and pursued after the Philistines.] Having Samuel to lead them, as their captain, according to Josephus.

And smote them, until they came under Beth-car.] A place in the confines of the tribe of Judah. This victory was the more wonderful, because we do not find the Israelites came appointed with any weapons to Mizpeh; but, as far as can be gathered by the relation of the fight, they smote them with their own weapons; which the Philistines threw away when they fled, and which were found among those that were slain by the lightning.

Ver. 12. And Samuel took a stone, and set it up between Mizpeh and Shen.] So Jacob and Joshua had done, as monuments of God's mercy to them, and their obligations to him.

And called the name of it Eben-ezer, saying, Hitherto hath the Lord helped us.] That is, thus far we have gotten the better: for they were not utterly destroyed, but driven quite out of their coasts, as it follows in the next verse.

Ver. 13. So the Philistines were subdued, and they came no more into the coast of Israel.] He put an end to the forty years' tyranny of the Philistines, mentioned Judg. xiii. 1. (See my notes there, and upon ver. 5. of that chapter, and Judg. xv. 20.)

And the hand of the Lord was against the Philistines all the days of Samuel.] As in this battle he gave them such an overthrow, that they were quite driven out of the country of Israel: so, during Samuel's government, until Saul was made king, we never read that they attempted with an army to invade them; but then they did, (xiii. 19.)

Ver. 14. And the cities which the Philistines had taken from Israel were restored to Israel.] They not only expelled the Philistines, but recovered also several places of which the Philistines had possessed themselves, during their dominion over them.

From Ekron even unto Gath; and the coasts thereof did Israel deliver out of the hands of the Philistines.] Ekron was in the tribe of Judah, (Josh. xv. 45.) which the Philistines now forsook out of fear, as some think: or were driven out of it for the present, though it was not long before they got possession of it again.

And there was peace between Israel and the Amorites.] Not by compact and covenant; but by the inclination of both sides, they abstained from all hostile actions. The Amorites were not the only remainders of the old inhabitants of Canaan; but being the most powerful among them, they had long given name to the rest, (Gen. xv. 16.) And now the Philistines were thus subdued, none of them, who used to infest the Israelites, durst stir to give them any molestation, but sat quiet and still.

Ver. 15. And Samuel judged Israel all the days of his life.] From these words Mr. Hobbes and his followers draw an argument that this was written by somebody after the death of Samuel. Which is a very weak proof: for the sense may be no more than this: that Samuel was so diligent in the discharge of his office, that he gave himself no rest, but sat to judge causes every day.

Ver. 16. And he went from year to year in a circuit to Beth-el, and Gilgal, and Mizpeh, and judged Israel in all those places.] Ἐν πᾶσι τοῖς ἡγιασμένοις τούτοις, in all these sanctified places, as the LXX. translate these last words (though there be no such thing in the Hebrew), because, as Mr. Mede conjectures, here were proseuchas, i. e. places of prayer, in those ancient days. But we may more certainly gather from hence, that there was no such high court then established (which they called the Sanhedrin in following ages) to judge all causes; at least, not such inferior courts as were appointed by the law in Deut. xvi. 18. as the high court is in Deut. xviii. 8. For if there had, there would have been no need of Samuel's riding circuit every year about the country to do justice, as other judges had done. (Judg. v. 10. x. 4. xii. 14.)

Ver. 17. And his return was to Ramah; for there was his house: and there he judged Israel.] The power of the judges was greatest in war: but when it was over, they still retained such an authority, that all difficult causes (at least) were brought before them. They were consulted also in all political affairs: and, that they might know where to resort to Samuel, when he had ended his circuit, he kept his constant station at Ramah.

And there he built an altar unto the Lord.] There being no declaration yet made where God would have the ark to be fixed, after the destruction of Shiloh, he built an altar where he himself constantly resided. Because it was fit, when they consulted about any public business, concerning the good of the commonwealth of Israel, that there should be a public invocation of God's direction and blessing: which was done by sacrifice, as appears from ver. 9.

CHAP. VIII.

Ver. 1. AND it came to pass, when Samuel was old.] The Jews in Seder Olam Rabba, and other books, make

Samuel to have lived no more than fifty-two years; when he could not be said to be old. Therefore Abarbinel forsakes the doctors in this, and shews their proofs of it to be very weak; and thinks that he rather lived until he was seventy, if not eighty years old. But less than seventy, he affirms, none of the prophets or good men lived.

That he made his sons judges over Israel.] When he could not well sustain all the labour, he took them to assist him: both when he went his circuit, and in hearing causes at home. Or, perhaps, when he was old, he went circuit no more; but settled them in a convenient place (as it follows in the next verse) where people might have justice done them, either by him or by them.

Ver. 2. Now the name of his first-born was Joel, and the name of his second Abijah; they were judges in Beer-sheba.] As his constant residence was at Ramah, so he ordered theirs to be at Beer-sheba. Whereby, as Corn. Bertram observes, (cap. 9. de Repub. Jud.) the country was divided into two parts, for the greater convenience of the people; that the causes of all those who dwelt between Dan and Mount Ephraim, might be brought to be judged by Samuel at Ramah; and the causes of those between Mount Ephraim and Beer-sheba, might be judged by his sons.

Ver. 3. And his sons walked not in his ways, but turned aside after lucre, and took bribes, and perverted judgment.] Covetousness made them take bribes, (contrary to the law, Exod. xviii. 8.) and they made them pervert judgment. (See Exod. xxiii. 21. Deut. xvi. 19.) Procopius Gazæus here asks this question: Why God did not punish Samuel as he did Eli, for the wickedness of his sons? Unto which he answers, that Samuel's sons were not so bad as Eli's: for taking bribes privately, was not like open profaning the tabernacle, and making the worship of God contemptible. And, besides, it is possible Samuel might be ignorant of this corruption in his sons: who did not live near him, but he in Ramah, and they at Beer-sheba.

Ver. 4. And all the elders of Israel gathered themselves together, and came to Samuel unto Ramah.] All the great men who were dissatisfied with the management of affairs came to Ramah: which was one of the places where Samuel judged the people, and determined their controversies, (vii. 16, 17.)

And they said unto him, Behold, thou art old, and thy sons walk not in thy ways: make us a king to judge us like all the nations.] The weakness of Samuel's body, and the ill disposition of his sons' minds, they make their pretence of demanding what they had long desired to have. The Gemara of the Sanhedrin, cap. 2. sect. 6. according to the tradition of R. Eliezer, saith, the elders were in the right in desiring a king to judge them: for, according to the opinion of some of their doctors, this was one of the three things God commanded to be done, when they came into Canaan, that they should make them a king. The only error was, which arose, they say, from the perverseness of the vulgar people, that they desired a king like all the nations. But these are mere fancies; for God gave no such command, as their best authors, Bechai, Nachman, Ralbag, and others, acknowledge. But their own pride and vanity suggested these desires to them, that they might not want that outward pomp and show which was among their neighbours. Fear also of a potent enemy, who was about to invade them, might make them think a king necessary to lead them on successfully to encounter him, (ver. 20. and xii. 12.) But above all, this proceeded from their insensibility of the great honour they enjoyed above all mankind, in being under the peculiar government of God: for whom they had so little regard, that he saith, (ver. 7.) they despised him; that is, made nothing of such a King as they could not see. But that he had the supreme power over them was apparent, in that when they prayed Samuel to make them a king, immediately he prayed to God; shewing it was not in his power to do it, but in God alone.

Ver. 6. But the thing displeased Samuel, when they said, Give us a king to judge us. And Samuel prayed unto the Lord.] To give him direction what to do in this case: but thus far the elders were in the right, that they came to the prophet to ask a king: for none, as I said, could make one, but the Lord alone, who was their sovereign.

Ver. 7. And the Lord said, Hearken unto the voice of the people in all that they say unto thee.] These are the words of an angry sovereign, (Hos. xiii. 11.) being as much as to say, Let them have their will. Which he indulged to them, partly to punish them, and partly to preserve them from apostacy from their religion. For being as violently set upon having a king, after the manner of the Egyptians, as they had been to follow their gods, they might have thrown off the law itself, and conformed entirely to the customs of other nations, if they had not been humoured: for they were so set upon it, as appears from ver. 19. that after the prophet had represented to them, how much they would lose by having their desires granted, they persisted in them, saying, "Nay, but we will have a king," &c. Which expresses a resolution to have one whatsoever became of them.

For they have not rejected thee, but they have rejected me, that I should not reign over them.] These words shew that Samuel took it very heavily, that they should be dissatisfied with his government: but God tells him, he himself had more reason to be angry: for, in truth, they had thrown off his authority, who was their king: (as Samuel tells them afterward, xii. 12.) and therefore was highly offended they should desire any other. Which the Jewish doctors abovementioned (ver. 5.) justly make an argument that God did not command them in the book of Deuteronomy to make them a king; because he was displeased when they desired to have one. For the supreme Lord of the world was their sovereign; who governed them by judges, whom he raised up and extraordinarily inspired, when he saw occasion: as he had before conducted them by Joshua and Moses, who never ordained any thing of moment without a special command for it from God: who reserved to himself the sole power of establishing laws, and appointing magistrates, and making war, as appears by the war against the Midianites, Numb. xxxi. For there is no truth in their opinion, who imagine that the government of the Israelites, before they had a king, was an aristocracy. Josephus, indeed, seems to say so, in one or two places of his Antiquities: but, in his book against Appion (a very learned gentile), wherein he writes most accurately, he makes it a distinct sort of government, different from all other; which he truly calls by a new name, Θεοκρατία, the government of God, (lib. ii.) For God exercised the supreme authority among them, by his express command. Which being without example, that it may not seem incredible to those who are wont to detract from the sacred history, it may be fit to observe, (to use the words of Hermannus Conringius, in his animadversions on Machiavel's Princeps, cap. 6.) that the demons, who were worshipped as gods by the gentiles, attempted to imitate this, by setting up a like government. So that memorable history of the original of the commonwealth of the Cyrenians in Egypt, mentioned by Diodorus Siculus, Strabo, Pausanias, Justin, and others; and that history of the beginning of Heraclea in Pontus, which Justin relates, lib. xvi. cap. 3. For this republic being raised by the express command of demons, was, upon that account, they say, exceeding flourishing. No less memorable is the republic of the Mexicans in America, erected by the command of their demon Vitzipultzi: who, above all others, endeavoured to imitate the miracles wrought by God for the Israelites. Many others, he there shews, pretended to this: though all was transacted by themselves.

Ver. 8. According to all the works that they have done, since the day that I brought them out of Egypt unto this day, wherewith they have forsaken me, and served other gods, so do they also unto thee.] No wonder they desired another sort of ruler than Samuel, for they had chosen other gods. And this had been their wicked humour ever since they were delivered from the tyranny of Pharaoh.

Ver. 9. Now therefore hearken unto their voice.] Since they had no greater regard unto God and his minister; he resolved to let them exchange his government for such a one as the nations had, who often oppressed them.

Howbeit yet protest solemnly unto them, and shew them the manner of the king that shall reign over them.] He continuing still their king, God was so very gracious as to order Samuel to lay before them at large, into what servitude they were going to throw themselves by casting off the government of judges set over them by God himself; and subjecting themselves to the power of such kings as ruled in other nations.

Ver. 10. And Samuel told all the words of the Lord unto the people that asked of him a king.] How ill God took it, looking upon it as a rejection of himself; who had hitherto governed them most graciously, and often delivered them from the heaviest oppressions. For he either stirred up some person, by an immediate signification of his will and pleasure, to be their judge: or, when there was none, he was ready to rule their proceedings himself, by urim and thummim, directing them what course to follow in the public concerns of the nation. These two things plainly demonstrated (as our Mr. Thorndike hath well observed) that God was their king, whom they now cast off. (See Review of the Rites of the Church, p. 68. 133.)

Ver. 11. And he said, This shall be the manner of the king that shall reign over you.] And, moreover, he declared what kind of government they chose instead of God's. There are various opinions about the jus regium, the royal power, here mentioned. Which containing divers particulars that seem arbitrary and unjust, interpreters have chosen to expound the Hebrew word mishpat, not by jus, but by mos and consuetudo; that is, not by right, but by manner and custom. And so the words may be translated, as Joseph Scaliger observed long ago from many instances, (Epist. xv.) particularly Gen. xl. 13. and in this book, xxvii. 11. (See Petavius also upon Epiphanius, Hæres. lv. n. 9.) But there is no necessity of this, as Grotius rightly observes, and from him Conringius. For Samuel doth not speak of a just and honest right of a king to do these things (for his right is quite otherwise described in that part of Moses's law which concerns the king's duty), but such a right as the kings of the nations had then acquired: for they desired such a king as their neighbours had; who were all under the absolute dominion of their princes. Which Aristotle calls, δεσποτικὴν ἀρχήν· lib. v. polit. cap. 10. Οἱ περὶ τὴν Ἀσίαν ὑπομένουσι μὲν δεσποτικὴν ἀρχὴν οὐδὲν, δυσχεραίνοντες, They of Asia endure a despotic government, nothing at all complaining.

He will take your sons, and appoint them for himself.] To attend him as the guards of his body, and in other offices. This shews that he speaks of an arbitrary power, which kings in those days used. And therefore Abarbinel observes, that Samuel doth not say absolutely, I will shew you the manner or right of the king (as if it were a right belonging to all kings), but that shall reign over you; that is, of such a king as you desire, who will administer affairs in this fashion.

For his chariots, and to be his horsemen.] To look after his chariots and his horses. For so the word paras signifies (as Lud. de Dieu and Bochartus have observed), and these words should be thus translated, For his chariots and his horses.

And some shall run before his chariots.] Be his footmen.

Ver. 12. And he will appoint him captains over thousands, and captains over fifties.] Others should be disposed of to military offices, higher or lower, as pleased him, (xiv. 52.) who were to be perfectly subject to him, and displaced by him when he thought good.

And will set them to ear his ground, and to reap his harvest.] Others should be made husbandmen, to plough his ground and reap his corn on his own terms; when, perhaps, their labour was necessary about their own fields.

And to make his instruments of war, and instruments of his chariots.] Others he would make artificers: which was not very agreeable to that nation, who were inclined from their beginning rather to look after the breed of cattle.

Ver. 13. And he will take your daughters to be confectioners, and to be cooks, and to be bakers.] He would exercise, he shews, as arbitrary power over the women as over the men; whom he would make to serve in such employments as he thought fit, either for nothing, or such wages as he pleased to give them.

Ver. 14. And he will take your fields, and your vineyards, and your olive-yards, even the best of them, and give them to his servants.] Bestow them on such of his courtiers as he thought good to raise to great estates. Which is not to be understood as if he should challenge a right to take their lands from them (for the contrary appears from the story of Ahab, who without a very wicked contrivance could not possess himself of Naboth's vineyard), but that he should take the fruit of them when he thought it necessary, especially in time of war, to gratify his soldiers. To this case Abarbinel confines the sense of these words.

Ver. 15. And he will take the tenth of your seed, and of your vineyards.] This was part of the jus regium in the eastern countries, (see my notes upon Gen. xxviii. 22.) to have the tenth part of the fruit of the land for the king's share: and if they contented themselves with this portion they were accounted good kings. As Cypselus, king of Corinth, is observed by Aristotle to have exacted no more of his subjects than the tenth of their fruits. Such capitations and taxes, as Bodinus speaks, (lib. vi. de Republ. cap. 2.) which are usual now, being unknown in those days.

And give to his officers, and to his servants.] This revenue being brought into his exchequer, he therewith paid his bedchamber-men, and other servants, their salaries. I call them bedchamber-men, because the Hebrew word (which we translate officers) signifies eunuchs (as the LXX. here translate it), who commonly attended them in their chambers. And it was the more grievous to have such men maintained out of this revenue, because they were strangers: for it was not lawful for the Jews to make any of their nation an eunuch. This revenue itself also proved a heavy burden upon the Jews, because this tenth part was exacted out of the remainder, after the tenth part had been paid to the Levites, as Kimchi and Abarbinel observe.

Ver. 16. And he will take your men-servants, and your maid-servants, and your goodliest young men.] The most beautiful and proper persons he could find.

And your asses, and put them to his work.] Either at the plough, or for carriage, or any other employment wherein they were necessary.

Ver. 17. And he will take the tenth of your sheep: and ye shall be his servants.] So subject to him, that, if he pleased, they should be no better than his slaves. I know none that hath discoursed this whole matter so perspicuously and fully, as the late learned Puffendorf, whose words I shall translate, as I find them in his book, De Rebus Gestis Philippi. This people, saith he, had hitherto lived under governors raised up by Divine instinct, who had exacted no tribute of them, nor put them to any charges. With which government they being not contented, but desiring to have a king, like other nations, that should live in pomp and splendour, and keep standing forces about him, to be ready to resist any invasion; Samuel informs them what it was they desired, that they might consider, when they understood it, whether they would persist in their choice: if they would have a king magnificently attended, then he tells them, the king will take their sons, and put them in his chariots, &c. (ver. 11.) If they would have him keep up constant forces, then he must appoint them for colonels and captains, and employ those in his wars who were wont to follow their family business, (ver. 12.) And since, after the manner of other kings, he must keep a stately court, they must be content that their daughters (ver. 13.) should serve in several offices; which the king would think below the dignity of his wives and daughters. Many ministers also in several employments, both in war and peace, must have salaries to support them; which must be paid out of their fields and vineyards, (ver. 14.) For which services, he tells them, the king will exact the tenth of all belonging to them, that he may maintain his royal expenses. In one word, if you will have a king, he must be maintained, after a royal manner, out of your estates.

Ver. 18. And ye shall cry out in that day, because of your king which you have chosen.] This shews, that, in all the foregoing verses, Samuel describes the uncontrollable power which the eastern princes exercised over their subjects; who were patiently to bear whatsoever their princes imposed upon them, without any power to help themselves. For, as Grotius observes, this mishpat doth not signify a true right, but such a fact as hath effectum juris (the effect of right), viz. an obligation of not resisting: which is the reason that Samuel adds these words; that the people, loaded with intolerable oppressions, should implore the help of God: because there was no human remedy left for their relief. (See lib. i. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 4. sect. 3.) This plainly confutes the fancy of the Jews concerning their Sanhedrin, and their power to scourge princes: for, as Samuel consulted nobody in making a king, but God alone; so, when he was made, he got such a power, that it is ridiculous to think that high court could control him.

And the Lord will not hear you in that day.] But leave them under this heavy yoke; because they would not hearken unto him, when he represented to them what would be the effect of that power which they desired him to set over them.

Ver. 19. Nevertheless the people refused to obey the voice of Samuel: and they said, Nay; but we will have a king over us.] This description of the government of the eastern kings did not deter them from persisting in their desires. But they peremptorily demanded a king, though Samuel told them that this demand was a throwing off the government of God. Who always heard their cry, when they were oppressed by their enemies; but now would leave them without any help, when they groaned under the oppression of their kings. Which obstinacy, as an excellent person of ours (Dr. Jackson) speaks, did prognosticate that incurable and desperate disease, which had its fatal crisis in their rejecting Christ: who was both priest and prophet, and their lawful king. In casting off whom they could not but cast off God, that he should not reign over them. And so a great admirer of his paraphraseth the seventh verse of this chapter: Let it not grieve thy spirit that they grow weary of thee: but let them have their will, for so will they serve the Lord and thy Redeemer.

Ver. 20. That we may be like all other nations.] Strange blindness! that they could not see it was their singular felicity, that they were not like other nations: but had God for their governor, who never failed, in time of need, to raise up men of wonderful worth to be their deliverers. It was their vain-glorious humour, therefore, that made them think they were inferior to other nations, unless they saw a prince set over them shining in gold and jewels, living in a sumptuous palace, attended with guards richly clothed, appearing in great pomp and state, as they did in other countries; which they fancied would be for the glory of their land.

To judge us, and go out before us, and fight our battles.] There was anciently a respect to their military virtue, in the choice of their kings; the very word rex, among the Romans, having its original from their abilities to govern armies, and keep them in good order and discipline. Such were all those great men whom God had raised up, as there was occasion, to judge Israel. Who had been so successful when they fought for them, that they were always victorious; which they could not promise themselves their kings would be; the very first of which was slain in battle.

Ver. 21. And Samuel heard all the words of the people, and rehearsed them in the ears of the Lord.] As he had told all the words of the Lord unto the people, (ver. 10.)

Ver. 22. And the Lord said unto Samuel, Hearken unto their voice, and make them a king.] Such as they desired, like those of other nations: for so it appears in the following history many of them were, as Samuel had predicted. Witness the words of the people to Rehoboam, concerning Solomon's government, (1 Kings xii. 4.) And the tyrannical words of Jezabel to Ahab, about Naboth's vineyard, (1 Kings xxi. 7.) And all the violence of Manasseh, who shed innocent blood very much, till he had filled Jerusalem with it, (2 Kings xxi. 16.) And what David himself did, in the matter of Uriah, when he had defiled his wife, (2 Sam. xi. 15, 16.)

And Samuel said unto the men of Israel.] To the elders of the people, who had attended him about this matter.

Go ye every man unto his city.] He bade them leave the business unto him; and God, he doubted not, would set a king over them.

CHAP. IX.

Ver. 1. NOW there was a man of Benjamin, whose name was Kish, the son of Abiel, the son of Zeror, the son of Bechorath, the son of Aphiah, a Benjamite.] In this genealogy there is no difficulty but one; which is, that in two places of the Chronicles it is said, that Ner begat Kish, (1 Chron. viii. 37. ix. 39.) But by begetting there must be meant, the giving him his breeding and education. For it is evident Ner was Kish's brother, (1 Sam. xiv. 51.) D. Kimchi will have it that he had two names, Abiel and Ner.

A mighty man of power.] This seems not to be meant of his wealth or interest in his country, (for Saul himself saith he was of a mean family, ver. 21.) but of his great strength, courage, and fortitude; which is therefore mentioned, because it hath been often observed, that fortes creantur fortibus.

Ver. 2. And he had a son, whose name was Saul, a choice young man, and a goodly; and there was not among the children of Israel a goodlier person than he: from his shoulders and upward he was higher than any of the people.] They desired a king like the rest of the nations, who looked upon persons of an heroic stature and countenance to be marked out for empire. Whence the saying of Euripides, Εἶδος ἄξιον τυραννίδος; and that of Curtius, "Quippe hominibus barbaris in corporum majestate veneratio est." But no words are more memorable, to this purpose, than those of Pliny, in the conclusion of his fourth chapter of his panegyric to Trajan, where he saith, the strength and talness of his body, the nobleness of his aspect, the dignity of his mouth, the gracefulness of his speech, &c. "Nonne longe lateque principem ostentant?" Do they not every where proclaim a prince? This was a thing so carefully provided for in ancient times, to have a goodly race of kings, that the Lacedemonians set a fine upon their king Archidamus (as Plutarch tells us in the beginning of his book, περὶ παιδῶν ἀγωγῆς) for marrying a wife of a low stature; who was likely to bring them, οὐ βασιλέας ἀλλὰ βασιλίσκους, not kings but kinglings, to reign over them.

Ver. 3. And the asses of Kish, Saul's father, were lost.] Wandered out of their pasture.

And Kish said unto Saul his son, Take now one of the servants with thee, and arise, go and seek the asses.] It is no wonder that he was employed in this inquiry, for I suppose he had the charge of looking after his father's cattle: which was an employment the greatest men did not disdain in ancient time: as we learn from the history of Hercules and Paris, and others among the Greeks. And in Judea asses were a considerable part of their substance: for the greatest persons rode upon asses till the time of Solomon, when horses began to be multiplied, (Judg. x. 4.)

Ver. 4. And they passed through Mount Ephraim, and they passed through the land of Shalisha, but they found them not; then they passed through the land of Shalim, and there they were not, &c.] They searched, that is, all the mountainous country of the tribe of Ephraim, which lay next to Benjamin, after they had first gone through that tribe, as it here follows:

And they passed through the land of Benjamin, &c.] Or, they had passed through the land of Benjamin; where hearing no tidings of them, they went into the next country, to see if they were strayed thither.

Ver. 5. And when they were come to the land of Zuph.] A territory in the tribe of Ephraim, where some of Samuel's ancestors had lived, (i. 1.) and Ramah, where Samuel now dwelt, seems to have been in it; as we may gather from the next verse.

Saul said to his servant that was with him, Come, let us return.] Being uncertain whither to go next, after they had sought so many places in vain.

Lest my father leave caring for the asses, and take thought for us.] Be afraid that we are lost. The Hebrew word, as Dr. Hammond observes, (upon Psal. xxxviii. 18.) signifies solicitude of mind, mixed with grief and sorrow.

Ver. 6. And he said unto him, Behold now, there is in this city a man of God.] A prophet.

And he is an honourable man.] A person of great fame, and held in high esteem.

All that he saith comes surely to pass.] Which procured him such honour.

Now, let us go thither; peradventure he can shew us our way that we should go.] To find the asses.

Ver. 7. Then said Saul to his servant, But, behold, if we go, what shall we bring the man?] This was a part of the honour they did to great men in those countries, to make them a present, when they had occasion to address themselves to them. Particularly prophets were thus honoured; being men of God; before whom they were not to appear empty. Thus also they demonstrated their reverence to their king, in the next chapter of this book, (ver. 27.)

For the bread is spent in our vessels, and there is not a present to bring to the man of God: what have we?] Provision for their table was as acceptable a present as money: which appears from what Jeroboam's wife brought to Ahijah the prophet, (1 Kings xiv. 3.)

Ver. 8. And the servant answered Saul again, and said, Behold, I have here at hand a fourth part of a shekel of silver; that will I give to the man of God to tell us our way.] A small present, but as acceptable as the widow's mite; being all they had left in their travels.

Ver. 9. Beforetime in Israel, when a man went to inquire of God.] By consulting a prophet.

Thus he spake, Come, let us go to the seer: for he that is now called a prophet, was beforetime called a seer.] Though the word nabi (a prophet) had been anciently known, as appears by the books of Moses; and used in Samuel's days, as appears from many places in this book; yet the more common word, which now prevailed, when Saul was anointed king (for in all languages words are in and out of fashion, in several times), was roeh (a seer). But in following years, when Samuel wrote this book, nabi was become the more usual word in all men's mouths. This is a fair account of these words, from whence some argue, that Samuel was not the author of this book, nor Moses the author of the Pentateuch: where Abraham is called nabi; (xx. 7.) which shews that this was no new word in these days, as they would have this place understood. But it might be sufficient to answer unto this, that nabi did not signify, in ancient times, one that foretold things to come; but only one that was familiar with God, and was instructed in his will, that he might instruct others. But now, in Samuel's time, it came to be appropriated to the revealing future things, and foretelling what should come to pass, or revealing secrets, which none could know but God.

Ver. 10. Then said Saul to his servant, Well said; let us go. So they went to the city where the man of God dwelt.] That is, to Ramah.

Ver. 11. And as they went up the hill to the city, they found young maidens going down to draw water.] At the fountain, which (as usual) was at the bottom of the hill.

And said unto them, Is the seer here?] Of which there might be some doubt; because some time he was wont to go circuit about the country.

Ver. 12. And they answered them, and said, He is; behold, he is before you: make haste now.] That is, they could not fail to find him, if they lost no time, but went speedily to the city, before he went to sacrifice; when it would not be proper to interrupt him.

For he cometh to-day to the city.] He either lived without the gate of the city; or returned from his country circuit.

For there is a sacrifice of the people to-day.] Either at some solemn festival (the new moon some imagine), or upon some special occasion of prayer and thanksgiving to God; for the people of that city, or for all Israel.

In the high place.] All sacrifices were regularly to be offered before the ark, in the place which the Lord should choose. But while this choice stood suspended, because Shiloh was laid desolate, and no other place appointed; they sacrificed in other places, where neither the ark, nor the tabernacle was: the tabernacle being void of the ark, which was its principal furniture; and the ark being without a house for God to dwell in. What place then, in this condition, could be more commodious, than those cities where the priests and Levites lived; to which the people went for instruction? and they chose the highest parts of those cities for this purpose. Corn. Bertram (cap. 11. de Repub. Jud.) imagines, that from this example high places came to be in use in after-ages (unless we suppose them to be the relics of the Canaanites, or more ancient people), for this is the first time we read of a high place among the people of God. Yet we read before of the thing, though not of the name. See Judg. vi. 20. xiii. 19. and so early as Abraham's time we read (Gen. xxii.) he was directed to Mount Moriah to offer his son. The same learned man also thinks, that this was the beginning of synagogues and schools, as our Mr. Thorndike doth in his Religious Assembly, p. 29. For though, when the ark was settled, it became unlawful to offer sacrifices in high places; yet it was no offence to continue there for public prayer, and the praises of God, and the learning of the law.

The Jewish doctors take this high place to have been some house, where, after they had sacrificed, they feasted when they had done. And so the Targum here translates these words, the house of feasting.

Ver. 13. As soon as ye come into the city, you shall straightway find him.] For on this day he appeared publicly.

Before he go up to the high place to eat: for the people will not eat until he come, because he doth bless the sacrifice.] That is, the feast upon the sacrifice, which were peace-offerings; the greatest part whereof belonged to him that brought the sacrifice; wherewith he entertained his friends.

And afterward they eat that be bidden.] The guests of him that offered the sacrifice; who, at this time, I suppose, was Samuel. For God having told him, that he should that day see the man whom he intended for their king, it is likely he appointed more sacrifices to be added unto those which were usually offered at such times, at his own charge. That there might be the greater feast, unto which he invited the people, (ver. 24.) that is, the principal of the people; and placed the guests, (ver. 22.) and carved at the table, (ver. 23.) which are all tokens that he was at the expense of the sacrifice, and made this feast for his friends.

Ver. 14. And they went up into the city: and when they were come into the city, behold, Samuel came out against them, for to go to the high place.] Met them directly in his way to the feast: for so God in his providence had disposed things; as it follows in the next words.

Ver. 15. Now the Lord had told Samuel in his ear a day before Saul came, saying.] In the Hebrew the words are, He revealed or uncovered the ear of Samuel; as is noted in the margin. Now that was done in order to tell him something; and therefore the meaning is, God told him a secret; using, in all likelihood, a whispering voice.

Ver. 16. To-morrow, about this time, I will send thee a man out of the land of Benjamin.] This shews still that all was done by God's direction.

And thou shalt anoint him to be captain over my people Israel, that he may save my people out of the hand of the Philistines.] Who had grievously oppressed them for forty years together: and though driven out of the country by Samuel, yet were ready to invade them again; as they did, it appears, by the following history.

For I have looked upon my people, because their cry is come unto me.] Though he would not hear their cry to relieve them from the oppression of their kings, (viii. 18.) yet he was so gracious as to make those kings instruments of their deliverance from the oppression of their cruel neighbours.

Ver. 17. And when Samuel saw Saul, the Lord said unto him.] With such a low voice as he heard the day before, (ver. 15.)

Behold the man whom I spake to thee of! the same shall reign over my people.] The word we translate reign, signifies something of coercion and restraint, as is observed in the margin; and denotes, he should rule them with an absolute, uncontrollable power, sternly and rigidly, after the manner of the eastern monarchs. Which was, as I said, a punishment for throwing off the kind and gentle government of God.

Ver. 18. Then Saul drew near to Samuel in the gate.] He came up to him, as he was going out of his house.

And said, Tell me, I pray thee, where the seer's house is.] It is an argument that Saul had led a very private life, since he had never seen Samuel, who went about into so many places to judge the people.

Ver. 19. And Samuel answered Saul, and said, I am the seer: go up before me unto the high place.] This seems to be spoken out of respect to him.

For thou shalt eat with me to-day; and to-morrow I will let thee go, and tell thee all that is in thine heart.] All that he desired to know. This shews it was a supper, not a dinner, to which he invited him; otherwise he might have dismissed him as well after dinner, as the next morning. But the custom of that country was to make their entertainment in the evening, when business was over.

Ver. 20. And as for thy asseswhich were lost three days ago.] This satisfied him he was a prophet, that he knew what he came to him for, though he had not told him.

Set not thy mind on them, for they are found.] He frees his mind from all care about the asses; that he might eat and drink the more cheerfully at the feast.

And on whom is all the desire of Israel? is it not on thee, and on all thy father's house?] The meaning is, all Israel desire a king, and there is none fitter for it than thyself; whose family God is resolved to advance.

Ver. 21. And Saul answered and said, Am I not a Benjamite, of the smallest of the tribes of Israel? and my family the least of all the families of the tribe of Benjamin?] He thought no person more unfit for the dignity; both because the tribe of which he was had been lamentably impaired in the time of the Judges, (chap. xx.) and his own family was very inconsiderable in this little tribe.

Wherefore then speakest thou so unto me?] He concluded therefore, that Samuel did but jest with him.

Ver. 22. And Samuel took Saul and his servants and brought them into the parlour, and made them sit in the chiefest place among them that were bidden.] He convinced him he was in earnest, by setting him uppermost at the table, in the most honourable place among the guests.

Which were about thirty persons.] The principal persons, I suppose, of the city, who were witnesses of the extraordinary respect which he paid him.

Ver. 23. And Samuel said unto the cook, Bring the portion which I gave thee, of which I said, Set it by thee.] The master of the feast distributed to every one their portion; or ordered what dish should be set before them: and Samuel had commanded the cook (before they sat down) not to set one dish upon the table, but keep it till he called for it.

Ver. 24. And the cook took up the shoulder, and that which was upon it.] The left shoulder and breast; for the right shoulder and the right breast belonged to the priest. (Lev. vii. 33, 34.)

And set it before Saul.] As the principal place was given him at the feast, so the principal dish also was set before him, to express still the great regard he had to his person.

And Samuel said, Behold that which is left!] Reserved on purpose for his entertainment.

Set it before thee, and eat.] Let it stand, as it is set before thee, and eat of it, as thy portion.

For unto this time hath it been kept for thee, since I said, I have invited the people.] The plainest translation of these words, is that of Lud. de Dieu, Eat, because till this appointed time it hath been reserved for thee, when I said, I have invited certain persons. That is, besides the thirty persons, he told the cook he had invited some others (which were Saul and his attendant) for whom he would have this shoulder to be reserved. For by inviting the people, he understands only these two persons; the word people sometimes signifying (as he shews) very few. He thinks, indeed, the feast was not made by Samuel, who brought along with him only these two guests: but that seems to me not to agree with the whole story.

And Saul did eat with Samuel that day.] Who entertained him very nobly; for the left shoulder was always accounted the best part of the sacrifice: being the same with that which the priest had for his portion. And therefore set before the king, if he was present at the feast, and thence called by Josephus Μερὶς Βασιλικὴ, the royal portion: for the arm and shoulder, as Philo discourses, were the symbols of strength and fortitude.

Ver. 25. And when they were come down from the high place into the city, Samuel communed with Saul upon the top of the house.] Concerning his advancement to the royal dignity, and his administration of the government.

Ver. 26. And they rose up early: and it came to pass, about the spring of the day.] Before the people of the place were stirring.

That Samuel called Saul to the top of the house, saying, Up, that I may send thee away.] According to his promise, (ver. 19.)

And Saul arose, and they went out both of them, he and Samuel, abroad.] For Samuel intended, out of respect to him, to conduct him part of his way. But went without any of his usual attendants; that what he did, might, for the present, be kept a secret.

Ver. 27. And as they were going down to the end of the city, Samuel said to Saul, Bid thy servant pass on before us (and he passed on), but stand thou still awhile, that I may shew thee the word of the Lord.] Which he would have none to hear but himself: because he now meant only to give him private satisfaction, that God had chosen him to be the king of his people; before whom afterward he was publicly chosen by lot.

CHAP. X.

Ver. 1. THEN Samuel took a vial of oil.] It was the business of a prophet to anoint a king, as Abarbinel observes upon Exod. xxx. Which he proves from this example of Samuel's anointing Saul, and afterward David; and Nathan's anointing Solomon, and the prophet (which the Hebrew doctors say was Jonah) anointing Jehu, (2 Kings ix. 1. 6.) This unction seems to have been in the open fields: but that it was done at a fountain, because Solomon was there anointed, cannot be proved (as the Hebrew doctors would have it) from that single instance; which will not make a general rule. Nor can it be proved, that this was sacred oil taken from the tabernacle, but rather common: for Samuel was no priest, and therefore could not meddle with that which was kept there; nor was he now near unto that place.

Digitized by Microsoft®

And poured it upon his head.] There is no order of God, that we read of, for the anointing of kings: but it had been an ancient custom, two hundred years before this time, as appears from the parable of Jotham. (See on Judg. ix. 8.) And it was now used by Samuel, that their king might be like the kings of other nations, as they desired. In aftertimes they were far superior to them, if we may believe the Hebrew doctors; who say the family of David had the privilege to be anointed with the same holy oil, wherewith the high-priest was anointed. For though the law appropriated it unto him, yet there was a dispensation with the law, manifested by some prophet. For certain it is, that Solomon was anointed with oil taken from the tabernacle, (1 Kings i. 39.) Only, they say, there was a difference in the form of anointing: the king being anointed in the form of a crown encircling his head; but the high-priest in the form of a cross, by one line drawn with the oil running down his forehead, and by another drawn by the oil between his eyebrows; which they call in the form of the Greek letter chi, having no mind to mention the name of the cross. (See Selden's Titles of Honour, p. 144. De Success. in Pontific. lib. ii. cap. 9. Schickard's Jus Regium, cap. 1. Theor. 4.)

And kissed him.] In token of subjection and reverence to him; according to the custom of ancient times, (see Gen. xli. 40.) and in those following, (Psal. ii. 12.) This the Jews call neshikah shel gedolah, the kiss of greatness or majesty; in our language, the kiss of homage.

And said, Is it not because the Lord hath anointed thee to be captain over his inheritance?] That is, doubt not, but by authority from God thou art made the ruler of his people. This was a thing not easily to be believed, and therefore he gives him three or four signs, in the following verses, to confirm his faith. But it must not be imagined, that now he was inaugurated; for that was done afterward, according to this prophetical prediction: which was kept so private, that it shewed he intended no more now, than to assure Saul he should be made king, and publicly installed their sovereign.

Ver. 2. And when thou art departed from me to-day, thou shalt find two men by Rachel's sepulchre, in the border of Benjamin, at Zelzah: and they will say unto thee, The asses which thou wentest to seek are found: and, lo, thy father, &c.] He foretelling Saul so exactly how many persons he should meet, and the place where, and what they would say to him, was an argument that he was a prophet; and therefore was to be believed in what he said to him from God concerning the kingdom. Rachel's sepulchre was in the way to Beth-lehem, (Gen. xxxv.) which was in the tribe of Judah, but in the border of Benjamin.

Ver. 3. Then shalt thou go on forward from thence, and thou shalt come to the plain of Tabor, and there shall meet thee three men going up to God to Beth-el.] This had been a religious place ever since the days of Jacob: as if, by God's appearance to him there, it had been consecrated for prayer and sacrifice: and the tabernacle being now without the ark, and the ark in no determined place, they sacrificed in high places (as Samuel we read did in the foregoing chapter), and particularly here at Beth-el; where Jeroboam afterward settled one of his calves. But Fortunatus Scacchus thinks it no improbable conjecture, that they had no altar, but sacrificed upon the bare ground. (Myrothec. Elæochrysm. Sacr. lib. ii. cap. 5.)

One carrying three kids, and another three loaves, and another carrying a bottle of wine.] Intending to offer sacrifices of peace-offerings.

Ver. 4. And they will salute thee, and give thee two loaves of bread; which thou shalt receive at their hands.] This may be looked upon as a third sign, or an appendix to the second. And it is the more remarkable, because this present which they made him, was a figure of that honour which the people did him when he was declared their king. And if these loaves were two of the three which they were going to offer in sacrifice (as some think they were), the present was the more noble. But though this may be justified, by supposing them to be given to one that was faint with travelling, and which they might recruit at Beth-el; yet we may as well think, as Kimchi doth, that they were two loaves which they brought along with them for their own use in their journey: which they freely imparted unto Saul; and Samuel bade him not refuse; but learn thereby, when he had abundance, to be kind to those who were in want.

Ver. 5. After that thou shalt come to the hill of God.] So called, because they were wont to sacrifice here; or because here was a school of the prophets, who were called men of God. Some take this to be Gibeah, others Kirjath-jearim.

Where is a garrison of the Philistines.] This makes it probable the hill beforementioned was Geba, or Gibeah: for there they had a garrison, (xiii. 3.) which doth not contradict what was said vii. 13. For though the Philistines were subdued, and made no invasions upon the Israelites while Samuel lived; yet they might retain some strong holds, out of which they could not drive them.

And it shall come to pass, when thou art come thither to the city, that thou shalt meet a company of prophets.] Here it seems was a college of prophets, settled for the instruction of youth in the knowledge of the law and of piety (who were called the sons of the prophets), where, though the Philistines also had a garrison, yet in this they were better than many Christians (as Grotius observes), for they spared those places (when they conquered them) where learned men lived, and were dedicated to the study of religion. (See lib. iii. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 11. sect. 10.)

Coming down from the high place.] Perhaps they came from a sacrifice, which had been offered in the high place: and now praised God for his benefits, in the following manner.

With a psaltery, and a tabret, and a pipe, and a harp, before them.] With variety of instrumental music; among which the nevel (which we translate psaltery) was the chief: having its name, as the Jewish doctors fancy (in the Midrasch, upon Psalm lxxxi.) from hence—that it put down all other instruments of music, as much as a wise man doth a fool. Bartoloccius, in his Kirjath-Sepher, par. ii. fol. 185, &c. gives an account of this, and the rest of the instruments here mentioned. With which I do not think fit to trouble the reader; but only note, that this music was used in prophesying, because the minds of the prophets were thereby composed, and made apt to receive soft and good impressions, as Grotius here observes from many examples.

And they shall prophesy.] Sing the praises of God, as the word prophesy sometimes signifies, (Exod. xv. 21. 1 Chron. xxv. 3.) In what manner this was done, it is not so easy for us now to define or specify (as Mr. Mede speaks). But one of them seems to have been the precentor, to usher in the verse or ditty; and the rest to have answered, Τὰ ἀκροτελεύτια, the extremes, or last words of the verse. (See him, book i. discourse xvi. p. 78.)

Ver. 6. And the Spirit of God shall come upon thee, and thou shalt prophesy with them.] This was the highest assurance of all the rest, that Samuel anointed him by God's authority; who vouchsafed suddenly to inspire him with such thoughts and affections, that he became like one of them, viz. a psalmist: able in an instant to compose hymns in the praises of God; or to accompany them in their melodies, which he had never learnt. For he was not bred in the school of the prophets.

And shalt be turned into another man.] Endued with extraordinary prudence and courage, and such-like qualities, as fitted him for the government and conduct of God's people.

Ver. 7. And let it be, when these signs are come unto thee, that thou do as occasion shall serve thee.] As if he had said, I cannot give thee particular rules about every thing that is to be done by thee: but doubt not to undertake the government of the people: for God's Spirit shall guide thee to do that which the present occasion requires.

For God is with thee.] Be confident of good success in all thy undertakings, for God will be with thee, when thou goest out against thine enemies. The Chaldee paraphrast understands the foregoing words as if he had said, make all things belonging to a king, and then adds, for the Word of the Lord will be thy help.

Ver. 8. And thou shalt go down before me to Gilgal.] A place which had been famous for many great things done there, when they first came to Canaan: and lay conveniently for all the tribes beyond Jordan to meet, now they dwelt there.

And, behold, I will come down to thee, to offer burnt-offerings, and to sacrifice sacrifices of peace-offerings: seven days shalt thou tarry, till I come unto thee, and shew thee what thou shalt do.] This looks like another sign, which he gave him, of God's presence with him, in future times, if he were obedient to his commands. For it cannot be understood of his going immediately to Gilgal; and staying there seven days: for the people were first to be called together to Mizpeh, where he was made king, (ver. 17.) and after the defeat of the Ammonites he was confirmed in the kingdom at Gilgal, (xi. 14, 15.) And then the next year, a war breaking out with the Philistines, all the people met at Gilgal, and Saul with them; waiting for Samuel to come, as he had appointed, to offer sacrifice; which Saul, being impatient of staying so long for him, offered himself, &c. (xii. 4. 8, 9.) and thereby forfeited God's favour; whose prophet had assured him he would not fail to come to meet him here. But then these words must not be pointed as they are now, but as the Hebrew text will bear; retaining the same words, and only altering the pause or point in this manner: Thou shalt go down before me to Gilgal: and, behold, I will come unto thee to offer burnt-offerings, and to sacrifice sacrifices of peace-offerings, seven days. Here is to be a pause; and then another sentence begins thus: Thou shalt tarry till I come unto thee, &c. As if he had said, See, in any case, that thou tarry till I come, and shew thee what thou shalt do. Which Samuel, perhaps, knew not himself at present: but intended to ask counsel of God; and being fully instructed in this great business, then come to consecrate him (as Dr. Jackson conjectures), and establish him in his kingdom; by a solemn sacrifice for seven days, such as Solomon used at the consecration of the temple. (See his Third Sermon on Jer. xxvi. 19.; and the very same he repeats in his book of the Knowledge of Jesus Christ, chap. 17. parag. 4.)

Ver. 9. And it was so, when he had turned his back to go from Samuel, God gave him another heart: and all these signs came to pass that day.] So great was the goodness of God, that he immediately fulfilled the last and chief of these signs: for he was no sooner gone from Samuel, but he felt another spirit come into him of wisdom and fortitude, to qualify him for the government of God's people. Which afterward God took away from him, because of his sins, xvi. 14. (See Psal. li. 12.)

Ver. 10. And when he came thither to the hill, behold, a company of prophets met him; and the Spirit of the Lord came upon him, and he prophesied among them.] He mentions not the other signs particularly, because they were not of such general concernment unto others; but for his own satisfaction: whereas this of the prophets meeting him, and his conversion into a prophet, was of great and universal concernment; to make the people reverence him as their king, when they heard how God had honoured him with such an extraordinary gift from heaven.

Ver. 11. And it came to pass, when all that knew him beforetime saw that, behold, he prophesied among the prophets, then the people said one to another, What is this that is come unto the son of Kish? Is Saul also among the prophets?] It begat wonder in all those who knew his education, that he should on a sudden be inspired as they were, who were bred up in the school of the prophets: for though it was in the power of God alone to bestow the gift of prophecy upon men, yet commonly he endowed none with it, but such as were trained up in those studies which might dispose them for it. For had it been usual to invest those with this spirit, who had not been educated in such a course as might fit them to receive it, we cannot think it would have been so great a marvel now, as to give rise to this proverb. Which must not be understood, as Procopius Gazæus observes, as if Saul had perpetually the gift of prophecy; but that he received such a spiritual gift, whereby he at present prophesied; and was endued with prudence also to govern the people of God. Thus the seventy elders, who were to assist Moses, prophesied; but not always. It is observed by Erasmus, That this became a proverb, when they saw, "aliquem indecenter alieno gregi admixtum," any man indecently mingled with company that were strangers to him. Or, when they saw a sudden change wrought in any person; as Gregory Nazianzen applied it when he was chosen a bishop: "Saul prophesied so much beyond expectation, and when nobody thought of it, that the miracle became a proverb."

Ver. 12. And one of the same place answered and said, But who is their father?] This wonder was presently satisfied by a prudent person among them, who bade them consider who it was that made prophets: not men, nor merely good education, but God alone; who was the father of all the children of the prophets (i. e. of their disciples), to teach them by his Spirit. Which he could bestow when he pleased upon any man, and make him a prophet, without the help of any other master: which was the cause of Amos, vii. 14. And that is the meaning of the word father in this place, which signifies the same with master or teacher. (See upon Gen. iv. 20, 21.)

Ver. 13. And when he made an end of prophesying, he came to the high place.] Herein he differed from the prophets who met him; that he prophesied but for a short time, this not being his office: and when he had done, he went up to the high place from whence they came down. Where was, I suppose, a place of worship, unto which he went up to give thanks to God for his gifts, and to pray to him to prosper him in the government he designed for him.

Ver. 14. And Saul's uncle.] Who met him here in the high place, or in his way home.

Said unto him and to his servant, Whither went ye?] How came you to stay so long before your return?

And he said, To seek the asses: and when we saw that they were no where.] In no place where they sought them.

We came to Samuel.] To be informed by him.

Ver. 15. And Saul's uncle said, Tell me, I pray thee, what Samuel said unto you?] What discourse they had with him.

Ver. 16. And Saul said unto his uncle, He told us plainly that the asses were found. But of the matter of the kingdom, whereof Samuel spake, he told him not.] Lest he should seem to have been seeking so high a dignity: and because hitherto Samuel thought fit it should be kept a secret between them two.

Ver. 17. And Samuel called the people together.] How long after he departed from Samuel we are not told; but now resolved to declare God's choice of Saul to be their king more publicly.

Unto the Lord to Mizpeh.] Which was a very famous place, where they used to meet upon great occasions, (see chap. vii.) and God was pleased to be present (as hath been before observed) wheresoever there was a general assembly of his people, for the common good. (See upon Judg. xx. 1.) Yet one cannot well imagine, that every person of the whole body of all Israel were called hither unto this convention: but by the people we are to understand all the elders and heads of their tribes, who governed and represented the rest: and accordingly that which follows is to be interpreted.

Ver. 18. And said unto the children of Israel, Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, I brought Israel out of Egypt, and delivered you out of the hands of the Egyptians, and out of the hand of all kingdoms, of them that oppressed you.] He commemorates the benefits they received from him, ever since they were in Egypt; from whence he brought them; and suffered none of the kingdoms that lay in their way to Canaan to obstruct their passage: and since they came there delivered them from many heavy oppressions.

Ver. 19. And ye have this day rejected your God, who himself saved you out of all your adversities and tribulations.] By raising up judges, whensoever they cried to him for help: who never failed to conquer all their enemies.

And ye have said unto him, Nay.] When he desired them to continue under his government, they refused, and would not be denied what they asked.

But set a king over us.] They would not any longer be governed by God, but have a king settled over them; to whom they might resort for help.

Now therefore present yourselves before the Lord by your tribes, and by your thousands.] Into which their tribes were divided. This was a wonderful obstinacy and stupidity, that, after God had given them time to consider what it was they desired, and what difference there was between his government, and that of the kings round about them, they should not relent; but persist to the last in their resolution; and imagine that a king could save them, though God was not with him.

Ver. 20. And when Samuel had caused all the tribes of Israel to draw near.] Unto the place where the lots were to be drawn, in the presence of the heads of their tribes and families, who represented all the rest.

The tribe of Benjamin was taken.] This is a phrase used in the seventh of Joshua, about the discovery of him, who had offended in the accursed thing: which all agree was by lots. And so Rasi and Ralbag understand it here: though Kimchi imagines God told him by urim and thummim, out of what tribe and family their king should be taken. Which is not probable, because the ark was not now at Mizpeh; before which the high-priest was to stand, when he consulted the Divine Majesty by urim and thummim.

Ver. 21. When he caused the tribe of Benjamin to draw near by their families, the family of Matri was taken, and Saul the son of Kish was taken.] The holy writer shortens this account of casting lots: but it is pretty evident they were cast four times: in the first the tribe of Benjamin was taken; in the second the family of Matri in that tribe was taken: but there being several households in that family, it was cast a third time, that they might know in what house their king was, and that of Kish was taken: and in his house, by a new lottery, Saul was taken: and he took this course, as to prevent all dispute, so to give him the greater authority over them, as a person divinely appointed; according to what God had said, Deut. xix. 15. And it is very observable, that Plato himself acknowledges a government appointed by lots to be Θεοφιλῆ ἀρχήν, a government beloved of God, (lib. iv. de Legibus.)

Here interpreters are wont to inquire, why their first king should be chosen out of the smallest tribe, sprung from the youngest son of Jacob, and out of the smallest family in this tribe: especially since Judah all along had the preeminence among his brethren, and the great King was promised to spring from him. To which this seems to be a reasonable satisfaction; that this king being extorted by their undutiful importunities, and given them in anger (as I before observed), God was pleased to express his dislike of it by this choice: whereby he also intended to take them off, from depending on their king (whose power was small) so much as on himself.

And when they sought him, he could not be found.] Having withdrawn himself, either out of feebleness of spirit (as some think), or rather out of modesty, he declined so high an authority, unless imposed upon him: or, perhaps, being affrighted when he heard Samuel still representing God as offended with them, for asking a king: which was to reject his government.

Ver. 22. Therefore they inquired of the Lord further, if the man should come thither. And the Lord answered.] From hence Abarbinel argues, that God directed them, both by lot, and by urim and thummim. Which if it be true, then, though the ark was not there, yet they inquired of the Lord in the usual way, and he was pleased to give answers any where, in great and weighty cases. As Abiathar inquired of the Lord with the ephod for David, at Keilah and at Ziklag, (xxiii. 9. xxx. 7.)

Behold, he hath hid himself among the stuff.] Or, among the carriages. Here the Jews observe, that whosoever flies dominion, him dominion follows. For when they told Saul he was chosen king, he said he was not fit for that office, and bade them inquire again by urim and thummim: which they make the meaning of the word further. And while they were going to make this inquiry, he went and hid himself, till the oracle discovered him. (See Buxtorf, Hist. Urim et Thummim. cap. 3. p. 307.)

Ver. 23. And they ran and fetched him thence: and when he stood among the people, he was higher than any of the people, from the shoulders and upwards.] A princely person, and of a majestic aspect: as Corn. Nepos describes Iphicrates in the account he gives of his life, cap. 3. "Fuit et animo magno et corpore, imperatoriaque forma, ut ipso aspectu cuivis injiceret admirationem sui." He was great both in mind and body, having a form so imperial, that his very aspect struck every one with admiration of him. And thus P. Cunæus observes, that not only barbarous people, but the most polite nations did, "Majestatem corporis venerari," look upon a majestic body with veneration, lib. i. de Repub. Hebr. p. 85. Which appears by what Homer saith of Agamemnon, Iliad. iii. ver. 166. and Virgil of Æneas and Turnus: the latter of which he describes just like Saul, lib. vii. ver. 782.

"Ipse inter primos præstanti corpore Turnus Vertitur, arma tenens, et toto vertice supra est."

Ver. 24. And Samuel said unto all the people, See ye him whom the Lord hath chosen.] Though the people were resolutely bent to have a king, yet they were sensible none could make one but God. And therefore they came, in the beginning of this business, to ask one of his prophets. But Samuel could not constitute one without Divine direction and appointment, as appears by the first verse of this chapter, where he saith, the Lord hath anointed thee; and the lot whereby he was publicly chosen was cast before the Lord, (ver. 19. 23.) And accordingly here he tells them, the Lord hath chosen him. Thus afterward the Lord commanded David to be anointed, (xvi. 1. 3.) and among all his sons Solomon was particularly appointed by God to succeed him, (1 Chron. xxix. 5.)

That there is none like him among all the people?] Such was his stature and his aspect, that, as Josephus expresses it, ἐξεῖχέ τε ἁπάντων, καὶ τὸ ὕψος ἦν βασιλικώτατος, he excelled, and was most kingly in his height, (lib. vi. Antiq. cap. 5.)

And all the people shouted.] All that were then present, except some profane fellows, who were so far from owning him for their king that they despised him.

And said, God save the king.] In the Hebrew, let the king live, that is, be prosperous. The same form of words was used in after-ages when they made kings, (1 Kings i. 34. 39. 2 Kings xi. 12. 2 Chron. xxiii. 11.) All this being done at Mizpeh, when Samuel set up the great stone called Ebenezer, it is not improbable that Saul was there declared their king.

Ver. 25. Then Samuel told the people the manner of the kingdom, and wrote it in a book, and laid it up before the Lord.] The right of the king, which he had laid before the people, upon their first desire to have one, (viii. 11.) he now wrote in a book, and laid up before the Lord: that it might be a witness against them, that all the evils which hereafter befel them, were drawn upon them by their own desires. For what Petrus Cunæus saith, that he wrote the words mentioned Deut. xvii. 16, &c. is altogether unlikely: they being laid up before the Lord long ago, when the law was put by the side of the ark, (Deut. xxxi. 26.) Josephus said a great deal better, (lib. vi. Antiq. cap. 5.) Τὰ μέλλοντα συμβήσεσθαι κακὰ γράψαι, &c. The prophet having written the evils that should befal them, he read them in the ears of the king, and then laid up the book in the tabernacle of God, to be a testimony unto future ages of what he had foretold. A duplicate of this writing, it is likely, he left with the elders of the people.

And Samuel sent all the people away, every man to his house.] The people were not dismissed by Saul, who would not presently take upon him to exercise his authority. For Samuel was there, who had been for many years their supreme governor. That is, sixteen years (as Sir J. Marsham computes) before the inauguration of Saul: and he lived eighteen years after, as Josephus saith, in the latter end of the sixth book of his Antiquities; during which time he exercised the power of a judge.

Ver. 26. Saul also went home to Gibeah.] In this he still shewed his humility: going to his own home, which was no princely palace.

And there went with him a band of men, whose heart God had touched.] A company of stout valiant men, of great resolution: whom God inclined to follow him, as his guard. Or, were moved, perhaps, by the authority of Samuel (who was a man of God), to go and attend him.

Ver. 27. And the children of Belial said.] Some very lewd men (see upon Deut. xiii. 13.) who hated all government: and being, it is probable, men of some rank and quality, were proud, and despised a person of such a small family.

How shall this man save us?] They would not vouchsafe so much as to call him by his name; but insolently contemned him, as one of no note, who had no power to deliver them.

And they despised him, and brought him no presents.] As the manner was to do unto their kings in the eastern countries, when they first tendered their service to them. Which was a token of their benevolence, subjection, and joy. Thus the Psalmist represents the people offering gifts to the Messiah, Psal. xlv. and lxxii.

Jonathan thus expresses it in this place, They did not come to wish him a happy reign.

But he held his peace.] This was an act of great prudence: which declared he was endued with an extraordinary spirit; which enabled him to dissemble his knowledge of the scorn they put upon him. For if he had taken notice of it, he must have punished it; and it had not been safe to begin his reign with any thing of severity: therefore he wisely ordered himself, as if he did not observe their neglect. Corn. Bertram thinks, in his book de Repub.

Jud. cap. 10. that these men refusing to be governed by Saul, he retired for awhile, and led a private life: leaving Samuel to administer all affairs, as he had done for many years. But whether that be true or not, it is evident Saul, in the beginning of his reign, was endued with a spirit of singular wisdom and moderation: and was none of those princes whom Dion Prusæus describes, (Orat. de Regno, p. 5.) μακαρίζοντας ἐξουσίαν μετ' ἀνοίας, who bless and praise power, joined with folly and want of understanding.

CHAP. XI.

Ver. 1. THEN Nahash the Ammonite.] He was either the king of the children of Ammon, or the captain of his host; who laid siege to Jabesh-Gilead, as Josephus saith, about a month after Saul was chosen king: but had levied war against them before, (xii. 12.) which was the occasion of their desiring a king.

Came up against Jabesh-Gilead.] He renewed, it is likely, their old pretensions to this country: which they had made in the time of Jephthah. For Jabesh-Gilead was in the tribe of Manasseh on the other side Jordan; bordering upon the Ammonites: who laid a claim to this country, which the Israelites took from Sihon and Og, as we read in Judg. xi.

And all the men of Jabesh said unto Nahash, Make a covenant with us, and we will serve thee.] Be his subjects, but not slaves, with whom no covenant was made.

Ver. 2. And Nahash the Ammonite answered them, On this condition I will make a covenant with you, that I may thrust out all your right eyes.] He would not put out both their eyes, because that would have made them unserviceable to him; but only the right, which (as many learned men have observed) was most useful in war; the left eye being covered with their shields, which they held in their left hand: so Procopius Gazæus, the left eye is covered with the shield; with the right we see our enemies.

And lay it for a reproach upon all Israel.] This is the only reason he gives for such insolent treatment, that all Israel might know what they were to expect, if he could prevail over them.

Ver. 3. And the elders of Jabesh said unto him, Give us seven days, that we may send messengers into all the coasts of Israel: and then, if there be no man to save us, we will come out to thee.] It may seem strange, that either they should submit so soon to such base conditions; or that Nahash should grant them so much respite, when he saw them so abject, and inclined to yield to him. But the reason of both is visible: for Saul they thought was not able to help them; having not yet taken upon him the government, but living privately; (see ver. 5.) and Nahash, it is like, was loath to drive them to desperation, by denying them this short space to expect relief, which he thought could not possibly come to them, though Saul should appear and endeavour to levy an army; for that he imagined could not be done in so few days.

Ver. 4. Then came messengers to Gibeah of Saul.] So called, because Saul was there born, and bred, and dwelt.

And told the tidings in the ears of the people: and all the people lifted up their voices, and wept.] As men despairing of relief.

Ver. 5. And, behold, Saul came after the herd out of the field; and Saul said, What aileth the people that they weep? And they told him the tidings of the men of Jabesh.] By this it appears (as I noted in the conclusion of the foregoing chapter), that some men, not only refusing to submit to him, but despising him, he went and lived retired, and led a rustic life: exercising no authority over the people; but leaving all to Samuel's management.

Ver. 6. Then the Spirit of the Lord came upon him when he heard these tidings, and his anger was kindled greatly.] But now he resolved, by an impulse he felt from heaven, to shew that God had chosen him to be their king. Who, upon this occasion, gave him an extraordinary measure of courage, zeal, and military skill.

Ver. 7. And he took a yoke of oxen.] Which he had newly brought out of the field, (ver. 5.)

And hewed them in pieces, and sent them throughout all the coasts of Israel, by the hand of messengers, saying, Whosoever comes not forth after Saul and after Samuel, so shall it be done unto his oxen.] He herein begins to give a proof of his resolution, by this terrible threatening; and by the representation he made of the execution he intended, if he was disobeyed. Whereby it appears, that the kings of Israel assumed such an absolute power as Samuel described chap. viii. One part of which consisted in making war, and raising soldiers, by their sole authority, and punishing those that did not come to the army at their summons. For we never read that they consulted the oracle before they went to war; nor that they are reproved by the prophets for that neglect. In like manner they made laws, which is the act of a sovereign. For though they could not alter the laws of Moses, but were to govern themselves by them; yet, in things not determined there, or were not clear and plain, they made what laws they thought good; as appears by David, and Solomon, and other of their best princes.

And the fear of the Lord fell upon the people.] They were no less affected with the cutting these oxen in pieces, than they had been with the using the Levite's concubine in like manner, (Judg. xix. 19.) as Bochartus notes: who observes something like this among heathen people, (Hierozoic. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 33.)

And they came out with one consent.] God, who put courage into Saul, possessed the people also with a fear of offending him; now that he asserted his royal authority over them. For he names himself before Samuel (the kingly dignity being superior to the prophetical), but wisely mentions him also, that they who did not reverence himself as their king, might follow the prophet, whom all reverenced.

Ver. 8. And when they numbered them in Bezek.] Of this place, see upon Judg. i. 6.

The children of Israel were three hundred thousand, and the men of Judah thirty thousand.] It is thought by some, that the Philistines invaded them in the west, as the Ammonites did in the east, (just as they had done formerly in the time of Jephthah, Judg. x. 7, 8.) which is the reason so few of Judah came in at this summons; being engaged elsewhere against another dangerous enemy. But they would not wholly neglect to come to his assistance in this other war, but shewed their forwardness to obey him, as much as they were able. Bertram, also, Altingius, (in his Shilo, lib. iii. cap. 11.) and others, take it as an honour done to this tribe, which had the pre-eminence, that they were numbered by themselves. But Sir J. Marsham looks upon it as the beginning of a schism, (Secul. ix.)

Ver. 9. And they said unto the messengers that came, Thus shall ye say to the men of Jabesh-Gilead, To-morrow, by that time the sun shall be hot, ye shall have help, &c.] The morrow after their return, before noon.

Ver. 10. Therefore the men of Jabesh said.] Unto Nahash the Ammonite.

To-morrow we will come out unto you, and ye shall do with us that which seemeth good to you.] In case, that is, relief did not come to them by that time: of which they pretended to have no hope. Most look upon this as spoken ironically and in mockery: but Grotius takes it for a stratagem, to make them secure: according to the opinion of those times, that they might delude an enemy by deceitful words: as Elisha did the Syrians, 2 Kings vi. 18, 19, &c. (See lib. iii. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 1. sect. 17.)

Ver. 11. And it was so on the morrow, that Saul put the people in three companies; and they came into the midst of the host in the morning-watch, and slew the Ammonites till the heat of the day.] He set upon them, I suppose, on three sides, and the men of Jabesh issuing out on the other, they were so distracted that they could make little resistance: but the Israelites got into the midst of them very early, and made a great slaughter of them till noon.

And it came to pass, that they which remained were scattered, so that two of them were not left together.] This is added to shew, with what a complete victory Saul began his reign: whereby God established his authority.

Ver. 12. And the people said unto Samuel.] Who, it appears from hence, accompanied Saul in this expedition, to encourage him with hopes of good success.

Who is he that said, Saul shall not reign over us? bring the men, that we may put them to death.] Great successes make great alterations in the affections of the people; who quietly saw Saul contemned a little while ago; but now would have inquiry made after those sons of Belial, who spake opprobriously of him, (x. 27.)

Ver. 13. And Saul said, There shall not a man be put to death this day.] He prudently dissembled his knowledge of their despisal of him, before the kingdom was confirmed to him: but this moderation, now that he was wonderfully victorious, argued greater wisdom and goodness. For nothing is more glorious than to be humble and meek in the height of power.

For to-day the Lord hath wrought salvation in Israel.] Besides the policy he exercised in pardoning offenders (whereby he laid the strongest obligations upon them to be faithful to him), it was a piece of piety to imitate God, who had been so good to them all.

Ver. 14. Then Samuel said unto the people, Come, and let us go to Gilgal, to renew the kingdom there.] New kingdoms are not easily settled. And this place was famous upon many accounts, as Mizpeh was, where Samuel first declared him king. Particularly, Samuel was wont to judge the people here, (vii. 16.)

Ver. 15. And all the people went to Gilgal; and there they made Saul king, before the Lord in Gilgal.] He had been anointed in Ramah; and chosen by lot in Mizpeh; but still some disdained to own him as their king: which made him content himself for a time (as I said before) with a private life. But now, after this signal token of God's presence with him, in the late victory, he was, by common consent, acknowledged by all the people for their king. Which is the meaning of these words, they made Saul king; for it is certain, it was neither they nor Samuel that could make a king; but God alone: who ordered Samuel to anoint him, and then made the lot to fall upon him; and now inclined the hearts of all the people to submit to his authority.

The LXX. here say, ἔχρισε Σαμυὴλ, &c. that Samuel here anointed Saul king over Israel. And Josephus, (lib. vi. cap. 6.) that he again anointed Saul, Τῷ ἁγίῳ ἐλαίῳ, with holy oil. But there is not a word of this anointing in the Hebrew text, no, nor in the Vulgar Latin: and the Targum very well expresses it, they made Saul to reign, i. e. would not let him any longer lead a private life; but prayed him to take the government upon him according to God's ordinance, and promised subjection to him. Gilgal seems to have been chosen for this purpose, rather than any other place: because there was a sanctified piece of ground, as Abarbinel speaks, where, when they entered into Canaan, the ark first stood: which now, perhaps, they brought hither, and offered sacrifice before it.

And there they sacrificed sacrifices of peace-offerings before the Lord.] Who was present, as I observed before, (see Judg. xx. 1.) in such great assemblies of the body of the people: with whom both they and their king made a covenant of obedience to him, by offering of the sacrifices.

And there Saul and all the men of Israel rejoiced together.] By feasting upon the peace-offerings: giving thanks to God for the late victory, and for settling the kingdom.

CHAP. XII.

Ver. 1. AND Samuel said unto all Israel.] In the presence of Saul, as appears from ver. 3. 5.

Behold, I have hearkened unto you in all that you said unto me, and have made you a king.] This speech was made before they parted from Gilgal: where they had renewed the kingdom.

Ver. 2. And now, behold, the king walketh before you.] To rule and govern them, (Numb. xxvii. 17.)

And I am old and grey-headed.] And therefore very willing to be discharged from the government of you.

And, behold, my sons are with you.] Reduced also to the state of private persons; being the king's subjects, no less than you.

And I have walked before you from my childhood to this day.] He appeals to them whether he had not always discharged his duty faithfully, from the very beginning; when God had made him a prophet to instruct and guide them. For now they might freely accuse him, if they had any thing to allege against him: both he and his sons being now become subjects to a more sovereign authority.

Ver. 3. Behold, here I am: witness against me before the Lord, and before his anointed.] He offers himself to be tried, and to give a public account of his administration: being ready to answer any thing that could be objected against him.

Whose ox have I taken? or whose ass have I taken?] He desires them to testify, if he had ruled after the manner of the eastern kings: under which government they chose to put themselves.

Or whom have I defrauded? whom have I oppressed?] If they knew of no open violence, he bids them mention any fraud or circumvention, of which he had been guilty.

Or of whose hands have I received any bribes to blind mine eyes? and I will restore it you.] He challenges them to prove so much as the receiving any gift, in any cause that came before him; and he would make full satisfaction.

Ver. 4. And they said, Thou hast not defrauded, nor oppressed us, neither hast thou taken aught of any man's hand.] They acknowledged him to be perfectly an upright judge: who could not be charged to have done any thing amiss.

Ver. 5. And he said unto them, The Lord is witness against you, and his anointed is witness this day, that ye have not found aught in my hand. And they answered, He is witness.] Of his innocence; and that they had no reason to complain of his government.

Ver. 6. And Samuel said unto the people, It is the Lord that advanced Moses and Aaron, and brought your fathers up out of the land of Egypt.] D. Kimchi refers this to the foregoing words; as if he had said, the Lord that did such wonders by Moses and Aaron is witness, &c.

Ver. 7. Now therefore stand still.] The Jews observe, that they were wont to stand, when they heard the word of God. Though those words, Exod. xx. 18. are but a slender proof of it.

That I may reason with you before the Lord of all the righteous acts of the Lord, which he did to you and to your fathers.] He would not dismiss them, till, having obtained this honourable testimony from them, he had represented to them the great benefits they had received from God, and their ingratitude to him.

Ver. 8. When Jacob was come into Egypt, and your fathers cried unto the Lord, then the Lord sent Moses and Aaron, which brought your fathers out of Egypt, and made them dwell in this place.] Any one may easily discern, this is but a compendious narrative of what God did for them, from their first coming out of Egypt, till they were settled in Canaan; no more than that their fathers cried unto the Lord, when Jacob came into Egypt, and the Lord sent these two persons to deliver them. For many things intervened between both these; till at last God settled them in their rest, in the good land he promised to give them.

Ver. 9. And when they forgat the Lord their God, he sold them into the hand of Sisera, captain of the host of Hazor, and into the hand of the Philistines, and into the hand of the king of Moab; and they fought against them.] This is a short history of the calamities which befel them, for their idolatry, after they came there: some few of which he only mentions; without observing exactly the order in which they came upon them: but these were the people who longest oppressed them.

Ver. 10. And they cried unto the Lord, and said, We have sinned, because we have forsaken the Lord, and have served Baalim and Ashtaroth: but now deliver us out of the hand of our enemies, and we will serve thee.] This they did very often. (Judg. iii. 9. 13. iv. 3. vi. 7. especially x. 10. 15, &c.)

Ver. 11. And the Lord sent Jerubbaal, and Bedan, and Jephthah, and Samuel, and delivered you out of the hand of your enemies on every side, and ye dwell safely.] This is perfectly agreeable to the history of the book of Judges; which acquaints us, that as often as they repented, and besought his pardon, &c. he raised up deliverers unto them: the latest of which he only mentions. In which account there is no difficulty, but only about Bedan: of whom we no where read. But see my notes upon Judg. x. 4. unto which may be added, that the Chaldee paraphrase here hath it, he sent Gideon and Samson, &c. whom most take to be the person here meant, and called Ben-Dan (the son of Dan), because he was of that tribe: and by contraction called Bedan; just as instead of Saulmeel (asked of God), they called him who writes this book Samuel, for shortness' sake. Who mentions himself as one of their deliverers; because the signal overthrow he gave the Philistines, which drove them out of their country, was fresh in their memory.

Ver. 12. And when ye saw that Nahash, the king of the children of Ammon, came against you, ye said unto me, Nay; but a king shall reign over us; when the Lord your God was your king.] They would not stay till God raised them up a deliverer, or commanded Samuel, who was their judge, to fight with him: but would have a king like other nations, always at hand to fight their battles. (See upon viii. 5.) The word nay seems to signify that Samuel told them, that God would be with them to deliver them; or that he offered himself to be their leader under God: but they refused his offer, and continued to demand a king.

Ver. 13. Now therefore behold the king whom you have chosen, and whom you have desired!] He could not upbraid them too often with this, that they would not be content with the government of God, which was peculiar to them; but chose to be like other people.

And, behold, the Lord hath set a king over you.] Though they chose to have a king like other nations, and be governed by God no longer; yet he still puts them in mind they could not make one, but he was set over them by God; as I have before observed.

Ver. 14. If ye will fear the Lord, and serve him, and obey his voice, and not rebel against the commandment of the Lord.] According to the covenant they lately made with him: (xi. 15.) all virtue springs from the fear of God.

Then shall both ye, and your king that reigneth over you, continue following the Lord your God.] That is, be defended by him; and continue a happy people: notwithstanding they had thus rejected him. This appears to be the meaning, by what is opposed to it in the following verse.

Ver. 15. But if ye will not obey the voice of the Lord, but rebel against the commandment of the Lord; then shall the hand of the Lord be against you, as it was against your fathers.] He would suffer their enemies to oppress them, as they did in the days of the Judges: or send other plagues upon them.

Ver. 16. Now therefore stand and see the great thing, which the Lord will do before your eyes.] For a visible demonstration of the truth of all that Samuel had said.

Ver. 17. Is it not wheat-harvest to-day?] A very clear day, and in no disposition to rain. Which was not wont to fall in harvest-time; but in the autumn, and in the spring: called the later and the former rain.

I will call upon the Lord, and he shall send thunder and rain; that you may perceive and see that your wickedness is great, which you have done in the sight of the Lord, in asking you a king.] By this he shewed how he could in an instant deprive them of all the comforts of life; as they deserved, for their rejecting him and his prophet: who was so powerful, as by his prayers to produce such wonders.

Ver. 18. So Samuel called upon the Lord; and the Lord sent thunder and rain that day.] A very horrible tempest, accompanied, it is likely, with lightning; when all was serene, and no sign appeared of it.

And all the people feared the Lord and Samuel.] This struck such a terror into them, that they were afraid God would destroy them, as he did Korah, Dathan, and Abiram; and that Samuel would not intercede for them.

Ver. 19. And all the people said unto Samuel, Pray for thy servants unto the Lord, that we die not: for we have added unto all our sins this evil, to ask us a king.] Till now they seem not to have been sensible of their sin, in desiring an alteration in the form of their government: therefore it was a miraculous storm, full of horror, which extorted this confession from them; not only of this, but all their former sins.

Ver. 20. And Samuel said unto the people, Fear not; ye have done all this wickedness; yet turn not aside from following the Lord, but serve him with all your heart.] He would not have them despair of recovering God's favour; and directs them the best way to it: by continuing so sensible of their wickedness, as to be moved to true repentance and steadfast obedience.

Ver. 21. And turn ye not aside: for then shall ye go after vain things, which cannot profit.] He warns them above all things against worshipping other gods, whom he calls vain things which cannot profit; by a scheme of speech in the Hebrew language, signifying, they do a great deal of mischief. Thus in Prov. xx. 23. the wise man saith, a false balance is not good; that is, is very bad and hateful to God; as it goes before, of divers weights. And thus heathen writers speak, particularly Homer, Odyss. ξ. ver. 85.

Οὐ γὰρ σχέτλια ἔργα θεοὶ μάκαρες φιλέουσι.

The blessed gods do not love wicked actions; i. e. they hate and detest them.

Nor deliver, for they are vain.] He presses them to persist in the worship of God alone; whom if they forsook and went after other gods, in vain did they expect help and deliverance from them, for they were void of all power.

Ver. 22. For the Lord will not forsake his people for his great name's sake; because it hath pleased the Lord to make you his people.] The steadfastness of God in his affection to them, notwithstanding their provocations, was a mighty motive to faithful obedience.

Ver. 23. Moreover, as for me, God forbid that I should sin against the Lord in ceasing to pray for you: but I will instruct you in the good and right way.] Not only pray for them, but teach and instruct them: which were the two great offices of a prophet. They had highly disobliged him; but he imitated God, who pardoned them, and so did he.

Ver. 24. Only fear the Lord, and serve him in truth with all your heart: for consider how great things he hath done for you.] All his prayers and instructions would not do the business, without their serious considerations. And what more worthy their constant thoughts than the great benefits they had received from God: particularly his tender mercy in not casting them off when they shaked off his government.

Ver. 25. But if you will still do wickedly, ye shall be consumed, both you and your king.] As it proved, not only in this, but in several future reigns.

CHAP. XIII.

Ver. 1. AND Saul reigned one year.] In the Hebrew the words are, the son of one year in his reign or kingdom. A very learned prelate of our own (in his Demonstration of the Messiah, par. ii. p. 240.) takes the meaning to be, that after the Philistines were subdued by Samuel, a year passed, when Saul began to reign; and after this he reigned two years free from their yoke. As for his being called the son of one year in the Hebrew, it is well translated by us reigned one year; because he was born, when he was made king, and changed into another man: for thus (as Bochartus hath observed) the day of an emperor's inauguration among the gentiles was called his birth-day, viz. natalis regni, the day when he began his reign.

And when he had reigned two years over Israel.] So Ralbag interprets the Hebrew words; and thereby confutes the strange fancy in Seder Olam Rabba, that Saul reigned but two years in all. Whereas the meaning is, after this he reigned two years free from the oppression of the Philistines: but when they were ended, the Philistines got the upper hand again, and enslaved the Israelites, as appears by this chapter.

Ver. 2. Saul chose him three thousand men.] In the first year of his reign he performed those things mentioned in the foregoing chapter: and when he had reigned two years, these things fell out which we read in this chapter. Which is much better than Dr. Lightfoot's exposition, that he had been king one year from his first anointing at Ramah, to his second at Gibeah: and after that he reigned two years more before the Lord cast him off, and anointed David. Symmachus and Procopius Gazæus, not much otherwise. Who by son of one year think the simplicity of his mind is denoted: which he preserved for some time, i. e. till he had reigned two years over Israel, and then he began to be depraved and forsaken of God.

Whereof two thousand were with Saul in Michmash, and in Mount Beth-el, and one thousand men with Jonathan in Gibeah of Benjamin.] There was another Gibeah in the tribe of Judah, (Josh. xv. 57.)

And the rest of the people he sent every man to his tent.] The forementioned number being sufficient for his guard, and to preserve the country in peace, and to oppose any sudden inroad of their enemies: he would not be burdensome to his people, by keeping great forces.

Ver. 3. And Jonathan smote the garrison of the Philistines.] Who, though subdued by Samuel at Eben-ezer, and driven out of the country; yet kept some strong holds, as I observed, x. 5.

That was in Geba.] This was a distinct place from Gibeah, though both in the tribe of Benjamin: as is evident from Josh. xviii. 24. 28.

And the Philistines heard it.] And thereupon (as the following words import) denounced war against Israel.

Digitized by Microsoft®

And Saul blew the trumpet throughout all the land of Israel, saying, Let the Hebrews hear.] He gave them notice by a proclamation, what Jonathan had done, and what was the effect of it: and thereupon summoned them to come to Gilgal.

Ver. 4. And all Israel heard say, that Saul had smitten the garrison of the Philistines.] This shews that Jonathan acted by Saul's order: who was desirous to free his own tribe from such intruders.

And that Israel also was an abomination with the Philistines.] Who were highly incensed to take revenge.

And the people were called together after Saul to Gilgal.] Where Samuel had appointed to meet him, (x. 8.)

Ver. 5. The Philistines gathered themselves together to fight with Israel, thirty thousand chariots, and six thousand horsemen, and people as the sand of the sea-shore for multitude; and they came up and pitched in Michmash, eastward from Beth-aven.] A prodigious army, and very formidable, by reason of their chariots and horsemen, which were also very numerous, (see Josh. xi. 4.) But it is not likely the Philistines alone could bring so many into the field: no, nor after other nations thereabout were associated with them, it is credible that they should make up thirty thousand chariots of war. For none ever had so many; Pharaoh himself pursuing the Israelites only with six hundred, (Exod. xiv. 7.) Therefore most of them were no more than carriages, which were necessary for the baggage of such vast multitudes of people: which is a better account, in my judgment, than to say there is a mistake made by transcribers in later times: as Bochartus himself thinks, (Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 9.) because in the Syriac and Arabic copies there are only found three thousand. Which is too great a number, without the help of the foregoing exposition; for in the vast army of Mithridates there were but a hundred chariots, and in Darius's two hundred, and in Antiochus Epiphanes' (of which we read 2 Macc. xiii. 2.) but three hundred.

Ver. 6. When the men of Israel saw that they were in a strait (for the people were distressed). Though their wonderful success against the Ammonites had encouraged them to obey the summons of such a prosperous leader, as Saul had been; yet when they saw the vast army of the Philistines, how well they were appointed, and themselves unprovided, their hearts failed them, and they slunk from him as fast as they had flocked to him.

Then the people did hide themselves in caves, and in thickets, and in rocks, and in high places, and in pits.] One part of the people endeavoured to secure themselves in lurking places: where it was not easy to find them.

Ver. 7. And some of the Hebrews went over Jordan to the land of Gad and Gilead.] Another part of them fled as far as they could from present danger, into the country of the two tribes and a half.

As for Saul, he was yet in Gilgal, and all the people followed him trembling.] All that were left with him were in great fear, seeing so many of their brethren desert him.

Ver. 8. And he tarried seven days, according to the set time that Samuel appointed.] He mistook Samuel's meaning, (as I shewed upon x. 8.) who told him he would come and offer sacrifice seven days: and then adds, thou shalt tarry till I come. So two interpreters, who are ancient in respect of our times (Rupertus and Angelomus), have observed an amphibologia in Samuel's words in that place, which may be construed two ways; and it was Saul's folly to make choice of the wrong sense. For the last words there are as much as if he had said, be sure to tarry till I come, and shew thee what thou shalt do. And indeed common reason might have taught him, that if the war was to be undertaken, it was to be managed likewise by the counsel of the Lord: and therefore he ought not to have sacrificed, or done any other solemn act, before the prophet, who was God's ambassador in this business, came to instruct him.

But Samuel came not to Gilgal.] So soon as Saul expected him.

And the people were scattered from him.] That third part of the people who were left began to go away, when they saw Samuel did not come to advise and assist him in this dangerous condition.

Ver. 9. And Saul said, Bring hither the burnt-offering unto me, and peace-offerings. And he offered the burnt-offering.] And would have proceeded to offer the peace-offerings, if Samuel's coming had not prevented him.

Ver. 10. And it came to pass, that, as soon as he had made an end of offering the burnt-offering, behold, Samuel came; and Saul went out to meet him, that he might salute him.] Welcome him thither: which he did in honour of the prophet.

Ver. 11. And Samuel said, What hast thou done? And Saul said, Because I saw the people were scattered from me, and that thou camest not within the days appointed, and that the Philistines gathered themselves together to Michmash.] These looked like weighty reasons; but could not excuse his presumption in not waiting for Samuel, who assured him he would come thither.

Ver. 12. Therefore, said I, The Philistines will come down now upon me to Gilgal, and I have not made supplication unto the Lord: I forced myself therefore, and offered a burnt-offering.] He pretends it was much against his inclination: but pleads necessity for what he did, least his enemies should have set upon him before he had commended himself to God and begged his blessing. By which it appears, that burnt-offerings were of the nature of a prayer to God: whom they acknowledged hereby to be the Lord of all. Whence it is that we read so often of Abraham and Isaac, that they "built altars (which were for sacrifice) and called upon the name of the Lord." The gentiles also, as well as the Jews, invoked God by their sacrifices, as Mr. Mede hath shewn from Homer and other authors, book ii. p. 464.

Ver. 13. And Samuel said to Saul, Thou hast done foolishly: thou hast not kept the commandment of the Lord thy God, which he commanded thee.] When God advanced Saul to be king, he was little in his own eyes, and then a great man in the sight of God. But now he began to take upon him, and thought it was fit the prophet should wait for the king rather than the king for the prophet: and distrusted Samuel's word, who bade him tarry till he came. And so intruded upon the priest's office; or, at least, caused the priest to do that unseasonably which was reserved for Samuel to do, when God thought fit to send him: who had all along transacted all matters between God and Saul. In short, his folly and disobedience consisted in this, that he intrenched upon the priest's office, or upon the prophet's, or upon both: and would not wait Samuel's coming, nor confess his fault to him when he came; but made excuses, and laid the fault upon all but himself, (ver. 11.)

Abarbinel hath expounded this a little more distinctly, by observing the command which Samuel gave him, when he anointed him, x. 8. where he tells him, first, he would come and offer sacrifice; secondly, he bids him wait for him seven days; and, lastly, saith he would direct him what to do. Now Saul transgressed every part of this command: for he offered sacrifice himself, which God intended should be offered only by the prophet; and he did not stay till the end of the seventh day, but offered on the seventh day in the morning; and he intended to begin the war without any direction from Samuel what he should do. He thinks, also, that those words, seven days (in that place), may refer to the words going before, viz. peace-offerings so many days. For Saul was bound, as it follows, to tarry till Samuel came, though he stayed more than seven days before he came.

For now would the Lord have established thy kingdom upon Israel for ever.] This suggests that the intention of Samuel's coming to offer sacrifice at Gilgal for seven days, was to confirm Saul in the kingdom, (as I observed upon x. 8.) if he had not foolishly deprived himself of that blessing: but here the Hebrew doctors take notice of a difficulty, which is, how God could intend to establish the kingdom upon him for ever, without contradicting the prophecy of Jacob, who had promised the sceptre to the tribe of Judah. Which Ralbag thinks is sufficiently answered, by saying that for ever signifies no more than a long time; as it doth in the words of Hannah in the beginning of this book, chap. i. 22. and in Exod. xxi. 9. and many more places. And so others interpret these words, as long as his posterity lasted.

Ver. 14. But now the kingdom shall not continue.] He predicts that God would not let his family enjoy the kingdom: because of other sins which he foresaw he would commit.

The Lord hath sought him a man after his own heart, and the Lord hath commanded him to be captain over his people, because thou hast not kept that which the Lord commanded thee.] God had not yet commanded David to lead his people, but he fully intended to do it, if Saul did not repent, and obtain a pardon of him for his offence. Whereby he had not provoked him so far, as to have an irreversible sentence passed upon him (as many great men have thought), but it might have been revoked if he had not persisted in his folly, and committed a much greater offence against the Divine Majesty, in the war against Amalek. Then Samuel tells him, the Lord would not repent: which not being added here, it makes it probable he was capable of a pardon, notwithstanding this denunciation: if he had begged it with repentance, and better obedience for the time to come.

Ver. 15. And Samuel arose, and gat him up from Gilgal unto Gibeah of Benjamin.] The place of Saul's birth, and where he lived; which I look upon as a sign that Samuel did not intend to desert him, as he did afterward, nor looked upon him yet as forsaken by God.

And Saul numbered the people that were present with him, about six hundred men.] A strange alteration since the last year, when against the Ammonites he had three hundred thousand men with him, besides those of Judah, (xi. 6.)

Ver. 16. And Saul, and Jonathan his son, and the people who were present with him, abode in Gibeah of Benjamin.] They followed Samuel; and it was a strong place, where they could defend themselves better than in the open field: and here, it is likely, he hoped to increase his forces, being in his own tribe.

But the Philistines encamped in Michmash.] A place not very remote from Gibeah; but in the tribe of Ephraim.

Ver. 17. And the spoilers came out of the camp of the Philistines, in three companies.] They sent out parties three several ways, to ravage the country, there being none to oppose them.

One company turned the way that leadeth to Ophrah.] There was a city of this name in the tribe of Benjamin, (Josh. xviii. 23.) but many take this rather to be that in the tribe of Manasseh, where Gideon was born, (Judg. vi. 11.)

Unto the land of Shual.] So called, because it abounded with foxes, as Bochart observes.

Ver. 18. And another company turned the way of Beth-horon.] Both the upper and the nether cities of this name were in the tribe of Ephraim, (1 Chron. vii. 24.)

And another company turned to the way of the border that looks to the valley of Zeboim, towards the wilderness.] The Chaldee paraphrast translates these words, the valley of vipers; for tzeboa signifies a sort of speckled serpent, wherewith this valley abounded, and lay towards the wilderness of Jericho in the tribe of Benjamin. Thus also a great number of the Hebrew writers translate Zeboim; which Junius takes for a city in this tribe. (See Bochartus, in his Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. iii. cap. 7.)

Ver. 19. Now there was no smith found throughout all the land of Israel: for the Philistines said, Lest the Hebrews make them swords and spears.] To this miserable condition the Philistines had reduced them during the forty years' tyranny over them, of which we read, Judg. xiii. 1. But after Samuel had put an end to it, by the great overthrow he gave the Philistines at Eben-ezer, it seems something strange they had not restored their artificers. But the sloth of the Israelites appears in their whole story; and it was not easy, in so short a time, for men to learn this trade, which the Philistines wisely destroyed, as the Chaldeans, when they destroyed Jerusalem, carried away all the smiths to Babylon, that they who remained in the land might not arm themselves again, (2 Kings xxiv. 14.)

Ver. 20. But all the men of Israel went down to the Philistines, to sharpen every man his share, and his coulter, and his axe, and his mattock.] Not to the country of the Philistines, for that was too far off from some parts of the land of Israel; but to their garrisons, which they held among them, even after Samuel had driven the main body of them out of the country, as I observed upon x. 5.

Ver. 21. Yet they had a file for the mattocks, and for the coulters, and for the forks, and for the axes, and to sharpen the goads.] Thus Pliny tells us in his Natural History, lib. xxxi. cap. 14. that in the league which Porsanna made with the Roman people, after the expulsion of their kings, it was expressly covenanted, "Ne ferro, nisi in agricultura uterentur;" that they should not make use of iron, but only in the tilling of their fields.

Ver. 22. So it came to pass, that in the day of battle, there was neither sword nor spear found in the hand of any of the people that were with Saul and Jonathan: but with Saul, and Jonathan his son, was there found.] The Jews being very much addicted to feeding cattle, very much neglected mechanical arts, as appeared when Solomon built the temple. For there were so few skilled in architecture among the Israelites, that he was constrained to send to another nation for them. And so Rasi thinks it was in the trade of smiths; there being no iron mines in the land. But that was not the true reason, as Kimchi observes; for the Philistines, as was said before, had transplanted the smiths, when the Israelites were under their dominion. In their oppressions also, which they lay under, their enemies were wont to disarm them, as appears by the song of Deborah, (Judg. v. 8.) But though they had no sword nor spear, yet they had bows and arrows, and slings; which the men of Gibeah could anciently manage to a wonderful advantage, as we read, Judg. xx. 16. And besides these, they anciently used clubs to beat down their enemies; and before the invention of spears with iron points, they had sharp stakes hardened in the fire, as many authors inform us.

Ver. 23. And the garrison of the Philistines went out to the passage of Michmash.] Some refer this to the garrison mentioned ver. 3. which Jonathan having smitten, they that escaped joined with the army at Michmash. But it refers rather to the garrison mentioned in the beginning of the next chapter, (ver. 1.) and the last word relates not to the passage, but to the garrison. As if he had said, The garrison of the Philistines in Michmash went out to the passage. For Michmash, as Rasi observes, was upon a high hill, as Gibeah was; between which was a valley, called here a passage. Into which the garrison descended, to invite the Israelites to battle; or, as the Targum translates the first word, the captain-general of the Philistines went out into the valley; to view the ground, we may suppose, and form a camp there.

CHAP. XIV.

Ver. 1. NOW it came to pass upon a day, that Jonathan the son of Saul said unto the young man that bare his armour, Come, and let us go over to the garrison of the Philistines that is on the other side.] Of the valley, mentioned in the foregoing verse. This had been a very rash attempt, and very criminal (he having no order from his father, who commanded in chief), if he had not had a Divine incitation to it. Which he felt upon the sight of the Philistines appearing, as if they intended to assault Gibeah; and upon the information he received of the great spoil which the three parties made of the poor people in the country, (xiii. 17.)

But he told not his father.] Lest he should have hindered him from this enterprise, into which he felt himself moved by God.

Ver. 2. And Saul tarried in the uttermost part of Gibeah.] In some intrenchments he had made without the city.

Under a pomegranate-tree, which is in Migron.] Where he pitched his tent.

And the people that were with him were about six hundred men.] His forces were not augmented since he came to Gibeah, as might have been expected, (xiii. 15, 16.) But, as Vegetius observes, (lib. i. de Re Militari, cap. 8.) "in omni conflictu non tam prodest multitudo, quam virtus:" in all conflicts valour doth more service than multitude.

Ver. 3. And Ahijah the son of Ahitub, Ichabod's brother, the son of Phinehas.] It seems Phinehas (who was slain with Hophni) left two sons; Ichabod, who was born after his death; and Ahitub, who was born before: and left a son, who is here called Ahijah, and in xxii. 9. Ahimelech; who left a son called Abiathar, xxiii. 6.

The son of Eli, the Lord's priest in Shiloh.] These last words, the Lord's priest in Shiloh, manifestly belong to Eli, who was the high-priest while the tabernacle was in Shiloh.

Wearing an ephod.] Or rather, the ephod; which comprehends the breast-plate, with urim and thummim, for they were inseparable from it. These Ahijah, being high-priest, now wore: for these words, as Ralbag observes, belong to him. (See Selden, lib. i. de Success. ad Pontif. cap. 3.) Saul being now in great distress sent for Ahijah, to consult God for him, as there should be occasion: and, as appears by the eighteenth verse of this chapter, had commanded him to bring the ark with him from Kirjath-jearim.

And the people knew not that Jonathan was gone.] This makes Josephus's opinion probable, that he went away in the night: which was prudent upon another account; that he might not be spied presently by the Philistines.

Ver. 4. And between the passages, by which Jonathan sought to go over unto the Philistines' garrison, there was a sharp rock on one side, and a sharp rock on the other.] So that there was no way to come at the Philistines, but by climbing up one of these rocks, (ver. 12.) which were thought inaccessible: and therefore not fortified, as the other passages to Michmash were, with such strong guards as Jonathan could not encounter.

The name of the one was Bozez, the name of the other Seneh.] Which were such famous precipices, that they had names bestowed on them: the original of which will not be worth our inquiry; but the latter seems to have taken its name from the thorns that grew upon it.

Ver. 5. The fore-front of the one was situate northward over against Michmash, and the other southward over against Gibeah.] By this we understand how these two places lay, towards which these rocks pointed.

Ver. 6. And Jonathan said to the young man that bare his armour, Come, let us go over to the garrison of the uncircumcised.] He speaks of them with contempt, as strangers to the covenant of God.

It may be the Lord will work for us: for there is no restraint to the Lord to save by many or by few.] He speaks with some diffidence to his servant; but was inwardly persuaded of a certain victory, by the Divine assistance.

Ver. 7. And his armour-bearer said unto him, Do all that is in thine heart: turn thee.] Which way thou wilt.

Behold, I am with thee according to thy heart.] He resolved not to forsake his master in any undertaking, though ever so dangerous: being such a servant as Gideon had, (Judg. vii. 10.)

Ver. 8. Then said Jonathan, Behold, I will pass over to these men.] He resolves to lead the way.

And we will discover ourselves unto them.] At break of day.

Ver. 9. If they say thus unto us, Tarry until we come unto you; then we will stand still in our place, and will not go up unto them.

Ver. 10. But if they say thus, Come up to us; then we will go up: for the Lord hath delivered them into our hand; and this shall be a sign unto us.] Which he could not have known without an instinct from God, who often suggested such thoughts unto good men: as we see in the example of Abraham's servant, Gen. xxiv. 14, &c. And there is something like this in the beginning of Herodotus's fifth book concerning the Pæones, and the Perinthians: where he saith, the Pœonians went to war by a Divine direction with the Perinthians; and were ordered, if the Perinthians, being opposed to them, provoked them by name to fight, then they should invade them; but if they did not, they should abstain from fighting. Now while they faced one another there happened a threefold single combat: and the Perinthians being victors in two of them, began to sing a song of triumph, and insult over the Pœonians; who thereupon said one to another, νῦν ἂν εἴη ὁ χρησμὸς ἐπιτελεσμένος ἡμῖν, νῦν ἡμέτερον τὸ ἔργον. Now is the oracle fulfilled to us, now is our business: and so shouting, and falling upon the Perinthians, they vanquished them, and left few of them remaining.

Ver. 11. And both of them discovered themselves unto the garrison of the Philistines.] At the bottom of the rocks.

And the Philistines said, Behold, the Hebrews come forth out of their holes where they had hid themselves.] See xiii. 6. They imagined it was not courage, but necessity, which forced them to come within their view, as they sought for food.

Ver. 12. And the men of the garrison answered Jonathan and his armour-bearer, and said, Come up to us, and we will shew you a thing.] They mocked at them, thinking they durst not attempt to climb up to them.

And Jonathan said to his armour-bearer, Come up after me; for the Lord hath delivered them into the hand of Israel.] Now he gives him the same assurance which he had before in his own mind.

Ver. 13. And Jonathan climbed up upon his hands and his feet, and his armour-bearer after him.] Not in the view of the Philistines, but by some difficult way, which none was ever known to go: and so, perhaps, they came behind them and surprised them.

And they fell before Jonathan; and his armour-bearer slew after him.] The first onset was made by Jonathan (as he led the way up the precipice), who rushed upon them with such a fury, that he threw them down to the ground, and then his armour-bearer killed them. So some understand this: which was a more wonderful action than that of Horatius Cochlites (as Victorinus Strigelius observes), who alone maintained a passage at a bridge, against all the forces of the enemy: and caused the bridge to be broken down behind him. But that shews, since natural courage made a man so daring, it is not incredible that Jonathan made such an attempt by Divine incitation.

Ver. 14. The first slaughter, which Jonathan and his armour-bearer made, was about twenty men, within as it were an half acre of land, which a yoke of oxen might plough.] viz. In one day. That is, saith Kimchi, in a very small space of ground: which De Dieu will have to be half a furrow in length. (See him.)

Ver. 15. And there was a trembling in the host, in the field, and among the people; the garrison, and the spoilers, they also trembled.] News being brought of this slaughter to the host of the Philistines which lay in the field, it put them into a great consternation: for they were asleep (it is likely), this being done very early in the morning, as Josephus thinks, (lib. vi. cap. 7.) And all the people that attended the host, as well as the garrison, and spoilers who had been ravaging the country, (xiii. 17.) were very much affrighted: imagining a great army had been at hand to fall upon them; of which these two were but the scouts. Whose exploits, perhaps, were also magnified beyond the truth.

And the earth quaked.] Some think there was a real earthquake, which increased their fear: but it may be no more than a metaphorical expression, for the great tumult they were in.

So it was a great trembling.] In the Hebrew, a trembling of God; that is, which God sent upon them: called by the heathen a panic fear, which they thought came from their gods; and made the stoutest men quake. So Pindar excellently expresses it in his Nemea, ix. ver. 63.

——— Ἐν γὰρ
Δαιμονίοισι φόβοις
Φεύγονται καὶ Παῖδες Θεῶν.

When men are struck with Divine terrors, even the children of the gods (i. e. the most heroic spirits) betake themselves to flight. And the army of the Philistines consisting (as I observed on xiii. 5.) of different nations, it made the confusion and trembling the greater: because they either did not understand, or suspected one another.

Ver. 16. And the watchmen of Saul in Gibeah of Benjamin looked.] For it was seated on a high hill, which overlooked the country about it.

And behold the multitude melted away.] Were scattered; so that fewer and fewer were seen in a company together.

And they went on beating down one another.] Not being able, in this confusion, to distinguish their friends from their enemies.

Ver. 17. Then said Saul unto the people that were with him, Number now, and see who are gone from us. And when they were numbered, behold, Jonathan and his armour-bearer were not there.] He easily missed Jonathan, I suppose, but could not imagine he would fall upon the Philistines, without a good number of men to assist him: which he knew he had not. This made him call the high-priest, to inquire of God, that he might be informed what was the matter, and what he should do.

Ver. 18. And Saul said to Ahijah, Bring hither the ark of God: for the ark of God was at that time with the children of Israel.] How could he bid him bring the ark, when it was at Kirjath-jearim, in the house of Abinadab? To this Abarbinel answers, that he doth not speak of the ark in which the tables of the law were kept (for he doth not say, bring the ark of the covenant hither), but a little coffer, wherein the ephod was kept; that is, the breast-plate with urim and thummim. These the priest brought along with him, that Saul might consult God upon occasion, as David did, 1 Sam. xxx. 8. Therefore the LXX. translate it, προσάγαγε τὸ Ἐφοὺδ, bring hither the ephod. And so Rasi and Kimchi. (See Buxtorf. Hist. Arcæ, cap. 3. and our learned Dr. Spencer, de Leg. et Rit. Heb. fol. 859.) But this doth not seem a solid interpretation, there being but one ark mentioned in Scripture, which is not always called the ark of the covenant, but the ark of the Lord, or the ark of God, as it is called when it came into the camp of Israel, and was taken by the Philistines, (chap. iv. ver. 6. 11. 17, 18, &c.) Therefore here, I suppose, Saul commanded the ark itself to attend him; when he wanted the advice and assistance of Samuel.

Ver. 19. And it came to pass, that while Saul talked with the priest.] Desiring him to inquire of God what was become of Jonathan and his armour-bearer; and what was the meaning of that tumult in the host of the Philistines.

That the noise that was in the host of the Philistines went on and increased: and Saul said to the priest, Withdraw thine hand.] He was going to take the urim and thummim, as the forenamed authors understand it, when Saul, hearing the tumult grow greater and greater among the Philistines, bade him forbear: there being no need, for he concluded they were routed; and therefore resolved, without any further deliberation, to go and pursue them. Or, as others understand it, the priest having stretched forth his hand to God in prayer for his advice, Saul called upon him to desist: for it was plain what they had to do without any inquiry.

Ver. 20. And Saul and all the people that were with him assembled, and came to the battle: and, behold, every man's sword was against his fellow, and there was a very great discomfiture.] This Josephus thinks fell out (as I noted above) because their army consisted of divers nations, who did not know one another, and so fell into great confusion.

Ver. 21. Moreover, the Hebrews that were with the Philistines before that time, which went up with them into the camp from the country round about.] As some, it seems, did; either out of fear, compulsion, or design.

Even they also turned to be with the Israelites that were with Saul and Jonathan.] And helped to destroy the Philistines.

Ver. 22. Likewise all the men of Israel that had hid themselves in Mount Ephraim.] And other places mentioned xiii. 6.

When they heard that the Philistines fled, even they also followed hard after them in the battle.] Pursued them closely.

Ver. 23. So the Lord saved Israel that day: and the battle passed over unto Beth-aven.] These words seem to imply, that the fight continued till they came to this place, which lay westward from Michmash, (xiii. 5.) and there the Philistines threw down their arms; and fled as fast as they could towards their own country.

Ver. 24. And the men of Israel were distressed that day.] When they should have been full of joy and triumph.

For Saul had adjured the people, saying, Cursed be the man that eateth any food until the evening, that I may be avenged of my enemies. So none of the people tasted any food.] That they might not lose time, nor make the least stay in the pursuit of their enemies, who fled before them. The king had the same power that the great Sanhedrin had, who, the Jews say, might devote those to destruction, who did not obey the charge that was given them in war. (See Selden, lib. iv. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 6.) But this was a very indiscreet act of Saul, unbecoming an excellent captain; for instead of pursuing the Philistines with vigour, they fainted for want of refreshment. Therefore great commanders always took care their soldiers should be moderately fed, that they might not be tired in a long conflict. So Vegetius informs us: (lib. iii. de Re Militari, cap. 9.) "Veteribus seculis mos fuit, parco cibo curatos milites ad certamen educere, ut citatiores sumpta esca redderet et longiore conflictu non fatigerentur inedia." And there was the same need of taking a little refreshment if they could get it, when they were engaged in a long pursuit of their enemy.

Ver. 25. And all they of the land came to a wood; and there was honey upon the ground.] Which dropped from the hollow trees, or the clefts of rocks, where bees made their combs in that country; and sometimes upon the very ground; as Bochart hath shewn in his Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. iv. cap. 12. where he observes this was not peculiar to Judea, but usual in other countries.

Ver. 26. And when the people were come into the wood, behold, the honey dropped; but no man put his hand to his mouth: for the people feared the oath.] Wild honey was so copious in those countries, and flowed so plentifully, that it gave occasion to that hyperbolical speech in the book of Job, xx. 17. where we read of brooks, or torrents, of honey and butter.

Ver. 27. And Jonathan heard not when his father charged the people with the oath.] He and his armour-bearer being engaged in fight, (with whom some others joined, ver. 21.) long before Saul and his small army came to join him.

Wherefore he put forth the end of his rod, and dipped it in a honey-comb, and put his hand to his mouth; and his eyes were enlightened.] That is, his spirits and strength, which were quite spent by long abstinence from meat, so that he could scarce see, were restored to him, and he was made fresh and lively to proceed in pursuit of the enemy. For, as Gerh. Vossius observes, (lib. iv. de Orig. et Progr. Idol. cap. 79.) the eyes are wont to grow dim with long hunger: and as all meat and drink refreshes and enlivens, so wine and honey do it above all other more speedily: for their spirits are both very subtile, and soon diffuse their strength through the body. It is also observed by learned men, that honey is an excellent medicine for sore and weak eyes: but that is nothing to this purpose; such cures being not performed by eating of it, but by anointing the eyes with it.

Ver. 28. Then answered one of the people.] That came with Saul to the pursuit.

And said, Thy father charged the people with an oath, saying, Cursed be the man that eateth any food to-day. And the people were faint.] And yet forbore to take any refreshment, for fear of the curse.

Ver. 29. Then said Jonathan, My father hath troubled the land: see, I pray you, how mine eyes have been enlightened, because I tasted a little of this honey.] Which did not cause so long a stay, as to hinder the pursuit of the enemy.

Ver. 30. How much more, if haply the people had eaten freely this day of the spoil of their enemies which they found? for had there not been now a much greater slaughter among the Philistines?] They would have been able to pursue them more swiftly, and to have done greater execution upon them, than they could when they were faint. Thus men, by their rashness, hinder what they would have.

Ver. 31. And they smote the Philistines that day from Michmash to Ajalon.] A city in the tribe of Dan, (Josh. xix. 42.) which bordered upon the country of the Philistines.

And the people were very faint.] Otherwise they might have pursued further.

Ver. 32. And the people flew upon the spoil.] Like a ravenous bird, which wanted food.

And took sheep, and oxen, and calves, and slew them on the ground: and the people did eat them with the blood.] Raw, or but half roasted or boiled, their hunger being so sharp, that it made them forget their duty.

Ver. 33. Then they told Saul, saying, Behold, the people sin against the Lord, in that they eat with the blood.] All the people were not so profane, but only some part of them.

And he said, Ye have transgressed: roll a great stone unto me.] Our learned Dr. Spencer thinks, they did not eat with the blood, as we translate it, but upon, or by the blood; which was an idolatrous custom in the east, to invite the familiarity of demons, as hath been noted on Lev. xix. 26. And therefore Saul, to keep the people from thus defiling themselves, commanded a great stone to be brought to him, that there they might kill their beasts at that one place, and then feed upon them. (See de Leg. et Rit. Hebr. p. 334.) But this doth not seem probable that they should now practise those idolatrous rites, when God had wrought such a wonderful deliverance for them; and they were so impatient to eat, that they had not time to think of such ceremonies.

Ver. 34. And Saul said, Disperse yourselves among the people.] He speaks unto his officers.

And say unto them, Bring me hither every man his ox, and every man his sheep.] This is a sign they had not all offended; having not yet killed their beasts.

And slay them here, and eat; and sin not against the Lord in eating with the blood. And all the men brought every man his ox with him that night, and slew them there.] As many as they had occasion to use.

Ver. 35. And Saul built an altar unto the Lord.] To offer sacrifices of peace-offerings, and give thanks to God for this great victory. Though others think it was not for sacrifice, but only a monument of God's mercy, in this late deliverance.

The same was the first altar that he built unto the Lord.] In the Hebrew the words are (as is observed in the margin of our Bibles), that altar he began to build unto the Lord; i. e. he laid the first stone himself. We read of his offering before in Gilgal; but that, perhaps, was not upon an altar erected by himself, but was built before by others.

Ver. 36. And Saul said, Let us go down after the Philistines by night, and spoil them until the morning, and let us not leave a man of them.] Having thus refreshed themselves, in the evening Saul propounded to them to renew the pursuit: hoping to cut off their whole army, when they were asleep in the night.

And they said, Do whatsoever seemeth good unto thee.] Their good success made them as forward, as before they were backward to follow him.

Then said the priest, Let us draw near hither unto God.] It is likely he stood before the altar (if it were for sacrifice) and put them in mind, that it was dangerous to undertake any thing without God's advice: which he was there ready to ask for them: in the Targum it is, Let us inquire by the Word of the Lord.

Ver. 37. And Saul asked counsel of God.] By urim and thummim.

Shall I go down after the Philistines? wilt thou deliver them into the hand of Israel?] Hitherto Saul had some goodness left in him: for he hearkened to the priest, when he admonished him of his duty, which he neglected. The Targum here again hath it, Saul asked by the Word of the Lord.

But he answered him not that day.] Though perhaps the priest had often begged an answer, yet he received none.

Ver. 38. And Saul said, Draw near hither all the chief of the people; and see wherein this sin hath been this day.] He concluded some sin had provoked God, not to regard his supplication: which he desired might be found out and punished.

Ver. 39. For, as the Lord liveth, that saveth Israel, though it be in Jonathan my son, he shall surely die. But there was not a man among the people that answered him.] Though many knew that Jonathan had transgressed his father's charge, (ver. 28.) yet none would discover it.

Ver. 40. Then said he unto all Israel, Be you on one side, and I and Jonathan my son will be on the other side. And the people said, Do what seemeth good unto thee.] He had gained great authority among the people (it appears by this, and by ver. 36.) since his wonderful success.

Ver. 41. Therefore Saul said unto the Lord God of Israel, Give a perfect lot. And Saul and Jonathan were taken: and the people escaped.] The word lot is not in the original, but only give perfect, that is, declare who is innocent. So the word give sometimes signifies to pronounce, (Deut. xiii. 1, 2.)

Ver. 42. And Saul said, Cast lots between me and Jonathan my son. And Jonathan was taken.] This looks like virtue in him, that, for good example's sake, he would not exempt himself, though a king, from the same trial to which he exposed all the people.

Ver. 43. Then said Saul to Jonathan, Tell me what thou hast done. And Jonathan told him, and said, I did but taste a little honey, that was in my hand, and, lo, I must die.] This shews a very great mind, that he neither denied what he had done, nor excused it by his ignorance, nor refused to die: though he looked upon it as very hard. So Josephus represents it, εὐγενῶς καὶ μεγαλοφρόνως, &c. with a generous and great mind, he told his father the truth; and desired not to be spared, (lib. vi. Antiq. cap. 7.)

Ver. 44. And Saul answered, God do so and more also: for thou shalt surely die, Jonathan.] This demonstrates Saul to have been of a rash and of a rigorous temper. With whom learned men are wont to compare Titus Manlius; who caused his son's head to be cut off, for fighting the enemy, when he had a fair advantage, contrary to order, as A. Gellius tells us, (lib. ix. cap. 13.) But in this regard Saul was to be commended, as Josephus also observes, that he had a greater regard to his oath, than to his kindred and natural affection.

Ver. 45. And the people said unto Saul, Shall Jonathan die, who hath wrought this great salvation in Israel? God forbid: as the Lord liveth, there shall not one hair of his head fall to the ground; for he hath wrought with God this day. So the people rescued Jonathan, that he died not.] They did not rescue him by force and violence, but by their petition to Saul, and the reason they gave for it. Josephus saith, that " by their prayers and vows to God they delivered him:" who, perhaps, signified by the priest, that he approved the people's desire. They were too forward indeed to swear directly against Saul's oath: but of the two, his being the most rash, God was pleased to annul it, and absolve him from it. Thus Josephus understands it, They rescued him from the anger of his father, καὶ εὐχὰς ὑπὲρ τοῦ νεανίσκου ποιοῦνται τῷ Θεῷ, ὡς τὸν αὐτὸν ἀπολύσαι τοῦ ἁμαρτήματος, and made their prayer to God for the young man, that he would loose him from his sin.

How that phrase, not a hair of his head, &c. was used, appears from 2 Sam. xiv. 11. 1 Kings i. 51.

Ver. 46. Then Saul went up from following the Philistines, and the Philistines went to their own country.] He pursued them no further, but let them go quietly to their own homes.

Ver. 47. And Saul took the kingdom over Israel.] Ruled with greater authority over his people after this victory: for the Philistines had enslaved them, (as I observed xiii. 2.) But by this deliverance they were freed from their yoke, and Saul recovered his kingdom.

And fought against all his enemies on every side.] He did not invade them (as may be gathered from the next verse), but repelled them, and kept them within their own limits.

Against Moab, and against the children of Ammon, and against Edom, and against the kings of Zobah, and against the Philistines.] These were the principal enemies wherewith they were encompassed. And by the kings of Zobah are meant those that ruled in that part of Syria, which is called Aram-Zobah; which lay towards Euphrates: having that river for its eastern bounds, and Damascus and the land of Canaan for its western. For it appears to be near to the Israelites, by the frequent wars which David and Solomon had with the kings of this country, (2 Sam. viii. 3. x. 6. 2 Chron. vii. 3.) and the aid which the Syrians of Damascus sent them, (2 Sam. viii. 5.) and their flying thither when they were routed. (1 Kings xi. 24.) And the cities which Solomon built in the wilderness, (1 Kings ix. 17, 18.) are said to be in Hamath-Zobah, 2 Chron. viii. 34. which demonstrates it was upon the confines of Judea.

And whithersoever he turned himself, he vexed them.] He got the better of them. And in his days the Reubenites also made war with the Hagarites, and possessed their land, till the time of the captivity, (1 Chron. v. 10. 18—20.)

Ver. 48. And he gathered a host, and smote Amalek.] Which war is at large described in the next chapter.

And delivered Israel out of the hand of them that spoiled them.] The six forementioned nations.

Ver. 49. And the sons of Saul were Jonathan, Ishui, and Melchi-shua, &c.] These were only fit to accompany him in his wars, and upon that account are only mentioned here, and xxxi. 2. though he had another son (Ish-bosheth), who is mentioned in 1 Chron. viii. 33. under the name of Esh-baal.

Ver. 50. And the name of Saul's wife was Ahinoam, the daughter of Ahimaaz; and the name of the captain of his host was Abner, the son of Ner, Saul's uncle.] For Ner was brother to Saul's father, as the next verse tells us. It seems to me observable, that we never read of more than one wife that Saul had, though David had many. It is possible he did not think it prudent, in a new-erected kingdom, to follow the example of the eastern kings in every thing.

Ver. 51. And Kish was the father of Saul; and Ner, he father of Abner, was the son of Abiel.] As Kish also was, (xi. 1.)

Ver. 52. And there was sore war against the Philistines all the days of Saul.] Who could not perfectly subdue them; as appears from their renewing the war, (chap. xvii. &c.)

And when Saul saw any strong man, or any valiant man.] Who behaved himself with vigour and courage in the wars.

He took him unto him.] To be one of his guard, or to be preferred in the army.

CHAP. XV.

Ver. 1. SAMUEL also said unto Saul, The Lord sent me to anoint thee to be king over his people, over Israel: now therefore hearken unto the voice of the words of the Lord.] Being so highly obliged to God, above all other men in the nation, it highly concerned him to be very careful to observe his commands; especially having lately been disobedient, (xiii. 13.)

Ver. 2. Thus saith the Lord of hosts, I remember that which Amalek did to Israel, how he laid wait for him in the way, when he came up from Egypt.] See my notes upon Deut. xxv. 17, 18.

Ver. 3. Now go, and smite Amalek, and utterly destroy all that they have, and spare them not; but slay both man and woman, infant and suckling, ox and sheep, camel and ass.] This heavy sentence was pronounced against them long ago, (Exod. xvii. 14.) and renewed at their entrance into Canaan, with a charge not to forget it, (Deut. xxv. 19.) and now ordered to be put in execution.

Ver. 4. And Saul gathered the people together, and numbered them in Telaim, two hundred thousand footmen, and ten thousand men of Judah.] The word Telaim signifying lambs (which it is likely were very plentiful in this place), the Targum translates it, he numbered them by paschal lambs: as if the Passover was kept at this time. And so Rasi fancies that it being unlawful to number the people, he commanded every man to take a lamb out of the flock, and numbered them. But David Kimchi, and others, take this as we do, for the name of a place called Telem, in the tribe of Judah, (Josh. xv. 24.) For there is no place mentioned in Scripture called Telaim; nor any so near it in sound as this. (See Selden, lib. iii. de Synedr. cap. 11. n. 5. and Bochart's Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 43.) I have often observed that their armies consisted of footmen, they having no horses in Judea. And in two regards they were more useful than horsemen, as Vegetius observes, (lib. ii. de Re Militari, cap. 1.) first, because " possunt ubique prodesse," they may be serviceable every where, which horsemen cannot. And, secondly, a great number of them, " sumptu et expensa minore nutritur," is maintained at less expense and charge.

Ver. 5. And Saul came to a city of Amalek.] To the metropolis of the kingdom, whose name, perhaps, was Amalek. For so the words may be understood, he came to the city Amalek.

And laid wait in the valley.] Or fought them in the valley, as we translate it in the margin: for they came out to give him battle.

Ver. 6. And Saul said to the Kenites.] Who were of the posterity of Jethro: some of which were of the tribe of Judah, others in Naphtali; and some, it seems, dwelt among the Amalekites in the rocky part of that country, (Numb. xxiv. 21.)

Go, depart, get ye down.] For they dwelt on high.

From among the Amalekites, lest I destroy you with them.] For some of the Amalekites, it is likely, would flee to them for shelter.

For you shewed kindness to the children of Israel when they came out of Egypt.] Some of their ancestors did, which the Israelites did not forget, (Exod. xviii. 12. Numb. x. 31.)

And the Kenites departed from among the Amalekites.] And went, it is likely, into the land of Judah.

Ver. 7. And Saul smote the Amalekites from Havilah until thou comest to Shur, that is over against Egypt.] That is, their whole country, of which this was the extent; from Havilah in the north-east, to Shur in the south-west. These two, Havilah and Shur, are constantly opposed, as the most opposite terms of Arabia, as Bochartus hath observed, in his Phaleg. lib. iv. cap. 6.

Ver. 8. And Saul took Agag the king of the Amalekites alive, and utterly destroyed all the people with the edge of the sword.] That is, all that could be met with: but some fled, no doubt, as soon as they saw him victorious; and saved themselves in other countries. Accordingly we read of good numbers of this people afterward.

Ver. 9. But Saul and the people spared Agag.] Whosoever proposed it, they all agreed in it, not to kill Agag: and Saul, it is most likely, was the chief author of this counsel. Who, Θαυμάσας τὸ κάλλος καὶ τὸ μέγεθος τοῦ σώματος (as Josephus speaks), being struck with admiration of him as a very goodly and proper person, thought fit to save him. Not following herein the command of God, but his own private fancy and affection, (lib. vi. Antiq. cap. 8.) Others think he intended to lead him in triumph. (See ver. 12.)

And the best of the sheep, and of the oxen, and of the fatlings, and of the lambs.] Interpreters wonderfully vary about the sense of the word hamisnim, which we translate fatlings: as may be seen in Bochartus's Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 43. fol. 430. where he shews it signifies cattle in their full strength.

All that was good.] Of their household goods (I suppose), apparel, and such-like things.

And would not utterly destroy them.] As they had been commanded by God; but took them as a prey unto themselves.

But every thing that was vile and refuse, that destroyed they utterly.] All that was not worth the keeping. Which is a wonderful instance of the baseness of human nature, when governed by covetousness, or any such-like affection.

Ver. 10. Then came the word of the Lord unto Samuel, saying.] Immediately before Saul returned from his expedition.

Ver. 11. It repenteth me that I have set up Saul to be king.] Whom he resolved now to throw down from his throne. (See ver. 29.) For repentance in God, imports only the will of a change, and not of every change, but of the Divine sentence pronounced, which the Scripture calls repentance. So Procopius Gazæus, "Pœnitentia Dei, est dispensationis ipsius mutatio," God's repentance is the change of his own dispensation.

For he is turned back from following me, and hath not performed my commandment. And it grieved Samuel; and he cried unto the Lord all night.] Beseeching him to pardon Saul.

Ver. 12. And when Samuel rose up early to meet Saul in the morning, it was told Samuel, saying, Saul came to Carmel.] A city in the mountains of the tribe of Judah, where Nabal dwelt, who is called the Carmelite, xxvii. 3. (See Josh. xv. 55.)

And, behold, he set him up a place.] Either for the dividing of the spoil, as the Targum understands it; or marking out a camp, as Kimchi; or he erected a triumphal arch, as St. Jerome: having brought Agag with him, to make his triumph greater. Which arch, it may be thought, was in the form of a hand: for in the Hebrew the word we translate place is jad, which signifies a hand. Or, as Rasi will have it, he here built an altar: which Elijah in future times repaired, (1 Kings xviii. 30.) But this is a very gross mistake: for this Carmel was very remote from that mount which Elijah frequented, as Bochartus hath observed, (par. i. Hieroz. lib. ii. cap. 48.) It may be rather thought, to be some building erected in the form beforementioned, to signify that they overcame the Amalekites with a strong hand.

And is gone about, and passed on, and gone down to Gilgal.] In a long pomp, I suppose, as a mighty conqueror.

Ver. 13. And Samuel came to Saul: and Saul said to him, Blessed be thou of the Lord.] A form of salutation, wishing him all happiness from God: who had ordered him to undertake such a piece of service, as he had done him.

I have performed the commandment of the Lord.] He was so insensible of any fault he had committed, that he boasts of his performance.

Ver. 14. And Samuel said, What means then this bleating of the sheep, &c.] Which he had commanded him utterly to destroy, (ver. 3.)

Ver. 15. And Saul said, They have brought them from the Amalekites.] He lays the blame upon the people, when it is evident he himself was principally in fault, (ver. 9.)

And the people spared the best of the sheep and of the oxen to sacrifice unto the Lord thy God; and the rest we have utterly destroyed.] This was a plausible pretence, it being the custom all the world over, to give part of their spoils in war unto their gods; if there had not been an express command for destroying every thing in this war: so that nothing should be spared, either for himself, or for them.

Ver. 16. And Samuel said unto Saul, Stay.] This sounds as if Saul was going away: being abundantly satisfied in his noble achievements.

And I will tell thee what the Lord hath said unto me this night.] When he cried to him without ceasing, (ver. 11.) Though Samuel was a prophet, saith Procopius Gazæus, yet speaking to a king, he begs leave he may do it freely.

And he said, Say on.] He hoped, it is likely, to hear himself commended for his piety.

rael?] It is of great use for men to remember what they were: as Placilla the wife of Theodosius (Strigelius here observes) said to her husband, Αεί σε προσήκει λογίζεσθαι, τί μὲν ἦσθα πάλαι, τί δὲ γέγονας νῦν, &c. It behoves thee always to think what thou wast heretofore, and what thou art now. For calling these things to mind, thou wilt not be ungrateful to thy benefactor: but govern the kingdom thou hast received according to the laws; and by that means honour him that bestowed it upon thee.

Ver. 18. And the Lord sent thee on a journey, and said, Go and utterly destroy the sinners the Amakelites.] He was employed in a very honourable expedition, to destroy the declared enemies of the Lord.

Ver. 19. Wherefore then didst thou not obey the voice of the Lord, but didst flee upon the spoil.] With great greediness, as a hungry bird or beast doth upon his prey.

And didst evil in the sight of the Lord?] The command was as plain as words could make it: so that there was no reason but his own base covetousness, why it was not obeyed.

Ver. 20. And Saul said unto Samuel, Yea, I have obeyed the voice of the Lord, and have gone the way which the Lord sent me, and have brought Agag the king of the Amalekites, and have utterly destroyed the Amalekites.] A strange stupidity! to imagine such a partial obedience could be pleasing unto God.

Ver. 21. But the people took of the spoil, sheep and oxen, the chief things that should have been utterly destroyed, to sacrifice unto the Lord thy God in Gilgal.] This was a mean thing, to throw all the blame on the people, whom he should have governed better: and it was worst of all, to let them pretend religion for their disobedience.

Ver. 22. And Samuel said, Hath the Lord as great delight in burnt-offerings and sacrifices as in obeying the voice of the Lord? Behold, to obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams.] This most Divine admonition is inculcated by all following inspired writers, David, Solomon, and the prophets. (See Psal. l. 13, 14. li. 16, 17. Eccles. v. 1. Isa. i. 11, 12, &c. lxvi. 3. Jer. vii. 21, 22, &c. Hos. vi. 6. Micah vi. 6—8. Zach. viii. 16.) And some of the heathen have said excellent things to this purpose.

Ver. 23. For rebellion is as the sin of witchcraft.] Or, following after divination: which is opposed to prophecy, as idols are to God.

And stubbornness is as iniquity and idolatry.] The words aven and teraphim signify all manner of idolatry. From which though Saul was free, yet his obstinate disobedience made him liable to such punishment as idolaters deserved. For as they were to be cut off, so he was to be dethroned, as it here follows.

Because thou hast rejected the word of the Lord, he also hath rejected thee from being king.] As idolaters were to lose their lives, so he and his posterity lost the kingdom. And it is observable, that he was at last slain by the hand of an Amalekite, (2 Sam. i. 8.)

Ver. 24. And Saul said unto Samuel, I have sinned: for I have transgressed the commandment of the Lord, and thy word; because I feared the people, and obeyed their voice.] It is not certain whether he led the people into this sin, or they led him. I look upon this only as an excuse (he having no reason to fear the people, who were all at his command), and that he was not yet thoroughly sensible of his guilt.

Ver. 25. Now therefore, I pray thee, pardon my sin.] By deprecating God's displeasure.

And turn again with me.] To Gilgal; from whence he came forth to meet Samuel.

That I may worship the Lord.] And by Samuel's prayers obtain a pardon.

Ver. 26. And Samuel said unto Saul, I will not return with thee: for thou hast rejected the word of the Lord, and the Lord hath rejected thee from being king over Israel.] The prophet looked upon God's sentence as peremptory; and therefore peremptorily denied his request.

Ver. 27. And as Samuel turned about to go away, he laid hold upon the skirt of his mantle.] It was a four-square garment covering the breast and the back; knit at the shoulder, but open on the sides, as Jo. Braunius hath shewn, lib. ii. de Vestitu Sacerd. Hebr. cap. 5. n. 8. On this Saul laid hold, that he might stop Samuel from going away.

And it rent.] A sign the motion of Samuel was violent; he being full of indignation against Saul.

Ver. 28. And Samuel said, The Lord hath rent the kingdom of Israel from thee this day, and hath given it to a neighbour of thine, that is better than thou.] That casual rent, he took to be an apt representation of his destiny.

Ver. 29. And also the Strength of Israel.] The word we translate Strength imports victory (as is observed in the margin), and therefore these words should be translated, He that gives victory, and disposes kingdoms, or the triumphant King of Israel.

Will not lie, nor repent: for he is not a man, that he should repent.] Sometimes, God is said to repent of the evil, i. e. to alter his intentions of inflicting punishment. But in this case there was no room for it, because of the oath of God, that Amalek should be cut off. This made Saul's sin unpardonable; it being of the like nature (to use the words of Dr. Jackson) as if a judge or inferior magistrate, being entrusted to do justice in a matter, unto which his sovereign lord had peremptorily and determinately sworn, should upon a bribe, or other sinister respect, neglect his duty, and (as much as in him lay) make his master forsworn. For an inferior judge to do this, deserves more bodily deaths than one. And therefore though God did repent that he had made Saul king (for he had the kingdom only by mere promise, not by a promise confirmed by an oath), yet he would not repent his deposition, nor reverse the sentence against him; because, by his preposterous indulgence unto Amalek (God's sworn enemy), he did by this fact incur the sentence of deposition by oath.

Ver. 30. And he said, I have sinned.] Now he makes a downright acknowledgment of his guilt; without any alleviations of it, from the fear he was in of the people, or any other thing, (ver. 24.)

Yet honour me, I pray thee, before my people, and before Israel.] He submitted to the sentence, and only desired while he was king he might not lose his honour with those that waited on him, and with the rest of his subjects.

And turn again with me, that I may worship the Lord thy God.] He speaks as if he thought, that, unless it were for Samuel's sake, he was afraid God would not regard him.

Ver. 31. And Samuel turned again with Saul.] He said before he would not: (ver. 26.) but upon his importunity (and ordered perhaps by God), he altered his mind. For he spake before only his present thoughts, which upon further reason he might change.

And Saul worshipped the Lord.] In the company of Samuel, that the people might not despise his authority while he held it.

Ver. 32. Then said Samuel, Bring ye hither unto me Agag the king of the Amalekites.] This he spake to the people, in the presence of Saul, that he might see what he ought to have done himself.

And Agag came unto him delicately.] Or, walking in state; for though he was at the point of death, saith Kimchi, he could not forbear to come to Samuel in a haughty manner: but this word seems to relate to softness, rather than pride; and signifies that he came to him with a soft pace, treading gingerly (as we speak) after a nice and delicate manner.

And Agag said, Surely the bitterness of death is past.] Being spared by Saul and his soldiers, he feared no hurt from a prophet.

Ver. 33. And Samuel said, As thy sword hath made women childless, so shall thy mother be childless among women.] This shews he had been a bloody tyrant, and was now cut off, not merely for the sins of his ancestors four hundred years ago, but for his own merciless cruelty.

And Samuel hewed Agag to pieces.] He commanded it to be done by the public executioner of justice: or, perhaps, did it himself. (See Judg. viii. 20.) This doth not prove that Samuel continued a judge after Saul was anointed: but he was authorized to do this by a special command from God.

Before the Lord in Gilgal.] For here they had been praying, and offering sacrifice: and God was present in all the great assemblies of his people. (See Judg. xx. 1.)

Ver. 34. Then Samuel went to Ramah.] Where he commonly lived, (vii. ult.)

And Saul went up to his house in Gibeah of Saul.] Which was the place of his birth, and constant abode, (x. 26. xiv. 2.)

Ver. 35. And Samuel came no more to see Saul until the day of his death.] He was wont, it is likely, to make him frequent visits: but now he forsook him, as a man abandoned by God.

Nevertheless Samuel mourned for Saul.] Yet he had still so much love to him, or to his country, as to lament the sad condition into which he was fallen.

And the Lord repented that he had made Saul king over Israel.] In testimony whereof he utterly cast him off; and all Samuel's tears could not procure a reversal of the sentence pronounced against him.

CHAP. XVI.

Ver. 1. AND the Lord said unto Samuel, How long wilt thou mourn for Saul, seeing I have rejected him from being king over Israel?] Since God had told him so plainly, and positively, that the sentence against him was irreversible, it was in vain to mourn and to pray (as some think he did) for his restitution to God's favour.

Fill thy horn with oil, and go to Jesse the Beth-lehemite: for I have provided me a king among his sons.] It might increase his sorrow, perhaps, to think that if Saul should die suddenly, there was none yet appointed by God to succeed him. Which might be one reason why now God declared his pleasure about that matter.

Ver. 2. And Samuel said, How can I go?] That is, with safety.

If Saul hear it, he will kill me.] For he was enraged at the sentence passed upon him, though at that present he seemed to submit unto it.

And the Lord said, Take an heifer with thee, and say, I am come to sacrifice unto the Lord.] Which he, being a prophet, might do any where: all the ritual laws being subject to the prophets.

Ver. 3. And call Jesse to the sacrifice.] To an eucharistical feast upon the sacrifice: unto which they might invite their neighbours and friends.

And I will shew thee what thou shalt do; and thou shalt anoint him whom I will name unto thee.] God promises to direct him so to manage the business, that he should come into no danger. From whence it may be gathered, that it was not the holy oil wherewith he anointed him, for that was kept in the sanctuary: unto which place he could not have gone to fetch it, but it would have been known, and raised suspicions of what he was going to do. (See Fort. Scacchus, in his Myrothecium, lib. iii. cap. 46.)

Ver. 4. And Samuel did that which the Lord spake.] Took a horn of oil, and an heifer.

And came to Beth-lehem: and the elders of the town trembled at his coming.] They went out, I suppose, to meet him, but trembled when they saw him.

And said, Comest thou peaceably?] They were afraid that he came to reprove them for some sin that was in their city; or that he fled to them for security against Saul's anger, which might bring them into danger.

Ver. 5. And he said, Peaceably: I am come to sacrifice unto the Lord.] That was one intention of his coming; and though there was another (to anoint David) he was not bound to declare it: for where there are two ends of any action, one may without any injury to truth declare the one, and conceal the other. As Moses did, when he told Pharaoh they must go and sacrifice to God in the wilderness; but suppressed their intention to march to the land of Canaan.

Sanctify yourselves, and come with me to the sacrifice.] See upon Exod. xix. 10.

And he sanctified Jesse and his sons, and called them to the sacrifice.] It is likely Jesse might be an elder; but if he were, his sons were not: but he gave them a particular invitation, and took care they should come prepared. Samuel was not a priest, but being a prophet he had authority from God, in extraordinary cases, to perform the office of a priest, in offering sacrifice.

Ver. 6. And it came to pass, when they were come.] After the sacrifice was over, while they were making ready the feast, that was to follow upon it, Samuel took Jesse privately into a room, and there, it is likely, acquainted him with his commission: whereupon he called for his eldest son to come to him.

That he looked on Eliab, and said, Surely the anointed of the Lord is before me.] Beholding a goodly person, handsome and tall (as appears by the following verse), he concluded within himself, that this was the person God designed for his anointed.

Ver. 7. And the Lord said unto Samuel.] By a secret, inward suggestion.

Look not on his countenance, nor on the height of his stature; because I have refused him: for the Lord seeth not as man seeth; for man looketh on the outward appearance, but the Lord looketh on the heart.] All have not a noble spirit, who have a noble aspect; as appeared by Saul. Which should have made Samuel not conclude so hastily, from a goodly appearance.

Ver. 8. Then Jesse called Abinadab, and made him pass before Samuel.] That he might have a full view of him.

And he said, Neither hath the Lord chosen this.] God had suggested to him, as he did concerning the former, that he did not approve him.

Ver. 9. Then Jesse made Shammah to pass by. And he said, Neither hath the Lord chosen this.] He is called Shimeah, 2 Sam. xiii. 3. and Shimma, 1 Chron. ii. 13.

Ver. 10. Again, Jesse made seven of his sons to pass before Samuel.] Not all at once; but seven in all, one after another in order; David being the eighth.

And Samuel said unto Jesse, The Lord hath not chosen these.] These words shew that he had acquainted Jesse with his business: but these four of his sons, among whom he was to anoint one to be king, were no more qualified for it, than the three first: for he had eight sons in all, (xvii. 12.)

Ver. 11. And Samuel said unto Jesse, Are here all thy children? And he said, There remaineth yet the youngest; and, behold, he keeps the sheep.] And so was not at home. The most excellent commanders were anciently taken from the plough, or from feeding sheep, as Pliny observes, lib. xviii. Nat. Hist. cap. 5. "Fortissimi viri, et milites strenuissimi ex agricolis gignuntur." And so Vegetius, lib. i. cap. 3. de Re Militari, discusses this point, whether the best soldiers came out of the city or country: and resolves, "aptiorem armis rusticam plebem," &c. that the country people are most fit for arms; who live in the open air, and are bred up to labour, and endure heat, and neglect the shade; being unacquainted with baths, ignorant of delights, of a simple mind, contented with a little; having their bodies hardened to the enduring all labour; who are used by the country life to carry burdens, dig trenches, and such-like labour. And therefore he concludes, that the strength of an army is to be supplied out of the field, for so it is, that the less men are acquainted with the delights of life, the less they fear death. Moses was thus bred a long time in the service of Jethro: and Saul looked after his father's cattle.

And Samuel said unto Jesse, Send and fetch him: for we will not sit down till he come hither.] By this it appears, all this was transacted between the sacrifice and the dressing of the feast upon it.

Ver. 12. And he sent and brought him in. Now he was ruddy.] His hair was red, which in ancient times was accounted beautiful, as Bochartus observes from this place. With which agree the words of Festus, who having said that rutilus signifies red, adds, "cujus coloris studiosæ etiam antiquæ mulieres erant;" of which colour women also were studious in ancient times. (See Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 34.) But it must be confessed, that the Hebrew word admoni doth not signify only red, but also bright and shining; as Bochartus himself acknowledges those words, Lament. iv. 7. are to be understood, where he saith of the Nazarites, ademu azem mippinim, they were more shining in body than pearls. And I think these words are so to be interpreted concerning David, that he had a clear complexion; or was very fair (as we speak) and lovely.

And withal of a beautiful countenance.] Or, had beautiful eyes, as the words are in the Hebrew, "Oculis speculis et liberalibus," as Conradus Pellicanus here glosses.

And goodly to look to.] Of a pleasant aspect; full of sweetness and clemency, as the same author understands it. All this is said to signify that he was a goodly person, and had greatness in his countenance.

And the Lord said, Arise, anoint him: for this is he.] The Jews observe upon these words, that it was necessary to anoint the first of a family, that was advanced to the kingdom; but it was not necessary to anoint his children that succeeded him: unless upon occasion of a dispute, by a contrary faction. (See Selden, de Success. in Pontificat. lib. ii. cap. 9.)

Ver. 13. Then Samuel took the horn of oil, and anointed him.] He did not hereby invest him actually with the kingly power: but this anointing was only a designation of him to succeed Saul after his death. So David always understood it; looking upon Saul as the Lord's anointed as long as he lived; that is, as the king of Israel. (See Judg. ix. 8.)

In the midst of his brethren.] It had better have been translated, from the midst of his brethren; that is, he singled him out from the rest, and privately anointed him. For it is manifest by what is said before, that Samuel was afraid to have it known, and therefore did not anoint him publicly in the midst of his brethren. And by Eliab's treatment of David after this, (xvii. 28.) it plainly enough appears he did not know him to be the king elect of God's people.

The Jews in Seder Olam Rabba (cap. 13.) say, David was twenty-nine years old when he was anointed: which certainly is false, if it be understood of this first unction by Samuel (whereby God elected him, as in the two following Judah and Israel received him for their king); for after Saul's death he reigned forty years, and lived till he was seventy. So that he was thirty years old when he began to reign: part of which time he spent in the service of Saul; and after that was sorely persecuted by him. How long that persecution lasted is uncertain: but it continued so long, that it makes the opinion of Abarbinel probable, that David could not be above twenty years old, if so much, when Samuel anointed him.

And the Spirit of the Lord came upon David from that day forward.] A spirit of prudence to behave himself wisely upon all occasions; with a spirit of courage, so that he durst grapple with a lion and a bear: and the spirit of prophecy, in which he was very eminent afterward. In short, a spirit fit for a prince.

And Samuel went up, and went to Ramah.] Having no further commission from God at Beth-lehem.

Ver. 14. But the Spirit of the Lord departed from Saul.] Which came upon him when he was first made king, and continued with him till this time; (x. 11. xi. 6.) yet he did not lose his courage, but his prudence and skill in government.

And an evil spirit from the Lord troubled him.] He grew melancholy, timorous, and suspicious: so that he started where there was no danger, as the Hebrew word seems to import; and thereby became very unfit for business, being sometimes furious and distracted; always full of anxiety and solicitude of mind: sighing and trembling like a man in the dark, as Abarbinel explains it. For his blood and spirits were thick and heavy, having lost their usual purity and splendour.

Ver. 15. And Saul's servants said unto him, Behold, an evil spirit from God troubleth thee.] His courtiers could not but observe a strange disturbance in him: which they looked upon as so unusual, that they ascribed it to the hand of God.

Ver. 16. Let our lord now command thy servants, that are before thee, to seek out a man who is a cunning player upon the harp.] An instrument always highly esteemed; as those were who could play well upon it. It is called cinnor in the Hebrew, from whence, no doubt, the Greek Κιννύρα is derived.

And it shall come to pass, that when the evil spirit from God is upon thee.] When a melancholy fit seized him.

That he shall play with his hand, and thou shalt be well.] It being a bodily disease, they hoped by this means he might receive some relief: and, perhaps, they had seen some experiment made of it upon men in the like condition; for music wonderfully alters the spirits, and consequently the blood: and hath a peculiar virtue in it to cheer and delight those that are sad, and compose those that are furious, as Saul sometimes was.

Ver. 17. And Saul said unto his servants, Provide me now one that can play well, and bring him to me.] For none durst deny his attendance on him, as Samuel had described the manner of the kingdom, (viii. 11, 12, &c.)

Ver. 18. Then answered one of the servants, and said, Behold, I have seen the son of Jesse the Beth-lehemite, that is cunning in playing, and a mighty valiant man, and a man of war, and prudent in matters, and a comely person.] It is likely this was some friend or acquaintance of David's, who had a mind to bring him to court: and therefore reckons up all his good qualities, as well as his skill in music; together with his success in all affairs. Which though he managed with great prudence, yet he could not have been so constantly prosperous if God had not blessed him.

Ver. 19. Wherefore Saul sent messengers unto Jesse, saying, Send me David thy son, which is with the sheep.] This message, it is likely, might possess Jesse with some fear that the secret was discovered.

Ver. 20. And Jesse took an ass laden with bread, and a bottle of wine, and a kid, and sent them by David his son unto Saul.] But by this present he hoped to ingratiate his son in his princely favour. The word laden is not in the Hebrew, but only an ass of bread. Which is a phrase used in other authors, as Bochartus hath observed out of Athenæus: who mentions this phrase in Sosibius, ἄρτων τρεῖς ὄνους κανθηλίνους, three great asses of loaves, (Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 34.)

Ver. 21. And David came to Saul, and stood before him.] Ministered unto him among the rest of his servants.

And he loved him greatly; and he made him his armour-bearer.] Which was an honourable preferment.

Ver. 22. And Saul sent to Jesse, saying, Let David, I pray thee, stand before me; for he hath found favour in my sight.] This was an extraordinary token of his kindness, that he would not keep his son to wait upon him without his consent.

Ver. 23. And it came to pass, when the evil spirit from the Lord was upon Saul, that David took a harp, and played with his hand.] Josephus seems to have thought that he also sung hymns and psalms to the harp; for his words are, (lib. vi. Antiq. cap. 9.) λέγων τε τοὺς ὕμνους καὶ ψάλλων ἐν τῇ κιννύρᾳ, &c. But the illustrious Spanheim shews that the word ψαλμὸς is often used for the sound of the harp. So the scholiast upon Aristophanes's Aves, ψαλμὸς κυρίως ὁ τῆς καθάρας ἦχος. (See his observation on Callimachus's hymn in Apollinem, ver. 12.) And so Nero truly said, (which Tacitus mentions in his Annals, lib. xiv. cap. 14.) "Antiqui duces cithara cecinerunt," the ancient great commanders sang to the harp. So Cornelius Nepos reports of Epaminondas, that he was an excellent musician.

And Saul was refreshed, and was well.] All authors are full of the power of music, both to stir up passions, and to allay them; according to the several kinds of it. Athenæus (lib. xiv.) praises it for the virtue that is in it, καὶ τὰ ἤθη παιδεύειν, καὶ τοὺς θυμοειδεῖς καὶ τὰς γνώμας διαφόρους καταπραΰνειν, to regulate men's manners, and to allay and soften those that are furious, and disturbed in their minds. Such songs Aristotle calls μέλη καθαρκτικὰ, purgative songs; apt to cleanse the mind from turbid motions, (lib. viii. Polit.) See Gerh. Vossius concerning this in his book de Artibus Popularibus, cap. 3. sect. 13. where he shews how diseases of the body have been cured by music, as well as of the mind: and sect. 45, 46. he shews the power of it over brute creatures. Bochartus also enumerates many famous artists among the ancients, besides Orpheus and Amphion (whose history is dressed up fabulously), that are celebrated, not by poets, but by good historians, for their wonderful skill in moving men's passions by music. (Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 44. p. 461, &c.) And long before these, the great Erasmus hath observed the force of music in curing diseases, and quite altering the passions of men's minds, in his preface to Arnobius upon the Psalms. Which may be found among his epistles, lib. xxviii. p. 1655.

And the evil spirit departed from him.] For a time: there being lucid intervals in such distempers as his was; which frequently returned again.

CHAP. XVII.

Ver. 1. AND the Philistines gathered their armies together unto battle.] In what year of Saul's reign this was, we are not told: but Josephus thinks it was not long after the things related in the foregoing chapter. For so his words are, χρόνοις δὲ ὕστερον οὐ πολλοῖς, not many years after, &c. For the Philistines having received a great defeat (chap. xiv.) resolved to be revenged, and thought they had a fair opportunity, when they heard that Saul was distracted.

And were gathered together at Shochoh which belongeth to Judah, and pitched between Shochoh and Azekah, in Ephes-dammim.] See Josh. xv. 35. By this it appears, that the Philistines invaded the country of the Israelites, and possessed themselves of some parts of it. That place here called Ephes-dammim, by taking away the letter aleph, is called Pas-dammim, 1 Chron. xi. 13.

Ver. 2. And Saul and the men of Israel were gathered together, and pitched by the valley of Elah.] A place, I suppose, in the same tribe, for their armies were not far one from another.

And set the battle in array against the Philistines.] As ready, and desirous to fight them.

Ver. 3. And the Philistines stood on a mountain on the one side, and the Israelites on a mountain on the other side: and there was a valley between them.] After they had faced one another some time, and neither side thought fit to engage and begin to fight, they drew up their armies upon two opposite mountains, which were parted by a valley.

Ver. 4. And there went out a champion out of the camp of the Philistines, named Goliath of Gath.] For to this city the Anakims fled when Joshua rooted them out of the land of Canaan, (Josh. xi. 22, 23.) And here they propagated a race of giants; that is, people of great stature and strength.

Whose height was six cubits and a span.] A great number of authors write of such men of vast stature in ancient times. See Magius de Gigantibus, and Casp. Schottus; but especially Hermannus Conringius, in his book de Antiquo Statu Holmstadii, and in another book, de Habitu Corporum Germanorum; where he shews the ancient Germans were of a vast size, as Cæsar relates in his book de Bello Gal. where he calls them "immani corporum magnitudine homines," men of a huge greatness of body. And Pomponius Mela and others say the same. In short, they were generally seven feet high. And now at this day, there is a whole nation on the north side of the strait of Magellan, "immani corporum vastitate," as he there observes, p. 37.

Ver. 5. And he had a helmet of brass upon his head; and he was armed with a coat of mail.] With plates of brass, laid one upon another like fishes' scales. So Bochartus, in his Phaleg. lib. iii. cap. 13.

And the weight of the coat was five thousand shekels of brass.] This shews he was a man of vast strength: who was able to walk and to fight with such prodigious armour: which was impenetrable. Yet this is not to be understood, as Fortunatus Scacchus thinks, as if the coat weighed so much, for it would have been insupportable; but that it cost so much, or was valued at five thousand shekels of brass, (Myrothec. vol. ii. p. 33.)

Ver. 6. And he had greaves of brass upon his legs, and a target of brass between his shoulders.] That he might be no where vulnerable. For the target defended his neck as well as his shoulders.

Ver. 7. And the staff of his spear was like a weaver's beam; and his spear's head weighed six hundred shekels of iron.] This was one of his offensive weapons: by which the largeness of his sword may be measured.

And one bearing a shield went before him.] Which was proportionable, no doubt, to his bulk: and was carried before him when he made his challenge, for the greater state's sake; but, when he fought, I suppose, was used by himself.

Ver. 8. And he stood and cried unto the armies of Israel.] They were divided, it seems, into several bodies, called here armies: and they could hear one another from the mountains on which they were encamped; and Goliath came down into the valley, and there challenged any body to come and fight with him in the sight of both armies.

Why are ye come out to set your battle in array?] He charges them with presumption, in offering to make war with the Philistines, who were so much superior to them.

Am not I a Philistine, and you servants of Saul?] Who doubted of this, that he was a Philistine, and they Saul's subjects? The meaning thereof is, as Abarbinel explains it, that he was one of the lords of the Philistines, a chief ruler in Gath, subject to none; and yet would condescend to fight with any of Saul's servants: who, in comparison with him, he looked upon as no better than slaves. The Targum will have it, that he brags of his great deeds: particularly that he had killed Hophni and Phinchas with his own hand, and taken the ark of God captive; and therefore wonders at their presumption, that they should come to fight with those who had gained such victories over them. Which is not likely, for they had since that been beaten twice by the Israelites.

Choose you a man for you, and let him come down to me.] He propounds the deciding of their quarrel by a single combat: which seems to have been done out of a bravado, rather than from any examples of those ancient times, of ending quarrels in this manner: for though it looks like a charitable design to prevent much bloodshed; yet no nation sure was willing to venture its whole well-being upon one single man's good success. We read, indeed, as I observed upon xiv. 10. of two or three single combats, before the armies of the two nations engaged, but they were not intended to be decisive of the quarrel between them. This therefore was, as I said before, a high rant of Goliath's, proceeding from the high opinion he had of his matchless strength: which made him brag, as if he was the support of the whole nation: which must stand or fall together with him.

Ver. 9. If he be able to fight with me and kill me, then will we be your servants; but if I prevail against him, and kill him, then shall ye be our servants, and serve us.] These conditions were never accepted, though Saul sought for a man to fight: but quite contrary, they were so far from being agreed on by either side, that the Philistines did not yield themselves slaves to the Israelites upon the death of Goliath; but fled to their own country, and there defended themselves against them, and fought many battles with them.

Ver. 10. And the Philistine said, I defy the armies of Israel this day; give me a man that we may fight together.] He expresses the utmost contempt of their whole army: in which he signifies there was not a man that durst look him in the face.

Ver. 11. When Saul and all Israel heard these words of the Philistine, they were dismayed, and greatly afraid.] For though Saul had not quite lost his courage, but gathered an army to fight the Philistines; yet it was not so undaunted as it had been before the Spirit of God forsook him: and the people's spirits sink, when their leaders flag and are dismayed.

Ver. 12. Now David was the son of that Ephrathite of Beth-lehem of Judah, whose name was Jesse.] He being chosen by God to combat with Goliath, the Divine writer gives an account who he was, and what relations he had.

He had eight sons.] In the first book of the Chronicles (ii. 13—15.) there are but seven mentioned: one being dead without children, as R. Solomon thinks; or being only an adopted son.

And the man was accounted an old man in the days of Saul.] And therefore excused from going to the war.

Ver. 13. And the three eldest sons went and followed Saul to battle: and the names of his three sons that went to the war were Eliab the first-born, &c.] These, I suppose, were men of the greatest experience and strength; and therefore fittest for the service.

Ver. 14. And David was the youngest: and the three eldest followed Saul.] David being young, was not put to the hardships of war: but the eldest only undertook to serve their prince and their country in this time of common danger.

Ver. 15. But David went and returned from Saul to feed his father's sheep at Beth-lehem.] In the beginning of this war, as Josephus thinks, Saul sent David home to his father, ἀρκούμενος αὐτοῦ τοῖς τρισὶ υἱοῖς, &c. contenting himself with three of his sons, who came to his assistance, with the hazard of their lives.

Ver. 16. And the Philistine drew near morning and evening, and presented himself forty days.] This is an argument the Philistines could not force the camp of the Israelites: otherwise they would not have spent so much time in this bravado. Unless we suppose, as Abarbinel doth, that all this time more forces were marching to this place, as their general rendezvous, both from the country of the Philistines, and from the land of Israel: for such great armies could not suddenly be got together. Or some wise men on both sides were treating all this time, to see if they could bring matters to an accommodation. It is a mere fancy of R. Jonathan, in the Gemara of the Mischna, title Sota, that Goliath drew near morning and evening, that he might disturb the Israelites at their morning and evening prayers, and hinder them from reciting them.

Ver. 17. And Jesse said unto David his son, Take now for thy brethren an ephah of this parched corn, and these ten loaves, and run to thy brethren.] For he did not know but provision might be scarce with them; or, as some will have it, he was informed they were under some hardship, and desired to know how they did. But having other sons at home with him, it was by a Divine direction that he sent David from the sheep upon this errand.

Ver. 18. And carry these ten cheeses unto the captain of their thousand.] Whose favour might be very serviceable to them.

And look how thy brethren fare, and take their pledge.] Some think that they went to war, in those days, at their own charge, and were not paid by the king. Provision therefore beginning to fail, Jesse's sons had sent to him for a supply, and by a certain token. Which their father bids David take with him, to know if it were theirs. So some expound the word pledge. But others think that if they had borrowed money, or pawned any thing for it, he ordered David to redeem it: or that he should bring something from them, that might certify him of their health. Others translate the word not pledge but business: and take the sense to be, Bring me word what they do; how they behave themselves; what company they keep, and whom they associate themselves withal.

Ver. 19. And Saul, and they, and all the men of Israel were in the valley of Elah, fighting with the Philistines.] They were now drawn up in battalia (as we speak) ready to engage: not in the valley, but hard by it, on the side of the mountain, where they faced the Philistines, and shewed themselves resolved to fight, if they came down from the other mountain.

Ver. 20. And David rose up early in the morning, and left the sheep with a keeper, and took, and went, as Jesse had commanded him: and he came to the trench as the host was going forth to the fight, and shouted for the battle.] By the trench, may be meant the carriages (as we translate the word in the margin), wherewith the host was surrounded, instead of a trench made about it.

Ver. 21. For Israel and the Philistines had put the battle in array, army against army.] This is the reason of what follows.

Ver. 22. And David left his carriage in the hand of the keeper of the carriage.] He left the provision which his father had sent his brethren with his servant, it being no time to present it to them, when they were just going to engage.

And ran unto the army, and came and saluted his brethren.] Acquainting them, no doubt, with their father's care of them.

Ver. 23. And as he talked with them, behold, there came up the champion (the Philistine of Gath, Goliath by name) out of the army of the Philistines, and spake according to the same words: and David heard them.] Though the armies stood ready to engage, yet the vanity of Goliath made him once more desire the matter might be determined by a single combat.

Ver. 24. And all the men of Israel, when they saw the man, fled from him, and were sore afraid.] They that could look the whole army of the Philistines in the face (among whom they knew Goliath was), one would think should not flee at the sight of one man. But the meaning is (as the next words shew), they could not endure to hear his opprobrious words against them, and his blasphemous words against God.

Ver. 25. And the men of Israel said, Have you seen this man that is come up? surely to defy Israel is he come up.] They bewailed among themselves their sad condition; that all the people of Israel should be set at nought, and vilified by one man; who despised both them and their God, (ver. 45.)

And it shall be, that the man who killeth him, the king will enrich him with great riches, and give him his daughter, and make his father's house free in Israel.] To make his family free in Israel, was to make them noble. And the Targum translates it, make them free princes in Israel: particularly free from paying any tribute or taxes, which was a royal privilege; of which see Selden, lib. vi. de Jure Nat. et Gentium, cap. 14. fol. 740. Here some observe, that Saul had lost his wonted piety; for he sent not to Samuel, nor consulted the high-priest, nor offered sacrifice: but only proclaimed a great reward to him that should fight with Goliath, and kill him. Which shewed he had not lost all prudence: for thus Caleb won Kirjath-sepher, by offering his daughter in marriage to him that should take it. And David himself afterward encouraged his soldiers to assault the strong fort of Zion, by promising to make him commander-in-chief of all his forces, who should first enter it. Thus Mathias Hostius observes, the Athenians offered a hundred talents to him that should bring Xerxes to them alive or dead: many more instances of this way of exciting men to valiant exploits he gives in his history of this monomachia.

Ver. 26. And David spake to the men that stood by him, saying, What shall be done to the man that kills this Philistine, and takes away the reproach from Israel?] He desired them to repeat the king's promise; signifying that he would undertake to encounter Goliath.

For who is this uncircumcised, that he should defy the armies of the living God?] He would not have them think he was moved by the hope of the reward (which was not to be despised) so much as by zeal for God, and for his country: which suffered by the reproaches of one, who was not in covenant with God: and therefore he did not fear him, nor would suffer him any longer to make such proud boasting.

Ver. 27. And the people answered him after this manner, saying, So shall it be done unto the man that killeth him.] They all confirmed what was before said.

Ver. 28. And Eliab his elder brother heard when he spake unto the men: and his anger was kindled against David, and he said, Why camest thou down hither?] His passion made him forget that he came by his father's order, to see how they did, &c.

And with whom hast thou left those few sheep in the wilderness?] This intimates, that he was fitter to look after sheep, than to fight a giant.

I know thy pride, and the naughtiness of thine heart; for thou art come down to see the battle.] Vain-glory he thought brought him to the battle: and now made him offer to run such a desperate adventure.

Ver. 29. And David said, What have I done? Is there not a cause?] He justifies his discourse; since no man, no, not Eliab himself, had the courage to wipe off the reproach which Goliath cast upon them all.

Ver. 30. And he turned from him to another, and spake after the same manner: and the people answered him again after the same manner.] He told them he would undertake to fight Goliath; and they told him what would be his reward if he killed him.

Ver. 31. And when the words were heard that David spake, they rehearsed them before Saul; and he sent for him.] They had been spoken to so many, that at last they came to Saul's ear: who desired to hear himself what he said.

Ver. 32. And David said unto Saul.] Who had told him what he heard reported of his resolution.

Let no man's heart faint because of him; for thy servant will go and fight with this Philistine.] In assured hope of victory.

Ver. 33. And Saul said unto David, Thou art not able to go against this Philistine to fight with him: for thou art but a youth, and he a man of war from his youth.] This Saul spake out of kindness to David, whom he would not have to hazard himself against an old soldier, when he was inexperienced in war.

Ver. 34. And David said unto Saul, Thy servant kept his father's sheep; and there came a lion and a bear, and took a lamb out of the flock.] Not both together (as Castalio supposes in his translation), but at several times; and it is likely more than once.

Ver. 35. And I went out after him, and smote him, and delivered him out of his mouth: and when he rose up against me, I caught him by the beard, and smote him, and slew him.] Sometimes he pursued the lion and killed him in his flight: or, if he turned again to devour him, he boldly caught him by the beard and killed him. And in like manner we are to understand he encountered the bear.

Ver. 36. Thy servant slew both the lion and the bear.] The author of Halicoth Olam, by a strange fetch, concludes from hence, that he killed a lion with two of her whelps, and a bear with one of her cubs. (Par. iv. cap. 3.)

And this uncircumcised Philistine shall be as one of them, seeing he hath defied the armies of the living God.] He encourages himself by three arguments. His mastery over such terrible creatures as a lion and a bear: which made him not fear this great beast, Goliath. Who was not one of God's people: whom he had insolently set at nought as varlets and slaves, (ver. 8.) though they were the servants of the living God.

Ver. 37. David said moreover, The Lord that delivered me out of the paw of the lion, and out of the paw of the bear.] In the Hebrew it is, out of the hand of the lion, and out of the hand of the bear. And Aristotle observes, that bears have paws, Χερσὶν ὁμοίους, resembling hands.

He will deliver me out of the hand of this Philistine.] To silence all objections, he declares that he was possessed with a full persuasion, that God would deliver this Philistine into his hands, as he had done the lion and the bear: for he felt himself full of that spirit which then assisted him. Abarbinel thinks, that he repeats this so often, because Saul did not seem to believe it, or did not attend to it: and therefore he saith over again, ver. 37. what he had said, ver. 36. And tells him it was not by his own strength, but by the mighty power of God, that he overcame those furious beasts: as he doubted not he should do this Philistine by the same power. Whereupon Saul prayed God to prosper him.

And Saul said, Go, and the Lord be with thee.] As he believed he would.

Ver. 38. And Saul armed David with his armour, &c.] Not that which he was wont to wear himself (for he was so tall it would not have fitted David), but he ordered them to bring out of his armoury a helmet and a coat of mail, as it here follows.

Ver. 39. And David girded his sword upon his armour, and he assayed to go; for he had not proved it. And David said unto Saul, I cannot go with these; for I have not proved them. And David put them off him.] He was not accustomed to wear such things, not being used to go armed: and, therefore, begged leave to lay them aside; as likely rather to encumber him, than facilitate his enterprise. Which Machiavel, in his Princeps, cap. 13. applies to the danger of employing mercenary soldiers: for "aliena arma aut ex humeris decidunt, aut sunt tibi oneri, aut te constrictum tenent."

Ver. 40. And he took his staff in his hand.] His shepherd's staff.

And chose him five smooth stones out of the brook.] Or rather five cleft stones: not whole and entire, but broken. For the word signifies partitions; and, therefore, denotes the stones to have been ragged; and sharp pointed were most fit for his purpose. (See De Dieu.)

And put them in a shepherd's bag which he had, even in a scrip.] Which hung by his side.

And his sling was in his hand.] A sort of weapon, in the management of which some were wonderful skilful in ancient days. (See Judg. xx. 16.) And Livy, with other authors, mention slingers that could hit a mark at a very great distance: particularly the Phœnicians, who, as Bochartus observes, were famous slingers; from whom this art was derived to the Baleares. (See Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 44.)

And he drew near to the Philistine.] It seems David made the first motion towards him, to shew he was in no fear of him.

Ver. 41. And the Philistine came, and drew near to David; and the man that bare the shield went before him.] As he was wont to do, (ver. 7.)

Ver. 42. And when the Philistine looked about and saw David.] He expected some tall, robust person to encounter him; and, therefore, at the first did not mind David, who was but a stripling.

He disdained him; for he was but a youth, and ruddy, and of a fair countenance.] He contemned him upon three accounts: as being a youth, unaccustomed to war; and being beautiful, seemed more fit to dance with women, than to fight with men; and he came also unarmed. (See xvi. 12.)

Ver. 43. And the Philistine said, Am I a dog, that thou comest to me with staves? And he cursed David by his gods.] So the Romans were wont to do, saying, "Dii Deæque te perdant:" as Goliath, it is likely, now wished, that Dagon and Ashtaroth, and the rest of his gods, would confound David.

Ver. 44. And the Philistine said unto David, Come unto me, and I will give thy flesh unto the fowls of the air, and to the beasts of the field.] For in his hand David was no more than a little lamb in the hand of a butcher.

Ver. 45. Then said David to the Philistine, Thou comest to me with a sword, and with a spear, and with a shield; but I come to thee in the name of the Lord of hosts.] By a commission from Him who commands all creatures in heaven and earth: and in a full assurance that he will deliver thee into my hand. Concerning the word chidon, which we translate a spear, see Bochart in his Hieroz. par. i. p. 138.

The God of the armies of Israel, whom thou hast defied.] The leader and protector of those armies whom Goliath had set at nought.

Ver. 46. This day will the Lord deliver thee into my hand; and I will smite thee, and take thy head off from thee.] Which Goliath thought impossible, he having no sword by his side.

And will give the carcasses of the host of the Philistines this day unto the fowls of the air, and to the beasts of the earth.] David did not rashly and vainly boast beforehand of the victory, as Goliath hath done: but, being full of faith (as Pellicanus here notes), praised the Divine omnipotence, and prophesied of an assured victory.

That all the earth may know there is a God in Israel.] Superior to all other.

Ver. 47. And all this assembly shall know that the Lord saveth not by sword and by spear.] They might learn, if they pleased, that the Lord needed not human force to effect his designs. David did not want courage: but he ascribes all to God; in whose power and might he went forth, and not his own.

For the battle is the Lord's, and he will give you into our hand.] The battle was properly the Lord's against the seven nations of Canaan: because he had commanded them to be extirpated. But in all other battles he disposed of the victory as he pleased. Strigelius here notes out of Sophocles the profane spirit of Ajax; who was therefore punished with madness: because his father Telamon piously admonishing him, as he went to war, to fight bravely, but to expect victory from God; he impiously answered, that "cowards might overcome by the help of God, but he doubted not to overcome without him."

Ver. 48. And it came to pass, when the Philistine arose, and came and drew near to meet David.] Having nothing but victory in his thoughts, as Pellicanus here observes, he arose, and marched gravely, and pompously, covered over with armour, and fearing nothing.

That David hasted, and ran towards the army to meet the Philistine.] But David, being loaded with no armour, nimbly ran towards him, and knocked him down; before he had so much as drawn his sword out of his sheath.

Ver. 49. And David put his hand in his bag, and took thence a stone, and smote the Philistine in his forehead.] Which either was bare (he perhaps contemning David so much, as not to pull down his helmet over his face), or else was thrown with such a force, that it pierced his helmet first, and then his forehead: or went in at the place which was left open for his eyes. However it was, the Divine hand directed it: for though there were men so wonderful skilful as to hit a mark that was fixed and immoveable, though small and at a distance; yet none had such admirable skill as to be sure to hit a mark that was in motion, as Goliath's body was at this time.

And the stone sunk into his forehead.] Pierced into his brain, so that he immediately, as it here follows, fell upon his face to the earth.

Kimchi thinks, that when he said to David, Come, and I will give thy flesh to the fowls of the air, he looked up, and his helmet then fell from off his head.

Ver. 50. So David prevailed over the Philistine with a sling and with a stone, and smote the Philistine, and slew him.] So true is that of Vegetius, (lib. i. cap. 6.) "Utilius est fortes esse milites, quam grandes." But it was not mere fortitude and valour that prevailed, but the Spirit of God.

But there was no sword in the hand of David.] This was so wonderful a thing, that so great a victory should be obtained without the usual warlike weapons, that it was thought fit a special mark should be set upon it.

Ver. 51. Therefore David ran, and stood upon the Philistine.] That he might complete his victory, and make it notorious to all the army.

And took his sword, and drew it out of its sheath.] He was strong, not merely by nature, but by the power of God: otherwise he could not have well managed the sword of a giant.

And slew him, and cut off his head therewith.] It is likely the stone had only stunned him; but his life was still in him after this blow in his forehead: and therefore now he quite dispatched him.

And when the Philistines saw their champion was dead, they fled.] Having lost all their courage with his life.

Ver. 52. And the men of Israel and of Judah arose, and shouted.] As they used to do when they had got the victory.

And pursued the Philistines, till they came to the valley, and to the gates of Ekron, &c.] They pursued them to their own country (which was in a valley), even to the gates of their principal cities; as Gath and Ekron were.

Ver. 53. And the children of Israel returned from chasing after the Philistines, and spoiled their tents.] They acted like good soldiers; who did not first fall upon the spoil; and thereby let the enemy escape.

Ver. 54. And David took the head of the Philistine, and brought it to Jerusalem.] After he had shewn it to Saul, (ver. 57.) and exposed it to all the people, (xviii. 6.) Jerusalem was now become a noted city, which was the reason, I suppose, why he brought his head hither: though it is only said, he brought it to that place; where it having been shewn as a spectacle, perhaps was reposited somewhere else.

But he put his armour in his tent.] Which, I suppose, was set up for David, upon this occasion; when he prepared himself to encounter the Philistine. And when his tent was taken down after the battle, the armour was deposited in the tabernacle, as his sword was, to remain there for a trophy.

Ver. 55. And when Saul saw David go forth against the Philistine, he said unto Abner, the captain of the host, Whose son is this youth?] Such cavillers as Spinosa from hence argue, that this chapter was not written by him that wrote the former: for how is it possible, say they, that Saul should not know David, who had lately attended on him in his court? But this is very frivolous; for in such a multitude of business as kings have, and among so many new faces which they see every day, it was easy to forget a man he had seen and conversed withal now and then; especially when he was crazed, and had a disease in his head, as Saul had. Besides, David came now in another kind of apparel than he did when he was sent to wait upon Saul at court: for he appeared now as a shepherd, in a rustic habit, (ver. 40.) and his countenance, it is likely, was much altered by the heroic motion he now found in himself to fight with Goliath. And after all, Abarbinel observes, he doth not ask who David was, but who was his father: which he might easily forget when he had been disturbed with melancholy, and with the public affairs.

And Abner said, As thy soul liveth, O king, I cannot tell.] He being a military man, and therefore much abroad, had not seen David when he was at court, or taken no notice of him.

Ver. 56. And the king said, Inquire then whose son this stripling is.] It was natural to desire to know whence such a young man came, who so much excelled all other men.

Ver. 57. And as David returned from the slaughter of the Philistine, Abner took him, and brought him unto Saul, with the head of the Philistine in his hand.] He thought it was best the king should learn from his own mouth who he was: especially after such a glorious exploit.

Ver. 58. And Saul said, Whose son art thou, thou young man? And David answered, I am the son of thy servant Jesse the Beth-lehemite.] More discourse, no doubt, passed between them, as appears by the next words; but this was all that was proper to be recorded, in answer to Saul's question.

CHAP. XVIII.

Ver. 1. AND it came to pass, when he had made an end of speaking unto Saul, that the soul of Jonathan was knit unto the soul of David, and he loved him as his own soul.] Such was the prudence and modesty of his discourse and behaviour, after such an heroic action, that he entirely gained Jonathan's affection.

Ver. 2. And Saul took him that day, and would let him go no more to his father's house.] Saul also resolved to shew greater respect unto him than before. For it appears by this that he had not lived always at court, after he came first thither; but often went to his father, when Saul was well, and had no use of him.

Ver. 3. Then Jonathan and David made a covenant.] Solemnly entered into a mutual friendship.

Because he loved him as his own soul.] Such excellent men there were among the heathen, between whom there was ζεῦγος φιλίας, as Plutarch calls it, a yoke of friendship, wherein they were so joined together in love and amity, as to have one common interest. He mentions (in his book περὶ πολυφιλίας) Theseus and Perithous; Achilles and Patroclus; Orestes and Pylades; Pythias and Damon; Epaminondas and Pelopidas: but none of them comparable to these two, Jonathan and David: who entered into the most sacred bonds of mutual assistance and defence to the very death; and kindness to their posterity after either of them was dead. Which was a singular providence of God, who by this means preserved David, in that sharp persecution which shortly after arose against him at court.

Ver. 4. And Jonathan stripped himself of the robe that was upon him, and gave it unto David.] That he might appear like a courtier.

And his garments, even to his sword, and to his bow, and to his girdle.] That he might look like another Jonathan; and all might take notice they were no longer two, but one. For he put him into the garb both of a courtier and of a soldier; or rather, great commander.

Ver. 5. And David went out whithersoever Saul sent him.] Upon military expeditions: none of which he refused, though ever so hazardous.

And he behaved himself wisely.] Shewed as much prudence in his conduct as he did courage.

And Saul set him over the men of war.] Not over all; for Abner was general, as we speak, of all his forces: but he made him captain of his guard; or gave him some other great command in his army.

And he was accepted in the sight of all the people, and also in the sight of Saul's servants.] Except a few, who envied his preferment.

Ver. 6. And it came to pass, as they came.] Marched along, in a great cavalcade (as they now speak), from the place of battle.

When David returned from the slaughter of the Philistine.] I suppose, Saul and the whole court thought fit to honour David, by accompanying him to Jerusalem, when he carried Goliath's head thither.

The women came out of all the cities of Israel.] All the neighbouring cities.

Singing and dancing to meet king Saul with tabrets, with joy, and with instruments of music.] As the custom was in times of great rejoicing.

Ver. 7. And the women answered one to another as they played.] They sang as well as played on musical instruments: and they sang alternately, as they did Exod. xv. 21. And the burden of the song seems to have been that which follows.

And said, Saul hath slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands.] For his slaying Goliath was the cause of the flight of the army of the Philistines, and the great slaughter of them.

Ver. 8. And Saul was very wroth, and the saying displeased him; and he said, They have ascribed unto David ten thousands, and to me they have ascribed but thousands: and what can he have more but the kingdom?] He began to be jealous they would advance him to the throne, in a little time: having so highly magnified him above their king.

Ver. 9. And Saul eyed David from that day forward.] Narrowly observed him, whether he had any such design to make himself king. Or, as it is commonly interpreted, he looked askew upon him, as one he envied and hated, and was afraid of; as the LXX. translate it.

Ver. 10. And it came to pass on the morrow, that the evil spirit from God came upon Saul.] Which had formerly haunted him, (xvi. 14.) and now, by his discontent, anger and melancholy was brought again upon him.

And he prophesied in the midst of the house.] Before the whole court. This prophesying is generally understood, only of his imitating the motions, actions, and gestures of the prophets; which sometimes were very different from those of other men: (see 2 Kings ix. 11.) but I do not see why this word should not retain the signification here, which it hath in other places: that he sung Divine songs. Which perhaps he the rather did, that David might suspect no danger from him. Abarbinel thinks, that his mind being disturbed with various roving thoughts about his own condition, and about David, he foretold that David should be heir of his kingdom.

And David played with his hand, as at other times.] To compose and quiet his disturbed spirits.

And there was a javelin in Saul's hand.] Which he had provided on purpose, as the following words shew, to dispatch David.

Ver. 11. And Saul cast the javelin, for he said, I will smite David even to the wall with it.] This argued he was so full of fury, that he designed to kill him in his own house, before all his courtiers, when David was waiting upon him, and doing him service.

And David avoided out of his presence twice.] Had his eye upon him, and shunned the blow, both now, and at another time mentioned xix. 10.

Ver. 12. And Saul was afraid of David, because the Lord was with him, and was departed from Saul.] Who was as unsuccessful in all his designs, as David was prosperous.

Ver. 13. Therefore Saul removed him from him.] From his court.

And made him a captain over a thousand.] Instead of captain of his guard (which required his attendance at court), he gave him a command abroad: where he hoped he might be killed in some expedition; or he might have an opportunity privately to take away his life.

And he went out and came in before the people.] As the leader of that thousand men.

Ver. 14. And David behaved himself wisely in all his ways.] None could find any fault in his conduct, whithersoever he went.

And the Lord was with him.] Made all his undertakings prosperous.

Ver. 15. Wherefore, when Saul saw that he behaved himself very wisely, he was afraid of him.] His fears increased as he saw David still grow so prudent that no exception could be taken to his behaviour.

Ver. 16. But all Israel and Judah loved David.] This is to be understood (as Corn. Bertram thinks, de Repub. Jud. cap. 10.) as if he had said, The Israelites in general loved David, but especially they of the tribe of Judah.

Because he went out and came in before them.] This phrase signifies in other places to administer all things belonging to one's charge with full authority. So Moses speaks of himself, Deut. xxxi. 2. and of Joshua his successor, Numb. xxvii. 21. And so I suppose it signifies here, that David had an absolute power under Saul, over those whom he commanded: and managed it so well that he gained every body's affection.

Ver. 17. And Saul said to David, Behold my elder daughter Merab, her will I give thee to wife.] He at last bethinks himself of the promise he had publicly made unto him that should kill Goliath. The performance of which David did not demand, but in modesty left it to Saul's own conscience. Who now intended nothing less, it appears by the sequel, than to be as good as his word.

Only be thou valiant for me, and fight the Lord's battles.] He would not have him think upon this marriage of coming again to live at court: but to continue a military life, and fight for his country, whereby he hoped to be rid of him.

For Saul said, Let not mine hand be upon him.] Now he seems to have some sense of honour, and to lay aside those base thoughts of murdering him himself.

But let the hand of the Philistines be upon him.] By whose hand God's just judgment so ordered things that Saul himself fell.

Ver. 18. And David said unto Saul, Who am I? and what is my life.] The hazarding his life, he tells him, could not deserve so high an advancement.

And what is my family in Israel, that I should be son-in-law to the king?] This was not a refusal of the honour, but an acknowledgment how unworthy he was of it.

Ver. 19. And it came to pass, at the time when Merab, Saul's daughter, should have been given to David.] When all things were ready for the marriage.

That she was given to Adriel the Meholathite to wife.] A most high affront to David, and the greatest injury that could have been done him: which he wisely dissembled. How Jonathan resented this usage we are not told. It is likely his duty to his father made him entreat David to take it patiently; and to look upon Saul as one that was sometimes beside himself, and did not know what he did.

Ver. 20. And Michal, Saul's daughter, loved David: and they told Saul, and the thing pleased him.] Not out of any love to David, or desire to perform his promise: but because he hoped by her means to bring his ends about of destroying David.

Ver. 21. And Saul said, I will give him her, that she may be a snare to him, and that the hand of the Philistines may be against him.] He hoped his daughter, in obedience to him, might be persuaded to bring him into some snare that he would lay for him: or, that being exposed to great dangers (which he was to undergo, as a condition of having her to wife) he might perish in some of them.

Wherefore Saul said unto David, Thou shalt be this day my son-in-law.] That is shortly, within a time, it is likely, prefixed by Saul.

In the one of the twain.] By marrying one of his daughters. He had two; and though he was disappointed in one of them, yet his promise was fulfilled, if he married the other.

Ver. 22. And Saul commanded his servants, saying, Commune with David secretly.] It seems David was not forward to embrace Saul's offer; having been so grossly abused: therefore Saul ordered his courtiers in private discourse to take occasion to persuade him to it.

And say, Behold, the king hath delight in thee, and his servants love thee: now therefore be the king's son-in-law.] The affection of the king and of the whole court, was a mighty argument to induce him to it.

Ver. 23. And Saul's servants spake these words in the ears of David. And David said, Seemeth it a light thing unto you to be a king's son-in-law, seeing I am a poor man, and little esteemed?] Having no estate, and of small credit: and therefore unable to endow her according to her quality.

Ver. 24. And the servants of Saul told him, saying, In this manner spake David.] In the Hebrew, according unto these words; that is, they reported his words faithfully; that he was as sensible of his own meanness, as of the honour that was offered him.

Ver. 25. And Saul said, Thus shall ye say to David, The king desireth not any dowry, but a hundred foreskins of the Philistines, to be avenged of his enemies.] This custom hath prevailed in latter times in some countries, to give their daughters in marriage to the most valiant men; or those who should bring them so many heads of their enemies. Alex. ab Alexandro reports of a people in Carmania, that if any were desirous to marry, it was necessary he should first bring the king the head of an enemy, (lib. i. cap. 24.) Vincent le Blanc reports the like of others, (par. i. cap. 30.) But why did Saul desire the foreskins of the Philistines', and not their heads? To this Procopius Gazæus answers, that Saul did not know but David might cut off the heads of his own subjects and bring them instead of the Philistines, and therefore he asked so many foreskins, which the Israelites had not, that he might be sure he had killed so many enemies. As for portions, the Hebrew custom was not like that of the Romans, who required the wife to bring a portion to her husband, "ut onera matrimonii tanto æquius sustineat," that he might be able to bear the charges of matrimony more equally. But among the Hebrews the husband endowed the wife, and received nothing at all with her. And so the custom was among the people of that land before they came into Canaan. For Sichem bade Dinah's relations require what dowry they pleased, and it should be settled upon her, he desiring nothing of them but her, (Gen. xxxix. 17.) And so it was in the case of David. (See Wagenseil upon Sota, cap. 4.)

But Saul thought to make David fall by the hand of the Philistines.] Who he knew would be extremely enraged against David, by putting this great indignity upon them, as they all counted it, of cutting off their foreskins.

Ver. 26. And when his servants told David these words, it pleased David well to be the king's son-in-law.] In the Hebrew the words are, the thing was right in David's eyes; that is, he thought fit to accept the offer upon these conditions.

And the days were not expired.] Which were appointed to be fulfilled (as it is in the Hebrew) before the marriage took effect: so that he had time to perform what was agreed instead of a dowry.

Ver. 27. Wherefore David arose and went, he and his men, and slew of the Philistines two hundred men: and brought their foreskins, and they gave them in full tale to the king, that he might be the king's son-in-law.] He gave Saul double of what he had demanded: partly to shew his sense of the honour he had done him, and partly to express his love to his daughter, and to declare his intention to venture his life freely to do him service.

And Saul gave him Michal his daughter to wife.] There being no way to avoid it, after the marriage had been so solemnly treated and ratified.

Ver. 28. And Saul saw and knew that the Lord was with David.] He was convinced of it, by the success which he constantly gave him.

And that Michal, Saul's daughter, loved him.] Which was a great disappointment to him.

Ver. 29. And Saul was yet the more afraid of David.] Having thus advanced him; and seeing no hope of bringing his designs to pass against him.

And Saul became David's enemy continually.] He was every day more resolved to destroy him. Such strange blindness did his anger and hatred, and such-like passions, bring upon him, that he set himself against him, who he saw and knew had God for his friend.

Ver. 30. And the princes of the Philistines went forth.] To fight with the Israelites: who had highly incensed them by David's late action, as well as by former losses. And they thought, perhaps, that David would make use of the benefit the law allowed, Deut. xxiv. 25. of not going to war in a year after he was married.

And it came to pass, after they went forth, that David behaved himself more wisely than all the servants of Saul.] By discovering, I suppose, the designs of the Philistines, and preventing them: for we do not read that they came to a battle.

So that his name was much set by.] He was very highly esteemed.

CHAP. XIX.

Ver. 1. AND Saul spake to Jonathan his son, and to all his servants, that they should kill David.] When he could not destroy him by craft, he declares open enmity to him; and commands his son and his whole court to make him away: some of which he thought would obey him. It is strange that he should speak to Jonathan to murder David, if he knew the friendship he had for him; and he could not well be ignorant of it, since he had so publicly declared it, as we read xviii. 3, 4. But he imagined his love to a father would overcome his love to a friend. And there was a great providence of God in his disclosing his mind so freely to Jonathan, whereby David came to be certainly informed of his danger.

Ver. 2. And Jonathan, Saul's son, delighted much in David.] He continued to take much delight in his company: and therefore would not lose the pleasure of his friendship by suffering him to be killed.

And Jonathan told David, saying, My father seeketh to kill thee. Now therefore, I pray thee, take heed to thyself until the morning, and abide in a secret place, and hide thyself.] He hoped, I suppose, to find his father better disposed in the morning: and in the mean time would have David secure himself in some close place where nobody could find him.

Ver. 3. And I will go out.] The next morning.

And stand beside my father in the field.] In which, it is likely, Saul used to walk in the morning, and take the fresh air. Thereabouts he advised David to lurk in some secret place, that he might speedily acquaint him with the issue of his discourse with his father.

And I will commune with my father concerning thee; and what I see, that I will tell thee.] Let him know how he left his father inclined.

Ver. 4. And Jonathan spake good of David unto Saul his father.] A noble act of friendship, to adventure to commend him to one who was his declared enemy.

And said unto him, Let not the king sin against his servant, against David; because he hath not sinned against thee, and because his work hath been to thee-ward very good.] He represented to him what a sin and dishonour it would be to kill such a faithful servant as David had been: who never offended him; but studied by all good offices to please him.

Ver. 5. For he did put his life in his hand, and slew the Philistine.] Especially he puts him in mind of that hazardous enterprise wherein he slew Goliath.

And the Lord wrought a great salvation for all Israel.] By which means the whole realm was delivered out of their enemies' hand.

Thou sawest it, and didst rejoice.] He desires him to remember that he himself was a witness of it; and could not then but applaud David, and rejoice in what God had done by him.

Wherefore then wilt thou sin against innocent blood, and slay David without a cause?] Having mollified Saul by so many arguments, he beseeches him to revoke the order he had given ver. 1. and in downright terms tells him, if he did not, he would bring innocent blood upon his own head.

Ver. 6. And Saul hearkened to the voice of Jonathan: and Saul sware, As the Lord liveth, he shall not be slain.] Some think he sware deceitfully; that Jonathan, believing he had no ill intentions towards David, might not persuade him to fly, but bring him to court again, where he might have an opportunity to kill him. But I rather think he spake what he really meant at this present: though this alteration proceeding not from any affection he bare to David, but from a sense (which Jonathan's discourse had wrought in him) how base a thing it would be, to slay a man of such worth, and who had done him such service, he soon forgot it, and returned to his old bent.

Ver. 7. And Jonathan called David, and Jonathan shewed him all these things: and Jonathan brought David unto Saul, and he was in his presence, as in times past.] When he was in his favour.

Ver. 8. And there was war again: and David went out and fought with the Philistines, and slew them with a great slaughter; and they fled from him.] All these battles were only between parties, for David commanded no more than a thousand men, (xviii. 13.) And if the whole army of the Philistines had been gathered together, Abner would have commanded the army of Israel against them; for he was captain of the host.

Ver. 9. And the evil spirit from the Lord was upon Saul, and he sat in his house with his javelin in his hand.] The more services David did his country, the more did Saul's hatred and malice increase against him. For this new victory, in all likelihood, made him melancholy and mad to see him so prosperous.

And David played with his hand.] He did not omit his duty to Saul, though he knew his danger.

Ver. 10. And Saul sought to smite David to the wall with his javelin; but he slipped away out of Saul's presence, and he smote the javelin into the wall.] His wrath and fury made him forget his oath: so dangerous it is to be possessed with such passions.

And David fled, and escaped that night.] He got out of the palace, before Saul's order (which it is likely he gave) could be executed, to apprehend him.

Ver. 11. Saul also sent messengers unto David's house, to watch him, and to slay him in the morning.] As he went out of the door of his house. By this it is apparent, when Saul missed his blow, he was the more enraged, and implacably pursued his destruction.

And Michal, David's wife, told him, saying, If thou save not thy life to-night, to-morrow thou shalt be slain.] She had intelligence either from her brother Jonathan, or some other friend at court: or perhaps she saw suspicious persons hovering about the house.

Ver. 12. So Michal let down David through a window.] Which did not look towards any of the doors which were narrowly watched.

And he went, and fled, and escaped.] Having most of the night, it is likely, to travel in.

Ver. 13. And Michal took an image.] In the Hebrew, a teraphim. But it doth not signify such as were made for a superstitious use (which David would not have suffered in his house), but a simple image of a man's head; such as we now use for blocks, whereon to comb our perukes. Abarbinel thinks (whom Abendana follows) that women were wont in those days to make such figures in the likeness of their husbands; that when they were absent from them, they might have them in their image, to look upon them, as still present with them. Of which sort of teraphim (which were images in the likeness of men) was this of Michal's; who, dearly loving her husband, had got one made in his likeness. But whatsoever becomes of this, the conceit that teraphim were little puppets (as I may call them), which the high-priest had in his breast-plate (called urim and thummim) is plainly destroyed. For this place shews that teraphim was a large image representing a man: and therefore fitter for a bed, than for a breast-plate.

And laid it in the bed.] Where David was wont to lie.

And put a pillow of goats' hair for his bolster.] It is hard to determine what the word cebir signifies, which we translate pillow; for there is great variety of opinions among interpreters about it. But Bochartus hath with much probability resolved that it signifies great. And the meaning is, she put a great deal of goats' hair upon his bolster; for though the word goats is only mentioned in the Hebrew, yet the word hair must be supplied, as a great many other places of Scripture testify. (See his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 51. p. 623.) For in those countries goats had long hair, which was shorn, as the wool of sheep is, and served for many uses; and it is not unlike man's hair, as he there observes. It was also of divers colours, so that she might choose some fine goats' hair (which was ready at hand, being used to be spun) of the same colour with David's.

And covered it with a cloth.] As if David had been sick.

Ver. 14. And when Saul sent messengers to take David.] He not coming out of doors, where they watched for him, Saul sent other messengers to take him in his house.

She said, He is sick.] Her affection to David made her tell an untruth; whereby he gained more time to get to a place of safety.

Ver. 15. And Saul sent messengers again to see David.] As if they came to visit him, and see how he did.

Saying, Bring him to me in the bed, that I may slay him.] Such was his insatiable rage, that he could not stay to see whether he would die of his sickness; but when he was able to make no resistance, resolved to dispatch him.

Ver. 16. And when the messengers were come in, behold, there was an image in the bed, with a pillow of goats' hair for his bolster.] An image dressed up with goats' hair, resembling a man.

Ver. 17. And Saul said unto Michal, Wherefore hast thou deceived me so, and sent away mine enemy, that he is escaped?] He did not expect to be served so by a daughter, whom he had married to David, that she might betray him.

And Michal answered Saul, He said unto me, Let me go; why should I kill thee?] This was another fiction of her own; for it is not likely that she endeavoured to detain him, or that he threatened to kill her if she did.

Ver. 18. So David fled, and came to Samuel to Ramah, and told him of all that Saul had done unto him. And he and Samuel went and dwelt in Naioth.] A place near to Ramah, as the next verse shews.

Ver. 19. And it was told Saul, Behold, David is at Naioth in Ramah.] Ramah seems to have been the place from whence Samuel was descended, called (in the first chapter, ver. 1.) Ramathaim-zophim, for the reason I gave there. And Naioth was a neighbouring place belonging to it, and perhaps the suburbs of it: where the sons of the prophets either had their ordinary residence, or were wont sometimes to retire thither for greater privacy.

Ver. 20. And Saul sent messengers to take David.] His implacable hatred had abolished all respect and reverence to Samuel (under whose protection David now was), and to the college of the prophets, which was a kind of sanctuary unto those who fled to it.

And when they saw the company of the prophets prophesying, and Samuel standing as appointed over them.] To govern them.

The Spirit of the Lord came also upon the messengers of Saul, and they also prophesied.] That is, praised God in hymns, which the prophets composed and sang to him, (1 Chron. xxv. 1, 2. 4.)

Ver. 21. And when it was told Saul, he sent other messengers, and they prophesied likewise. And Saul sent again the third time, and they prophesied also.] A strange obstinacy, to contend so long with the Spirit of God: who quite diverted the minds of his messengers from David, by inspiring them with Divine thoughts.

Ver. 22. Then went he also unto Ramah.] Not out of devotion, but to destroy David.

And came to a great well that is in Sechu.] Where company commonly was to fetch water.

And he asked and said, Where are Samuel and David? And they answered and said, Behold, they be at Naioth in Ramah.] It is a probable opinion of Conrad. Pellicanus, that Naioth signifies the habitation or college where the prophets dwelt in Ramah.

Ver. 23. And he went thither to Naioth in Ramah.] He directed his way towards that place.

And the Spirit of the Lord came upon him also, and he went on prophesying until he came to Naioth in Ramah.] His messengers did not prophesy till they came thither; but God inspired Saul as he was on the way unto that place. So that from Sechu, I suppose, till he came there, his evil spirit was gone, and he praised God as the prophets did. This was to convince him, that he laboured in a vain pursuit after David, whom the Spirit of God powerfully defended.

Ver. 24. And he stripped off his clothes also.] His royal robes (as R. Solomon and other Jewish doctors expound it), appearing like an ordinary man; or perhaps in the prophetical habit. Or it may be meant only of his upper garment, whatsoever it was. For when the Germans are said by some to have appeared naked, Tacitus interprets it, "rejecta veste superiore," throwing off their upper garment. But the first I take to be the truest account; and, as Procopius Gazæus here notes, "Habitus ille regni ablationem significabat;" this throwing off his royal habit signifies the taking away his kingdom from him.

And prophesied before Samuel in like manner.] This seems to denote, that his messengers had also stripped themselves when they prophesied. And Abarbinel will have it, that they all still foretold the crown should be set upon the head of David.

And lay down naked all that day, and all that night.] As a man in an ecstacy, that had not the use of his senses. But by naked is meant only, as before, stripped of his royal robe.

Wherefore they say, Is Saul also among the prophets?] This gave occasion to renew the proverbial saying, which had been in use long before. (See x. 12.)

CHAP. XX.

Ver. 1. AND David fled from Naioth in Ramah, and came and said before Jonathan.] By Saul's being thrown into a trance (mentioned in the verse beforegoing), God's providence gave David time to escape; and he went from thence to Gibeah, where Jonathan was.

What have I done? and what is mine iniquity? and what is my sin before thy father, that he seeketh my life?] Such violent and unwearied persecution must arise from some extraordinary cause or other; which he desires to know: for he could not accuse himself of any kind of fault, that should embitter Saul against him.

Ver. 2. And he said, God forbid; thou shalt not die.] He would have him think there was no such danger as he suspected.

Behold, my father will do nothing, either great or small, but he will shew it me; and why should my father hide this from me? it is not so.] These words signify that Jonathan knew nothing of his father's design; and that he had sent the messengers forenamed, without his privity, to seize David. Yet it is strange he should not know of his sending to his house to apprehend him. Therefore some think Jonathan, out of dutiful affection to his father, dissembled the matter: and would not have David think him so very wicked as he was.

Digitized by Microsoft®

Ver. 3. And David sware moreover, and said.] That it was certainly so.

Thy father certainly knoweth that I have found grace in thine eyes, and he saith, Let not Jonathan know this, lest he be grieved.] He was willing to believe that Saul might conceal his intentions from Jonathan; for the reason here mentioned.

But truly, as the Lord liveth, and as thy soul liveth, there is but a step between me and death.] But by a most solemn oath he endeavours to persuade him that he was in extreme danger of losing his life.

Ver. 4. Then said Jonathan to David, Whatsoever thy soul desireth, I will even do it for thee.] Both to find out Saul's intentions, and to save David's life.

Ver. 5. And David said unto Jonathan, To-morrow is the new moon, and I should not fail to sit with the king at meat.] There were solemn sacrifices every new moon, and then a feast upon them. And David being one of the king's family, by marrying his daughter, used to eat with them at these festival times: and he thought it possible that Saul, who lately pursued him in a fit of rage, when the evil spirit was upon him, might now be mitigated by the Spirit of God coming upon him at Naioth: and so might inquire after him, and receive him into favour again, as he had formerly done. But he durst not trust to this opinion, till he had tried his mind and affection to him, after the manner here propounded.

But let me go, that I may hide myself in the field.] He desires, with his approbation, to retire to his father's house, and the field thereabouts, with which he was well acquainted.

Till the third day at even.] That is, till the next day but one after the new moon, as appears from ver. 27. 35.

Ver. 6. If thy father at all miss me, then say, David earnestly asked leave of me that he might run to Beth-lehem, his city: for there is a yearly sacrifice there for all the family.] It is likely this was a custom among pious families to meet together once a year, and praise God for his mercies towards them all.

Ver. 7. If he say thus, It is well; thy servant shall have peace: but if he be very wroth, then be sure that evil is determined by him.] If he approved of Jonathan's licence, he might hope he was pacified: but if he still stormed and raged, he might probably conclude his destruction was decreed; and that his hatred continued so implacably, that he must be forced to leave his country.

Ver. 8. Therefore thou shalt deal kindly with thy servant.] In giving him a faithful account how he found his father disposed towards him.

For thou hast brought thy servant into a covenant of the Lord with thee.] It was Jonathan's motion, that they should make a solemn covenant before God (who is the avenger of all falseness) of mutual friendship, (xviii. 3.)

Notwithstanding, if there be in me iniquity, slay me thyself; for why shouldest thou bring me to thy father?] A marvellous assurance of his integrity, which made him freely offer himself to die, without troubling his father any further, if he knew any guilt in him.

Ver. 9. And Jonathan said, Far be it from thee.] Do not speak after this manner.

For if I knew certainly that evil was determined by my father to come upon thee, then would not I tell thee?] He disclaims all thoughts either of killing him himself, or letting him fall into the hands of his father, if he could prevent it. For who could imagine a man so solemnly engaged, and who had already shewn himself such a faithful friend, would not discover any design he knew against him?

Ver. 10. And David said, Who shall tell me?] He desired to know who should bring him advice how matters stood.

And what if thy father answer thee roughly?] And not suffer thee to come to me thyself.

Ver. 11. And Jonathan said unto David, Come, let us go into the field. And they went both of them into the field.] To take their measures about this matter.

Ver. 12. And Jonathan said unto David, O Lord God of Israel, when I have sounded my father any time to-morrow, or the third day, and, behold, if there be good towards David, and I then send not unto thee, and shew it thee.] The first words seem to be an exclamation: and the rest, as if he had said, Shall I who love thee so much, be thought capable of breaking my word with thee? All these verses are full of passion; and the words are broken, concise, and interrupt: as the words of lovers are wont to be, especially when they are disturbed.

Ver. 13. The Lord do so, and much more to Jonathan: but if it please my father to do thee evil, then I will shew it thee, and send thee away, that thou mayest go in peace; and the Lord be with thee, as he hath been with my father.] In this case he advises him to get away, and preserve himself as well as he could: praying God to make him as successful as his father had been; and bring him to the kingdom.

Ver. 14. And thou shalt not only, while I yet live, shew me the kindness of the Lord.] The kindness promised him before the Lord, or the greatest kindness. The words in the Hebrew run plainly thus, And wilt thou not, if I be then alive (viz. when God had advanced him to the throne, as he did his father) wilt thou not shew me the loving-kindness of the Lord? He made no doubt, but rather strongly affirmed his belief of it.

That I die not.] After the manner of those kings, who were wont to cut off the children of their predecessors: unto whose throne they were advanced.

Ver. 15. But also thou shalt not cut off thy kindness from my house for ever.] The covenant they had made was not merely personal, but reached to their posterity.

No, not when the Lord hath cut off the enemies of David, every one from the face of the earth.] When he had the greatest power, and none to oppose his will.

Ver. 16. So Jonathan made a covenant with the house of David, saying, Let the Lord even require it at the hand of David's enemies.] They had made a league of personal friendship, a little after the slaughter of Goliath: and now they make a friendship between their families; and Jonathan wished that God would requite it, if any of his family proved David's enemies. This he renewed afterward, and added further articles to the league, that Jonathan should be next to himself, (xxiii. 18.)

Ver. 17. And Jonathan caused David to swear again, because he loved him.] Or he made him swear again by the love he bare to him.

For he loved him as he loved his own soul.] The greatness of his love to him made him think he could never do enough to secure his friendship to all generations.

Ver. 18. Then Jonathan said unto David, To-morrow is the new moon; and thou shalt be missed, because thy seat will be empty.] The place where he used to sit with Saul at table.

Ver. 19. And when thou hast stayed three days, then thou shalt go down quickly.] It is commonly interpreted, of staying so long with his kindred at Beth-lehem, or some other place of retirement. But in the Hebrew the words are, thou shalt three times (or three days) go down to a very low place: and the meaning seems to be, that if Jonathan did not come the first day, he should take it for granted he knew nothing; and come again the second; and if he brought him no news then, come the third.

And come to the place where thou didst hide thyself when the business was in hand.] When they were discoursing of this very matter; how to discover Saul's affection towards David. Or, when he did David's business with his father, and interceded so effectually for him, that Saul promised not to kill him.

And thou shalt remain by the stone Ezel.] It is thought to be a stone that shewed men their way, where several roads met: because the word imports going or travelling.

Ver. 20. And I will shoot three arrows, as though I shot at a mark.] For when he came there might be passengers going to and fro: which would deprive them of the privacy they desired. Therefore this seems to have been given as a sign that the coast was clear.

Ver. 21. And, behold, I will send a lad, saying, Go find out the arrows. If I expressly say to the lad, Behold, the arrows are on this side of thee, take them; then come thou: for there is peace to thee, and no hurt, as the Lord liveth.] So that he might securely appear, and shew himself.

Ver. 22. But if I say thus unto the young man, Behold, the arrows are beyond thee; go thy way: for the Lord hath sent thee away.] He would not have him venture to discover himself; but look upon this as a sign that God would not have him appear at court.

Ver. 23. And as touching the matter that thou and I have spoken of, behold, the Lord is between thee and me for ever.] As a witness, and an avenger, if we keep not the covenant we have made of perpetual friendship.

Ver. 24. So David hid himself in the field: and when the new moon was come, the king sat him down to eat meat.] He did not immediately hide himself in the field, but when the time came that he had appointed: for he first went to Beth-lehem, (ver. 6. 28.)

Ver. 25. And the king sat upon his seat, as at other times, even upon a seat by the wall.] The Israelites sat at meat (as did the Greeks and Romans in aftertimes) in a half round, or circle: which they called sigma, from the ancient figure of that letter, which was thus, ς. Now the middle place, in this fashion of sitting, was most honourable among this people, as our Mr. Thorndike gathers from this very place. Upon which R. Solomon saith, "Saul sat in the head of the couch next the wall." For supposing them to sit in a round, or half circle, as the manner always was, we must needs conceive that the back or middle of this half circle must be towards the wall, for all conveniences. (See his Religious Assemblies, p. 62.) It may be also here observed, that the custom of lying along, leaning on their elbows, was not yet introduced, in these ancient times; but they sat at meat as we do. (See Bochartus, Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 5. p. 598.)

And Jonathan arose.] When his father came into the room: and after Saul had taken his place, it is likely, sat on his right hand.

And Abner sat by Saul's side.] On his left hand, I suppose, being his cousin, and the general of his army.

And David's place was empty.] Which, it is probable, was next to Abner's.

Ver. 26. Nevertheless Saul spake not any thing that day.] Made no inquiry after David.

For he thought, Something hath befallen him, he is not clean; surely he is not clean.] What this mikrah or accident signifies, which we translate something hath befallen him, see upon Lev. xv. 16.

Ver. 27. And it came to pass on the morrow, which was the second day of the month, that David's place was empty: and Saul said unto Jonathan his son, Wherefore cometh not the son of Jesse.] His calling him the son of Jesse argued both scorn and displeasure against him.

To meat, neither yesterday nor to-day?] By this it appears, the Jews anciently observed two days, in the beginning of every month, with festival joy. The reason was, because the new moon being proclaimed according to its appearance, and it appearing unequally, sometimes in the afternoon, sometimes in the evening, sometimes at midnight, therefore they observed two days, as Scaliger and others have observed. And they who were not clean the first day, might observe the second: for that sort of uncleanness here spoken of lasted but one day.

Ver. 28. And Jonathan answered Saul, David earnestly asked leave of me to go to Beth-lehem.] Which he, being next to the king, had power, I suppose, to grant: as appears, from his demanding of Jonathan an account what was become of him.

Ver. 29. And he said, Let me go, I pray thee; for my family hath a sacrifice in the city; and my brother, he hath commanded me to be there.] The eldest brother let all the rest know that their company was expected.

Now, if I have found grace in thine eyes, let me go away, I pray thee, and see my brethren: therefore he cometh not to the king's table.] He expresses in many words, the great importunity of David for leave to go and visit his relations: which he thought might make the king not take it ill that he had granted it.

Ver. 30. And Saul's anger was kindled against Jonathan, and he said unto him, Thou son of a perverse rebellious woman.] Or, as it is in the Hebrew, thou son of perverse rebellion. That is, a very perverse rebel.

Do not I know that thou hast chosen the son of Jesse to thy own confusion.] Made him his friend, to his utter undoing.

And unto the confusion of thy mother's nakedness?] For the world would think that he was none of his son; because he loved him entirely, whom Saul hated extremely.

Ver. 31. For as long as the son of Jesse liveth upon the ground, thou shalt not be established, nor thy kingdom.] He was fully satisfied that David, if he lived, would be king of Israel. Which, if he knew by Samuel's anointing him, it was madness to imagine that he should be able to overthrow the counsel of God.

Wherefore now fetch him to me; for he shall surely die.] He could not expect to be obeyed, since his son loved him so much: but his fury made him lay this command upon him.

Ver. 32. And Jonathan answered Saul his father, Wherefore should he be slain? what hath he done?] He declines his command, by desiring to know what his guilt was.

Ver. 33. And Saul cast a javelin at him to smite him.] It is not said, as it is of David, xix. 10. to smite him to the wall: and therefore some think he intended only to wound him, not to kill him: but the word smite, in Scripture, commonly signifies to kill, and there is no reason to take it otherwise here: Saul's fury being so great, that he minded not what he did. One would think that he used a javelin or lance as a sceptre: for it was always ready at hand.

Wherefore Jonathan knew that it was determined of his father to slay David.] That it was his unalterable resolution. Which is implied in that phrase, (ver. 31.) he is the son of death, as Constantine L'Empereur observes upon Bava-kama, p. 90.

Ver. 34. So Jonathan rose from the table in fierce anger, and did eat no meat the second day of the month: for he was grieved for David, because his father had done him shame.] Here are two reasons why he fasted: first, because he was extremely afflicted for David; and, secondly, his father had put Jonathan to shame, by his foul language, and by throwing a javelin at him: for so the words run clearly in the Hebrew; for he was grieved for David, and because, &c. the copulative and being wanting, as in many other places.

Ver. 35. And it came to pass in the morning.] Of the third day.

That Jonathan went out into the field at the time appointed with David, and a little lad with him.] According to their agreement, (ver. 20, 21.)

Ver. 36. And he said to the lad, Run, find out the arrows which I shoot. And as the lad ran, he shot an arrow beyond him.] Which was the sign given to David of Saul's ill intentions, (ver. 22.)

Ver. 37. And when the lad was come to the place of the arrow which Jonathan had shot, Jonathan cried after the lad, Is not the arrow beyond thee?] He cried so loud, I suppose, that David might hear him what he said.

Ver. 38. And Jonathan cried after the lad, Make speed, stay not.] So desirous he was to be alone with David.

And Jonathan's lad gathered up the arrows, and came to his master.

Ver. 39. And the lad knew not any thing; only Jonathan and David knew the matter.] The meaning of all this.

Ver. 40. And Jonathan gave his artillery to the lad, and said unto him, Go, carry them into the city.] That he might be left alone with David.

Ver. 41. And as soon as the lad was gone, David arose out of a place towards the south.] On the south of the stone Ezel: on the north side of which Jonathan shot his arrows, that the lad might not chance to stumble upon David.

And fell on his face to the ground, and bowed himself three times.] After three bows, he fell on his face; out of reverence to him, as the king's son, and his excellent friend. Arrianus saith, (lib. iv.) that this prostration was introduced by Cyrus: but he is confuted by this action of David; which shews it to have been a far more ancient posture.

And they kissed one another, and wept one with another, until David exceeded.] Being to become an exile from his friend, from his wife, from his kindred, and the people of God; and from all sacred solemnities.

Ver. 42. And Jonathan said to David, Go in peace, forasmuch as we have sworn both of us in the name of the Lord, saying, The Lord be between me and thee, and between my seed and thy seed for ever.] As much as to say, doubt not that I will faithfully keep my covenant with thee; as I doubt not of thy perpetual steadfastness in it, when I am dead. And this must be our satisfaction, in this sad separation.

And he arose and departed.] That is, David left Jonathan.

And Jonathan went into the city.] I suppose their discourse continued but a short time; for fear of being discovered.

CHAP. XXI.

Ver. 1. THEN came David to Nob.] It is hard to tell where this city was; for it is not reckoned among the cities of the priests, either in the tribe of Judah, or of Benjamin, or of any other. But D. Kimchi saith, his father took it for Jerusalem; and perhaps it was near to it: where the tabernacle being fixed, the priests resorted thither in great numbers, and settled there. In Neh. xi. 32. we find mention of a city of this name, in the tribe of Benjamin: whither Saul, perhaps, brought the tabernacle, being his own tribe.

Unto Ahimelech the priest.] Intending here to commend himself and his cause to God; and to beg his direction and protection. Ahimelech is no where called the high-priest, but always Ahimelech the priest, or simply the priest: (ver. 4—6. 9.) yet, being the son of Ahitub, (xxii. 9. 11.) who was the son of Phinehas, the son of Eli, he is generally supposed to have been the brother of Ahijah, (mentioned xiv. 3.) and he being dead, to have succeeded him in the high-priesthood.

And Ahimelech was afraid at the meeting of David.] Seeing him alone; and having heard, perhaps, something of the king's displeasure against him.

And said unto him, Why art thou alone, and no man with thee?] A man of David's quality, he knew, never went without attendants. And the truth is, David had some persons with him, as the fourth verse tells us, and appears from our Saviour's words (in the second of St. Mark), where he mentions "David and those that were with him." But he had no such persons as used to be his guard; and he left those that were with him at some distance, that Ahimelech might not see them.

Ver. 2. And David said unto Ahimelech the priest, The king hath commanded me a business, and hath said unto me,

Digitized by Microsoft®

Let no man know any thing of the business whereon I send thee, and what I have commanded thee.] We are not from hence to take an example of speaking untruths (as Conradus Pellicanus here glosses), but the wickedness of the world is the more to be deplored, which sometimes puts a necessity upon excellent men to lie, that they may preserve their lives, which cannot be safe without it.

And I have appointed my servants to such and such a place.] Here he acknowledges he had servants with him: but he had disposed them into several places, that the king's business might be the better concealed.

Ver. 3. Now therefore what is under thy hand?] He desires to know what he was able to do for him, to supply his wants.

Give me five loaves of bread in my hand.] Particularly he desires to satisfy his hunger, and enough for his servants.

Or what there is present.] That is, any other victuals.

Ver. 4. And the priest answered, There is no common bread under my hand; but there is hallowed bread, if the young men have kept themselves at least from women.] It was the ancient custom among other nations, for the priests to keep themselves even from the lawful use of women, before they performed their office: as Porphyry informs us, lib. iv. Περὶ Ἀποχῆς, sect. 7. Therefore Ahimelech requires this of David's soldiers, or companions, that being to eat of the holy bread, which none but priests might eat, they should eat it with the same purity, which was required of the priests.

Ver. 5. And David answered the priest, and said unto him, Of a truth women have been kept from us about these three days, since I came out.] As many days as the Lord himself required for the sanctifying of the people, when he appeared on Mount Sinai, at the giving of the law, (Exod. xix. 15.)

And the vessels of the young men.] That is, their bodies: so the word keli here signifies, as σκεῦος doth in 1 Tim. iv. 4.

Are holy.] That is, separated from women.

And the bread is in a manner common.] He adds, that he need not scruple to give them the hallowed bread; for it was not so holy as when it was upon the table of the Lord: but became, in a manner, or in some part, common bread; being now the food not only of the priest, but of his whole family.

Yea, though it were sanctified this day in the vessel.] The marginal translation is more plain, especially when there was other that day sanctified in the vessel. He means, new bread was set upon the table of the Lord: so that no wrong was done to him. By the vessel is meant the dish on which the bread was placed, mentioned Exod. xxv. 29.

Ver. 6. So the priest gave him hallowed bread; for there was no bread there but the shew-bread that was taken from before the Lord, to put hot bread in the day that it was taken away.] In this neither Ahimelech nor David committed any sin: for invincible necessity dispensed with all these ritual laws; as the Jews themselves confess. Particularly R. Levi, who saith, in a great famine they might eat an ass's head, which was an unclean creature. And they justify this by the words of the law, (Lev. xviii. 5.) he shall live in them, not, He shall die in them. From whence they gather, that in danger of life such laws were not to be observed. And so Procopius Gazæus observes, that wise men among the ancient people of God, had less regard to these bodily precepts of the law: and that Abiathar, in granting leave to David and his men to eat of the pontifical bread, plusquam vulgus sapiebat, was much wiser than the vulgar people. He calls him Abiathar, not Ahimelech, who granted this indulgence; for so doth our blessed Saviour, Mark ii. 26. and there is a learned friend of mine, who hath a Dissertation ready for the press, to prove that Abiathar was at this time high-priest. Though it is commonly thought he was only the sagan, as the Jews in later times call him who was the high-priest's vicar: and upon that account was a secondary high-priest; though that name of high-priest did not belong to Abiathar in the highest sense. And besides this, there is no incongruity in saying, that was done in the days of Abiathar the high-priest (as our Saviour speaks), which was done in Abiathar's days, though done somewhat before he came to the high-priesthood. As things may be said to have been done in the days of Henry VIII. or any other king of England, which came to pass before he began to reign.

Ver. 7. Now, a certain man of the servants of Saul was there that day, detained before the Lord.] It is not to be imagined that he was detained here by force and constraint: but by some vow he had upon him; or other religious performance, to which he had obliged himself.

And his name was Doeg, an Edomite.] His native country was Edom: but he was proselyted to the Jewish religion.

The chiefest of the herdsmen that belonged unto Saul.] The Hebrew word abir signifies a potent man, or prince; and is sometimes attributed to God. And therefore here signifies, that he was set over all the herdsmen, as their inspector and governor. Such there were in Syria, as Bochartus observes, out of Diodorus Siculus; who mentions one that was προεστὼς τῶν βασιλικῶν κτηνῶν, pecoris regii præfectus. And so the Targum, and Kimchi, and others, here translate it.

Ver. 8. And David said unto Ahimelech, Is there not here under thy hand either spear or sword? for I have not brought my sword nor any weapon with me.] He left them all behind, that he might the better conceal himself, and pass for a private man.

Because the king's business required haste.] But he pretended to Ahimelech, it was because he had not time to go to his house: the king pressing him immediately to be gone about his business.

Ver. 9. And the priest said, The sword of Goliath the Philistine, whom thou slewest in the valley of Elah, behold, it is here wrapped in a cloth behind the ephod.] Behind the place where the garments of the priests were laid up: of which the ephod and its appurtenances were the chief.

If thou wilt take that, take it; for there is no other save that here. And David said, There is none like unto that; give it me.] Which he thought he might use, though it had been laid up in God's treasury as a monument of his wonderful mercy: because he was in great necessity to provide for his own defence.

Ver. 10. And David arose, and fled that day for fear of Saul.] Out of the country of Israel.

And went to Achish the king of Gath.] A miserable condition! to be forced to flee to those for protection, who, he had reason to think, were his bitter enemies. For this was the city of Goliath whom he had slain, and whose sword he had now about him. But perhaps he thought he should not be known; or he knew Achish to be a very generous person; or being now in disgrace with Saul, he thought the Philistines might take him for Saul's enemy, and engage with them against him. Thus Themistocles being banished his own country, fled first to Admetus the king of the Molossians, with whom he had been at enmity, and then to the king of Persia.

Ver. 11. And the servants of Achish said unto him, Is not this David the king of the land?] Either they meant a chief commander in Israel, who was respected as the king: or they had heard of his being designed to be king instead of Saul, which made him persecute him.

Did they not sing of him one to another in dances, saying, Saul hath slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands?] By this it appears they had good information of what was done in the land of Israel: and so might know what was reported, that Samuel had anointed him to be their king.

Ver. 12. And David laid up these words in his heart, and was sore afraid of Achish king of Gath.] This discourse deeply affected him, and made him think himself not safe there.

Ver. 13. And he changed his behaviour before them, and feigned himself mad in their hands, and scrabbled on the doors of the gates, and let the spittle fall down upon his beard.] He counterfeited himself to be out of his wits, or to be a fool, who never had any. For he wrote upon the gates, and slavered, as fools are wont to do.

Ver. 14. And Achish said unto his servant, Lo, the man is mad, wherefore have ye brought him unto me?] Some of the courtiers had presented him unto the king: who seeing him a goodly person, had listed him, perhaps, as an officer in his service.

Ver. 15. Have I need of madmen that ye have brought this fellow to play the madman in my presence? shall this fellow come into my house?] He would not have his court troubled with fools or madmen. For it is likely he did not believe this to be David; or if he was, he was now become good for nothing: and come out of his own country because he was beside himself.

CHAP. XXII.

Ver. 1. DAVID therefore departed thence, and escaped to the cave of Adullam.] Which was a strong hold (1 Chron. xi. 13.) in the tribe of Judah, (Josh. xv. 35.) unto which tribe he belonging, might hope to find some friends there.

And when his brethren and all his father's house heard it, they went down thither to him.] Either to comfort him, or to secure themselves from the fury of Saul: who they thought might probably wreak his hatred to David upon them.

Ver. 2. And every one that was in distress.] All needy people, pinched with want, who heard that David was there.

And every one that was in debt.] Perhaps David might not know they were such persons: or if he did, intended not to protect them from their creditors, if they had been able to pay them. It was the manner in ancient times, among the Gauls, for those who were in debt or oppressed, to betake themselves to the service of some great men: by whom, as they were maintained, so they devoted themselves to live and die with them. Thus Cæsar tells us, lib. vi. de Bello Gall. cap. 13. "Plerique cum aut ære alieno aut magnitudine tributorum, aut injuria potentiorum premantur, sese in servitutem dicant nobilibus," &c. And these they called Soldurii: and the men that came to David seem to have been such as resolved to live and die with him.

And every one that was discontented.] In the Hebrew, bitter of soul; that is, lay under sore afflictions.

Gathered themselves unto him; and he became a captain over them.] They listed themselves under him, as their commander: who was forced to take this course in his own defence, that he might not be suddenly surprised. But Grotius observes, (lib. i. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 4. sect. 6.) that David did not entertain these men into his service, till, in the judgment of Jonathan, and by many other certain arguments, his life appeared to be in imminent danger. And then he neither assaulted any city, nor sought for any occasion to fight: but avoided it, by seeking for lurking-places, sometimes in the deserts, sometimes among strange people: always taking care not to hurt his countrymen.

And there were with him about four hundred men.] Among whom, I suppose, his own kindred were the chief.

Ver. 3. And David went thence to Mizpeh of Moab.] For the Moabites were at difference with Saul, (xiv. 47.)

And he said unto the king of Moab, Let my father and my mother, I pray thee, come forth, and be with you.] He the rather hoped for this kindness to be shewn to his aged parents (who were not able to travel up and down, as he was likely to do), because he was descended from a Moabite by the mother's side, especially if Ruth the Moabitess were of the royal family, as the Jews imagine.

Till I know what God will do with me.] Who, he doubted not, would make good his word to him.

Ver. 4. And he brought them before the king of Moab; and they dwelt with him all the time that David was in the hold.] All the time of his exile: when he wandered here and there, and had no certain place of abode: being haunted by Saul from place to place; seldom suffering him to rest. So Pellicanus expounds the Hebrew word metzudah: which signifies also a strong hold.

Ver. 5. And the prophet Gad.] Who being bred under Samuel, and knowing he had anointed David to be king, resolved to accompany him in his banishment: which was a great comfort to him.

Said unto David, Abide not in the hold.] This doth not signify any particular strong place, where he now was: but, in general, all those places where he thought himself secure, in the neighbouring countries.

Depart, and get thee into the land of Judah.] Where he would have him publicly appear; as one that confided in God, and in his own innocence.

Then David departed, and came into the forest of Hareth.] Where there were many secret lurking-places: unto which he might upon occasion resort.

Ver. 6. And when Saul heard that David was discovered, and the men that were with him.] He was not so well beloved, as to have early intelligence of David's listing men: which made him reproach those that attended him, in the following verse.

(Now Saul abode in Gibeah under a tree in Ramah.] Or, in a high place, as Ramah signifies. Otherwise the first words must be interpreted near Gibeah, or in the territories of Gibeah.

Having his spear in his hand.] By his spear is to be understood his sceptre, according to the phrase of those times. For so Justin, (lib. xliii. cap. 3.) speaking of the first times of the Romans (which was about the reign of Saul), saith, "Per ea adhuc tempora, reges hastas pro diademate habebant, quas Græci sceptra dixere," &c. In those days, kings hitherto had spears as signs of royal authority: which the Greeks call sceptres. For in the beginning of things, the ancients worshipped spears for immortal gods. In memory of which religion, spears are still added to the images of the gods. And thus the kings of Argos (as Pausanias tells us in his Bœotica) called their sceptres spears.

And all his servants were standing about him).] His usual guards, and the principal officers of his court.

Ver. 7. Then Saul said unto his servants that stood about him, Hear now, ye Benjamites.] Ye men of my own tribe: of whom he seems to speak with disdain.

Will the son of Jesse give every one of you fields and vineyards, and make you all captains of thousands, and captains of hundreds?] Bestow preferment upon them all, more or less; if not lands of inheritance. For so the words are to be translated, give you fields, &c. or make you captains, &c.

Ver. 8. That all of you have conspired against me.] To conceal David's designs from him, if not to assist him in them. The spirit of jealousy always possesses those who are engaged in such bloody designs as he had against David: which all good men abhorred.

And there is none of you that sheweth me my son hath made a league with the son of Jesse; and there is none of you that is sorry for me.] He suspected Jonathan had made a league with David; but did not certainly know it, much less what it was: and was very much vexed, that none were solicitous enough for him (so the word signifies, as De Dieu observes, which we translate sorry for him), to make a discovery of it to him.

Or sheweth me that my son hath stirred up my servant against me, to lie in wait as at this day.] His jealousy carried him so far as to make him suspect Jonathan not only sided with David, but had encouraged him to take up arms, and to appear openly, as having many friends and partakers: for since he threw the javelin at Jonathan, it is likely he absented himself from court, or did not appear so frequently, or looked discontented when he came into his presence.

Ver. 9. Then answered Doeg the Edomite, which was over the servants of Saul.] The rest being silent, he undertook to inform the king who were false to him: or being a forward man, and hating David, prevented all the rest of his fellow-servants.

And said, I saw the son of Jesse.] He speaks as contemptibly of him, as his master had lately been wont to do, not vouchsafing to call him by his name, (xx. 27. 30.)

Coming to Nob, to Ahimelech the son of Ahitub.] He represents him, as if he came to take advice of Ahimelech, and lay his designs accordingly.

Ver. 10. And he inquired of the Lord for him.] Some think Doeg in this slandered Ahimelech, because we read nothing of it; and David speaks of his false tongue: but this may as well be true as that which follows is. And Doeg's wickedness consisted in representing things wrong: concealing the truth, and saying nothing of David's pretences to Ahimelech; but insinuating as if he were in a plot with David against the king. Whereas, the good man was made to believe that David was going about the king's business, and upon that account assisted him.

And gave him victuals, and gave him the sword of Goliath the Philistine.] And very innocently, as he very well knew: but represented these as acts whereby he abetted David in his conspiracy: which are the lies of which David accuses him, nothing being farther from the truth.

Ver. 11. And the king sent to call Ahimelech, the son of Ahitub, and all his father's house, the priests that were in Nob: and they came all of them to the king.] By his father's house is meant all the house of Eli, whom God had threatened to cut off.

Ver. 12. And Saul said, Hear now, thou son of Ahitub.] He shews not the least respect to him, but rather the utmost contempt: calling him in his rage the son of Ahitub.

And he answered, Here I am, my lord.] But he did not forget his respect to the king.

Ver. 13. And Saul said unto him, Why have ye conspired against me, thou and the son of Jesse, in that thou hast given him bread, and a sword, and hast inquired of God for him, that he should rise against me, to lie in wait, as at this day?] A very rash charge, unless there had been proof that he did these things with an evil intent, which there was not.

Ver. 14. Then Ahimelech answered and said, And who is so faithful among all thy servants as David, which is the king's son-in-law, and goeth at thy bidding, and is honourable in thy house?] The oracle was consulted only upon public occasions, not for any private business. And therefore the sense of Ahimelech's apology for himself is this: Since David was held by all to be a most loyal subject, as well as a person of great honour, and in high favour with the king, having married his daughter; what could he think but that David was sent by the king (as he said he was) upon some business of public concern; to command his forces, suppose (as he had often done), in some expedition against his enemies? And, doubting what course to take, came to advise with God, as he had done heretofore. For this was not the first time (as he saith in the next verse) that he had consulted the Divine Majesty for him, in difficult cases, concerning the good of the kingdom.

Ver. 15. Did I then begin to inquire of God for him?] He desired that might not be an argument against him; for he had theretofore done the same thing without any imputation of guilt.

Be it far from me.] That which he was charged withal; conspiracy against the king, (ver. 13.)

Let not the king impute any thing to his servant, or to his father's house; for thy servant knew nothing of all this, more or less.] If there was any bad design, he pleads perfect ignorance of it.

Ver. 16. And the king said unto him, Thou shalt surely die, Ahimelech, thou, and thy father's house.] A mad resolution: for what had the rest of the priests done to deserve such a bloody execution?

Ver. 17. And the king said unto the footmen that stood about him.] In the Hebrew it is, to the runners; that is, to those who used to go before him, and to follow him when he went abroad.

Turn, and slay the priests of the Lord; because their hand is also with David, and because they knew when he fled, and did not shew it me.] Such was the power their kings exercised (as Samuel told them they would), that, without a formal process against a man accused of a crime, they commanded him to be cut off at their pleasure.

But the servants of the king would not put forth their hand to fall upon the priests of the Lord.] Such was their reverence to God and religion in ancient times: which kept them in their wars from doing any hurt to the priests of their enemies, as Grotius observes, lib. iii. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 11. sect. 10. And therefore Theodoret here justly praises the guards of Saul, that they chose rather to expose themselves to the enraged fury of Saul, than execute it upon the priests of God.

Ver. 18. And the king said to Doeg, Turn thou, and fall upon the priests.] He who was the informer, he made also his executioner.

And Doeg the Edomite turned, and fell upon the priests, and slew that day eighty-five persons.] Kings never want some to execute their commands, though never so bloody. Saul was little better than a madman; and yet had those at his beck who would do as he bade them, because he was their king. It was excellently, therefore, said by Justin Martyr, Εὐχώμεθα τοὺς βασιλεῖς καὶ ἄρχοντας, μετὰ τῆς βασιλικῆς δυνάμεως, καὶ σώφρονα τὸν λογισμὸν ἔχοντας εὑρεθῆναι, Let us pray that kings and rulers, together with a royal power, may be found having a sober mind.

That did wear a linen ephod.] i. e. Ministered unto God: but we are not to understand by the ephod such a garment as the high-priest wore, for this is distinguished from that by the matter of it, which was merely linen: and nothing else but a linen robe, which was an honourable kind of garment, which others who were not priests were permitted to wear; as I observed before upon chap. ii. ver. 18. and see Braunius, lib. ii. de Vestitu Hebr. Sacerd. cap. 6.

Ver. 19. And Nob, the city of the priests, smote he with the edge of the sword, both man and woman, and suckling, and oxen, and asses, and sheep, with the edge of the sword.] His fury transported him to deal worse with them than he did with the Amalekites; some of which he spared, though God commanded him to destroy them all. But he did this to terrify all the Israelites from giving the least assistance to David: and make them forward to come and tell him, if they knew where he was. In all this was fulfilled the word of the Lord against the house of Eli by the prophet, in the second chapter of this book; and by Samuel, when he was a child, in the third chapter. Abarbinel thinks, that, at this time, the Gibeonites were slain; upon which account there was a sore famine in the days of David. For Josephus saith, (lib. vi. cap. 14.) that Doeg slew in all three hundred eighty-five persons; taking some men, as wicked as himself, into his assistance.

Ver. 20. And one of the sons of Ahimelech, the son of Ahitub, named Abiathar, escaped, and fled after David.] For he could be safe no where else.

Ver. 21. And Abiathar shewed David that Saul had slain the Lord's priests.] Which confirmed David in his belief of the hatred he bare him, and his resolution to destroy him.

Ver. 22. And David said unto Abiathar, I knew it that day, when Doeg the Edomite was there, that he would surely tell Saul.] For he knew he was none of his friend, and a man that loved mischief.

Ver. 23. Abide thou with me; fear not: for he that seeketh my life seeketh thy life.] He comforts him with the assurance, that he would take as much care of him, as of himself.

But with me thou shalt be in safeguard.] For he was sure God would make good his promise of protecting him, till he was made king of Israel.

CHAP. XXIII.

Ver. 1. THEN they told David, saying, The Philistines fight against Keilah.] Or, they had told David, &c. For this was done before Abiathar came to him to tell him of the slaughter of the priests, ver. 6. where it is said, he fled to David to Keilah. Which was a city in the tribe of Judah, (Josh. xv. 44.) Which the Philistines now besieged; being encouraged thereunto, perhaps, by the news they heard that David was forced to flee his country.

And they rob the thrashing-floors.] Which was commonly without their cities; for the convenience of wind, to separate the chaff from the corn. (See Ruth iii. 2. 15.)

Ver. 2. And David inquired of the Lord.] It is probable by the prophet Gad, who we read before, xxii. 5. was now with him. For there is no mention yet of Abiathar's having the ephod; though some think it is mentioned, ver. 6. to shew how David inquired of God.

Shall I go and smite these Philistines? And the Lord said unto David, Go and smite the Philistines, and save Keilah.] A remarkable instance of David's love to his country: unto which he did not become an enemy, when he was banished from it.

Ver. 3. And David's men said unto him, Behold, we be afraid here in Judah.] In that part of the country where they then were.

How much more, then, if we come to Keilah, against the armies of the Philistines?] His men argued against this expedition, because they did not think themselves safe in their own country, where they hoped they had some friends: and therefore thought they should be in greater danger, if they made the Philistines their enemies.

Ver. 4. Then David inquired of the Lord yet again.] Not for his own satisfaction, but for theirs: as we read in the history of Gideon that he did.

And the Lord answered him and said, Arise.] Make no delay.

Go down to Keilah; for I will deliver the Philistines into thy hand.] Here he expressly assures him of victory.

Ver. 5. So David and his men went to Keilah, and fought with the Philistines, and brought away their cattle, and smote them with a great slaughter. So David saved the inhabitants of Keilah.] He seems to have pursued the Philistines to their own country: from whence he brought their cattle. Or else we must suppose these cattle were the booty they had among the Israelites; which is not so probable, because then David would have restored them to their owners.

Ver. 6. And it came to pass, that when Abiathar, the son of Ahimelech, fled to David to Keilah, that he came down with an ephod in his hand.] Or rather, with the ephod. For he being left, I suppose, to keep the sanctuary, while his father and the rest of the priests went to wait upon Saul, as soon as he heard of their slaughter, took this principal vestment of the high-priest, viz. the ephod, unto which the urim and thummim, with the breast-plate, were annexed, and carried it unto David. Unto whom he hoped to be the more acceptable, when he appeared capable to serve him in that high office. And accordingly he calls upon him, (ver. 9.) to bring hither the ephod; as he did afterward, (xxx. 7.) But the ephod could do no good, without the urim and thummim, which were inseparable from it. And that he speaks of the high-priest's ephod is manifest, because he doth not call it a linen ephod, such as the priests wore; but the ephod. The only difficulty is, that Saul after this seems to have consulted God by urim, (xxviii. 6.) But perhaps he made a new one, in the room of that which Abiathar carried away: but God would not own it, nor any other way give him advice. Aben Ezra, indeed, here notes, that there wants that which they call the he hajediah, that is, the demonstrative particle he, to shew that he means the high-priest's ephod, and therefore it was only a linen ephod. Which led him into this absurd opinion, that in some cases God answered without urim and thummim; being consulted merely by an ephod.

Ver. 7. And it was told Saul that David was come to Keilah.] So remarkable an action could not but come presently to Saul's ears; who was not at all mollified by it, but rather more resolutely bent upon David's destruction.

And Saul said, God hath delivered him into my hand; for he is shut in, by entering into a town that hath gates and bars.] The men of Keilah could not but open their gates to their deliverer; but Saul fancied that he sought for safety in a place, that would only secure him from running away from him.

Ver. 8. And Saul called all the people together to war.] Raised a great army.

To go down to Keilah, to besiege David and his men.] He pretended, it is likely, he would go, and be avenged of the Philistines: but his inward intention was to go against David.

Ver. 9. And David knew that Saul secretly practised mischief against him.] This intimates that Saul did not openly declare, when he raised his army, he would besiege Keilah; but made a show of some other design.

And he said to Abiathar the priest, Bring hither the ephod.] Which no doubt he put on: otherwise he could not have inquired of the Lord by it.

Ver. 10. Then said David, O Lord God of Israel, thy servant hath certainly heard that Saul seeks to come to Keilah, to destroy the city for my sake.] Some think that David put on the ephod, and then asked the Lord's advice: but that is a great mistake; for the high-priest was the person appointed by God, to ask counsel of him for the supreme governor, (Numb. xxvii. 21.) Therefore David spake these words by the mouth of Abiathar.

Ver. 11. Will the men of Keilah deliver me into his hands? will Saul come down, as thy servant hath heard? O Lord God of Israel, I beseech thee, tell thy servant. And the Lord said, He will come down.] He seems to have been in a great fright, and some confusion of spirit, when he spake these words: which made him not only to ask two things together (which the Jews say was not usual), but also out of due order. For the first question should have been, Will Saul come down? and then the other should have followed, Will they deliver me into his hand? God therefore put him into the right method, by answering to the last question first: as the Jewish doctors observe in the Gemara of the Codex Joma.

Ver. 12. Then said David, Will the men of Keilah deliver me and my men into the hand of Saul?] Hence the Talmudists gather, that he who asked out of order was bound to ask again.

And the Lord said, They will deliver thee.] He saw the base disposition of their hearts, whatsoever gratitude they pretended to David for their deliverance. For that is a rare virtue; not to be found in those in whom self-love prevails. It is not easy to be resolved, how they inquired of God, the tabernacle not being there. It is likely David had some tent, wheresoever he was, wherein he was wont to pray to God, and meditate his praises; and there God was pleased to answer him.

Ver. 13. Then David and his men, which were about six hundred.] His forces were increased two hundred, since the famous victory over the Philistines at Keilah.

Arose, and departed out of Keilah, and went whithersoever they could go.] Sometimes to one place, sometimes to another: according as they found any hope of safety. So Hackspan interprets this phrase in his Disputationes, p. 403.

And it was told Saul that David was escaped from Keilah.] Now he began to have better intelligence of David's motions, since the slaughter at Nob: which made the people afraid to fall under his displeasure.

And he forbore to go forth.] Not knowing as yet where to find him.

Ver. 14. And David abode in the wilderness in strong holds, and remained in a mountain in the wilderness of Ziph.] Where it was not easy to come at him.

And Saul sought him every day; but God delivered him not into his hand.] As he foolishly fancied he would, (ver. 7.) though God very manifestly had forsaken him, and was with David.

Ver. 15. And David saw that Saul was come out to seek his life.] That he was restless in his endeavours to destroy him.

And David was in the wilderness of Ziph in a wood.] Where he could better defend himself than in an open country.

Ver. 16. And Jonathan, Saul's son, arose, and went to David into the wood.] Being a very private place, they had, it is likely, by some intelligence which passed between them, appointed a meeting there.

And strengthened his hand in God.] In his promise to him. What Hecuba saith in Euripides, is most true in this friend of David's, and in Saul his father:

Ὁ μὲν πονηρὸς οὐδὲν ἄλλο πλὴν κακός·
Ὁ δ' ἐσθλὸς, ἐσθλός· οὐδὲ συμφορᾶς ὕπο
Φύσιν διέφθειρ' ἀλλὰ χρηστός ἐστ' ἀεί.

A bad man is nothing else but bad. But a good man is still good: nor because of any calamity doth he lose his nature; but is always good.

Ver. 17. And he said, Fear not; for the hand of Saul my father shall not find thee: and thou shalt be king over Israel, and I will be next unto thee.] He doth not mean, that he would succeed him in his throne; but be the principal person in the kingdom, next to David. Which, I suppose, had been agreed between them.

And that also Saul my father knoweth.] For he remembered what Samuel told him, xv. 28. and by his wonderful successes concluded he was the person of whom Samuel spake.

Ver. 18. And they two made a covenant before the Lord.] Solemnly renewed the covenant, which they had formerly made. This is the third time that we read of their making a covenant. (See xviii. 3. xx. 16.) In none of which there is any mention of a sacrifice, no more than there is in the covenant between David and the elders of the people, (2 Sam. v. 3.) and between Solomon and Hiram; (1 Kings v. 12.) which is an argument that eating together of a sacrifice, or going between the parts of a sacrifice, was not essential to the making a covenant: though it must be acknowledged, the rite was so ancient of dividing the parts of the sacrifice, that hence is the phrase which is so frequent in Scripture of cutting a covenant, i. e. entering into it.

And David abode in the wood, and Jonathan went to his house.] For he did not accompany his father, in his search after David.

Ver. 19. Then came up the Ziphites to Saul to Gibeah, and said, Doth not David hide himself with us in the strong hold in the wood, in the hill of Hachilah, which is on the south of Jeshimon?] These people were of the tribe of Judah; among whom David thought himself the safer, because he was of the same tribe. But they were afraid to be served as those at Nob: which made them come and discover the place where he was, very particularly, and precisely.

Ver. 20. Now therefore, O king, come down, according to all the desire of thy soul to come down.] Which they knew was very great.

And our part shall be to deliver him into the king's hand.] For being neighbours to it, they knew all the avenues of the wood where he was: and how to come at him.

Ver. 21. And Saul said, Blessed are ye of the Lord; for ye have compassion on me.] This signifies, that the generality of people did not favour him in his design: which made him so joyfully receive the Ziphites' intelligence.

Ver. 22. Go, I pray you, and prepare ye.] Dispose all things so, that I may take him.

And know and see his place where his haunt is.] Inform themselves perfectly, in what hill, or wood, or cave, he hid himself.

And who hath seen him.] He would have them certainly informed, that he might not go after him in vain.

For I am told he dealeth very subtilely.] So that it was not easy to catch him.

Ver. 23. See therefore, and take knowledge of all the lurking-places where he hideth himself, and come to me again with the certainty, and I will go with you.] He seems to be very diffident, having been so oft disappointed: and by this means gave David time to get intelligence, and remove to another place.

And it shall come to pass, that if he be in the land, I will search him out through all the thousands of Judah.] Their tribes were divided into thousands; (see Judg. vi. 15.) among some of whom he supposed he would lurk: and he would not cease searching for him till he found him.

Ver. 24. And they arose, and went to Ziph before Saul.] As he had directed them, ver. 22.

But David and his men were in the wilderness of Maon, in the plain on the south of Jeshimon.] Having heard what the Ziphites had undertaken, he disappointed their design, by going into another place, with which, it is likely, they were not so well acquainted. For Maon was a distinct wilderness from Ziph: though both in the tribe of Judah.

Ver. 25. Saul also and his men went to seek him.] Hearing, I suppose, by the Ziphites, whither he was gone.

And they told David.] He also had intelligence brought him, that Saul was coming against him.

Wherefore he came down into a rock.] Some craggy place.

And abode in the wilderness of Maon.] Not thinking himself safe there, he went into another part of the same wilderness.

And when Saul heard that, he pursued after David in the wilderness of Maon.] So that he came to the very place where he was.

Ver. 26. And Saul went on this side of the mountain, and David and his men on that side of the mountain: and David made haste to get away for fear of Saul; for Saul and his men compassed David and his men round about to take them.] Saul's forces being far more numerous, he divided them into several parties; who marching several ways, were about to encompass the whole mountain: so that it should be impossible for David to escape them. Who therefore made haste to get away before he was quite surrounded.

Ver. 27. But there came a messenger unto Saul, saying, Haste thee, and come; for the Philistines have invaded the land.] A marvellous providence of God, who stirred them up at this very time to make an irruption into the land of Israel, for the preservation of David when he was in extreme danger.

Ver. 28. Wherefore Saul returned from following after David, and went against the Philistines.] It was very probable David would in a little time have fallen into his hands, had not the messenger, who, I suppose, was sent by his council, desired him with all speed to come and oppose the Philistines, who were the most dangerous enemies.

Therefore they called the name of that place Sela-hammah-lekoth.] That is, the rock of divisions. Either because Saul was distracted here between two counsels, whether to pursue David, or go immediately against the Philistines; or, because God divided Saul from David, when he was coming up close unto him.

Ver. 29. And David went up from thence, and dwelt in the strong holds at En-gedi.] A place in the tribe of Judah, not far from the Dead Sea: which Solomon in his Song celebrates for the famous vineyards which were there: and St. Jerome and Eusebius say there was excellent balm at En-gedi: from which the wilderness near it took its name, where David found secure lurking-places.

CHAP. XXIV.

Ver. 1. AND it came to pass, when Saul was returned from following the Philistines.] Who either retreated upon Saul's march towards them, or he drove them out of the land.

That it was told him, saying, Behold, David is in the wilderness of En-gedi.] The very place was not told him where David was, but only in general that he was in that wilderness.

Ver. 2. Then Saul took three thousand chosen men out of all Israel.] Men of valour, and whom he thought he might trust.

And went to seek David and his men upon the rocks of the wild goats.] In craggy and bushy places, where none but wild goats lived; but he imagined David might there skulk: and, therefore, resolved to be at the pains of searching for him there.

Ver. 3. And he came to the sheep-cotes by the way, where there was a cave.] In which the sheep rested in the heat of the day. Unto which place David was directed by God's guidance: for Saul would not suspect that he would abide in the highway unto those rocks, where he was going to look for him.

And Saul went in to cover his feet.] See upon Judg. iii. 24.

And David and his men remained in the sides of the cave.] Where they could see him by the light at the entrance of it: but he could not see them, because it was dark in the remote parts of it. Some of these caves were exceeding large: Strabo in his sixteenth book mentions one that would contain four thousand men.

Ver. 4. And the men of David said unto him, Behold the day of which the Lord said unto thee, Behold, I will deliver thine enemy into thy hand, that thou mayest do to him as it shall seem good unto thee.] We do not read any where that God made a promise to deliver Saul into David's hand: but so they interpreted what Samuel had said, that God would take the kingdom from Saul and give it to David. And they, having a desire to return to their own habitations, and likewise to have preferment under David, desired him to make use of the opportunity which now presented itself of destroying his enemy, and advancing himself.

Then David arose, and cut off the skirt of Saul's robe privately.] Which he might easily do, if he were asleep: as that phrase may be interpreted, he went in to cover his feet. This robe was long, coming down to the feet: as the Hebrew word meil signifies.

Ver. 5. And it came to pass, that afterward David's heart smote him.] He was inwardly troubled.

Because he had cut off Saul's skirt.] For it looked like an indignity unto a prince to have his royal robe disfigured: "Tantam intelligebat personæ illius sanctitudinem" (as Grotius speaks), such he understood was the sacredness of his person. And that very deservedly; for the supreme powers being obnoxious to many men's hatred, ought to be secured in the discharge of their office. Of which the Romans took care in the very tribunes of the people, that they should be ἄσυλοι, inviolable, (lib. i. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 4. sect. 7.)

Ver. 6. And he said unto his men.] When he returned unto them, and they grew angry, he had only cut off the skirt of his robe, and not killed him.

The Lord forbid that I should do this thing.] Which they desired.

Unto my master.] For I must own him, as long as he is alive, to be my lord and master; unto whom I am bound to be faithful.

The Lord's anointed.] Whom God hath appointed to be king as long as he lives.

To stretch forth my hand against him, seeing he is the anointed of the Lord.] Set up by God, who alone could throw him down. For he was as much constituted king by God while he lived, as David was after his death. And his anointing made his person sacred: for the very heathens looked upon their kings as holding the place of God. So Artabanus the Persian (as Plutarch relates in the life of Themistocles), This is the very best of our many excellent laws, Τὸ τιμᾶν βασιλέα καὶ προσκυνεῖν, ὡς εἰκόνα Θεοῦ τὰ πάντα σώζοντος, that we should honour and adore our king, as the image of God, who preserves all things.

Ver. 7. So David stayed his servants with these words, and suffered them not to rise against Saul.] Who still had a desire to kill him, though David would not: which he hindered by his wise and pious persuasions.

But Saul rose up out of the cave, and went his way.] To his camp: which he had left to take some repose in the cave, having a guard to attend him, who stood without while he covered his feet within.

Ver. 8. David also arose afterward.] When Saul was gone.

And went out of the cave, and cried after Saul, saying, My lord the king.] A bold attempt, to adventure to come into the presence of such an enraged enemy. But his innocence and confidence in God emboldened him, especially having so strong an evidence to give him of his integrity.

And when Saul looked behind him, David stooped with his face to the earth, and bowed himself.] See xx. 41.

Ver. 9. And David said unto Saul, Wherefore hearest thou men's words, saying, Behold, David seeketh thy hurt.] He wisely endeavours, at the entrance of his speech, to mollify Saul, by transferring all the blame of his persecution, from him, unto the sycophants and false accusers that were about him.

Ver. 10. Behold, this day thy eyes have seen that the Lord had delivered thee into my hand in the cave.] Out of which he followed Saul.

And some bade me kill thee, but my eye spared thee.] A phrase for taking pity and compassion upon those whom we have in our power to hurt.

And I said, I will not put forth my hand against my lord, for he is the Lord's anointed.] He acknowledgeth him both to be his king, and appointed by God so to be.

Ver. 11. Moreover, my father.] So he was by the marriage of his daughter; and as he was supreme governor, the father of his country. Or if he had not been so, yet this word was proper to be used, that he might soften and sweeten him into more tender usage to him.

See; yea, see the skirt of thy robe in my hand.] He offers him a demonstration of the truth of what he declared: and prays him to observe it.

For in that I cut off the skirt of thy robe, and killed thee not, know thou and see.] Let it convince thee.

That there is neither evil nor transgression in my hand.] That he had no bad design against him, nor ever attempted to do him any harm. For if he had, it had been as easy to cut his throat, as to cut off the skirt of his robe.

And I have not sinned against thee; yet thou huntest my soul to take it.] This was a great aggravation of Saul's guilt (which makes David repeat it), that he sought the life of one who had no way offended him, and when it was in his power would not hurt him.

Ver. 12. The Lord judge between me and thee, and the Lord avenge me of thee.] If he still persisted to persecute him. But he doth not, by these words, avenge me of thee, pray God to punish him for the injuries he had done him; but only to vindicate and deliver him from his violent and unjust persecution. So the Hebrew word nakam often signifies.

But my hand shall not be upon thee.] He persisted in his resolution not to avenge himself; but leave it to God to do him right.

Ver. 13. As saith the proverb of the ancients, Wickedness proceedeth from the wicked; but my hand shall not be upon thee.] Men may be known by their actions. And this is as if David had said, Were I so bad as I am represented, I should now have shewn it: but I will never have my hand in such crimes. Or thus, It is for wicked men to do this: but I am none of them.

Ver. 14. After whom is the king of Israel come out? after whom dost thou pursue?] He turns every stone, as we speak, to appease Saul's rage; and tells him in conclusion, that it was below him, and a disparagement to him to raise armies against such a mean person as he was.

After a dead dog, after a flea?] He represents himself as contemptible as it was possible, that he might convince Saul it was not for his honour to take so much pains to kill him if he could: for what an inglorious thing was it for a king, with so many armed men, to triumph over a dead dog? As if a lion should hunt after a flea. "Which (as Bochartus glosses) if it be sought, is not easily found; and if it be found, is not easily caught; and if it be caught, is a poor prey, especially for a prince."

Ver. 15. The Lord therefore be judge, and judge between me and thee, and plead my cause, and deliver me out of thy hand.] He thought he could not repeat this too often, that as hitherto, so he resolved hereafter to leave it to God to judge which of them was in the right, and not avenge himself. It may seem strange that Saul, who came with such an enraged mind to seek for David, should hear him make so long a speech to him with patience, and not furiously fall upon him as soon as he saw him. But we may well think, that at the first he was surprised to see him follow after him out of the cave; and more astonished to find, after a few words, that it was in David's power to kill him, if he had pleased: which he knew he had, by a long persecution of him, provoked him to do.

Ver. 16. And it came to pass, when David had made an end of speaking these words unto Saul, that Saul said, Is this thy voice, my son David?] Though he stood at such a distance, that it is likely he could not know him by his face, yet he very well knew his voice.

And Saul lifted up his voice, and wept.] His heart being mollified at present, by this unparalleled kindness of David, in sparing his life, when he could have taken it away.

Ver. 17. And he said unto David, Thou art more righteous than I; for thou hast rewarded me good, whereas I have rewarded thee evil.] Most men have their good moods. And Saul now could scarce avoid being touched with a deep sense, how very unjust and unkind he had been to one who truly loved him.

Ver. 18. And thou hast shewed this day, how that thou hast dealt with me: forasmuch as, when the Lord had delivered me into thy hand, thou killedst me not.] The demonstration of his kindness was so clear, that he could not but acknowledge it, and be affected with it.

Ver. 19. For if a man find his enemy, will he let him go well away?] i. e. He will certainly destroy him to save himself. The kindness of David therefore was unusual, and without example.

Wherefore the Lord reward thee good, for that thou hast done unto me this day.] Herein David had imitated God; who doth good to the evil: from whom Saul prays David might receive his reward for the good done to him.

Ver. 20. And now I know well that thou shalt surely be king, and that the kingdom of Israel shall be established in thy hand.] These wonderful providences of God over David, and David's no less wonderful virtue, at last convinced Saul that God designed him to be the king of his people, and that none could hinder his establishment.

Ver. 21. Swear now therefore unto me by the Lord, that thou wilt not cut off my seed after me, and that thou wilt not destroy my name out of my father's house.] As he had endeavoured to destroy David; and as kings frequently destroyed the family of those into whose thrones they were advanced.

Ver. 22. And David sware unto Saul.] Who should rather have sworn unto David, he would suffer him to live quietly; yea, have invited him to return home, and assured him of his protection. But David did not require this: resolving to trust to God, and not to him. Some question how David kept this oath, when he hanged up seven of Saul's sons, (2 Sam. xxi.) But they should consider, that he did not this of himself, but at the desire of the Gibeonites, unto whom God required satisfaction should be given for Saul's bloody endeavours to destroy them.

And Saul went home; but David and his men gat them up unto the hold.] viz. Of En-gedi. For he durst not stay in such an open place as he now was in, knowing Saul's inconstancy, and the hatred he had to him, and the fury he was in when the evil spirit came upon him. It is dangerous to trust a reconciled enemy: and the old saying is very wise, μέμνησο ἀπιστεῖν, remember not to be too credulous. And so the son of Sirach, (Ecclus. xii. 10, 11.) "Never trust thine enemy: though he humble himself, yet take good heed, and beware of him."

CHAP. XXV.

Ver. 1. AND Samuel died.] According to Josephus (lib. vii. latter end) he governed Israel after the death of Eli twelve years, and lived eighteen in the reign of Saul, and then died. But according to Sir J. Marsham, he judged Israel sixteen years before Saul's inauguration; and after he was made king lived eighteen.

And all the Israelites were gathered together, and lamented him.] Such was his virtue, and such was the love the people bare to him, that the whole nation bewailed his loss, and that many days, as Josephus saith, Καὶ ἐπὶ πολλὰς ἡμέρας ἔκλαυσεν.

And buried him in his house at Ramah.] The place where he was born, and had long lived: where, it is likely, there was a place belonging to his house in which his family was interred.

And David arose, and went into the wilderness of Paran.]

Which was in the southern parts of Judea, near to Arabia: into which he might presently flee, if there were occasion. The Mahometan writers (as Hottinger observes) make Paran a part of Arabia Deserta: so that now it was that David dwelt in the tents of Kedar: which was the same with Paran, as our learned Fuller observes in his Miscellanies.

Ver. 2. And there was a man in Maon, whose possessions were in Carmel.] There were two Carmels: one in the north near the sea, in the confines of Asher and Zebulun, to which Elijah was wont to resort; and another in the south near Hebron, in the tribe of Judah, which is here meant. See Josh. xv. 55. both concerning Maon and Carmel.

And the man was very great, and he had three thousand sheep, and a thousand goats.] A very wealthy man.

And he was shearing his sheep in Carmel.] They pulled off the wool at Rome, and in the neighbouring countries (as Bochartus observes), but not in Greece, nor Judea; where they sheared it, as we do now.

Ver. 3. And the name of the man was Nabal, and the name of his wife was Abigail; and she was a woman of great understanding, and of a beautiful countenance: but the man was churlish, and evil in his doings.] Uncharitable, and perhaps oppressive in his dealings.

And he was of the house of Caleb.] Descended from a worthy ancestor, but very unlike him. In the Hebrew the word is Calebi, a Calebite, of the family of Caleb. But the word Caleb signifying a dog, some of the ancient interpreters understand the word here, as if the holy writer insinuated he was of dog-like dispositions and manners. Whence the LXX. translate it, ὁ ἄνθρωπος κυνικὸς, a dogged man, or a cynic. And so the Syriac and Arabic.

Ver. 4. And David heard in the wilderness that Nabal did shear his sheep.] For the wilderness of Paran was not far from Nabal's house.

Ver. 5. And David sent out ten young men.] To shew his great respect to him.

And David said unto the young men, Get ye up to Carmel.] For it was a mountain, as the other Carmel was.

And go to Nabal, and greet him in my name.] Present his service to him, as we now speak; and wish him continued happiness, as it is in the following words.

Ver. 6. And thus shall ye say to him that liveth in prosperity.] In the Hebrew the words are only, to him that liveth: unto which we add in prosperity; because life in Scripture signifies happiness, as death signifies misery.

Peace be both to thee, and peace be unto thy house, and peace to all that thou hast.] A most affectionate and comprehensive salutation; wherein he wishes well to him (both his soul and body), and to his whole family, and to all that he possessed, either at home or abroad: and some think in the first words he wishes all this might be perpetuated as long as he lived. There could not well be a higher compliment, as we now speak; for peace comprehends all manner of blessings, in the holy language.

Ver. 7. And now I have heard that thou hast shearers.] Whom he entertained that day.

Now, thy shepherds which were with us, we hurt them not, neither was there aught missing to them all the while they were in Carmel.] He represents the good demeanour of those who belonged to him, while they were in his neighbourhood. And suggests, that he would not have had so many sheep to shear, if his men had been like others in their condition. But though they were soldiers, and in great necessity, they never took any thing from him.

Ver. 8. Ask thy young men, and they will shew thee.] He desires him to be informed of the truth of this from his own servants.

Wherefore let the young men find favour in thine eyes (for we come in a good day); give, I pray thee, whatsoever cometh unto thy hand unto thy servants, and to thy son David.] Most humble words, and full of respect: mixed with strong arguments; from their harmless and friendly living in his neighbourhood; and from the present festival which he kept, when men's hearts use to be open and bountiful: and they did not desire delicates, but any thing that was at hand, which he could spare.

Ver. 9. And when David's young men came, they spake to Nabal according to all these words in the name of David, and ceased.] Added nothing of their own, but waited for his answer in silence, as Maimonides interprets it, in his More Nevoch. par. i. cap. 116.

Ver. 10. Nabal answered David's servants and said, Who is David? and who is the son of Jesse?] A most rude and brutish answer to such a civil message and humble request.

There be many servants now-a-days that break every man from his master.] He reproaches them all as a company of fugitives and vagabonds; and taxes David secretly, with infidelity to his master Saul.

Ver. 11. Shall I take my bread, and my water, and my flesh that I have killed for my shearers, and give it unto men whom I know not whence they be?] A most foolish speech; when he had just before called David the son of Jesse: which shews he knew well enough who he was.

Ver. 12. And David's young men turned their way, and went again, and told him all these sayings.] They did not stand arguing with him, or entreating him: but slighted him, as much as he did them.

Ver. 13. And David said unto his men, Gird you on every man his sword. And they girded on every man his sword; and David also girded on his sword.] Being resolved, in his passion, to be revenged on Nabal.

And there went up after David about four hundred men, and two hundred abode by the stuff.] For he had with him six hundred men in all; as we read before, xxiii. 13.

Ver. 14. But one of the young men.] Belonging unto Nabal.

Told Abigail, Nabal's wife, saying, Behold, David sent messengers out of the wilderness to salute our master; and he railed on them.] Some of his servants were wiser and better than he himself, which makes good that saying of Seneca (in his third book de Beneficiis), "Nulli præclusa est virtus, omnibus patet," &c. Virtue is shut up from none; it lies open to all. It admits all, it invites all; free men and servants, kings and exiles. It makes not choice of such a house, or of such an estate: but is content with a man himself.—For who can choose but admire the wisdom and fidelity of this shepherd? who admonished his mistress of the danger her family was in; as he rationally concluded from the rude abuse that had been put upon David: whose merits he honestly set before her.

Ver. 15. But the men were very good to us, and we were not hurt, neither missed any thing, as long as we were conversant with them, when we were in the fields.] They confirm every word that David's messengers had told their master, (ver. 7.)

Ver. 16. They were a wall unto us, both by night and day, all the time we were with them keeping sheep.] They add more than David's men had said of themselves, that they not only did them no hurt, but were a guard and defence to them against robbers, and against wild beasts.

Ver. 17. Now therefore know and consider what thou wilt do; for evil is determined against our master, and against all his household.] This they understood, either from the young men whom David sent, who let fall some words signifying how highly he would resent the indignity done to him; or they concluded it from what they had observed of the nature of David; who was very kind, but would not put up rude affronts.

For he is such a son of Belial, that a man cannot speak to him.] So wilful and obstinate, that they durst not speak to him of this matter: fearing he would be more insolent to them than he had been to David.

Ver. 18. Then Abigail made haste.] For she was so prudent a woman as not to neglect the good advice of a servant.

And took two hundred loaves, and two bottles of wine, five sheep ready dressed, and five measures of parched corn, and a hundred clusters of raisins, and two hundred cakes of figs, and laid them upon asses.] This shews he was a great man, who had such plenty of provisions in his house. For it is not to be imagined, that she would rob the shearers of a festival day to gratify David.

Ver. 19. And said unto her servants, Go before me: behold, I come after you.] They carried the present; that David beholding it, might be a little mitigated before she came to him.

But she told not her husband Nabal.] Who, it is likely, would have persisted in his folly: or been so long before he would have been persuaded to be wiser, that it would have been too late to prevent the danger.

Ver. 20. And it was so, as she rode upon the ass, that she came down by the covert of the hill.] By a way full of bushes, so that David saw not her, nor she him, till they met together.

And, behold, David and his men came down against her.] From another hill, I suppose.

And she met them.] In the bottom, between the two hills.

Ver. 21. (Now David had said, Surely in vain have I kept all that this fellow hath in the wilderness, so that nothing was missing of all that pertained to him; and he hath requited me evil for good.] This he said to himself: or to his men, as soon as the messengers came back; or as they were upon the road to Nabal's house.

Ver. 22. So and more also do God unto the enemies of David.] He means to himself: but being unwilling to pronounce his own name, or any other whom he respected, together with a curse, he transfers it to an enemy: by a figure called euphemismus. Or, as some take it, the meaning is, let my enemy destroy me, if I let Nabal and his family escape. But the former is the plainest interpretation; it being common in the Jewish language (as Joh. Cocceius observes), when they speak of any evil to themselves, to translate it to another person. Of which he gives instances out of Maccoth, and Bava Bathra. (See him upon the Gemara Sanhedrin, cap. 4. sect. 18. annot. 1.)

If I leave to him before the morning light.] He intended to fall upon them in the night, when they were in a dead sleep, after great jollity.

Any that pisseth against the wall.)] That is (as the generality of interpreters think), so much as a dog; this being, they take it, like that saying of Aurelian, mentioned by Vopiscus, who, going to a city, and finding the gates shut against him, said in his wrath, "Canem in hoc oppido non relinquam;" I will not leave a dog in this town. But Bochartus excepts to this interpretation, that all dogs do not piss against the wall, but only the males; and that not till they be six or eight months old, as Aristotle and others observe. And therefore (to omit his other reasons) he takes this phrase to be a periphrasis of a man, as the Hebrews expound it, particularly Ralbag. So that it is as much as to say, I will not leave a man alive.

Ver. 23. And when Abigail saw David, she hasted, and lighted off the ass, and fell before David on her face, and bowed herself to the ground.] Both out of reverence to him as a great man, and as an humble supplicant, for pardon of a great offence.

Ver. 24. And fell at his feet, and said, Upon me, my lord, upon me let this iniquity be.] She applies herself to him, in a speech full of art and prudence; and first begs, like a kind wife, that she might suffer, not her husband, who was not so wise as he should be.

And let thine handmaid, I pray thee, speak in thine audience, and hear the words of thy handmaid.] She desires him patiently to hear her reasons.

Ver. 25. Let not my lord, I pray thee, regard this man of Belial, even Nabal; for as his name is, so is he; Nabal is his name, and folly is with him.] She represents him as a man that offended out of folly rather than malice; which might a little excuse his rudeness. There are many such allusions in Scripture, as there is here of Nebala and Nabal. (See Gen. v. 25. xlix. 8. 16. 19. Zeph. ii. 4.)

But I, thine handmaid, saw not the young men of my lord, whom thou didst send.] If any were to be punished, she had desired it might be herself; yet she had this to say in her own behalf, that she knew nothing of the message sent by David.

Ver. 26. Now therefore, my lord, as the Lord liveth, and as thy soul liveth, seeing the Lord hath withholden thee from coming to shed blood, and from avenging thyself with thine own hand.] This is wonderfully artificial, to presume so much upon his goodness and clemency, as already to conclude, she had diverted him from his purpose: or rather, that God had interposed, by his good providence, to hinder him from shedding blood.

Now let thine enemies, and they that seek evil to my lord, be as Nabal.] That is, may thou have no worse enemy than he. Or, may thy enemies have no more power to hurt thee, than Nabal hath. This is another argument to persuade him to mercy; that Nabal was so inconsiderable, that, as he would do him no good, so he could do him no evil.

Ver. 27. And now this blessing.] That is, this present or gift. The same phrase in xxx. 26. 2 Kings v. 15.

Which thine handmaid hath brought unto my lord, let it even be given to the young men that follow my lord.] To appease their anger: or, as unworthy of David's acceptance.

Ver. 28. I pray thee, forgive the trespass of thine hand- maid.] She still speaks as if she had been the offender; because she desired none might suffer but herself.

For the Lord will certainly make my lord a sure house.] She prays him to be good to her, as God would certainly be to him.

Because my lord fighteth the battles of the Lord, and evil hath not been found in thee all thy days.] She puts him in mind of all his heroical acts against the Philistines, and other enemies; and that hitherto he had been blameless, and done no hurt to the Israelites: and therefore hoped he would do none to her, and her family.

Ver. 29. Yet a man is risen to pursue thee, and to seek thy soul.] Saul she means restlessly endeavoured to take away his life.

But the soul of my lord shall be bound in the bundle of life with the Lord thy God.] Be preserved. For those things which we would not have lost, nor scattered about, we are wont to bind up in bundles.

And the souls of thine enemies, them shall he sling out, as out of the middle of a sling.] As we bind up things to preserve them from being thrown about, and lost; so we put things into a sling, that they may be cast out of sight, or a great way from us.

Ver. 30. And it shall come to pass, when the Lord shall have done to my lord according to all the good that he hath spoken concerning thee, and shall have appointed thee ruler over Israel.] Nothing could be more obliging than this, at every word to call him her lord, and to acknowledge his title to the kingdom; and her belief that he would certainly enjoy it.

Ver. 31. That this shall be no grief unto thee, nor offence of heart to my lord, either that thou hast shed blood causeless, or that my lord hath avenged himself.] She reserves the most Divine argument to the last; that he would have a clear and quiet conscience, and not be disturbed with a remembrance that he had shed the blood of the innocent, or otherwise avenged himself: which belonged unto God.

And when the Lord hath dealt well with my lord, remember thine handmaid.] Thou wilt thank me for my advice.

Ver. 32. And David said to Abigail, Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, which sent thee this day to meet me.] He was so moved with this pathetical speech, that, in the first place, he acknowledges the good providence of God, which directed her to come so seasonably to prevent the effects of his anger. Whereby he was absolved from his oath, which he had sworn, to cut off Nabal's family. And indeed it was null in itself; for no man can oblige himself to do an evil thing; as this would have been: there being a double guilt in it, as Philo observes, if he had shed their blood. To which may be applied the words of Seneca, that in such cases, "scelus est fides," to keep one's word, is a wicked thing. See Grotius de Jure Belli et Pacis, lib. ii. cap. 13. sect. 6. where he observes, that Cicero mentions the like case with this in the vow of Agamemnon. And Procopius Gazæus here well resolves, that this oath of David was the effect of anger; but his sparing Nabal the effect of reason and prudent counsel.

Ver. 33. And blessed be thy advice, and blessed be thou, which hast kept me this day from coming to shed blood, and from avenging myself with my own hand.] Next he commends her, and her wise counsel; for which he beseeches God to bless her: for she had preserved him from a very outrageous piece of revenge; which might have afflicted him all his days.

Ver. 34. For in very deed, as the Lord God of Israel liveth, which hath kept me back from hurting thee, except thou hadst hasted and come to meet me, surely there had not been left unto Nabal, by the morning light, any that pisseth against the wall.] It may seem strange, that his anger should not cool in so much time as passed between the return of his messengers and Abigail's meeting him: but the affront was great, and his soldiers it is likely inflamed his rage, and he resolved to make Nabal an example to others, not to use him so rudely.

Ver. 35. So David received of her hand that which she brought, and said unto her, Go in peace unto thy house: for I hearkened unto thy voice, and accepted thy person.] Both she herself, and what she said, and what she brought, were most welcome to him. So happy a thing it is (as Euripides speaks in his Heraclidæ, ver. 359.) to fall into the hand of a wise, and not a foolish enemy. For the latter, if he get the better, exercises nothing but cruelty: but with the former there is room for mercy, justice, moderation, and pardon. Such an enemy Abigail met withal; unto whom Nabal's offence was not more provoking to the destruction of his family, than the admiration of Abigail's virtue to its preservation.

Ver. 36. And Abigail came to Nabal; and, behold, he held a feast in his house like the feast of a king: and Nabal's heart was merry within him, for he was very drunken.] Had eaten and drank too liberally, at a very great feast, which he made for his shearers.

Wherefore she told him nothing, less or more, till the morning light.] Said not a word of what had passed, because he was not capable to understand the mercy of God to him.

Ver. 37. But it came to pass in the morning, when the wine was gone out of Nabal.] When he had slept himself sober.

And his wife told him of these things, that his heart died within him, and he became as a stone.] He fainted away, and was as cold as a stone; out of the dread of the danger which he imagined still hung over him. For it is a frigid interpretation of Rasi and Kimchi, that he was troubled to hear of the great present that his wife had made to David.

Ver. 38. And it came to pass, that about ten days after, the Lord smote Nabal, that he died.] It seems he lay so long dispirited, in a stupid senseless condition; and then God put an end to his life, either by some disease, or by a sudden stroke.

Ver. 39. And when David heard that Nabal was dead, he said, Blessed be the Lord, who hath pleaded the cause of my reproach from the hand of Nabal, and hath kept his servant from evil: for the Lord hath returned the wickedness of Nabal upon his own head.] He doth not rejoice so much in his death (who was a worthless wretch) as in the justice of God: who shewed him, that, if men would have patience, they should see right done them; so that they need not go about to avenge themselves.

And David sent and communed with Abigail, to take her to him to wife.] Being a woman of admirable prudence, as well as beauty, (ver. 3.) and one that expressed a high esteem of him, he sent some to treat with her about marriage with him.

Ver. 40. And when the servants of David were come to Abigail to Carmel, they spake unto her, saying, David sent us unto thee, to take thee unto him to wife.] This was their business: which, no doubt, they delivered in many more words, which signified the great esteem and affection which David had for her; whom he knew to be a woman of such great wisdom, that she had respect not merely to his present, but to his future condition. Otherwise he would not have adventured, being now very poor, to court one that had such riches.

Ver. 41. And she arose, and bowed herself with her face to the earth.] In reverence to the very name of David: whom she highly honoured, as a man of an heroic spirit; and who she was fully persuaded should be king of Israel, (ver. 30.)

And she said, Behold, let thine handmaid be a servant to wash the feet of the servants of my lord.] She sent him an answer in these words; which shew her humility to be as great as her other virtues: for to wash one's feet was the lowest sort of service.

Ver. 42. And Abigail hasted, and arose, and rode upon an ass, with five damsels of hers that went after her.] That she might come attended suitable to her quality and his. (See Grotius, Gen. xxx. 3.)

And she went after the messengers of David.] Though she did not long deliberate about the matter, but soon consented, yet it is not likely she followed them immediately: but stayed some decent time before she went to David.

And became his wife.] She had a strong faith in God to marry a man who had nothing to live upon, but was forced to wander from place to place, and beg the assistance of his friends. But she verily believed he would at last come to the throne, as she had before expressed: and could make some provision for him out of her own estate.

Ver. 43. David also took Ahinoam of Jezreel, and they were also both of them his wives.] At the same time: according to the corrupt custom of those days, wherein they had perverted the law of nature, which is admirably expressed by Euripides in his Andromache, (ver. 177, &c.)

——— οὐδὲ γὰρ καλὸν,
Δυοῖν γυναικοῖν ἄνδρ' ἓν' ἡνίας ἔχειν, &c.

It is not good for one husband to govern two wives: but he should be content with one, who would live happily.

And again, (ver. 909.)

Κακὸν δ' ἔλεξας, ἓν' ἄνδρα δίσσ' ἔχειν λέχη.

Thou hast said, it is an evil thing for one man to have two wives. For where there are more than one they seldom agree, but breed great trouble to their husband. It is commonly thought, that Ahinoam was his wife before he married Abigail. (See upon xxvii. 3.)

Ver. 44. And Saul.] Or rather, for Saul, the particle vau being often so used.

Had given Michal his daughter, David's wife, to Phalti the son of Laish.] Here is the reason why David took another wife; because Saul had deprived him of his former: but it was no good reason for taking two, which were more than he had before. He was not forced from Michal, and therefore we read afterward that he took her again. And the Jewish doctors are of opinion, that this Phalti was a very pious man, and would never touch her, because she was another man's wife: which was the reason David received her again. (See 1 Sam. iii. 15.)

Which was of Gallim.] A town near Accaron, as Eusebius and St. Jerome tell us: which had its name from Gal, a heap of stones; it being, I suppose, a stony place.

CHAP. XXVI.

Ver. 1. AND the Ziphites.] The old enemies of David, (xxiii. 19.)

Came unto Saul to Gibeah, saying, Doth not David hide himself in the hill of Hachilah, which is before Jeshimon?] He thought he might safely return thither, Saul having so lately made peace with him. The Ziphites also could not but hear how he had obliged Saul, and what declaration Saul had made, that he knew David would be king of Israel, (xxiv. 20.) Which David thought might discourage them from meddling any more. But quite contrary, they being afraid, if he came to be king, he would remember and revenge their ill usage of him, went to excite Saul to destroy him.

Ver. 2. Then Saul arose, and went down to the wilderness of Ziph, with three thousand men of Israel with him.] The same number he had the last time he pursued after him, (xxiv. 2.)

To seek David in the wilderness of Ziph.] The inconstancy, falseness, and implacable rage of this prince is inconceivable. Who, having not long ago been obliged to David for his life, and had acknowledged his error, and made David swear he would be good to his posterity, yet openly declared himself again to be his enemy, and sought to kill him.

Ver. 3. And Saul pitched in the hill of Hachilah, which is before Jeshimon, by the way.] That is, by the way that went to the wilderness.

But David abode in the wilderness; and he saw that Saul came after him into the wilderness.] He thought at first his intelligence had not been true; but he was credibly informed that Saul's wrath was broke out again, and that he intended to come thither.

Ver. 4. And David therefore sent out spies, and understood that Saul was come in very deed.] A good captain always hath scouts abroad: who assured him his information was true, and that Saul was not far from him.

Ver. 5. And David arose, and came to a place where Saul had pitched.] Within sight of it; where he might observe how they lay.

And David beheld where Saul lay, and Abner the son of Ner, the captain of the host.] Who, it is likely, lay near him.

And Saul lay in the trench.] Or rather, in his chariot, for so the LXX. translate the Hebrew word by λαμπήνη, or as some editions have it, ἀπήνη: which signifies a chariot drawn by mules, as Bochartus shews out of Homer and other authors, par. i. Hierozoicon, lib. ii. cap. 19.

And the people lay round about him.] He was enclosed, I suppose, with the carriages; as our marginal translation is of the foregoing word.

Ver. 6. Then answered David, and said to Ahimelech the Hittite.] A valiant man of that nation, who was a proselyte to the Jewish religion: and not only followed David, but was always near to his person,

And to Abishai the son of Zeruiah, brother to Joab.] Who were the sons of David's sister, (1 Chron. xi. 16.) whose father is no where mentioned; being a man, I suppose, of no note.

Saying, Who will go down with me to Saul to the camp?] That is, which of these two.

And Abishai said, I will go down with thee.] Either Ahimelech declined it, as too hazardous an enterprise; or Abishai, being a hot forward young man, offered himself, while the other stood deliberating.

Ver. 7. So David and Abishai came to the people by night.] A bold attempt, for two men to come into the midst of an army of three thousand chosen men, who were not without a watch, though they were now asleep. But a strong confidence in God's promise that he would preserve him, overcame all fear of danger.

And, behold, Saul lay sleeping within the trench, and his spear stuck in the ground at his bolster; but Abner and the people lay round about him.] To secure his person from any sudden assault.

Ver. 8. Then said Abishai to David, God hath delivered thine enemy into thy hand this day: now therefore let me smite him, I pray thee, with the spear even to the earth at once, and I will not smite him the second time.] Though David would not kill him himself, when he had the like opportunity; (xxiv. 4.) yet Abishai thought he might give him leave to do it: and he undertook to stick him to the ground at one thrust, so that he should make no noise by crying out.

Ver. 9. And David said to Abishai, Destroy him not: for who can stretch forth his hand against the Lord's anointed and be guiltless?] Being made king by God's special appointment, he looked upon it as a high crime to do him any hurt; because he was a sacred person.

Ver. 10. David said furthermore, As the Lord liveth, the Lord shall smite him; or his day shall come to die; or he shall descend into battle, and perish.] God, who made him king, after a solemn manner, could only depose him: and that he could do several ways; either by a sudden stroke, or in the course of nature, or letting him fall in battle.

Ver. 11. The Lord forbid that I should stretch my hand against the Lord's anointed.] What he permitted another to do, when he could hinder it, was as if he had done it himself. But he abhorred to meddle with that, which belonged to God, as he had before said.

But I pray thee, take now the spear that is at his bolster.] As a witness what they could have done, if respect to God, whose anointed he was, had not withheld them.

And the cruse of water, and let us go.] This was set there, either for him to drink, if he was thirsty, or to wash himself; which was prescribed by their law in case of many pollutions.

Ver. 12. So David took the spear and the cruse of water.] By the hand of Abishai: who, like an excellent soldier, was perfectly subject to his commander, to forbear, or to do whatsoever David enjoined him.

And gat them away, and no man saw it, or knew it, neither awaked; for they were all asleep: because a deep sleep from the Lord was fallen upon them.] The Jewish doctors, in Bereschith Rabba, observe, that there are three sorts of that they call tardama, which is the Hebrew word for deep sleep in this place. The first, mere sound sleep, which God sent upon Adam, (Gen. xi. 21.) The second is the deep sleep of prophecy, which he sent upon Abraham, (Gen. xv. 12.) The third is this here mentioned, which they call the sleep marmorita (it should be printed marmota, as Bochart observes), which is a little creature more drowsy than a dormouse. (Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. iii. cap. 33.)

Ver. 13. Then David went over to the other side, and stood on the top of a hill afar off (a great space being between them).] So that he was in safety, and yet his voice might be heard.

Ver. 14. And David cried unto the people, and to Abner the son of Ner, saying, Answerest thou not, Abner?] Art thou still asleep?

Then Abner answered, and said, Who art thou that criest unto the king?] And disturbest his repose.

Ver. 15. And David said unto Abner, Art thou not a valiant man, &c.] In the Hebrew the words are, Art not thou a man? That is, in place of authority, as well as of great courage and valour.

Wherefore hast thou not kept thy lord the king?] Observed better military discipline, for the preservation of Saul's person.

For there came one of the people in to destroy the king thy lord.] Came into the camp with that intention, and had a very fair opportunity.

Ver. 16. This thing is not good that thou hast done.] A soft way of speaking: but his meaning was, that he was very faulty, as appears by what follows.

Ye are worthy to die, because ye have not kept your master, the Lord's anointed.] Guarded him better from any danger. It is probable they despised David's small forces, which made them so grossly negligent.

Now see where the king's spear is, and the cruse of water that was at his bolster!] He sets before them the tokens of their carelessness; and of the opportunity he had to kill Saul.

Ver. 17. And Saul knew David's voice, and said, Is this thy voice, my son David?] He was in great confusion of mind, and knew not what more to say to him.

And David said, It is my voice, my lord, O king.] He humbly acknowledgeth his authority; and the allegiance he owed him: though he had done him so many injuries.

Ver. 18. And he said, Wherefore doth my lord thus pursue after his servant? for what have I done, or what evil is in my hand?] Being conscious of his own innocence, David expostulates with him in a long speech: and desires, in the first place, to know what crime he had to accuse him of: especially since he lately acknowledged that he was more righteous than himself, (xxiv. 17.)

Ver. 19. Now therefore, I pray thee, let my lord the king hear the words of thy servant.] Having no answer to that question, he desires him to be so patient, as to suffer him to argue awhile with him.

If the Lord have stirred thee up against me, let him accept an offering.] For God is not implacable, but willing to be reconciled, if I have offended him. Or the meaning may be, If, for any offence against God, there be just cause for this anger, I refuse not to die, and expiate the faults with my blood. Or the words may refer to Saul, as if he had said, Offer to God some sacrifice, that he, being appeased, may free thee from this pertinacious melancholy.

But if they be the children of men, cursed be they before the Lord; for they have driven me out this day from abiding in the inheritance of the Lord.] From having any settled abode in his own country; which he foresaw he should be forced also to leave, as we read he did in the next chapter.

Saying, Go, serve other gods.] That was the effect of their actions, though they did not say so in so many words. For they banished him into a nation of another religion, as Mr. Mede expounds these words. (See book iii. p. 823.)

Ver. 20. Now therefore, let not my blood fall to the earth before the face of the Lord.] God seeing it, and being the avenger.

For the king of Israel cometh out to seek a flea.] Which was neither for his profit nor for his glory. (See xxiv. 14.)

As when one doth hunt a partridge in the mountains.] Hunt a poor bird from mountain to mountain, with a great deal of labour, which is not easily caught, and worth nothing when one hath it: the Hebrew word kore is no where to be found, but here and in Jer. xvii. 11. from both which places we learn it was a mountainous bird of no great value: in taking of which, the fowler spent his pains to little purpose. And it was one of those birds that sits upon the eggs of other birds; as the words of Jeremiah import, "She gathereth what she hath not brought forth," that is, eggs which she did not lay. From which it is apparent, that this word doth not signify a partridge, which is a bird of price, and doth not sit on other birds' eggs; but, as Bochart hath taken a great deal of pains to shew, was a bird with a long bill and short feet, called rusticula. I will not mention the opinions of interpreters about it, for they are very various, and the same men are not constant to themselves; for R. Solomon, who here takes it for a partridge, in that place of the prophet Jeremiah takes it for a cuckoo. (See Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. i. cap. 12.)

Ver. 21. Then said Saul, I have sinned: return, my son David.] He invites him to come to the court again; which is more than he did at their former meeting.

For I will no more do thee harm, because my soul was precious in thine eyes this day: I have played the fool, and have erred exceedingly.] This is a very ingenuous confession, wherein he condemned himself as a great offender against God and against David. In which for the present, no doubt, he was very serious, and both ashamed and sorry for what he had done.

Ver. 22. And David answered and said, Behold the king's spear! let one of the young men come over and fetch it.] He durst not venture to go and present it himself to Saul, though it was the testimony of his fidelity and affection to him. For he did not know but the evil spirit might come on a sudden upon him, and make him change his good resolution.

Ver. 23. The Lord render to every man according to his righteousness and faithfulness: for the Lord delivered thee this day into my hand, but I would not stretch forth my hand against the Lord's anointed.] He repeats what Saul had confessed, the more to affect his heart with it: and tells him he doubted not the Lord would deal with him accordingly, howsoever Saul used him.

Ver. 24. Behold, as thy life was set by this day in mine eyes, so let my life be set by in the sight of the Lord, and let him deliver me out of all tribulation.] He prays God to deal with him as he had done with Saul; and then he doubted not to come out of all his troubles.

Ver. 25. And Saul said unto David, Blessed be thou, my son David; thou shalt do great things, and also shalt still prevail.] He perceived it was in vain to contend any longer against David, whom God designed for great things (as he saw by his most worthy and noble actions), and would still have the better of him, until he came to the throne: for possibly Saul looked upon the taking away his spear, which I observed (upon xxii. 6.) was his sceptre, as an omen the royal authority should be translated to David.

So David went on his way, and Saul returned to his place.] To Gibeah, from whence he came, (ver. 1.) but David did not think fit to accompany him, remembering how fickle he was, and therefore, notwithstanding all those good words, not to be trusted.

CHAP. XXVII.

Ver. 1. AND David said in his heart, I shall now perish one day by the hand of Saul.] Whose heart he believed was not altered, though he had felt lately some compunction for what he had done against him. But David had the greatest reason to believe he would never be able to compass his design, having God's promise he should be king of Israel; therefore these words were spoken in a melancholy fit, when he was under some great depression of spirit.

There is nothing better for me than that I should speedily escape into the land of the Philistines; and Saul shall despair of me, to seek me any more in any coast of Israel: so shall I escape out of his hand.] He thought, that as long as he remained in any part of Saul's dominions, he would never cease his persecution: but by going into an enemy's country, he would be forced to be quiet.

Ver. 2. And David arose, and he passed over with the six hundred men that were with him, unto Achish, the son of Maoch, king of Gath.] It is not certain that this was the same Achish mentioned xxi. 10. with whom David took shelter at his first flight from Saul. He seems rather to have been another, who is distinguished from the former by the name of his father. But whichsoever he was, he had either invited David to come thither for his security (hoping to make use of his valour or his prudence in his wars), or David had sent ambassadors before to treat with him, and had his royal word, that he should be protected by him. And it appears afterward, that he had David in great esteem; for he gave him a town for his own inheritance, (ver. 6.)

Ver. 3. And David dwelt with Achish at Gath, he and his men, every man with his household, even David with his two wives, Ahinoam the Jezreelite, and Abigail the Carmelite, Nabal's wife.] It was a very capacious place that could contain so many men and their families; some of which might be numerous. And Achish was very generous to receive so many strangers and old soldiers into his royal city, as might have made themselves masters of it. Ahinoam being here mentioned before Abigail, hath made many think she was his wife before he took the other.

Ver. 4. And it was told Saul that David was fled to Gath; and he sought no more again for him.] Unto which, it is likely, he was inclined; if he had not found it to be in vain.

Ver. 5. And David said unto Achish, If I have now found grace in thine eyes, let them give me a place in some town in the country, that I may dwell there: for why should thy servant dwell in the royal city with thee?] This he said, that he might avoid envy. For perhaps he might have too much the port of a king; having so many men at his service, and being attended, no doubt, with a considerable number of them about his person. In a private town also he might more freely exercise his own religion; without any offence to the Philistines, who worshipped other gods.

Ver. 6. Then Achish gave him Ziklag that day.] Either out of his royal bounty, or on condition of some service he should do him.

Wherefore Ziklag pertaineth unto the kings of Judah unto this day.] In the division of the land of Canaan it was first given unto the tribe of Judah, (Josh. xv. 31.) and afterward to that of Simeon, who had a portion out of the land given to Judah, (Josh. xix. 5.) But the Philistines kept possession of it, so that neither of them enjoyed it: till now it became by Achish's gift the peculiar inheritance of David and his successors.

Ver. 7. And the time that David dwelt in the country of the Philistines was a full year and four months.] How long he wandered up and down, till he settled here, we are no where told: but it is probable the persecution of Saul lasted a great while.

Ver. 8. And David and his men went out, and invaded the Geshurites, and the Gezerites, and the Amalekites: for those nations were of old the inhabitants of the land, as thou goest to Shur, even unto the land of Egypt.] The Geshurites and Gezerites were both of them relics of the Canaanites, whom God commanded to be rooted out. (See Grotius.) The Amalekites who were near had been destroyed by Saul, but not these that were afar off: or, perhaps, these were some that fled into these remote parts when they heard Saul was coming against them. And the following words (ver. 11. of David's killing all) must be understood, that he left none alive whom he found in these parts: but there still were Amalekites in other places, (xxx. 1.) Abarbinel imagines all the people here mentioned were at enmity with Achish, and hated him and his people: so that when David smote them he made no complaint about it.

Ver. 9. And David smote the land, and left neither man nor woman alive, and took away the sheep, and the oxen, and the asses, and the camels, and the apparel, and returned, and came to Achish.] To give an account of his actions, and to present him, I suppose, with part of the spoil.

Ver. 10. And Achish said, Whither have ye made a road to-day?] For David, it is likely, constantly kept his men in exercise upon some expedition or other.

And David said, Against the south of Judah, and against the south of the Jerahmeelites, and against the south of the Kenites.] He answers Achish cunningly, in such ambiguous words, that he might understand him as if he had assaulted the land of Judah; whereas he only fell upon those people who bordered on those parts which he mentions. For these countries lay on the south of Judah: and the Jerahmeelites were a part of Judea, and the Kenites of the family of Jethro were their neighbours and confederates.

Ver. 11. And David saved neither man nor woman alive to bring tidings to Gath, saying, Lest they should tell on us, saying, So did David, and so will be his manner all the while he dwelleth in the country of the Philistines.] Who had people of some countries thereabouts; perhaps tributaries to them, and under their protection: whom they might fear David would serve in the same manner, had they known how he dealt with these.

Ver. 12. And Achish believed David, saying, He hath made his people utterly to abhor him; therefore he shall be my servant for ever.] The enmity between him and his own people being, as he thought, irreconcilable, he must make him his friend by faithful service for ever.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Ver. 1. AND it came to pass in those days.] While David was in the country of the Philistines.

That the Philistines gathered their armies together for warfare, to fight with Israel.] Mustered all their forces to invade the land of Israel, being encouraged, it is probable, by the banishment of David, the death of Samuel, and the frenzy of Saul.

And Achish said unto David, Know thou assuredly, that thou shalt go with me to battle, thou and thy men.] Achish seems to have been the principal person in the country, and the commander of all their forces. For we read of no other king among them but he: who required David, who was now one of his subjects, to assist him in this warfare against his own native country.

Ver. 2. And David said to Achish, Surely thou shalt know what thy servant can do.] He answered in doubtful words, which might be taken in different senses.

And Achish said to David, Therefore will I make thee keeper of my head for ever.] Achish understood him that he would do his best to serve him: and thereupon promised, if he did, that he would make him captain of his guard, or some great officer, near to his person.

Ver. 3. Now Samuel was dead, and all Israel lamented him, and buried him in Ramah, even in his own city.] This was noted before, (xxv. 1.) but repeated here again, to shew that Saul now was sensible of his loss, wanting his advice in a time of great distress.

And Saul had put away those that had familiar spirits, and the wizards, out of the land.] According to the Divine commandment, (Lev. xx. 27.) which, perhaps, he had executed in the beginning of his reign, when he was governed by Samuel: or if he did it since, it was to shew that he had some zeal for God left, whereby he kept up his authority among the people.

Ver. 4. And the Philistines gathered themselves together.] Met at an appointed place.

And came and pitched in Shunem.] A place in the tribe of Issachar, as we learn from Josh. xix. 18.

And Saul gathered all Israel together, and pitched in Gilboa.] A mountain near the valley of Jezreel, not far from Shunem: as that place in Joshua informs us. So that they seem to be pitched, as they were before the great battle was fought when Goliath fell, upon two mountains, with a valley between them.

Ver. 5. And when Saul saw the host of the Philistines.] Of which he had a full view from Mount Gilboa.

He was afraid, and his heart greatly trembled.] For the Spirit of God having forsaken him, his courage very much failed him, when he saw how numerous the Philistines were, and heard, perhaps, that David was among them; and reflected upon all the evil he had done unto him.

Ver. 6. And when Saul inquired of the Lord.] This seems to contradict what is said 1 Chron. x. 14. that he did not inquire of the Lord: which was the reason that he slew him. But Kimchi and others thus reconcile these two places; that since he did not continue to inquire of him, but went to a witch, it was all one as if he had not inquired at all; for he did it faintly, coldly, and indifferently: resolving, if he was not heard there, to go to some other place for counsel. See Buxtorf, Hist. Urim et Thummim; who observes, out of Samuel Laniado, a learned Jew, that "he whose heart is perfect with God, lifts up his eyes unto him, and fixes them on him; hoping in him, though he doth not presently hear him: and perseveres in his hopes, firmly settling a resolution to wait upon him. But so did not Saul, who was remiss and negligent, saying, If God will not hear me, I will go and consult a familiar spirit."

The Lord answered him not.] Because he had killed his priests, as R. Solomon here notes. And by this means, as R. Levi ben Gersom here farther observes, had nobody capable of the Holy Spirit to consult God for him.

Neither by dreams.] By which he prayed, perhaps, that God would inform himself.

Nor by urim.] Kimchi thinks that he sent to Abiathar to inquire about the event of this war: for he had the urim with him. It is observable, that the Scripture never saith that God answered by thummim; for that is comprehended under urim: which is always put first when they are joined together, and here it is mentioned alone. (See xxiii. 6.)

Nor by prophets.] A college of which, no doubt, was still remaining at Ramah; whom Samuel had educated. It will not be amiss to observe, that the same ways of inquiry were among the gentiles, as appears by what Achilles saith, in the council of the Greeks, who met to consider about the plague Apollo had sent among them: (Iliad. i. ver. 62.)

Ἀλλ' ἄγε δή τινα μάντιν ἐρείομεν ἢ ἱερῆα,
Ἢ καὶ ὀνειροπόλον, (καὶ γὰρ τ' ὄναρ ἐκ Διός ἐστιν)
Ὅς κ' εἴποι———

Where he reckons three sorts of men, a prophet, or a priest, or an expounder of dreams; who might tell why Apollo was so angry with them.

Ver. 7. Then said Saul unto his servants, Seek me a woman that hath a familiar spirit, that I may go to her, and inquire of her.] In this he acted like a distracted man, who now approved what he had condemned. He mentions a woman rather than a man; because the weaker sex were most addicted to these practices (being most easily deceived by evil spirits), among whom such a person he thought might be soonest found.

And his servants said unto him, There is a woman that hath a familiar spirit.] There are always some flatterers in courts, who will never contradict their princes; but are ready to comply with them in their worst designs. And it appears by this, that though this sort of divination was not publicly practised, yet it was known that there were some who privately continued to consult the dead. I say publicly, because it is very probable that before Saul executed the law against them, there were those that made profession of having familiar spirits, as there were among the heathen. For Plutarch, in the life of Cimon, speaks of Pausanias' going to a Νεκυομαντεῖον (an oracle of the dead) at Heraclea, where he called up the soul of Cleonice.

At En-dor.] A place in the tribe of Manasseh, (Josh. xvii. 11.) not far from Shunem, as Salianus observes: and part of the mountain of Gilboa was over against En-dor, and another part of it against Shunem. This woman, the Jewish doctors say, was the mother of Abner.

Ver. 8. And Saul disguised himself, and put on other raiment, and went, and two servants with him.] He put off his royal apparel, and clothed himself like an ordinary man, having but a small attendance; that he might not be suspected to be what he was. These two servants, the Jewish doctors say, were Abner and Amasa.

And they came to the woman by night.] They could not go the direct way, for then they must have passed through the army of the Philistines: and therefore they fetched a compass, and travelled also by night, that they might not be discovered. And it is likely they went on foot, that less notice might be taken of them; and they might go and return through by-ways, which made their journey the longer. In the night also it was, that women went about such magical practices. For, as Psellus observes in his book of Demons, it is the common opinion of the Greeks, that none of the terrestrial demons dare appear in the day-time. Ἑλληνικῆς γάρ ἐστι δόξης τὸ μηδένα τῶν ἐνύλων δαιμόνων θαρρεῖν τὰς τοῦ ἡλίου αὐγάς. Nay, he saith all those things were performed after the summer solstice; when the days grew short, and the nights increased.

And he said, Divine unto me by the familiar spirits, and bring me him up whom I shall name unto thee.] This consulting the dead, was a very ancient practice among the gentiles, as appears from Homer: but long before him, mentioned by Moses himself, who forbids it in Deut. xviii. 10. Notwithstanding which, the Israelites, who had a Divine oracle, and holy prophets to guide them, fell into this foul sin, as they did into most of the gentile abominations.

Ver. 9. And the woman said unto him, Behold, thou knowest what Saul hath done, how he hath cut off those who have familiar spirits, and wizards, out of the land: wherefore then layest thou a snare for my life, to cause me to die?] For so the law was, (Lev. xx. 27.) And Saul seems by the woman's speech to have executed it, for she saith he had cut them off; whereas it is only said, that he had put them away: as if he had failed in his duty; and merely banished such persons, when he should have put them to death.

Ver. 10. And Saul sware unto her by the Lord, saying, As the Lord liveth, there shall no punishment happen to thee for this thing.] An oath was so sacred a thing in those days, that they entirely relied upon it, and ventured their lives upon its credit.

Ver. 11. Then said the woman, whom shall I bring up to thee? And he said, Bring me up Samuel.] It is a wonderful thing that he should believe a woman should have power to disturb the rest of Samuel, and bring him thither at her command. But he was forsaken by God, and grown delirious.

Ver. 12. And when the woman saw Samuel.] Here interpreters are very much divided; some imagining it was Samuel himself that appeared; others, a spectre, which by the power of the devil, appeared in his likeness. Several of the ancient fathers are of the former opinion, and particularly Justin Martyr; who, in his dialogue with Trypho the Jew, alleges this as a demonstration of the immortality of the soul, p. 333. And most of the Roman church are now of the same mind. But Tertullian saith, (in his book De Anima, cap. 57.) "God forbid we should believe the soul of any holy man, much less of a prophet, should be brought up by the power of the devil." Of this persuasion are a great number of the ancients, particularly St. Cyril of Alexandria, who thinks it the greatest absurdity to believe that a wretched woman should call up Samuel's soul; the demons, with whom such people deal, having no such power. And so St. Jerome calls this Samuelis phantasma. Yet there are vast numbers of modern authors, who think that by God's permission, or dispensation, the soul of Samuel might appear; which Sir John Marsham himself takes not to be improbable. (See Chron. Canon. xiii.) But the very letter of the text seems to me to be against this opinion; which speaks of bringing him up, and his coming up out of the earth; whereas, if it had been Samuel, he should rather have come down from heaven. This apparition, therefore, was one of those fallacious spirits, whom Porphyry speaks of (lib. ii. De Abstinentia), "who put on any shape, and counterfeit (as his words are) the gods, and demons, and the souls of the dead;" Γένος ἀπατῆλης φύσεως παντόμορφον καὶ πολύτροπον, ὑποκρινόμενον καὶ θεοὺς, καὶ δαίμονας, καὶ ψυχὰς τεθνηκότων. Which a very learned person (Joh. Wagenseil) hath confirmed, by this reason, which to me seems very solid; that since God was not pleased to answer Saul (as he confessed) either by prophets, or by dreams, or by urim and thummim, but had withdrawn himself wholly from him, it is not probable, that he would send Samuel himself to him from the dead (and none else could do it), and that at the call of a witch, when he would not favour him with any revelation from a living prophet, or any other way. (Confut. Carm. Lipmanni, p. 198.)

She cried with a loud voice: and the woman spake to Saul, saying, Why hast thou deceived me? for thou art Saul.] She cried out for fear of Saul, when she perceived, by the reverence the spectre paid him, who he was. For so Abarbinel interprets it, he bowed with his face to the ground, in honour of Saul, whereby the woman concluded he was the king.

Ver. 13. And the king said unto her, Be not afraid.] Do not imagine I come with any design to discover thee, and bring thee to punishment.

For what sawest thou?] But tell me what appeared to thee.

And she said, I saw gods ascending out of the earth.] By the word Elohim the Jews understand a judge; for so judges are called in Psal. lxxxii. 1. 6. Peter Martyr therefore interprets it not amiss, a person very majestic, like a judge or a king. And so R. Esaias, mentioned by Vorstius upon Pirke Eliezer, (p. 113.) who by Elohim understands "hominem insignis atque excelsæ staturæ," a man of an eminent and high stature; as the Scripture calls high trees and mountains, trees and mountains of God. And he is said to ascend out of the earth. For so the heathen endeavoured (as Homer, Virgil, Statius, and other ancient poets tell us) to bring up the dead out of the earth, to give them answers to their doubts. Which wicked custom prevailed long among the Jews; for Isaiah alludes to it in xxix. 4. when he saith, they should be brought so low, as to speak like a familiar spirit out of the ground, and whisper out of the dust. And it is evident likewise from Isa. lxv. 4. that they were wont to go to the sepulchres of the dead, there to consult them. For that is the meaning of sacrificing in gardens, (ver. 3.) for there they were wont to bury their dead.

Ver. 14. And he said unto her, What form is he of?] This is an argument he saw nothing, but afterward heard a voice.

And she said, An old man cometh up; and he is covered with a mantle.] Such as kings wore, and also prophets, who had very great authority, (xv. 27. 2 Kings ii. 8. 13.) The Hebrew word meil signifies as much as the Greek ποδήρης, a long garment which came down to the feet.

And Saul perceived that it was Samuel, and he stooped with his face to the ground, and bowed himself.] By the description which the woman gave of him, he concluded it was Samuel; and thereupon made his reverence to him.

Ver. 15. And Samuel said to Saul, Why hast thou disquieted me, and brought me up?] This shews it was an evil spirit, personating Samuel, who spake these words. For it is not in the power of witches to disturb the rest of good men, and to bring them into this world when they please. And Samuel, we may be sure, would never have acknowledged such a power in magical arts, the credit of which the devil endeavoured to support.

And Saul answered, I am sore distressed; for the Philistines make war against me, and God is departed from me, and answereth me no more, neither by prophets nor by dreams; therefore I have called thee, that thou mayest make known to me what I shall do.] Some think he omits inquiry by urim, because, in truth, he neither did nor could make use of that: Abiathar having carried it away to David. But this doth not agree with ver. 6. which supposes he did inquire by urim. He should rather, by repentance, and prayer, and sacrifices, and doing right to David, have besought the favour of God, as Pellicanus here well observes.

Ver. 16. And Samuel said to Saul, Wherefore dost thou ask me, seeing the Lord is departed from thee, and become thine enemy?] Nothing could be more senseless than to imagine Samuel could do any thing for him, when the Lord, whose servant Samuel was, would not regard him.

Ver. 17. And the Lord hath done to him.] That is, to David, mentioned in the conclusion of the verse.

As he spake by me.] Still the evil spirit personates Samuel, that Saul might be deceived into a belief that it was really he who spake to him.

For the Lord hath rent the kingdom out of thy hand, and given it to thy neighbour, even unto David.] As Samuel had foretold long ago; and now it was ready to be accomplished.

Ver. 18. Because thou obeyedst not the voice of the Lord.] This relates (Abarbinel thinks) to his sin in Gilgal, (chap. xiii.)

Nor executed his fierce wrath upon Amalek.] This was his next sin, whereby he highly provoked God's anger against him: for he was not sensible he had offended his express command, but justified his conduct, till Samuel took a great deal of pains to convince him; and then told him he would rend the kingdom from him, (xv. 28.)

Therefore hath the Lord done this unto thee this day.] He doth not mention his sin in killing the Lord's priests; because this decree of taking the kingdom from him was passed before that sin was committed.

Ver. 19. Moreover, the Lord will also deliver Israel with thee into the hand of the Philistines.] Samuel himself could no more know this, than an evil spirit; unless God had been pleased to suggest it: which he might think good to do to this ghost, which personated Samuel, that he might terrify Saul. Or, he saw the Philistines to be so numerous, and Saul so feeble and dispirited, that he doubted not the victory would be on the Philistines' side; and therefore confidently pronounced it. But the former is more probable, that God used this evil spirit to declare his mind at this time: so that he spake nothing but by his direction.

And to-morrow shalt thou and thy sons be with me.] If we take the word to-morrow strictly, Eustathius, archbishop of Antioch, his argument against Origen is good, that this could not be Samuel who spake, because his words are false: there being more than a day between this and the fight, as many have clearly proved from the story itself. But the meaning may be no more, than very shortly thou shalt be as I am, that is, dead. For, as many have well observed (particularly Hackspan, in his disputation concerning Angels and Demons), by these words, be with me, "mors simpliciter notatur, non vero peculiaris mortem secutus status;" death is simply noted, but not the state which follows after death.

And the Lord shall deliver the host of Israel into the hand of the Philistines.] He would not have him think his army should be able to defend him. Abarbinel observes, that he reckons up three judgments, in the very order wherein they fell out (which shews all was spoken by God's order); first, that the host of Israel should be delivered into the hand of the Philistines; then, that Saul and his sons should be slain; and, lastly, that the Philistines should come and dwell in their cities, (xxxi. 7.) which he takes to be the sense of the last words, which otherwise are only a repetition of the first.

Ver. 20. And Saul fell straightway all along on the earth, and was afraid, because of the words of Samuel: and there was no strength in him; for he had eaten no bread all the day, nor all the night.] No wonder he fainted away, being weak in body for want of food; and extremely afflicted in mind by this dismal message, which Samuel, he thought, brought him from God.

Ver. 21. And the woman came unto Saul.] These words suggest that Saul was in some private room, where he alone heard the words that were spoken by the apparition.

And saw that he was sore troubled, and said unto him, Behold, thy handmaid hath obeyed thy voice, and I have put my life in thy hand, and have hearkened unto thy words which thou spakest unto me.] She had exposed herself to extreme danger: for what we carry in our hand may easily fall out, or be snatched from us.

Ver. 22. Now therefore, I pray thee, hearken thou also unto the voice of thine handmaid, and let me set a morsel of bread before thee, and eat; that thou mayest have strength when thou goest on thy way.] For without some refreshment she saw it would be impossible for him to get to his camp again.

Ver. 23. But he refused, and said, I will not.] He chose rather to die there than by the Philistines.

But his servants, together with the woman, compelled him.] Pressed him so hard, that he yielded to them.

And he hearkened to their voice.] Who knew nothing of what he had heard, but thought he had fainted away only for want of food.

So he arose from the earth, and sat upon the bed.] As the manner (I observed before) then was; and not to lie along when they ate.

Ver. 24. And the woman had a fat calf in the house.] The Hebrew word marbek is well translated fat, as Bochartus confesses, though it properly signifies (as he demonstrates) a calf that treads out the corn, and is fatted up by that means. (Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 31.)

And she hasted, and killed it, and took flour and kneaded it, and did bake unleavened bread thereof.] Because there was no time to let it ferment.

Ver. 25. And she brought it before Saul, and before his servants; and they did eat. Then they arose up and went away that night.] Before the break of day; that none might discover they had been with such a woman.

CHAP. XXIX.

Ver. 1. NOW the Philistines gathered all their army to Aphek.] There were three places of this name; one in the tribe of Judah, another in Manasseh, and a third in Asher. Which last seems to be here meant, where the sons of Eli were slain. (See iv. 1.)

And the Israelites pitched by a mountain which is in Jezreel.] A valley which was overlooked by the mountain Gilboa: from whence the Israelites came down (xxviii. 4.) to draw up their army here.

Ver. 2. And the lords of the Philistines passed on by hundreds and by thousands.] When they took a view of their army, the great men appeared, some at the head of a hundred, some of a thousand soldiers.

But David and his men passed on in the rear-ward with Achish.] Who seems to have been the general of the army: and to have made David and his men his life-guard, according to his resolution, xxviii. 2.

Ver. 3. Then said the princes of the Philistines, What do these Hebrews here?] Who they were afraid would prove false to them, and take part with their own countrymen.

And Achish said unto the princes of the Philistines, Is not this David, the servant of Saul the king of Israel, who hath been with me these days, or these years.] The meaning is, I may say years, not days: for he had been with him part of two years: and, if he had not formerly known him, his predecessor had, (xxi. 10.) and it is likely he had held correspondence with him before he came to him.

And I have found no fault in him since he fell unto me unto this day?] This intimates, that he looked on him as revolted from Saul; and, by the experience he had of his fidelity, he thought he might be still trusted.

Ver. 4. And the princes of the Philistines were wroth with him; and the princes of the Philistines said unto him.] In an angry tone.

Make this fellow return, that he may go again to his place which thou hast appointed him.] At Ziklag, which they were contented he should possess.

And let him not go down with us to the battle, lest in the battle he be an adversary to us.] And thereby do them more mischief than the army of the Israelites.

For wherewith should he reconcile himself to his master? should it not be with the heads of these men?] That is, of the Philistines. They reasoned wisely, according to the common practice of mankind; and well it was for David, that they were such politicians: for hereby God delivered him out of a very great strait; either of being an enemy to his country, or false to his friends, and to his trust. And by the same good providence he was sent back to rescue his wives, and the wives and children of his men, who were taken captive.

Ver. 5. Is not this David, of whom they sang one to another in dances, saying, Saul hath slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands?] They remembered that he was their old enemy, who killed Goliath: and was highly magnified for it above Saul himself.

Ver. 6. Then Achish called David, and said unto him, Surely, as the Lord liveth.] He swears by the God whom David worshipped, that he might be the more believed: or, perhaps, he had learned something from David of the true God, though he worshipped others with him.

Thou hast been upright, and thy going out and coming in with me in the host is good in my sight.] He commends him as an unblameable person in his private conversation; and as an excellent commander in his army.

For I have not found evil in thee since the day of thy coming unto me unto this day.] A very honourable testimony from a foreign prince.

Nevertheless the lords favour thee not.] Unto whom Achish was forced to yield: for he was not an absolute king; but the lords of the country still retained a great authority.

Ver. 7. Wherefore now return, and go in peace, that thou displease not the lords of the Philistines.] From the effects of whose envy and jealousy he could not preserve him.

Ver. 8. And David said unto Achish, But what have I done? and what hast thou found in thy servant, so long as I have been with thee unto this day, that I may not go fight against the enemies of my lord the king?] He had told him before that he found not the least fault in him: therefore this question may seem impertinent. But David was to act his part handsomely upon this occasion; so that, though he was inwardly pleased, he would not have them suspect he was glad to be dismissed: and therefore, since the king was satisfied with his fidelity, asks why he might not be trusted to fight against his enemies, and that his lords would give him a reason? But Abarbinel thinks he never intended this; but being chosen by Achish to be the keeper of his head, (xxviii. 2.) he resolved only to discharge this office; but not to join in the battle against Israel.

Ver. 9. And Achish answered and said to David, I know that thou art good in my sight, as an angel of God.] He had learned something, as I observed before, (ver. 6.) of the Hebrew religion: and it appears by this, of their language also. And the meaning is, he looked upon David as a man sent down from heaven to him: all things prospering that he took in hand.

Notwithstanding, the princes of the Philistines have said, He shall not go with us to battle.] They seem to have made such an order in council: which the king durst not contradict.

Ver. 10. Wherefore now rise up early in the morning.] Lest any mischief should come to him, if he delayed his departure.

With thy master's servants that are come with thee.] This intimates, that the lords of the Philistines would not trust them, because they looked on them still as Saul's subjects.

And as soon as ye be up early in the morning, and have light, depart.] He advises them to lose no time, but, as soon as they could see their way, leave the army, and march to Ziklag.

Ver. 11. So David and his men rose up early in the morning, to return into the land of the Philistines.] For now they were in the Philistines' camp, in the land of Israel, at Aphek, (ver. 1.)

And the Philistines went up to Jezreel.] To the battle to the Israelites, who were pitched there, (ver. 1.)

CHAP. XXX.

Ver. 1. AND it came to pass, when David and his men were come to Ziklag on the third day.] So many days' journey it was from the camp of the Philistines to this place. (See the beginning of the next book, ver. 2.)

That the Amalekites had invaded the south, and Ziklag, and smote Ziklag, and burnt it with fire.] To revenge themselves for what David had done to them, (xxvii. 8.) which they might easily do, when he and his men were absent; and but a small, if any, guard left in the place.

Ver. 2. And had taken the women captives that were therein: they slew not any, either great or small, but carried them away, and went on their way.] Towards their own country. This may seem strange, that David having killed all he could meet with, and spared none, neither men nor women, (xxvii. 9. 11.) they should not serve his people in the same kind. But though they sought revenge, yet they desired booty much more: being a poor and very covetous people; who intended to sell them for slaves, and make money of them.

Ver. 3. And David and his men came to the city, and, behold, it was burnt with fire; and their wives, and their sons, and their daughters, were taken captive.] This befel David when he seemed to be in the greatest security: having escaped the fury of Saul, and also the service of the Philistines; who were likely to make Saul pay very dear for his ill usage of David. But such is the state of this world, we are often surprised with sudden unexpected troubles; and, as the proverb is, "Many things fall out between the cup and the lip."

Ver. 4. And David and the people that were with him lifted up their voice and wept, until they had no power to weep.] For such calamities are enough to break the heart of the most courageous and undaunted spirits.

Ver. 5. And David's two wives were taken captive, Ahinoam the Jezreelite, and Abigail the wife of Nabal the Carmelite.] This is set down distinctly, to aggravate David's loss.

Ver. 6. And David was greatly distressed: for the people

spake of stoning him.] As the cause of this calamity, in leaving the city unguarded: or in provoking the Amalekites so grievously as he had done, in the slaughter of all he could find.

Because the soul of the people was grieved, every man for his sons and for his daughters.] Grief took away the use of their reason.

But David encouraged himself in the Lord his God.] Who had never failed him in the greatest distresses: but done great things for him, and promised to do greater.

Ver. 7. And David said to Abiathar the priest, Ahimelech's son, Bring me hither, I pray thee, the ephod.] From these words Petrus Cunæus (lib. i. de Rep. Heb. cap. 14.) concludes, that the kings of Israel might make use of the ephod, as well as the high-priest: because David saith, Bring me hither, &c. But this doth not signify that he himself meant to use it; but only that he desired it might be used for him: according to what is said of Joshua, in Numb. xxvii. 21. that he should stand before Eleazar the priest, who should inquire for him, &c.

And Abiathar brought thither the ephod unto David.] From these words the same Cunæus, in an epistle of his to Caspar Barlæus, (Epist. Ecclesiasticæ, 506. p. 767.) argues for his forenamed opinion, because it is not said he brought it le David, but el David; the former of which, he thinks, might have signified for his use; but this denotes, it was for him to use himself: which he endeavours to confirm from the high privilege which the king had above other men, of sitting in the house of God, &c. But this is confuted lately by a man very learned in these matters, (John Braunius, lib. ii. de Vest. Hebr. Sacerd. cap. 20. n. 32.) who well observes (as Buxtorf also doth), that in the foregoing words David doth say, Bring the ephod, li, i. e. pro me, or mea causa, for me, or in meam gratiam, for my sake.

Ver. 8. And David inquired at the Lord, saying, Shall I pursue after this troop?] He inquired by Abiathar. So all the Hebrew doctors, as Buxtorf observes in his Hist. Urim. cap. 3.

Shall I overtake them?] This shews it is a vain observation of the Jews, that they were not to ask two questions together: for David still continues to do so here, as he had done at Keilah: though God, they say there, had set him right in his inquiry, and taught him to do otherwise.

And he answered him, Pursue; for thou shalt surely overtake them, and without fail recover all.] He answers both questions at once, and tells him also more than he asked; that he should regain all that he had lost: which, no doubt, was a mighty encouragement unto him in his pursuit.

Ver. 9. So David went, he and the six hundred men that were with him, and came to the brook Besor, where those that were left behind stayed.] They that were left to look after the stuff, (ver. 24.) who were so tired, that they were not able to march any farther.

Ver. 10. So David pursued, he and four hundred men: for two hundred abode behind, who were so faint that they could not go over the brook Besor.] Grief, it is likely, made them neglect to take necessary refreshment before they came out.

Ver. 11. And they found an Egyptian in the field.] They knew him to be so by his habit: or, perhaps, they did not know whence he was, until he came to himself and told them. But finding him in the garb of a soldier, they thought he belonged to the Amalekites.

And brought him to David.] Half dead.

And they gave him bread, and he did eat; and they made him drink water.] Natural compassion might move them to this: but they had another motive, which was the hope of making some discovery, by his means, where the enemies were.

Ver. 12. And they gave him a piece of a cake of figs, and two clusters of raisins.] Did all they could to comfort him up, and revive his spirits.

And, when he had eaten, his spirit came again to him; for he had eaten no bread, nor drunk any water, three days and three nights.] Having nobody near him to look after him: and being so sick, he could not look after himself. This is to be understood as Matt. xii. 40. of one whole day, and part of two others: as appears from the next verse, where he saith, Three days ago I fell sick. In the Hebrew, I fell sick this third day; i. e. this is the third day since I fell sick.

Ver. 13. And David said, To whom belongest thou? and whence art thou? And he said, I am a young man of Egypt, servant to an Amalekite; and my master left me, because three days ago I fell sick.] A barbarous act, to leave him there to perish, when they had camels good store for the carriage of men, as well as of their spoil, (ver. 17.) But this inhumanity cost them dear: for by this means they lost their own lives. Such is the wonderful providence of God (as Conr. Pellicanus here piously observes), which governs all the desires, and thoughts, and counsels, and works, and whatsoever is done among men, both the good and the bad.

Ver. 14. And we made an invasion upon the south of the Cherethites.] They are the same with the Philistines. For the Arabians call their country (as Bochartus observes) Keritha, and the Syrians call it Creth. Whose inhabitants the Hebrews call Crethi, or Crethim. And to put all out of doubt, the south of the Cherethites here mentioned, is, in the sixth verse explained, the land of the Philistines. Who were excellent archers, as we may gather from xxxi. 3. (See there.)

And upon the coast that belongeth to Judah.] The south coast of that tribe.

And upon the land of Caleb.] We read no where else of this land: which, in all probability, signifies that south part of Judah which was given to Caleb, and which his posterity inherited, (Josh. xiv. 13.)

And we burnt Ziklag with fire.] With which they seem to have ended their expedition.

Ver. 15. And David said, Canst thou bring me down to this company? And he said, Swear unto me by the Lord, that thou wilt neither kill me, nor deliver me into the hand of my master.] Who, it is likely, had otherwise been cruel to him: and, therefore, he had no mind to serve him any longer. Besides, his service, I suppose, was no better than slavery.

And I will bring thee down to this company.] For he heard them say, it is likely, where they would stay and rest themselves.

Ver. 16. And when he had brought him down.] Who had given him security, no doubt, by his oath, as he desired: and that, as I observed before, was such a sacred thing in ancient times, that all men relied upon it.

Behold, they were spread abroad upon the earth, eating and drinking, and dancing, because of the great spoil they had taken out of the land of the Philistines, and out of the land of Judah.] They had laid aside their arms, and were feasting and making merry; as men are wont to do, when they have had great success in their enterprises.

Ver. 17. And David smote them from the twilight even unto the evening of the next day.] He came upon them in the evening, when they were refreshing and resting themselves with mirth and jollity: being secure that no danger was near them; because the Israelites and the Philistines (among whom they thought David was) were ready to engage; so that he could no more come to revenge himself, than the Philistines could for the injuries done to them. And it is probable David let them fall asleep, when they had eaten and drunk liberally; and at peep of day fell upon them, and hunted them until the evening, which begun the next day.

And there escaped not a man of them, save four hundred young men, that rode upon camels.] The country of Arabia, where this people lived, abounded with camels: one sort of which run very swiftly. They were used also by some nations in battle: as Vegetius observes, lib. iii. de Re Militari, cap. 23. (See Stewechius's Annotations on him.)

Ver. 18. And recovered all that the Amalekites had carried away; and David rescued his two wives.] Which are here particularly mentioned, because he had the greatest concern for them.

Ver. 19. And there was nothing lacking to them, neither small nor great, neither son nor daughter, neither spoil, nor any thing they had taken to them.] According to the word of God, (ver. 6.)

Ver. 20. And David took all the flocks and the herds.] Which had been taken by the Amalekites from the Philistines, and other places.

Which they drave before those other cattle.] His soldiers drave them before those cattle that had been taken from David and his men.

And said, This is David's spoil.] Not that he challenged it all to himself: but that it was acquired by his valour and conduct; which they now magnified, who lately spake of stoning him. For some think they sung a triumphant song, and that this was the burden of it: which they repeated at the end of every verse.

Ver. 21. And David came to the two hundred men, which were so faint that they could not follow David, whom he had made also to abide at the brook Besor.] That they might look after their stuff.

And they went forth to meet David, and to meet the people that were with him.] To congratulate their happy success: and to receive their wives and children, who had been carried captive.

And when David came unto the people, he saluted them.] He was glad to see them, and inquired how they did (as it is in the margin), for he had left them very weak.

Ver. 22. Then answered all the wicked men, and men of Belial, of those that went with David, and said.] It is likely David told these two hundred men, when he saluted them, that they should lose nothing by their not being able to go along with him: which made these men, who had no conscience, but were only greedy of prey, to say what follows.

Because they went not with us, we will not give them aught of the spoil which we have recovered, save to every man his wife and his children, that he may lead them away, and depart.] This was a savage resolution of such as feared not God, nor regarded men: since it was not the choice of their brethren to stay behind, but mere necessity and inability to travel further.

Ver. 23. Then said David.] Who still preserved his authority over the most wicked among them.

Ye shall not do so, my brethren.] He overrules them: but thought fit to do it in a friendly manner.

With that which God hath given us, who hath preserved us, and delivered the company that came against us into our hand.] As much as to say, When God hath been so good to us, we ought not to be unkind to our brethren.

Ver. 24. For who will hearken unto you in this matter?] No equal persons, he was confident, would be of their opinion, if the matter was referred to them.

But as his part is that goeth down to the battle, so shall his part be that tarrieth by the stuff: their parts shall be alike.] Polybius explains the order of dividing the spoils of war, (as Grotius observes, lib. iii. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 6. sect. 17.) some of which was allotted those who remained in the camp. But the proportions were various in several places. In some, a simple portion was given to a footman; a double to a centurion; and a treble to a horseman. In other places they varied from this: but howsoever the division was made, the commander-in-chief was allowed to take the best of the spoil to himself: as David perhaps now did: and then left the rest to be equally divided among his men. But the Talmudists say, that, in aftertimes, the king had all the royal furniture that was found in the tent of the conquered prince given unto him for his share.

Ver. 25. And it was so, from that day forward, that he made it a statute and an ordinance for Israel unto this day.] The equity of this law appears from hence: that by common consent these two hundred men were left behind to look after their baggage: and they were part of the same body of men, linked together in the same common society: and were hindered by mere weariness from going to fight, which otherwise they would have done; and their will was accepted for the deed; and they were in the same common danger; for if the four hundred had been routed, their enemies would soon have cut them off.
